youngest of the children attaining twenty-one, and the testator had contemplated one dying before that time and leaving no issue, but not the possibility of both so dying. It was clear that the word "minority" was used by the testator in his will in its ordinary sense; and then by the codicil he provided for events not contemplated in the will, and made the gift over. Taking the words in the codicil in their ordinary sense, the ulterior gift could not arise unless both the children died in their minority leaving no issue. It was argued that the word "minority" was in the codicil applied to a class, and meant the minority of each of the class; and it was competent to the testator to have used the word in that sense, but he had not shewn that such was his intention. It could not be conjectured what the testator would have done if the state of things which had since happened had been present to his mind, and the words which he had used must be taken to have been used in their ordinary sense. As illustrating his Lordship's view on such points of construction, he referred to the language of Wilde, C.J. in the case of Booth v. Scarisbrick (1), where he said, "The language of the clause is not ambiguous, but is such as is in ordinary use and bears a well-known meaning. But it is contended that, upon reference to the other parts of the will, an intention may be inferred on the part of the testator which will not be fully carried into effect by reading the clause in question in the ordinary sense attached to the language. Such imputed intentions are in most respects speculative and uncertain, and where any are to be found which the construction of the clause in question, according to its ordinary meaning, will not carry into effect, or may defeat, it is more probable that such failure will arise from the testator not having contemplated or provided for the very many events which may be supposed as possible to arise in the family, than that he used such expressions in any other than the ordinary meaning. The clause being plain and simple in its language, we do not think the rules of construction now considered as settled, will warrant the clause receiving a construction other than according to its ordinary meaning, without its appearing satisfactorily from other parts of the will that the language was used by the testator in some other sense." The appeal, in the present case, must be dismissed; the costs to be costs in the cause.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE said, that adhering, as he did, to the decisions in Hart v. Tulk and Key v. Key, he found himself unable to dissent from the Lord Chancellor in dismissing this appeal.

Principal and Surety—Fraud—Innocent Misrepresentation—Release.

An innocent party to a fraud committed by another will not be allowed to derive any benefit from that fraud, unless there has been a consideration moving from himself. Therefore, where a surety innocently joined with his principal in persuading the creditor to accept a transfer of a pretended mortgage, which turned out to have no existence, and to release the surety from his liability—Held, that such a release was inoperative.

The friends of a surety advanced money to satisfy his private debts, stipulating, however, as a condition of such advance, that he should be released from his liability as surety. The surety having been released under the circumstances above mentioned,—Held, that the creditor was not entitled to set aside the release without repaying to the friends the money advanced by them.

The bill stated, that in 1850 the plaintiff discounted for William Bell, one of the defendants, who had since absconded, two joint and several promissory notes for 150*l.* each, signed by Bell, and also by the defendant Templer, and later in the same year he agreed to advance to Bell a further sum, if the defendants would give two joint and several promissory notes for 500*l.* to secure the two sums of 150*l.* and the further sum required, and upon condition that the plaintiff should be at liberty to retain and negotiate the two bills for 150*l.*, and hold the amount when received in part satisfaction of the amount to be secured on the 500*l.* notes. The plaintiff accordingly advanced the sum required, and received from Bell two joint and several promissory notes for 500*l.* each, signed by both defendants.

In February 1851 the plaintiff advanced to Bell a further sum upon a bill of exchange for 600*l.*, drawn by Bell and accepted by Templer. This bill was presented at maturity and dishonoured.

The plaintiff was afterwards applied to to make a further advance of 500*l.* on the security of a bill or note signed by both defendants, but declined to do so.

It was then proposed that the plaintiff should take a transfer of a mortgage for 5,000*l.*, to which Bell represented that he was entitled, upon the estate of Mr. Mirehouse in Wales, stating that the money had been lent by his father, who held the mortgage and title-deeds on his behalf, and Templer strongly urged the plaintiff to do so, alleging all would be right, and that he would have a better security for his money than he then possessed.

To this arrangement the plaintiff agreed, on condition that the original mortgage and the title-deeds were to be given up to him when Bell got them out of his father's possession. Accordingly a deed of transfer was prepared, which, after reciting the alleged mortgage from Mirehouse, purported to transfer the same to the plaintiff.

The deed of transfer was dated the 13th of June 1851, and was executed by Bell and attested by Templer. Bell then requested that the promissory notes and bill of exchange might be delivered up, but the plaintiff declined to give them up until he received the title-deeds of the mortgaged premises.

In the autumn of 1851 Templer compromised with some of his creditors, the arrangement for payment of the composition extending over several years, and his relations rendering some assistance. Previously to doing so he called on the plaintiff, and told him his friends would not assist him in arranging with his own private creditors, unless he was released from his liability on the promissory notes and bill, and he also intimated that, unless he was so released, bankruptcy or insolvency would be the consequence. He also alleged, that the plaintiff would be quite safe in so releasing him, as the mortgage was a sufficient security. The plaintiff, therefore, relying on the transfer of the mortgage, and in the belief that it was a valid mortgage security, was induced to give the defendant Templer a letter as follows:—

Shortly after this Templer called on the plaintiff, and stated that his friends were not satisfied with the letter, inasmuch as the plaintiff might indorse the notes and bill to some other person, and the plaintiff was induced, by the defendant still assuring him that the transfer was a perfectly good security, to add a postscript to the letter, as follows:—“P.S. Of course, I have struck your name out of the securities.” And he did thereupon strike Templer's name out of the two 500*l.* notes and the acceptance of the bill of exchange.

The bill further stated that the plaintiff afterwards made many applications to Bell and Templer for the mortgage and title-deeds, but could not obtain them, and upon applying to Bell's father for the deeds, he discovered that no such mortgage existed; that all the representations made by Bell as to the pretended mortgage were untrue; that the pretended transfer was prepared when Bell well knew that he had no interest in the pretended mortgage; and that Templer had no reason to believe that Bell was entitled to the said pretended mortgage, or that it existed, or that the said pretended transfer which he had assisted in preparing was not utterly worthless.

In December 1852 the plaintiff wrote to Templer, reminding him that he was induced to take the pretended security without the title-deeds, entirely on the representations made by Bell and himself, and youngest of the children attaining twenty-one, and the testator had contemplated one dying before that time and leaving no issue, but not the possibility of both so dying. The plaintiff accordingly advanced the sum required, and received from Bell two joint and several promissory notes for 500*l.* each, signed by both defendants.

In February 1851 the plaintiff advanced to Bell a further sum upon a bill of exchange for 600*l.*, drawn by Bell and accepted by Templer. This bill was presented at maturity and dishonoured.

The plaintiff was afterwards applied to to make a further advance of 500*l.* on the security of a bill or note signed by both defendants, but declined to do so.

In the autumn of 1851 Templer compromised with some of his creditors, the arrangement for payment of the composition extending over several years, and his relations rendering some assistance. Previously to doing so he called on the plaintiff, and told him his friends would not assist him in arranging with his own private creditors, unless he was released from his liability on the promissory notes and bill, and he also intimated that, unless he was so released, bankruptcy or insolvency would be the consequence. He also alleged, that the plaintiff would be quite safe in so releasing him, as the mortgage was a sufficient security. The plaintiff, therefore, relying on the transfer of the mortgage, and in the belief that it was a valid mortgage security, was induced to give the defendant Templer a letter as follows:—

Shortly after this Templer called on the plaintiff, and stated that his friends were not satisfied with the letter, inasmuch as the plaintiff might indorse the notes and bill to some other person, and the plaintiff was induced, by the defendant still assuring him that the transfer was a perfectly good security, to add a postscript to the letter, as follows:—“P.S. Of course, I have struck your name out of the securities.” And he did thereupon strike Templer's name out of the two 500*l.* notes and the acceptance of the bill of exchange.

The bill further stated that the plaintiff afterwards made many applications to Bell and Templer for the mortgage and title-deeds, but could not obtain them, and upon applying to Bell's father for the deeds, he discovered that no such mortgage existed; that all the representations made by Bell as to the pretended mortgage were untrue; that the pretended transfer was prepared when Bell well knew that he had no interest in the pretended mortgage; and that Templer had no reason to believe that Bell was entitled to the said pretended mortgage, or that it existed, or that the said pretended transfer which he had assisted in preparing was not utterly worthless.

In December 1852 the plaintiff wrote to Templer, reminding him that he was induced to take the pretended security without the title-deeds, entirely on the representations made by Bell and himself, and stating that he could not under the circumstances expect to be wholly released from the 1,600*l.* and interest.

In November 1856, the plaintiff having ascertained that he had omitted to strike Templer's name out of the 150*l.* bills, and considering that neither of the defendants was released in equity or at law from his liability, indorsed one of the 150*l.* notes for value, and the indorsee had commenced an action against Templer for the amount.

The bill then charged that, notwithstanding the said transfer, letter, and the erasure of the name of the defendant Templer, the defendants were still jointly and severally liable in equity to pay the amount of the two promissory notes and bill, amounting to 1,600*l.*, with interest, after deducting what might be paid on the 150*l.* note so indorsed, and on the plaintiff delivering up the other 150*l.* note. The bill then proceeded to deny an allegation by Templer, that the plaintiff was induced to accept the transfer, and to write the letter of the 24th of July, in consequence of Templer, in the spring of 1841, owing many private debts, and amongst others about 100*l.* to the plaintiff, and the friends of the defendant having resolved not to assist him to pay his private debts, unless he was released from the debts contracted by him as surety for Bell; but stated that the 100*l.* was paid by instalments under threat of legal proceedings.

The prayer of the bill was:—1. That it might be declared that the plaintiff was induced to accept the said pretended transfer of the 13th of June 1851 by the fraudulent representation of Bell, and that such pretended transfer was void and ought to be cancelled. 2. That it might be declared that the plaintiff was induced to write the letter of the 24th of July 1851, and to erase Templer's name from the notes and bill, in consequence of the execution of the said pretended transfer, and in the belief that such transfer was a valid security, but that, inasmuch as such pretended transfer was void, and notwithstanding such letter and erasure, the defendants were jointly and severally liable to pay the plaintiff the amount of the notes and bill, making together 1,600*l.*, with interest at 5*l.* per cent. from the time when the same became, or but for such erasure would have become, due, after deducting what should be paid in respect of the 150*l.* note so indorsed as aforesaid, and for consequential relief.

Davis v. Stainbank, 6 De Gex, M. & G. 679.

WOOD, V.C.—I think this case is brought within the large and general principle, that no one can profit himself by a fraud; that when a fraud is committed, as in that case of Huguenin v. Baseley and other cases, neither can the person who commits that fraud himself benefit by it, nor can anybody derive any advantage from that fraud so committed without consideration moving from himself; though, if the consideration moves from himself, and he is ignorant of the fraud, then he stands in the ordinary position of a purchaser without notice. The case stands thus:—You have Mr. Bell liable to Mr. Scholefield. Mr. Templer is surety. Then you have a negotiation passing between Mr. Bell and Mr. Scholefield; Mr. Templer concurring with Mr. Bell in suggesting to Mr. Scholefield a better security for his money. That must have been done, and I take it to hav been done for Mr. Templer's benefit, because the surety is the person to be principally benefited in the matter, at all events, as much as the creditor himself; and it was intended by Mr. Templer that it should be for his benefit, he, of course, conceiving, as appears from the facts now before me, that it was a perfectly honest transaction, and he was quite justified in having it so negotiated as much for his benefit as for the benefit of Mr. Scholefield. It is true, in the deed itself, there is no release of Mr. Templer, although it is suggested that the deed merged the debt. I think the right answer to that is, that Mr. Templer being a concurring party in this, there was no immediate release; but no doubt it was better for Mr. Templer's position that it should be put in this way. Now, Mr. Rolt supposed Mr. Templer contemplated the very thing that afterwards occurred, that is, that he was to get the release in consequence of this transfer of the mortgage being made. Then the case would exactly be brought within the case which was before the Lords Justices, of Davis v. Stainbank.

In this case Mr. Templer does, unquestionably with perfect innocence, join in all the representations that were made about the property; and those representations turned out to be wholly untrue. If that had been all, the case would have been too clear for argument. Then, is the case materially different, Mr. Templer afterwards availing himself of this without any other consideration? He comes in as a volunteer in this respect, because part of the argument addressed to me was this: suppose Mr. Scholefield had written a letter, and said, out of good nature, "Being perfectly satisfied with the security I now hold, I release you." Of course a man may make a gift of his own property in any way that he pleases; that probably would be the correct answer to make to such a state of things as that. But what occurs is this: Mr. Templer, desirous of being discharged, avails himself of this fraud, not knowing it to be a fraud, but which is a gross fraud, and without which fraud he cannot get any benefit whatever. He goes to the plaintiff, and says—and this is admitted in the cross-examination—"Now, having this deed, will you not release me?" He distinctly avails himself of the deed, and comes in as a volunteer, and procures, in consequence of that deed, this particular benefit to himself. That the release was given in respect of the deed I cannot doubt, because the note he procured is this:—"My dear Sir, Mr. Bell having arranged with me for repayment of the 1,600*l.* which I advanced to him, with lawful interest thereon, I beg to state, for the satisfaction of your friends and relatives as well as yourself, that I do not hold you in any way responsible to me for the above sum." That might have been said to be voluntary, if it had not been for the cross-examination. The cross-examination shews that it was on Mr. Templer's solicitation. Mr. Templer, therefore, solicited to have from Mr. Scholefield the benefit of this deed, which had been thus improperly executed by Mr. Bell; and if I gave to Mr. Templer the benefit of the result of these solicitations, I should be giving him directly the benefit of a fraud which has been committed by Mr. Bell. In truth, the real suggestion in all these cases is, where there is an innocent party concerned, it is no fraud in him so long as he does not insist upon a benefit from it; but if he insists upon deriving a benefit from it, he becomes a party to it. I am not using the term offensively, but Mr. Giffard was quite right to argue the legal question; it took that shape, and in equity that must be regarded as the case. You are no party to the fraud, it is true, unless you have obtained a consideration in respect of it. If you avail yourself of that fraud in order to obtain for yourself any benefit, then you become particeps criminis, and you ask the Court to give you the benefit of the fraud which has been so committed. Now, if any other consideration moved from him, the case would have been extremely different. The consideration for this release is fairly and simply that which is here stated in Mr. Scholefield's letter; that is to say, the moving cause, which is the more common expression, for this release was the representation to him that "you have a good security in your hand; therefore excuse me, and pass over my suretyship." Then, Mr. Rolt reasoned it in this way; he said, "By doing this you altered my position."

That a man should be allowed to say, you altered my position ; in other words, you put me in a position in which I could not sue the principal, at my request, and at my solicitation, and on my representation of that which turns out to be entirely erroneous, and therefore I am to be excused as surety,—it seems to me, is pressing the right of a surety to an extent which I never heard of or expected to have had urged before me. Now, upon this part of the case, independently of the fraud, in the absence of consideration, if you bring it down to the simple ground of mistake, I have yet to learn that the surety is to be free from the charge of making a false representation, and then to turn round and say, “At my solicitation, at my request, and upon my representation that you had got something which rendered it perfectly safe, you have—not released the principal, nothing of the kind—but you have made me believe that I may rest content, and not file a bill to have the debt paid. You made me believe that, because I made you believe something else.” It is a clear case of common mistake, as it appears to me. It seems to me it is impossible that the person who is the moving cause of the mistake, the person who originates the blunder and suggests everything that occasioned the mistake, can turn round and say, “you have altered my position by adopting my representation”; that would be pushing the rights to an extent that I cannot conceive any Court will possibly give any effect to; even taking it on the simple ground of mistake, there would be no such right as is supposed on the part of the surety. I cannot see that Lord Eldon's observations in Ex parte Wilson exactly fit the facts. There is no doubt of the accuracy of his Lordship's judgment, but there is something or other which occurred there with regard to the position of the parties which does not occur here. The words of the judgment do not exactly fit the facts. A principal became bankrupt at Hamburg, and the sureties said, “we want our debt diminished as much as possible; go and prove at Hamburg first, and then come in.” The creditor agrees, and he sends instructions to some agent to act accordingly. What those instructions were does not distinctly appear, because the case is stated very shortly ; but what the agent does is something different from proving against the bankrupt's estate at Hamburg ; he releases the party who is not a bankrupt. All that appears is, that he was an insolvent. All his after-acquired property was subject and liable to be seized, and he does that which irretrievably prejudices the surety, and which the surety never asked him to do. The surety says, Go and prove against the bankrupt's estate ; and if a man is a bankrupt there is nothing more to be got. Frequently bankrupts have the means of paying, but you cannot prove against future assets ; there is an end of it. You go and get all you can out of the bankrupt's estate, but when you sign a composition deed it is different ; you release the man entirely, who may otherwise have ample means of payment, which the surety never intended should be the case. Lord Eldon says, “In the case of a common mistake the party who does the act under mistake must suffer.” But what he must have done, as far as the facts go, is this ; he did an act which a mistake would not authorize. The mistake was in saying there was a bankruptcy, and when that was found out to be a mistake, the course would be to come back and say, “I find I can do nothing in it ; there is a blunder, and nothing more can be done in the matter.” The case might have been different if there was a representation that there was the same law of bankruptcy in Hamburg as in England, and it had turned out that there was a material difference in the law. I do not see how the facts fit the reasons for the judgment. There is something which the surety never agreed to. The difference between the two cases is this :—the surety, in truth, throughout the whole matter is the moving party. There is no reason whatever suggested why Mr. Scholefield should dream of releasing this gentleman, except the fact of having that deed, which this gentleman suggested to him as the ground for conferring upon him this indulgence. He has obtained that indulgence on representing to him the effect and the result of the deed, and it is a case of simple mistake. Mr. Scholefield would have a right to be replaced where he was. No injury is done to this gentleman by believing all this time that he was released, he having believed the person who made the representation which led to the result.

Then comes the question as to the friends' right to be reimbursed to the extent of their 1,000*l.*; my notion is, that Mr. Scholefield should satisfy these persons and stand in their place, and that he should only get his relief upon those terms.

Mr. James suggested, that the Court could not regularly make such an order in this suit. The friends had had notice of the suit, and had not come in to seek any remedy themselves, and it was not for the debtor to set up the jus tertii.

Wood, V.C.—I have proceeded to dispose of the case so far, as it appeared to me, that Mr. Templer could not in any way insist upon that transaction that had taken place as a release of his liability. Whether it be taken upon the higher ground of fraud, in which case it appears to me it would be fraudulent to give him the benefit of this transaction; or upon the simple ground of mistake; in either case the Court would replace things between him and the plaintiff in the same position in which they were before the arrangement had been made. In other words, the plaintiff would have a right to proceed against him as a surety. Then, with regard to what I was about to say with respect to the friends, it appears to me to be plain that the plaintiff could not, as against them, insist upon any remedy against Mr. Templer, without taking care to place them also back in the same position in which they were at the time the representation was made. Now Mr. Giffard said, that I could not put the friends in the position in which they were before they consented to advance the 1,000*l.* upon the ground of that clearing this gentleman of his debt. We know it is a common transaction in families, and a very natural and reasonable one. They say, "If we believe him to be wholly free and clear of debt, we will find the money to relieve him; but we will not waste our money by bestowing it on a certain set of creditors, to find out afterwards that all we wished to secure is not to be secured by this outlay of money." Then the question arises,

whether in truth in a transaction of this kind the parties could not be completely replaced; because, if they could not, the thing ought not to have been done. There might have been possibly some more difficulty if it had been the case of actual gift. Possibly there is not very much in that; but the case does not even come to that; it is not a gift by the friends, it is a loan. If you replace to the friends every farthing they have advanced, there does not seem to me any possible ground on their account for saying that the transaction is not to be set aside. But then, Mr. James says, the debtor could have no interest in that, and the friends have taken no steps to bring themselves in our position; but I cannot take it for granted that they have had notice of this suit. There must be a declaration according to the first and second paragraphs of the prayer. Then a declaration that the plaintiff ought to be restored to all his rights as against the defendant Templer, the surety for Bell, in the same manner as if the letter of the 24th of July 1851 had not been written, and as if the name of Templer had not been erased from the notes, but subject to his making good, as between him and the persons advancing the sum of 1,000*l.* in the bill mentioned, for the purpose of relieving the defendant Templer from all his liabilities the amount of such advances, if any, now remaining unpaid by Templer, and with the right of standing in the place of any person so repaid as against the defendant. Then, as to the costs, the plaintiff would clearly have to pay them up to the coming in of the answer. On amending the bill there still remains the allegation, that Templer had no reason to believe that such security was a valid mortgage security; whereas the said pretended transfer, which had been prepared, and given in manner hereinbefore mentioned, was utterly worthless. I agree with Mr. James, that a man cannot be said to have reason to believe that upon which he is uninformed, and ought not to concur in making any representation about; yet, on the other hand, it bears very much the aspect of still adhering to a certain charge. At least, this gentleman had as much reason to believe it as the plaintiff had; they both trusted Bell, therefore there is a portion of the case left with a certain degree of stigma.

With regard to the 150*l.* bill, I do not understand how the plaintiff could feel himself justified, when he had received this money, in negotiating that. The bill must be delivered up to be cancelled, or taken off the amount of the debt.

I think that, up to the hearing, there ought to be no costs at all, because if I went strictly into it there would be certain costs to be set off against each other (2).

KINDERSLEY, V.C. } In re CURTIS.

Infants, Custody of—Paternal Rights—Jurisdiction of the Court.

The Court of Chancery cannot decide upon the custody of infants simply with reference to what is most for their benefit, and cannot interfere with the rights of a father, unless he so conducts himself as to render it essential to the safety and welfare of the children in some serious and important respect, either physically, intellectually or morally, that they should be removed from his custody.

Upon petition by a wife for the custody of her children, after having obtained a decree of judicial separation against her husband in the Matrimonial Court on the ground of cruelty, this Court held, upon the affidavits and circumstances brought forward, that there were no grounds for attributing such undue harshness, severity or cruelty to the husband, with regard to his children, as to render him unfit to have the management of them, and dismissed the petition.

This was a petition presented by Frances Henrietta Curtis (the wife of John George Cockburn Curtis, civil engineer, from whom she had been, on her own application, judicially separated by a decree of the Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes), and also of Mary Curtis, John Curtis, and Frances

(2) June 24, 25. Upon an appeal by the defendant this decree was affirmed by the full Court of Appeal, excepting as to the repayment by the plaintiff of the sums obtained from the defendant's friends, the decree being in this respect varied by a declaration that it was to be without prejudice to any right of the friends.

Adelaide Maria Curtis (the infant children of John G. Cockburn Curtis and Frances Henrietta Curtis), by Frederick Solly Flood, barrister-at-law, their next friend; and it prayed that the petitioner Frances Henrietta Curtis might be appointed to act as guardian of the three infant petitioners, and to have the care of their maintenance and education during their respective minorities, or until the further order of the Court; and that the said infant petitioners might remain in the care and custody of their mother until the further order of the Court; and that J. G. C. Curtis and his agents might be restrained, until the further order of the Court, from changing the present custody of the said infant petitioners, or disturbing or interfering with the same in any manner whatsoever; and that proper inquiries might be made whether there was a sufficient provision for the maintenance and education of the said infant petitioners during their respective minorities, and that if necessary an order of the Court, dated the 8th of July 1851 (which was an order restraining the said J. G. C. Curtis from taking his infant children out of the jurisdiction of the Court), might be continued; and that such other order might be made as to the Court should seem meet.

The decree for a judicial separation between Mr. and Mrs. Curtis was pronounced by the Judge Ordinary of the Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes on the 21st of June 1858, and is fully reported 27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Prob. & M. 73. The Judge Ordinary also made an order that the custody of the children should be given to the mother, Mrs. Curtis, for three months from that date, in order that an application might be made in the meantime to the Court of Chancery as to the permanent custody of the children.

Mr. Curtis then appealed against the decision of the Judge Ordinary, and an interim order was made by this Court, by consent, that the children should remain in the custody of their mother until the further order of the Court.

On the 8th of January 1859 the appeal in the Divorce Court was heard, and the decree of the Judge Ordinary was confirmed (reported 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Prob. & M. 55).

The present petition was supported by a number of affidavits, and on the part of the respondent there were also numerous affidavits filed. The material facts, both in the petition and the affidavits, will be found referred to at length by the Vice Chancellor in his judgment.

Mr. Forsyth and Mr. Prendergast appeared in support of the petition, and cited the following authorities:—

Mr. Forsyth was heard in reply.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—As this petition relates to a question affecting the welfare of infants, I have done what probably I should not have thought it necessary to do if it had been a mere question of property between man and man; for if a question of the latter kind merely had been brought before me, with no better foundation for the relief asked than is here presented, I much doubt whether I should have called upon the respondent. As it is, however, I have thought it best to hear the whole matter through, in order that nothing might be left out which could in any way guide me in exercising the jurisdiction of the Court; and I may also in the outset state this, that having regard to the nature of the question, I should certainly have taken time to look into the cases and the affidavits before I expressed my opinion about it, had not the time that has elapsed since the case was first opened afforded me the opportunity of doing so. I need not say that I have looked into the authorities upon the subject, and also carefully read over all the affidavits that have been brought before me, and it is not necessary, therefore, that I should delay my opinion upon the case.—His Honour having read the prayer of the petition, said—Now the relief asked by that prayer is a relief founded entirely upon this proposition, that Mr. Curtis, the father, is a person who has so conducted himself, or is in such circumstances that he is not fit to be entrusted with the care and custody of his own children, and that he ought to be restrained from interfering in their management altogether. The petition is entirely based on that proposition; and, therefore, the question that I have to consider is, whether it is made out that this is the state of circumstances. I may at once observe that, whatever may be the jurisdiction with regard to the custody of children which the recent act of parliament has given to the Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes (upon which I express no opinion whatever), it does not in the smallest degree affect the jurisdiction of this Court, or the principles on which that jurisdiction is habitually exercised by the Court. If it be the case, as I believe has been suggested, that the Judge of the Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, when he decrees a judicial separation is armed with the authority to determine what the custody of the children of the marriage shall be, simply with reference to what is most for their interests, I can only say that there is no such jurisdiction in this Court. This Court has not the right simply to consider that. This Court does not exercise the jurisdiction in merely considering whether it would be for the benefit of the children that their custody should be with the father or with the mother, or with some other relative, or with strangers, simply because, upon the whole, it would be most for the benefit of the children that there should be that custody. I repudiate all such jurisdiction as belonging to this Court. If such a jurisdiction existed, I suspect that the peace of half the families in this country would be disturbed by applications shewing, or attempting to shew, what, I am afraid, might be shewn in a great many cases, that it was most for the interest of the children that they should be removed from the custody both of the father and of the mother; but happily there is no such jurisdiction. I need not cite cases upon this subject, but I will refer to one which has not been mentioned, with reference to the interference with a father's authority and parental rights as regards his children. I mean the case of Re Fynn (1), and I cite it merely for the purpose of shewing how the learned Judge who decided that case (the present Lord Justice Knight Bruce, then Vice Chancellor) expressed what was the ground of the jurisdiction, the manner of exercising, and the principles on which the Court does exercise, that jurisdiction. After making some general observations in the outset applicable to the case, he says this: "Of the present case I may say, that were I at liberty, as I am not, to act on the view which out of court I should as a private person, take of the course likely to be most beneficial for the infants, I should have no doubt whatever upon the question of interfering with the father's power. Without any hesitation—I should do so, to what extent and in what manner I do not say. But there may and must be many cases of conduct, many cases of family differences, family difficulties and family misfortunes, in which though interposition would be for the interest and advantage of minor children, Courts of justice have not the means of interfering usefully, or, if they have the means, ought not to interfere; and the jurisdiction to which the present petition is addressed is one that, infinitely various as are the possible circumstances in which it is applicable, is yet restricted, and I believe wisely restricted, by certain principles and rules from which there can with propriety be in its exercise no departure. The acknowledged rights of a father with respect to the custody and guardianship of his infant children are conferred by the law, it may be with a view to the performance by him of duties towards the children, and, in a sense, on condition of performing those duties; but there is great difficulty in closely defining them. It is substantially impossible to ascertain or watch over their full performance, nor could a Court of justice usefully attempt it. A man may be in narrow circumstances; he may be negligent, injudicious and faulty as the father of minors; he may be a person from whom the discreet, the intelligent and the well-disposed, exercising a private judgment, would wish his children to be, for their sakes and his own, removed; he may be all this without rendering himself liable to judicial interference, and in the main it is for obvious reasons well that it should be so. Before this jurisdiction can be called into action between them, the Court must be satisfied, not only that it has the means of acting safely and efficiently, but also that the father has so conducted himself, or has shewn himself to be a person of such a description, or is placed in such a position, as to render it not merely better for the children, but essential to their safety or to their welfare, in some very serious and important respect, that his rights should be treated as lost or suspended—should be superseded or interfered with. If the word 'essential' is too strong an expression, it is not much too strong."

I have read these observations, because they appear to me to enunciate in most admirable terms, in terms in which I entirely concur, and which I believe are in accordance with all the authorities on the subject, the principle on which this Court acts with regard to exercising its jurisdiction in interfering with the rights of a father; and when we recollect how very serious a matter it is to interfere with the rights of a father, in respect of his own children, it appears to me that the Court ought never so to interfere unless, as the Lord Justice expresses it in that case, in some very material and important respect it is essential to the welfare and well-being of the children, either physically, intellectually or morally, that it should do so.

Now, that this Court will exercise the jurisdiction is beyond all controversy. The cases which have most frequently occurred of the Court exercising it, have been cases where the father, being of a perverted condition of mind in respect of religious and moral views or habits, is inculcating such habits or such views and opinions upon his children, in such a way that it will be most grievously and seriously detrimental to them in after-life, as members of society. There, no doubt, the Court has interfered. The Court will also interfere unquestionably where the father, although he may not in the smallest degree tend by his teaching or his example to demoralise the children, does treat them with such a degree of violence, or harshness and cruelty, as that he appears utterly unfit to have the conduct and management of children. I quite agree with the observation that was made by the counsel for the petitioner, that a man may be very fond of his children; may have that natural affection in a strongly developed degree, which is an instinct not only in human beings but in brute animals; and yet be a person of a depraved condition of mind, subject to violent fits of excitement, treating them habitually (I will not say systematically) with a degree of violence that amounts to cruelty, to such an extent as to be likely to be seriously detrimental to their interests; and really the question is, whether the latter is now the case before me? because as to anything like a tendency to demoralize the children, to give them bad habits or bad opinions, or even to neglect them in respect of their religious and moral education, it appears to me, not only that there has been no suggestion of the kind, but that there is not the smallest ground for any such suggestion. It appears to me, the evidence tends to shew that whatever question there may be as to the soundness of the opinions, or some of the opinions, on religious questions or moral discipline entertained by Mr. Curtis—whether in these opinions he is right or wrong,—this at any rate is clear, that his object is the well-being of his children and the bringing them up in a moral and religious condition; indeed, I think, unusually so; whether it is carried to an excess, I will not pretend to say, but it appears to me that the manner in which Mr. Curtis is, upon the evidence, clearly proved to have behaved towards his children, as far as that matter is concerned, is unexceptionable. Mr. Curtis entertains certain opinions which are truly called “peculiar”—for example, upon the question of religious denominations or sects or parties into which the religious world, and perhaps all mankind, are more or less divided. It appears that Mr. Curtis is a member of the Church of England in this sense: that he attends the services of the Church of England, adopts the Liturgy of the Church, goes to a place of worship of the Church of England, uses in his family some of its prayers—at all events, one prayer I recollect was mentioned, which is a prayer taken from our Prayer-book; and, in fact, he adopts to all intents and purposes the opinions and the views of the Church of England, except as to some particular matters from which he dissents, and the most important one is, his opinion that infant baptism is wrong, and in that sense (although in no other) he is an Anabaptist or an Antipædobaptist. I may think that opinion erroneous, but whatever opinion of that sort Mr. Curtis may entertain, or may instil in his children, it is no ground for saying, that he is in any respect an unfit person to have the care of his children. I am bound, however, to say this, that that sort of peculiarity of opinion, namely, a person's adhering to the Church of England in all its main doctrines except that of infant baptism, may be such a peculiar state of opinion in certain cases as that, combined with a variety of other circumstances, may tend as one circumstance towards the conclusion that he is a man of morbid or irregular and eccentric condition of mind. I do not, of course, say, that it is so in this case, or that in itself it is objectionable; and yet that instance is brought forward by Mrs. Curtis as a matter of special complaint upon this petition.

Another thing suggested by Mrs. Curtis, and made a subject of special ground, upon which the Court ought to interfere with the parental rights of Mr. Curtis, is this: that he (as she says) repudiates and abhors—or “denounces” is the expression, I think—all churches and all creeds. Now one thing is pretty evident, namely, that during the period of the married intercourse between these two parties, there have been differences of opinion upon religious questions, the most unfortunate sort of differences that can arise, I apprehend, between husband and wife, especially when neither the husband nor the wife seems much disposed to submit his or her opinion to the opinion of the other. But Mrs. Curtis may consider, as a denunciation of all creeds, that which really, when it comes to be considered, is not so. However, if it were so, supposing that Mr. Curtis entertains the opinion which, I believe, is entertained by a certain section of individuals in this country, called “Separatists,” who deny that they belong either to the Church of England, the Church of Rome, the Baptists, the Anabaptists, the Antipædobaptists, the Independents, the Wesleyans, or to any denomination whatever, who call themselves Christians, assert and believe in all the truths of the Bible, but insist that there should be no church; that every man should be his own high priest, having his own place of worship, and that there should be no creed whatever by which persons might express their religious opinions. There are persons of respectability who bring up their children with those opinions, but nobody would suggest that they are not fit to have the care of their children; and am I to say, supposing even that Mr. Curtis entertains those opinions, that I ought to interfere with his parental rights? This, however, is brought forward seriously as a special ground of complaint, upon which I ought to interfere. As I have said already, with regard to the other matters, if he entertained such an opinion, and if that were combined with a great variety of circumstances to bring me to the conclusion that his state of mind is altogether depraved and morbid, so as to render him unfit to have the management of children, that might be considered as a ground for interference; but that does not appear to me to be the case here. Then, with regard to the suggestion that Mr. Curtis positively denounces all churches and creeds: why, so far from denouncing all churches, it appears that he goes regularly to church; that Mrs. Curtis, when they lived together, accompanied him, not only in this country, but in America, where there is an Episcopal church, holding, as nearly as possible, the same tenets as the Church of England; and that, going there, he took the children with him, or, at any rate, those that were old enough to go; and yet, in the face of all this, Mrs. Curtis says he denounces all churches, not merely the fabric, but all church government and all church worship. There is really no foundation for the suggestion; and I may now, in passing, observe, upon this part of the case, what I shall have to observe in several other parts of it, that we have here a sort of question arising, which really makes the difficulty in all such cases, and particularly in a case similar to this, namely, a question of degree. Mr. Curtis may, and I dare say does, entertain some opinions which are not precisely the opinions of this church or that church, or the other; for example, if he holds all the tenets of the Church of England, except the doctrine of Infant Baptism, what church does he belong to? Strictly, you will say, he does not belong to the Church of England; and it might also be said that he does not belong to the Anabaptists, or the Antipædobaptists, because in some things he holds to the doctrines of the Church of England. And in some expression of opinion that fell from Mr. Curtis, in the discussions that took place between him and Mrs. Curtis, he, no doubt, said something or other (whether rightly or wrongly is no concern of mine) which she has construed to mean a denunciation and repudiation of every church and of every creed whatever. It is a question of degree. How am I, when parties represent to me that this or that is what passed in their family quarrels, to determine which of them is speaking the truth, when there is no third person as witness, and nobody to corroborate either the one or the other? But I have what I think is a complete answer to the allegation of Mrs. Curtis in this instance. She says, he denounces all churches and creeds, and yet it is clear that she was constantly in the habit of going with him to the Church of England whenever she was living with him. This is one instance, and I will, hereafter, point out more, in which it is clear to my mind, —without saying that Mrs. Curtis is fabricating facts—that she is relating facts in a manner, not only exaggerated, but falsely, in the sense that the truth is not represented by what she puts in her affidavit.

The peculiar opinions which are alleged against Mr. Curtis, I have already dealt with, and they appear to me to form no ground whatever for interfering with his parental rights, unless there were such a case as I have suggested of their being merely items or ingredients in an aggregation of circumstances, shewing a perfectly disturbed, and disordered and morbid condition of mind.

It is further said that the circumstances of Mr. Curtis are straitened. I suppose they are straitened in this sense—that he is not a wealthy man; but I have nothing before me to shew that he is in such a condition as that he is unable to maintain his children in the position of life in which they were born, or in which they may be expected to move. He seems to have been considered a very efficient engineer.

It has been assumed by the petitioner's counsel, that Mr. Curtis is a man of considerable ability and skill, and experience in his profession, and I have no reason to doubt that that is true. Although he may not be able to maintain his children in wealth, or in that position of life in which Mr. Flood, perhaps, may be able to maintain them, I have no right to come to the conclusion that he is in that abject, destitute condition of life that he ought not to be allowed to take possession of his children. I can only say that, subject to such exceptions as occurred in the case of Lyons v. Blenkins, poverty is not a ground for removing a man's children from him.

But I now come to consider the ground which is, after all, the main ground, and as I may almost express it, the only ground on which there can be suggested any case upon which I ought to enjoin Mr. Curtis against the exercise of his parental authority, in having the custody of his children; and that is, the allegations which are made of acts of violence and cruelty, habitually exercised by Mr. Curtis as regards his children. Of necessity the discussion on this petition has been mixed up with the case as between Mr. and Mrs. Curtis, in the Divorce Court, and it was impossible that it should be otherwise. The petitioner's counsel, in opening the case, adverted necessarily to it. The respondent did the same, and, of course, that led to a very long argument on the part of the respondent. It is in vain to say that a great deal of it is utterly irrelevant, because it was impossible to proceed without adverting to it, and I shall myself advert to it, necessarily, to a certain extent, although, of course, I will endeavour to do it only so far as I think it fairly bears on the case which I have to consider.

Now, the case as between Mr. and Mrs. Curtis, which was a question of cruelty by the husband to his wife, was a case that has been decided by the Court of competent jurisdiction, not only by the Judge Ordinary, but by the Appeal Court exercising that jurisdiction. It would, therefore, be presumption in me (even if I felt any doubt) to allow myself to express any doubt as to the soundness of the conclusion at which the Court arrived; but I am quite satisfied that the conclusion of that Court was perfectly sound and correct. What, then, according to the fair view of the judgment pronounced by Sir C. Cresswell in that case, ought I to consider was the ground upon which he came to that conclusion? There was brought before him the evidence, contradictory in many respects, of persons asserting on the one side and denying on the other, a number of acts of alleged violence practised by Mr. Curtis towards his wife. Now, bearing in mind that they married in the year 1846, and, with a very trifling exception, have not seen each other since the middle of 1852, the acts of violence deposed to by Mrs. Curtis must have occurred within that time. Some of them Mr. Curtis denied; others of them he did not entirely deny; and the result altogether was, that the learned Judge, not immediately, off-hand, but after mature deliberation, came rightly to a conclusion—and when I say “rightly” it is presumption in me to use the term, for I not only assume technically that it is right, but I do not see the slightest reason for differing from it—which I conceive may be thus expressed: that although there must be made a great deal of allowance for exaggeration on the one side and on the other, and although some of the acts alleged, if the case stood upon those acts alone, would not be a sufficient cause for separation, yet, looking at the whole case, it did appear to him that there had been such a degree of harshness, of unkindness and of violence as amounted to what that Court was bound to consider as cruelty, or, as the Civilians call it, “sævitia,” so as to justify the Court in decreeing a judicial separation. That was the view that he took; and without reading through the judgment I may advert to one or two passages. I happen to have used Tristram and Swabey's Reports, and, therefore, I adhere to them, although I am not aware that there is any material discrepancy between that report and the report of the same case in the Law Journal. After referring to the dicta of learned Judges as to the grounds and extent of the jurisdiction with regard to cruelty or “sævitia,” he says, “The first question to be determined is, whether the respondent is proved to have been guilty of acts constituting cruelty, judging of the question by those rules," that is, the rules which he had just drawn from the dicta of prior Judges. "In order to do that, it is necessary to examine with care the evidence given in the cause, and to make allowance for the exaggerations which may be expected in the accounts given by parties whose feelings are much interested and excited, more especially when they are deposing to transactions which occurred several years ago. The necessity for caution, if not suspicion, on such occasions was pointed out by Lord Stowell in Oliver v. Oliver," and then he goes on to comment on the circumstances of the case. I consider the observation, that the learned Judge thought it necessary to make great allowance for the exaggeration which was to be expected under such circumstances, as a monition to my mind to make (as I think I am bound to make) large grains of allowance for exaggeration on the one side and on the other. He then goes on to observe upon the case in particular, and comes to this conclusion:—"Believing then, as I do, that before the petitioner and her husband left England for America she had been treated with cruelty by him; that his conduct in New York was such that, bearing in mind his former acts, danger was to be reasonably apprehended from it, and that his more recent behaviour in Ireland proves that such danger still exists,—I feel bound to grant the prayer of the petitioner, and decree a separation between her and her husband."

The learned Judge came to the conclusion that, upon the whole of the evidence,—although there might be, and was, no doubt, exaggeration on both sides; and although some of the acts might not be sufficiently proved, to constitute a ground in themselves,—there was that degree of cruelty which justified the decree for separation. I think also that the learned Judge took this view: that cruelty is not justified by the circumstance that the wife is not herself free from blame, and that he came to the conclusion that in this case Mrs. Curtis was by no means free from blame. I am afraid that that is only saying that human beings in general are not free from blame; for I believe it is the common case that very few wives do consider sufficiently their solemn obligation of obedience and submission to their husband's wishes, even though they be capricious, if they are not mischievous and wrong; and that there is an unfortunate habit of giving way to temper, and answering in such a manner as to lead to a replication more harsh, and to other unpleasant words. As appears from Mr. Curtis's own evidence there were constant instances of this sort—high words between the husband and wife; not merely high, harsh or fierce words used by the husband to the wife, but between the husband and the wife. I am not of course preaching a sermon, but I need not say that such a state of circumstances ought not to exist. However harsh, however cruel, the husband may be, it does not justify the wife's want of that due submission to the husband which is her duty both by the law of God and by the law of man. On the other hand, want of temper on the part of the wife does not justify cruelty on the part of the husband. That there has been fault on both sides in this case I am perfectly persuaded, and I adopt from Mr. Curtis the best excuse which can be made for Mrs. Curtis, which he volunteers, and which I confess, if he had not volunteered, I am not quite sure that it would have occurred to my mind; for he fairly and candidly said that great allowance ought to be made for her, considering the very trying circumstances under which she was placed, living with a husband who unfortunately during a considerable period of time was only able to place her in such a position that she could hardly be expected to conduct herself with perfect propriety as regards her husband. That excuse for Mrs. Curtis was suggested by Mr. Curtis, and I adopt it as the best excuse that can be made for her. At the same time (as the learned Judge says) I am satisfied that this was the cause of it all; that there was, in the first place, a reluctance on the part of the family of Mrs. Curtis to the marriage taking place at all. It was a consent reluctantly given; unfortunately the family—and when I say "the family" I mean Mr. and Mrs. Flood, to whom I confine the observation, for I do not know that the other members of the family did so, but Mr. and Mrs. Flood throughout assumed demeanour to Mr. Curtis that was certainly not a frank, cordial reception of him in their family; but treating and regarding him, and shewing that they regarded him, as a person of inferior position, and that their daughter had lowered and demeaned herself to some extent by marrying him. I need not advert to particulars, but there are statements indicating their condition of mind towards Mr. Curtis, and, undoubtedly as regards Mr. Flood, there seems to have been generated a considerable degree of animosity (as Sir C. Cresswell expresses it) towards Mr. Curtis. I do not say that it was Mr. Flood's fault entirely. It was, perhaps, reciprocated by Mr. Curtis; but owing to that state of circumstances Mrs. Curtis was discontented and dissatisfied with her position: this is beyond all doubt. It appears beyond contradiction, that she said to Mr. Curtis on one occasion, that he had injured her by marrying her and bringing her into an inferior position, especially when Mr. Flood became a man of increased fortune, and that the only amends or compensation he could make her would be by dying. In whatever sense that was used, whether more or less jocular, it clearly shewed the condition of her mind as to dissatisfaction or discontent with her position.

It appears, moreover, that there were constant quarrels between them, not in the early part of their career, but during a considerable portion of the period of their living together, in which it does appear to me, as far as I can judge, that Mrs. Curtis took her part, and I only mention it as an illustration to shew that I am not bringing this forward for the purpose of saying anything unkind towards Mrs. Curtis. Again, on the occasion of one of those quarrels, she suggested a doubt (and whether jocularly or not it shews she was taking her part in the quarrel) whether he or some other person or persons was or were the father or fathers of her children. It shews at any rate that it was not the case of a harsh husband and a submissive wife, where the woman was trying to perform the duties of a wife, and submitting patiently to his wishes unless they became absolutely wrong; but it was a case of connubial quarrels constant and frequent, and, unfortunately, the conduct of the wife's family did not assist in reconciling their differences, but tended (I do not say intentionally) to foment them. That is the view the learned Judge took in the Court of Divorce, and that is the view which I take of it here.

I will, however, just mention one other instance. A good deal of quarrelling took place about the suggestion of going to Australia. I am not at all meaning to say it was wise or right of Mr. Curtis to wish to go there; but this I do say, that if the husband thinks it is for the benefit of the family to emigrate to Australia, unless there were some pressing reasons to the contrary, it would be the duty of the wife (whatever her wishes might be) not to refrain from discussing the subject, but if he adhered to his opinion, to submit to his wishes. At the same time, I feel this, that if she thought he was in such a condition of mind that neither she nor the children would be safe in being trusted with him, it might have justified her in resisting such a desire; but still it seems to have been the subject of constant quarrels. Well, that was the state of circumstances contemplated as existing by the learned Judge in the Divorce Court, which he appears justly to have entertained; and I entertain precisely the same view myself.

Now, in that state of things, I am to pick out from the evidence what the conduct of Mr. Curtis towards the children has been. It is impossible to avoid seeing that the state of circumstances existing between the husband and the wife would necessarily very much influence the conduct of either the one or the other with regard to the children. It is impossible that it should be otherwise, and I can quite conceive (although, of course, I do not assert it as a fact) that, if there had not been this unfortunate state of violent animosity which at last existed between Mr. and Mrs. Curtis, in all probability there would have been no sort of harshness even, or severity practised by Mr. Curtis towards his children. But one cannot help seeing that the state of aggravation, very likely brought on partly and even mainly by his own fault, in which the parents lived when they were constantly quarrelling, as the husband and wife here seem to have been, acts of violence committed on the wife, recriminations passing between them, and so on, would of necessity influence the conduct of the one or the other towards the children. Now one point of difference between them (and of course I do not say which was right) seems to have been, as to the manner in which the children should be treated. Mr. Curtis thought it desirable to give his children early and decided religious impressions, with a knowledge of the incidents in the life of our Saviour, and was in the habit of doing so. It appears that Mrs. Curtis objected, and said, "You will make them Catholics." I do not say whether he was right or whether she was right, or whether he was wrong or she was wrong, or which was the most right or the most wrong; but there was a difference of opinion. Then, differing as they did as to the mode of bringing up, teaching and dealing with their children, we may surely expect that Mr. Curtis would more firmly assert his right to do as he thought fit with regard to the children because his wife was opposing him, than he would have done if they had not differed in their opinion; and he might even be led (I do not say rightly led), owing to the infirmity of the human mind, to exercise acts of harshness even towards the children, which otherwise he would not be guilty of. It must not in the least be understood that I mean to say cruelty would be justified, far from it; but I am looking to see what there is to sustain such a charge of cruelty as will shew that Mr. Curtis is upon that ground in a position not to be entrusted with the custody of his children, because that is the practical question that I have to determine.

Now, it is necessary that I should carefully go through the acts which are alleged by Mrs. Curtis as acts of cruelty, and I may observe that they rest entirely upon the allegations of Mrs. Curtis, utterly unsupported by any other evidence (although I do not say they are untrue), except that Mr. Flood, the father, a person, as the learned Judge in the Divorce Court observes, strongly prejudiced against Mr. Curtis, mentions three instances which he witnessed of what he calls "violent treatment" of the children in America. The instances alleged by Mrs. Curtis I will, as far as I can, take in the order of date in which they are alleged. Many of them have no date, and as to some it would be impossible to assign a date, because if there was a daily habitual exercise of violence it would be impossible to give particular dates to acts of that kind; but some acts are special and specific, and attributed to a particular period.

His Honour then adverted to an act of cruelty alleged against Mr. Curtis, in having treated one of his children (a year-and-a-half old) with great harshness upon the occasion of its crying one night in bed, and said the act imputed to him could not have happened unless he was in a paroxysm of fierce insanity, or he was an utterly depraved brute. This instance is more particularly referred to by the Judge in the Divorce Court. His Honour would not say that there was no foundation for the representation—that the thing was a pure fabrication, or that something did not occur, but it was obvious to his mind that that was a very gross exaggeration; but Mr. Curtis gave his representation of it, and utterly denied the cruelty laid to his charge. His Honour said that there was no corroborative evidence on either side, and it was impossible to say which spoke the truth. There was, probably, exaggeration on both sides, but he considered the version given by Mr. Curtis to be the most probable story. He did not believe that in that particular instance there was any cruelty whatever practised by Mr. Curtis. The next allegation made by Mrs. Curtis was, that her husband was in the habit of striking her children if they happened to make any movement at prayers; and if they indicated symptoms of weariness or impatience, he would beat the children severely, and generally gave them violent blows on the face, and inflicted blows of great severity, with the back of his hand that he was in the habit both before and after meals of using a very long grace, and if the children became weary and moved their position, he punished them severely. Now, Mr. Curtis had stated in his affidavit in answer to this charge, that the grace used by him was the short form with which every one was familiar, and this was not denied by Mrs. Curtis. This would in some measure test her representations, there being no third person as a witness; and no one would imagine that such a grace as that, was so unnecessarily long that no little child could be expected to sit through it. His Honour would assume that Mr. Curtis carried his opinion about the necessity of a strict and severe enforcement of implicit obedience on the part of a child to any command of the parent to a length beyond what would be considered right or reasonable; but he did not carry it to so great a length, that it amounted to such a degree of harshness and cruelty as to render him unfit as a father to have the custody of his children. In this statement of Mrs. Curtis, regarding the conduct of her husband to the children at grace, he considered Mrs. Curtis had failed, and he considered himself justified in assuming, that probably there was a similar tendency to exaggerate in other instances of the same nature. Another act of cruelty towards the children was alleged by Mrs. Curtis, but it was so utterly improbable, so unnatural, and so contrary to every thing that appeared with regard to Mr. Curtis's character among his friends and acquaintances, that he could not come to the conclusion that these acts were perpetrated by him. It must, however, be understood that he was not at all concluding in any of these instances, that Mr. Curtis, if the children did not do as he bid, never struck them, for that was not the question. The question was, whether there were blows of such violence and ferocity as to be injurious to the health of the children.

There were other charges of a similar nature, but which were all denied by Mr. Curtis, and explained by him in a very different manner. How, then, could the Court determine between the parties except on the balance of probabilities, by weighing their evidence against each other, and by seeing whether there was anything corroborative elsewhere? It was all a question of degree—a question whether Mr. Curtis carried that severity or harshness to a degree that amounted to habitual cruelty. He might have occasionally struck one of his children with a degree of severity; but was it that degree of severity which would justify the Court taking his children from him? The same observations might be repeated with regard to every one of the alleged instances of cruelty. His Honour then adverted to several other instances, by way of a test as to how far he could trust to the accuracy of the one party or the other. Most of these instances of cruelty were said by Mrs. Curtis to have taken place at New York, in the months of January, February and March 1852. Now, there was a letter written by Mrs. Curtis to her mother, on the 17th of the same month of March, a letter of a most confidential character, in which Mrs. Curtis spoke of the behaviour of her husband, and in which she canvassed the possibility of a separation on account of his conduct towards herself; but in that letter she used this expression, "I would to God I could tell what to do; but he seems so wrapped up in the children that I do not like to take them away, in spite of anything I may suffer, and I do not see that they are at present threatened." There was no doubt she intended by this sentence to express, in as strong language as perhaps could be expressed, the intense fatherly affection he felt towards the children. He was so wrapped up in them that, notwithstanding the suffering she underwent, she could not bring herself to separate the father from the children to whom he was so attached. This expression was quite inconsistent with the allegation, that at this time there was not only a recollection in her mind of harshness, and even cruelty, towards herself, but of harshness and cruelty towards the children; and, if in the months of January and February, and in March, when she was writing this letter, Mr. Curtis had been guilty of the habitual cruelty, harshness and violence alleged by her affidavit to have taken place, it was impossible to suppose she could have written this letter and not at all have adverted to it, or have used the language contained in it. Upon these facts, he could not come to any other conclusion than that Mrs. Curtis, when she was stating what took place in these months was, to some extent, stating what was not the truth; and he was satisfied that these acts could not have taken place without their being referred to in some way in that letter. His Honour then referred to a part of Mrs. Curtis's affidavit, in which she accused her husband of habitually denouncing and almost entirely refusing medical assistance to his children on occasions of sickness and disease, and particularly at one period, when one of the children was suffering under the chicken-pox. Mr. Curtis entirely denied the charge made against him, and alleged also that what was supposed by Mrs. Curtis to be the chicken-pox turned out not to be that complaint at all. The act of which Mrs. Curtis accused her husband was, of plunging the child while it had the chicken-pox into a tub of iced water, and this was in February, the month before the letter already adverted to was written; and yet in that letter, although nothing could be a more striking instance either of aberration of mind or of the most cruel, ferocious disposition than such an act, Mrs. Curtis never mentioned or alluded to it at all. Mr. Curtis might very likely have had his own opinions as to the manner in which the child should be treated, and he might not have been desirous of calling in a physician, but that was a mere matrimonial difference of opinion, and was no indication of cruelty in the father.

He then adverted to the affidavit of Mr. Flood, which was the only corroborative evidence of these acts of violence. The date that Mr. Flood assigned to these acts was between the 16th of May and the 12th of June; and in the month of June he himself caused Mr. Curtis to be placed in a lunatic asylum; but that was not a ground for saying that Mr. Curtis was not now in a fit state to be trusted with his children. Then, Mr. Flood was a person who must be regarded as giving his evidence with a feeling of bitter animosity towards Mr. Curtis, and of course endeavouring to make out the case against him. To prove this more clearly, he would advert to the conduct of Mr. Flood upon a more recent occasion, when he went to the Admiralty, and announced to persons there that Mr. Curtis was at that time of unsound mind and unfit to be employed. He must certainly receive the evidence of a person so acting to the party against whom he was giving his evidence, with a considerable degree of suspicion and jealousy. Then, as to any corroborative evidence on behalf of Mr. Curtis, it appeared that some of these alleged acts of violence towards the children took place while Mr. and Mrs. Curtis were residing at Blenheim Terrace. Previously to that, and down to the month of March 1849, a period of nearly three years, they had been residing at Mrs. Carberry's, at Charing Cross, and Mrs. Carberry said in her affidavit, that if Mr. Curtis had been in the habit of acting cruelly and harshly towards his children, or towards Mrs. Curtis, it must have been observed by her, or known to her through the servants; and then there was the evidence of Miss Elliot, the daughter of the person who kept the house at Blenheim Terrace, who said that prior to the time when Mr. Curtis was afflicted with his malady, she never saw any of the alleged cruel treatment on the part of Mr. Curtis either towards the children or towards Mrs. Curtis; and that if anything of the kind had taken place during the time they were in the house, it must have come to her knowledge. This lady, in another affidavit, stated that, subsequently to Mr. Curtis's attack of brain fever, he was most imperious and harsh towards his wife. His conduct was changed, and she did not think that when he quitted that house he was in a fit state to be trusted with the care of his children. These affidavits were quite consistent with the supposition, that if there were specific acts of harshness or violence, and of cruelty towards the children during the latter part of the time, they were acts to be explained and accounted for by the state in which Mr. Curtis was. There was also the corroborative evidence of seven persons, apparently in a most respectable position of life, who had known Mr. Curtis, some of them from his early youth, and who were competent to form a judgment of him generally; and all these witnesses deposed that, so far from being a person such as he must be if all the accusations against him were true, he was a person of kind, gentle, friendly, self-controlling habit, and that there was not the slightest ground for suggesting either that he was habitually subject to fits or paroxysms of violence, or uncontrollable temper, or a person of an unkind or harsh disposition, but quite the contrary. All that, so far as it went, was corroborative of Mr. Curtis's representation; and, so far as these acts went, if Mr. Curtis was not now in the condition in which he was during the period, or during any period from the time when he had the attack, until he was placed in the lunatic asylum in New York, in June 1852, it appeared to His Honour that he had no ground for assuming that he was not entirely fit to have the custody and conduct of his children; and that opened this question. The learned Judge in the Court of Divorce very truly observed this—"If, indeed, an act of violence was committed under the influence of an acute disorder, such as brain fever, and it was made clear that, the disorder having been subdued, there was no danger of a recurrence of such acts, the case would be different. But if the result of such a disease has been a new condition of the brain, rendering the party liable to fits of ungovernable passion which would be dangerous to a wife, then, undoubtedly, this Court is bound to emancipate her from such peril." He said, very truly, that if that be the case he ought not to be allowed to have the controul of his wife's actions, or to compel her to reside with him; and His Honour would be disposed to apply the same principle to the case of the children. If he was really brought, not by any fault of his, but by his ailment, into such a changed condition of mind as that he was liable to these insane, phrenzied exhibitions of violence and cruelty, then it might be that he was not fit to be entrusted with the exclusive government and custody of the children. His Honour then continued:—

Now, the question resolves itself into this—What ground have I for assuming that, at this time, Mr. Curtis is in that condition of mind, that is, that the condition of the brain has been altered by his illness? In the first place, there is no evidence whatever to lead me to that assumption, unless I can draw such a conclusion from his conduct since the separation in July 1852; and it does not appear to me that I can draw any such inference from his conduct. The worst that is alleged against Mr. Curtis seems to be this—that he went to Broomley, which is the residence of Mr. Flood, in Ireland, where Mrs. Curtis was residing, with a view of having an interview with his wife, for the purpose of persuading her to join him again, in order that they might be reconciled, and that the early condition of their married life might be restored. It ended in an altercation; that is to say, she refused. I am not saying whether there were sufficient grounds to justify that refusal or not. My own opinion of the duty of a wife is that there were not, but that I must consider as a private opinion, for I have no right, judicially, to assume that she was wrong in coming to the conclusion that she would not join him; but just consider what would be the feeling of a husband who, after a separation of five years, goes with a view to reconciliation, and finds that his wife declines to be reconciled. Whether it was his fault entirely, or partly, that the state of separation had been brought about or not, he must have been very much mortified; and she intimated something to the effect that both her father and herself had taken steps in order that the children might never be with him again; and his answer was, that if that was the determination or the feeling of herself and father he wished God might curse them both. Of course, I should be the last person to justify, under any aggravation, such an expression on the part of Mr. Curtis. At the same time, is that a sufficient indication, either alone or in connexion with other circumstances, to lead to the conclusion that he was in such a changed condition of the brain that the ebullition of violence and violent expressions which were then exhibited were occasioned by his brain being then in an altered and morbid condition? I confess I cannot draw that inference. I do not justify what Mr. Curtis then did, by any means; quite the contrary. It is not necessary for me to censure it, as it is obvious that it deserves censure, and as he himself now admits; nor am I assuming that Mrs. Curtis might not have sufficient grounds for desiring not to be reconciled with him; but I cannot come to the conclusion that that, or anything else that has been brought forward in evidence, is an indication of such a changed condition of the brain, producing a continued and fixed state of mind, of such a nature as to render it probable that to-morrow, the next day, within a week or a month, or some short time, he will be in such a condition of mind as to render it necessary to place him again under restraint.

Then, again, the other principal circumstance that has been mentioned, and almost the only one, is the circulating of the handbill; and there again I confess I wish it had not been done, for Mr. Curtis's sake. [This handbill is more particularly referred to by the Judge of the Divorce Court.] It was not done in a judicious or wise manner, and the word "absconded," which is used in it, had certainly better not have been put in; but I must make allowance for the state of things which then existed, considering what had been done by Mrs. Curtis. She had not only refused to live with him; but, in order that he might not have access to the children, had carried them to England, changed her name and the name of her children, and kept them in concealment, in order that the father might not know where they were to be found. I do say, that was a state of things likely to irritate even a less irritable mind than perchance Mr. Curtis may possess; and what does he do? He circulates this advertisement, and my impression is that he may have done so partly with a view of vexing Mr. Flood as well as Mrs. Curtis; but I must bear in mind the irritation under which it was done. It may have been done, however, really with a view of discovering his children, for it appears that Mr. Curtis did make great efforts with that object; and by the employment of the police, and by spending his money, he did ultimately find out the place of residence of these children at Hornsey. Is this act in that respect, either by itself or combined with other acts, sufficient to lead me to the conclusion that he is in such a condition as not to be fit to have the government of his children? I can only say that, so far as I can draw any inference as to Mr. Curtis's state of mind, from what has been the specimen before me during this discussion, his demeanour has been in every respect most exemplary.

It has been said that he is capable of assuming all that, and that even when he is in a state of great violence and irritation he can suddenly, when it suits his purpose, assume a calm and restrained demeanour. I do not very well understand how that comports with the allegation that he is a man of ungovernable temper and subject to uncontrollable fits of violence. I do not understand how a man who falls into such a fit of violence and passion that he is unable to control himself, is able at the same time so to control and regulate his conduct as to assume perfect calmness and gentleness. It may, perhaps, be reconciled by putting a particular construction on some of the words used; but I confess I did—not with reference merely to Mr. Curtis himself, but with regard to the general bent and tendency of human nature—expect to see and hear expressions of irritation, violence and recrimination as against Mrs. Curtis, Mr. Flood and other persons, but particularly as against Mrs. Curtis. So far, however, from seeing or hearing anything of that sort, every palliation that could be suggested of Mrs. Curtis's conduct has been suggested by Mr. Curtis himself. There has never been, I think I may say, a single expression tending to any recrimination, except so far as the exigency of the case required that Mr. Curtis should endeavour to shew that Mrs. Curtis was representing things inaccurately, untruly and falsely. Now, if that be assumed or artificial, I can only say it is as able a piece of acting as I have ever witnessed; but I confess I cannot see any reason for supposing that it is assumed; and, in the absence of anything to lead me to a contrary supposition, I am bound to assume, what the witnesses say who have known this gentleman both in his early and later life, and who all concur in stating that he is a man of placid temper and disposition, not subject to these violent fits of excitement; in short, that he is anything but what he is represented to be.

Now, there is no direct medical testimony that I am aware of; and I should have been glad if, during the last few years Mr. Curtis had had occasion to call in for his general health a medical gentleman, who would have known what was his opinion. It happens, however, that Mr. Curtis has had no occasion to employ a medical gentleman; at all events, this is clear, that there is no suggestion that there has been any necessity for calling in a medical man in respect of tendencies to cerebral disorder. There is a slight degree of evidence upon the subject, which, however, I can hardly consider of importance; for Dr. Winslow saw Mr. Curtis a few times, and, so far as I consider he gives any evidence on the subject, I have no reason to suppose that in his opinion there is cerebral disorder, either permanent or temporary.

I believe I have now gone through all the principal points that have been raised, with the exception of one, which is of this nature:—It has been suggested that ever since July 1852, down at least to the period of July 1857, when he went to Ireland, and had the interview to which I have alluded, Mr. Curtis has taken no pains to unite himself to his wife and children; that he has “deserted” them—that was the expression repeatedly used in the opening, although very properly it has not been insisted on in the reply; that there has been a state of things with regard to these children, superinduced with respect to their habits and education, which ought not, upon the principle on which Lyons v. Blenkin was decided, to be interfered with; and that this Court will preserve that condition of things. Now, Lyons v. Blenkin has no application to the present case; that was a totally different case, and the principles upon which it was decided depended on circumstances which have no existence here.—[His Honour, after stating the facts in Lyons v. Blenkin, continued]:—If that case were like the present, I should undoubtedly act upon it; but there is no resemblance whatever to it. First of all, this is a case in which, although desertion there has been, that desertion was, in the first instance, a desertion of the husband by the wife; and although I am very reluctant to say anything which can be painful to any lady, I am bound to say that a more heartless desertion can hardly be imagined. I make every allowance for this poor lady’s condition. I assume in her favour, what I have no doubt was the case, that she was most unkindly and harshly treated, and perhaps treated occasionally with great violence by her husband; but her husband was unfortunately in a lunatic asylum in a foreign country—in a Government lunatic asylum—governed, that is, by the municipal authorities; but being in that asylum (and I am not supposing that he should not have been thrust there) the wife goes away; leaves him there; comes to England; leaves him to the mercy of strangers; and the father of the wife is the party who assists her in doing so. No doubt, it was at his instigation that it was done, and so earnest and eager was he about it that she is carried away from New York within seven days of her confinement with her last child. Who, then, is to talk of desertion? In that state of things, conceive what must be the feelings of a husband with regard to what his wife had done; and yet in the month of August, after he comes out of the lunatic asylum, he writes a letter to her full of contrition, containing expressions of the most complete acknowledgment of fault on his part, expressions of regret, and also of a desire for reconciliation. I do not mean to say that Mrs. Curtis might not have been justified in saying, “I cannot trust to all this, and I will not be reconciled.” My own private opinion is, that the wife was not justified, although I am not assuming that judicially; but what must have been the feelings of the husband? He had done what he felt to be humiliating; although I confess, reading that letter, so far from thinking it humiliating, I consider it a highly creditable letter, not at all degrading or humiliating. It was a confession of great wrong; of his having behaved harshly, unjustly, and in an unchristianlike manner. I do not know that he admits what amounts to actual cruelty; but he acknowledges that he was grievously wrong, and urges upon her reconciliation; he does not, as he hoped, get a favourable answer to that application. What the correspondence was that took place subsequently is not in evidence before me, and I can only surmise that it was of a cold kind, for they seem to have addressed each other as “Dear Mr.” and “Dear Mrs. Curtis,” and “Sir” and “Madam”; but what the actual correspondence was I do not know. She has, however, withdrawn herself under these circumstances, and I cannot say it is to be wondered at (although I do not say that she was quite right); and instead of coming home to England, desiring to meet her, and endeavouring to effect a reconciliation in person, he goes to Spain, where there were Government works being carried on, and where he might be employed as an engineer, and where he was actually employed during a portion of the period that elapsed between that time and June 1856. How, then, is this the case of Lyons v. Blenkin? He allowed the children to remain with their own mother, but not under any bargain or arrangement, or gift of property. It is true that Mr. Flood has maintained the mother and the children; but under no bargain on his part, and it appears from the evidence that Mr. Curtis, in that letter which he wrote, or in some other, desired to know what were her pecuniary arrangements, not at all neglecting them; but not receiving answers, such as he expected to receive, he remains away. Is that the principle of Lyons v. Blenkin? Not at all. It does not approach it.

I believe I have now mentioned every point upon which the least reliance was placed, and the result of the whole is this: that, to my mind, what occurred with respect to the children (whatever may have been the degree of severity, if severity there was, or whatever was the nature of the chastisements inflicted upon the children) has been, at all events, grievously aggravated by the state of things existing between the husband and wife; and I think that is a matter of great importance to be kept in mind, because it appears to me that, although I might apprehend, and I think I should apprehend, that if the husband and wife came together again, with their children, there might possibly be a recurrence of these scenes as between the husband and wife, and therefore a recurrence of painful things with regard to the children; I see no reason to conclude that if the father has the custody of his children only, and the wife were separated from him as she is now separated by the decree of the Court of Divorce, he would not live with his children, not only in the most amicable way, but that he would not do for them everything which the kindest father could and ought to do. He may have some peculiar notions, not amounting to aberration of mind, either about religious questions or about the best mode of bringing children up either physically or mentally; he may have those peculiar opinions which any father is justified in entertaining and acting upon, provided they do not amount to cruelty, or an indication of aberration of intellect. I see, however, no reason to conclude that, whatever was the nature of the conduct of Mr. Curtis towards his children, which was very much brought about and very much aggravated by the state of things between him and his wife, such scenes, now that the husband and wife are separated, will again occur.

I think, further, that I have no reason to conclude that that ailment of Mr. Curtis has left his mind in a continuous morbid condition. If that were the necessary consequence of such a disease, of course, evidence could have been given of it. If it were so, I think, in this particular case, means might have been found of giving some evidence upon the subject, although, perhaps, it would have been difficult; but if he is not in that morbid condition of mind, how am I to apprehend that he will treat his children cruelly hereafter? If I considered it well founded that he had treated his children cruelly before, I might consider there was a chance of his doing so again; but I do not think that he has treated his children cruelly, I mean in the sense which is properly called cruel. I do not think that the allegations which have been made are established before me, or that I have a sufficient ground for feeling a reasonable doubt upon the subject. I have no doubt that both parties may have coloured the acts done, upon the one side and upon the other, in a manner not consistent with strict truth; but certainly nothing appears upon the evidence which amounts to that which is represented; for I believe that which is represented is such a state of things as is quite unaccountable, excepting on one or other of two suppositions, either that Mr. Curtis is habitually an insane man, or else that he is a person of that brutal and ferocious character (quite contrary to the evidence of those persons who have deposed to his general character,) that he cannot even keep his hands from injuring physically the very children that God has given him.

that I see much reason to suppose that he is more passionate than I am afraid the majority of men are when they get into quarrels with persons exhibiting violence and ill-temper. I am, however, perfectly satisfied of this, that although there can be no justification for his cruelty to Mrs. Curtis, Mrs. Curtis's conduct has undoubtedly been such as tended to aggravate any tendency to excitability in the temper of Mr. Curtis.

Under all these circumstances, have I got a case presented to me in which I can or ought to conclude, that the conduct or the condition of Mr. Curtis, with regard to his children, is such as that I ought, even if the children were now with him, to interfere for the purpose of taking these children from him? If not, how can I say that I will, although the children are not with him, grant an injunction to restrain him from having any interference with those children, or that I ought to order that he should be displaced from his position of a parent, and that another person, although the mother of the children, should be nominated the quasi guardian, to have the control of those children? I see no such case; and as I said in the outset, if this had not been a case affecting the interests of children, as it is, but had been merely a question of money between man and man, I felt, after having heard the opening, that so little case was presented by the petition, and by the affidavits in support of it, that I should have been disposed to dismiss the petition, without calling upon the respondent to argue the question. I have, however, thought it right and best to hear it all through; and having done so, I have stated my view of the case, and I think that all I can do is to dismiss the petition.

Dec. 2, 3, 4; } BANKART v. HOUGHTON.
Jan. 13. }

Nuisance — Action — Damages — Acquiescence.

If works likely to become a nuisance are erected, and subsequently carried on without any objection, the owners of adjoining estates, who acquiesced so long as no perceptible injury was sustained, are not precluded, when injury arises, from objecting to an extension of the works, or from pursuing their legal remedy to recover damages for injury sustained by such works; and when an action has been brought, and damages recovered, this Court will not restrain the execution to obtain payment of the amount, or prevent the plaintiff in the action from taking other proceedings at law.

The bill in this suit was filed by Frederick Bankart, who carried on the business of copper-smelting at the Red Jacket Works, near Briton's Ferry, in the county of Glamorgan, against Dugdale Houghton, who was the tenant of several farms adjoining, to restrain him from taking out execution upon a judgment for 450*l.* obtained in an action, which D. Houghton had brought to recover damages for injury done to his crops and cattle, by the fumes and vapours thrown off during the process of roasting or calcining the ore, to get rid of the sulphur and arsenic, which deposited itself on the adjoining lands. The bill also prayed that the defendant might be restrained from taking any further proceedings at law, and that he might repay any monies he had recovered under an execution issued; and that the plaintiff might be quieted in the enjoyment of the works.

The works were originally established for the manufacture of spelter or zinc. They subsequently came into the hands of the plaintiff, and in 1849 he altered them into copper works, and they have ever since been in operation. When the works were first erected, Jacob Williams was the tenant of the farms, and he continued to hold them until October 1853, when D. Houghton purchased his interest in the farms, together with the stock and crops, and entered into possession. At that time there were seventeen furnaces erected, seven calcining or roasting furnaces, nine melting furnaces and one refining furnace. These had since been increased, and there were now twenty-six furnaces, viz., eight calcining or roasting furnaces, fifteen melting furnaces, and one refining furnace; four of these had been erected since the action brought by Mr. Houghton. The plaintiff now sought to be relieved from the consequence of the verdict and judgment, on the ground that D. Houghton, and those through whom he claimed, had acquiesced and encouraged him in the erection and use of the works.

Mr. R. Palmer, Mr. Pullen and Mr. C. Jones, for the plaintiff.—

Jan. 13.—THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.
—The injury complained of by D. Houghton, the defendant, has been occasioned by the exhalation and deposit from the works of F. Bankart, the plaintiff; they affect not only the land, but the crops and the cattle. F. Bankart, however, says that D. Houghton, or those through whom he claims, have acquiesced and encouraged him in the erection and use of the works, and he insists that D. Houghton is bound by these acts. The damage is not disputed; and on the trial at law, after a lengthened investigation and examination, the jury assessed the damage sustained by D. Houghton up to that time at 450*l*. This damage is a constantly recurring injury, it is daily giving rise to fresh causes of action. There are two questions now to be considered: first, the extent of the acquiescence alleged and proved; and next, the legal consequences of such acquiescence. As to the fact of the acquiescence, this is proved, and, indeed, is not questioned on the part of D. Houghton, that both his lessor and he himself when he took the farm were well aware of the existence of the works; that the tenant who assigned the lease to D. Houghton had seen them while they were being erected, and that he had not taken any steps to prevent such erection; and that D. Houghton when he took the farm knew of the existence of the works. These facts are material for some purposes, and if the case were reversed, and the defendant were here as plaintiff, seeking the aid of this Court for an injunction to restrain the plaintiff from permitting the noxious effluvia or vapour to issue from his furnaces, and to be deposited upon the defendant's lands, I should, upon these facts, consider that the defendant had debarred himself from any right to obtain such relief as an injunction, and that he must be left to his remedy at law; but this is materially altered when the party who commits the injury comes here, and calls upon the Court to prevent the defendant from obtaining that legal remedy to which prima facie he would be entitled. It has been argued on behalf of F. Bankart, that in a district where the effects of copper smoke are widely felt and understood, the tenant who takes lands adjoining copper works, and who makes no objection to them, must be held to have acquiesced not only in the evil produced by the works then in the course of erection, but also in all that may thereafter be produced by their existence, and that the addition to the works is a natural consequence of their existence, and that the tenant cannot afterwards complain of the effects of the smoke issuing from the works then existing or thereafter to be added, which he must have foreseen, and of which he did not complain. The case is simple; it is unnecessary to go through the evidence in detail; there is a conflict of testimony as to whether the acquiescence of Jacob Williams, the former tenant, under whose assignment the defendant holds a portion of the land, was obtained by his trusting to an assertion of the plaintiff's sons, that they were in possession of a patent process by which copper smoke would be rendered innocuous; it is unnecessary to consider that, for, upon the fullest concession to the plaintiff of the truth of all the facts he alleges, his case wholly fails upon the merits, and the facts upon which he relies do not justify the legal inference he attempts to draw from them. The roasting furnaces are said to be those which originally produced the injury. The original number of these was small. They were increased, and since the trial at law others have been added. The evidence shews that it was not until 1853 that any perceptible damage was sustained from the works, and even then it must have been slight. It is impossible to hold that it can be reasonably contended that, because a man has acquiesced in the erection of works which have produced little or no injury, he is not afterwards to have any remedy if by the increase of the works he sustains a serious injury. But this is what the plaintiff must establish; nay, more, he must satisfy the Court that it ought to interfere to debar his opponent from his legal remedy, and prevent him from obtaining that compensation at law which he would prima facie be entitled to. I am unable to acquiesce in the argument that the defendant must be held to have foreseen and to have assented, as a probable consequence, to the great and injurious addition which has been made to the works. The highest that it can be put is, that he assented to what was done, and to the consequences that are necessarily to be derived from that construction, but no further. The consequence of so holding would be most injurious. Such a construction would also be unwarranted by any authority. It would follow, that the partial obscuration of an ancient light assented to involves its complete and total obscuration, and that any easement assented to might be increased at the pleasure of the grantee, provided it could be shewn that the increase was a probable consequence of the use of the easement. But even to the extent of the first limited statement of the proposition I do not assent. It may well be that a person's assent is given under an erroneous opinion and view, and in ignorance of its consequences. Is that mistake of a fact to bind him thenceforward and for ever? I think not; this Court holds that a man is not to be considered bound by an election which he has made in ignorance or mistake of actual facts. Is a man to be bound by an acquiescence made in ignorance or mistake of actual facts? I think not. In this case there is this important circumstance to be borne in mind. Can the Court replace both parties in the situation they were in when the first act was done by the one side and acquiesced in by the other?

If it can, it may probably be the duty of the Court to do so; but if the Court cannot replace the parties in the situation they were previously in, its usual course is to decline to interfere altogether, and accordingly here, as I have stated, if the defendant were plaintiff seeking for an injunction I should, upon the facts, leave him to his legal remedy; but it is an error to suppose that the opposite proposition holds good, that because the Court would not interfere to assist the tenant of the adjoining lands, it will therefore interfere to assist the plaintiff against the tenant. The evidence satisfies me that the defendant did not know what the injurious consequences would be to his crops and flocks. The most favourable way in which I can put it for the plaintiff is, to believe that he was equally ignorant, for if the plaintiff knew the consequence and the defendant did not, then, either intentionally or unintentionally, the plaintiff was obtaining an undue advantage over the defendant; but if they were both equally ignorant of the consequences, why is the defendant to be made to suffer for ignorance more than the plaintiff? Why is his consent to the erection of works which were not expected to injure, and did not injure the lands at that time, to confer upon one the right to erect additional works which will destroy the whole property, and entail upon the other the incapacity of making any objection or obtaining any remedy. It is impossible to say that the defendant and Jacob Williams, under whom he claims, ever assented to the erection of any works of the extent to which they have been subsequently made; his assent was to the limited extent in which they existed, and that cannot be enlarged by any such construction. If the proper remedy is a legal one, the defendant has deprived himself of all remedies except his legal remedies, but he has not deprived himself of these. Both parties have mutually taken the case out of the jurisdiction of equity. Injunctions and prohibiting orders have nothing to do with this case upon either side. Their rights and their defences are legal, to be estimated in damages, which up to the time of the trial have been ascertained at law, and which for the future will be better ascertained at law than they can be in this court. It is necessary, in order to avoid misconception of my observation on the ignorance of the consequences of his assent being not binding upon the assenting party, to distinguish between this case, where the consequences of the act assented to are obvious and plain, and another where they are necessarily doubtful. This may be easily illustrated. For instance, if a neighbour permits a person to open a window overlooking his close, he knows the exact consequences of that permission, namely, that he is liable for ever to be overlooked, and that he cannot afterwards so build upon the close as to obscure that window. This is the extent of the injury that can be produced, and he cannot say that he did not foresee it. So, also, if he allows another a right of way across his meadow, he knows, and can accordingly estimate the extent of the injury that will result from such permission. But if a copyholder allows the lord of the manor to work the coals under the close of his copyhold, by offset out of the adjoining land, does it therefore follow that if the lord, in winning the coal, works so near the surface as to destroy the farm-buildings of the copyholder, he is to have no remedy at law for the injury so done to him? Could the lord be permitted to allege in this court that the copyholder must have known that the coal lay near the surface, and that such a result was probable from its having often occurred in the neighbourhood? Certainly not; but all such illustrations present a weaker case than that before the Court, and the strongest illustration of the distinction to be taken in such cases appears to be the case of works erected, which at first seem to be and are innocuous, and which afterwards, by addition, become seriously injurious to the proprietors of the neighbouring lands. This is exactly a case in which equity declines to interfere upon either side, and leaves the parties to their legal rights and legal liabilities. The case of the plaintiff, therefore, fails, and the motion must be refused, with costs.

March 21, 22. } KEER v. BROWN.

Fines and Recoveries Act—3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 74.—Protector—Feme Covert.

The 24th section of the Fines and Recoveries Act (3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 74.) is retrospective as well as prospective, and therefore a married woman having an estate settled to her separate use by an instrument executed before the passing of the act is alone a sufficient protector of the settlement.

By an indenture of appointment and release, dated the 23rd of April 1805, certain freehold hereditaments were settled to the use of trustees during the life of Esther Moore, upon trust for her separate use, and after her decease to the use of John Bedwell, Mary Goldsmith, Martha Bedwell and Elizabeth Bedwell, during their respective lives, in equal shares, as tenants in common (subject, as to the estate for life of the said Mary Goldsmith therein, to the proviso thereafter contained respecting the same), with remainders to the use of all and every his or her respective child or children, as tenants in common in tail, with benefit of survivorship, with remainders over; and it was declared that the estate for life thereinbefore limited to the said Mary Goldsmith should not be subject or liable to the power, control, debts, engagements or incumbrances of her husband in any manner whatsoever, and that her receipts alone should be sufficient discharges.

By the same indenture power was given to Esther Moore, notwithstanding her coverture, by will, to determine and make void all and every or any of the uses, &c. thereinbefore contained of and concerning the same hereditaments, and to appoint new uses as she should think fit.

Pursuant to the power above stated, Esther Moore did, by her will, dated the 20th of May 1811, revoke the uses of the settlement by the above indenture limited, and appointed that all the said hereditaments should immediately after her decease (subject to certain restrictions not material to be mentioned), go, remain and be to such and the same uses, &c. as in the said indenture were expressed concerning the same, but so as if John Bedwell and his issue had not been introduced. And the testatrix also directed that the life interests limited to Mary Goldsmith, Martha Hayward and Elizabeth Bedwell, then Elizabeth Last, should be subject to the like restriction, for their separate use, as in the same indenture were contained as to the life estate of Mary Goldsmith; and that all such life interests should be without power of anticipation.

Esther Moore died in 1818, without having revoked or altered her will.

Mary and William Goldsmith had seventeen children, four of whom died infants and without having been married before the year 1841.

On the 10th of October 1841 Eliza Goldsmith, one of the children of Mary and William Goldsmith, intermarried with James Lenton.

By an indenture, dated the 2nd of November 1841 (duly acknowledged and enrolled for the purpose of barring estates tail), J. Lenton and Eliza his wife did "with the consent of the said Mary Goldsmith as protector of the settlement" release and dispose of all the one undivided thirteenth part or share of the said Eliza Lenton, of and in the said one undivided third part or share of the said Mary Goldsmith of and in the premises, subject to the life estate of Mary Goldsmith therein, unto Thomas Cree, his heirs and assigns. William Goldsmith, the husband of Mary Goldsmith, was alive at the time of the execution of this deed, but he did not consent to or execute the same.

In May 1849 a suit was instituted for partition of the property, and in 1857 a decree was made by which two messuages, part thereof, were allotted to the plaintiff in the present suit and her husband, since deceased; and it was ordered, that all parties, including Cree, should join in the conveyance.

In 1858 the plaintiff put up the two messuages for sale by auction, and the defendant became the purchaser, but raised an objection to the title, on the ground that under the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 74. s. 31. W. Goldsmith was at the time of the execution of the indenture of the 2nd of November 1841, either alone or jointly with his wife, protector of the settlement, and ought to have consented thereto. The plaintiff, on the other hand, contended that under section 24. of the same act Mary Goldsmith was sole protector of the settlement, and the concurrence of her husband was unnecessary.

The matter now came before the Court in the form of a special case, the questions being, first, whether, at the date of the indenture of the 2nd of November 1841, W. Goldsmith and Mary his wife together were, or Mary Goldsmith alone was, protector of the settlement; secondly, whether, by means of the disposition in the indenture of the 2nd of November 1841 contained, all persons, whose estates were to take effect after the determination of the estate of Eliza Lenton, were effectually barred; and, thirdly, whether, in a suit for specific performance, the Court would force a title depending upon such a disposition upon an unwilling purchaser.

The case was argued by—

Mr. Giffard and Mr. B. B. Rogers, for the plaintiff; and by—

Mr. Willcock, for the defendant.

They referred to the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 74. ss. 22, 23, 24, 27, 29, 31. and 34, and cited—

1 Rop. H. & W. 3.

March 22.—Wood, V.C.—I think, after having heard the able arguments which have been addressed to me on both sides, that the construction of this act is clearly that which is put upon it by the plaintiff. In the first place, I observe that the 15th section of the act gives to every tenant in tail full power, in the largest terms, to dispose of the entailed lands for an estate in fee simple, as against all persons claiming by force of the estate tail, and also as against all persons whose estates are to take effect after the determination, or in defeasance of such estate tail. The 22nd section seems to be the first section which introduces the novelty of a protector. Then, from that clause to the 33rd, there is a series of sections, mostly defining who, in certain cases, shall be the protector. Then the 34th section provides, in effect, that where there is a protector his consent shall be requisite to enable an actual tenant in tail to create a larger estate than a base fee, so that, although the first clause gives a tenant in tail full power over the estate, it nevertheless points to the clauses thereafter in the act contained, that is, amongst other things, to the whole machinery of the protector, and the consent of the protector in all cases where that is necessary. The 22nd section begins this set of clauses, and it points to all settlements, future as well as past. It begins by enacting, "That if at the time when there shall be a tenant in tail of lands under a settlement, there shall be subsisting in the same lands, or any of them, under the same settlement, any estate for years, determinable on the dropping of a life or lives, or any greater estate (not being an estate for years), prior to the estate tail, then the person who shall be the owner of the prior estate, or the first of such prior estates, if more than one, then subsisting under the same settlement, or who would have been so if no absolute disposition thereof had been made (the first of such prior estates, if more than one, being for all the purposes of this act deemed the prior estate), shall be the protector of the settlement." Here is the first definition of the officer whose consent is necessary to give complete effect to the conveyance; and who, I may observe in passing, is a complete substitution for the person who, under the old law, would have been tenant to the præcipe. The later part of the clause confirms the right once acquired, although it may have been parted with.

Now, the first general section, the 22nd, being prospective and retrospective, all these various clauses which follow (as it appears to me in the shape of provisos) must be equally extensive, namely, prospective and retrospective, until you arrive at something that points to the contrary. The first proviso tacked on to this general clause is in the 23rd clause, which enacts, "that where two or more persons shall be owners, under a settlement within the meaning of this act, of a prior estate, the sole owner of which estate, if there had been only one, would in respect thereof have been the protector of such settlement, each of such persons, in respect of such undivided share as he could dispose of, shall for all the purposes of this act be deemed the owner of a prior estate, and shall, in exclusion of the other or others of them, be the sole protector of such settlement to the extent of such undivided share." That must be both prospective and retrospective. There is nothing at all indicating any intention that it should be otherwise. When you come to the next section, the 24th, there is not the slightest indication there of any change of intention in the legislature, or of any limitation of the class of settlement to be dealt with. It enacts, "That where a married woman would, if single, be the protector of a settlement in respect of a prior estate, which is not thereby settled, or agreed or directed to be settled to her separate use, she and her husband together shall, in respect of such estate, be the protector of such settlement, and shall be deemed one owner." It appears to me that there is nothing in this part of the section in the slightest degree indicating that it is not to extend as far as the 22nd, and to apply to settlements executed before the act equally with those executed afterwards. The section proceeds:—"But if such prior estate shall by such settlement have been settled, or agreed or directed to be settled to her separate use, then and in such case she alone shall, in respect of such estate, be the protector of such settlement." If, therefore, the question had stopped there, I think the case would have been too clear for argument. It seems to me plain that the whole of this set of clauses have been carefully framed to apply to all cases.

It is quite clear, as Mr. Rogers has said, that, grammatically, I cannot split the two branches of the alternative, and say that as to settlements not to the wife's separate use the clause is prospective and retrospective, and as to settlements to the separate use it is prospective only. The legislature deals with the case of husband and wife; and considering it a case in which the general clause might create a difficulty, it explains the position of husband and wife by saying, where it is settled to her separate use she alone shall be protector; where it is not so, then she and her husband together shall be protector. The act, however, does not stop here, and it becomes necessary to examine the clauses which follow. The 25th and 26th sections are not material to the present question. Then, when I come to the 27th, for the first time I find a provision containing an express exception in the case of settlements made before the time fixed for the act to come into operation, confirming positively the presumption that the preceding clauses, as to which no such exception is expressed, were intended to apply to the case of settlements executed before the passing of the act, unless they should happen to fall within this exception. The 27th section is this:—"Provided always, and be it further enacted, that no woman in respect of her dower, and (except in the case hereinafter provided for, of a bare trustee under a settlement made on or before the 31st of December 1833) no bare trustee, heir, executor, administrator or assign, in respect of any estate taken by him as such bare trustee, heir, executor, administrator or assign, shall be the protector of a settlement." Now, the exception comes here. The legislature has dealt in a large and general manner with the question as to who shall be protector in the 22nd section; in the 23rd it deals with the special case of joint owners; in the 24th with the special case of husband and wife; in the 25th with that of estates confirmed or restored by settlement; and in the 26th with that of leases at rent created by settlement; and then we come to the 27th, which deals with the case of a bare trustee. It provides that no bare trustee shall be protector of a settlement, "except in the case thereafter provided for" (meaning by the 31st section) "of a bare trustee under a settlement made on or before the 31st of December 1833."

Nothing is said expressly as to whether or not a husband is to be deemed to be included under the general term, "bare trustee." And the question whether the act is to be so expounded as to include the specific instance under the general term is one, as to which the observations cited by Lord Justice Turner from the old report in Plowden (1), are plainly applicable. And if, on comparing one part of the act with another, I arrive at the conclusion that such was the intent of the legislature, then I may, and must, expound "acts which are general in words, to be but particular, where the intent is particular." The frame of the act appears to be this:— Dealing with the general question of the protector in the 22nd section, all the following sections are tacked on by way of proviso down to the 35th section, where the framers of the act seem to have exhausted their particular and special provisions on that subject. The 31st section provides for the excepted case, to which reference is made in the 27th. It provides that "where under any settlement of lands made before the passing of this act, the person who, if this act had not been passed, would have been the proper person to make the tenant to the writ of entry, or other writ for suffering a common recovery of such lands, for the purpose of barring any estate tail, or other estate under such settlement, shall be a bare trustee, such trustee shall, during the continuance of the estate conferring on him the right to make the tenant to such writ of entry or other writ, be the protector of such settlement." Now, no doubt, some little difficulty does arise on the words of this clause, for where the legal estate in lands is limited to a married woman, to her separate use, it is true that under the old law, as it existed before the act was passed, her husband would have been the proper person to make the tenant to the præcipe; and it is also true that he would be, in a sense, a bare trustee. But the question I have to determine is, whether he could be a bare trustee within the meaning of the term, as employed by the legislature in the act before me; and it is plain to me that he would not, for if I once arrive at the conclusion that the 24th section is throughout retrospective as well as prospective, and applies to settlements executed before as well as to those executed after the passing of the act, then the wife alone is, by that section, to be, in respect thereof, if the estate is settled, the protector of the settlement. And independently of that consideration, it would, as it seems to me, admit of considerable question upon the construction of the 31st section itself, without the aid of the 24th, whether a husband, under the circumstances supposed, could be deemed to be a bare trustee within the meaning of the 31st section; or, at all events, whether he could be deemed a bare trustee under the settlement; both of which conditions are essential in order to bring the case within the 31st section of the act. In the 22nd section, the legislature thought it necessary to insert an express provision, that a husband's estate by the curtesy in respect of the estate tail, or of any prior estate created by the same settlement, should be deemed a prior estate under the same settlement, and that an estate by way of resulting use for the settlor should be deemed an estate under the same settlement, within the meaning of that section. It seems to me that it is not hypercritical to infer, in the absence of any similar proviso in the case of a husband to whose wife lands had been settled before the act for her separate use, that he was not intended to be included in the exception contained in the 31st section in favour of a bare trustee. Still less probable is the contention, that a husband so situated was intended by the legislature to be included under the expression "a bare trustee under the settlement," for, as it was argued, it would amount to an absurdity to say that a husband is a trustee under the settlement, when the settlor has done his utmost expressly to exclude him. But, irrespective of these considerations, it appears to me on the whole scheme of the act, the 22nd section enunciating the general canon and applying to past as well as future instruments, that the 24th in like manner applies throughout to the case of settlements executed before as well as to those executed after the act, and on that ground the case is so clear in favour of the title, that in a suit for specific performance the purchaser would be decreed specifically to perform his contract. Therefore, all the questions will be answered in the affirmative.

Executor—Undisposed of Residue—Presumptive Trust—Illegitimate Testator—Crown.

A testator, who died in 1855, by his will gave all his property and the residue of his estate to three persons, upon trust, to pay various legacies; he also gave legacies of unequal amounts to each of his trustees, whom he also appointed executors. The trustees were also empowered to appoint new trustees in the place of those unable to act. The testator afterwards gave an additional legacy to one of his executors. He was illegitimate, and died without having ever been married:—Held, that the undisposed of residue did not belong to the executors, but lapsed to the Crown, and that it was unaffected by the 11 Geo. 4. & 1 Will. 4. c. 40.

Chambers Hall, by his will, dated the 8th of February 1855, disposed of his property as follows:—"I give, devise and bequeath unto Charlotte Read, the widow of my late dear friend David Charles Read, and unto Mary Read, daughter of the said Charlotte Read, and unto my friend Charles Henry Stedman, and to the survivors and survivor of them, and to the executors and administrators of such survivor, all my $\text{$}$ l. per cent. consolidated Bank annuities, all my long annuities, and also all my Royal Exchange stock, together with all the rest, residue and remainder of my property, of what nature or kind soever, and to which I am now in my own right, or to which I may or shall hereafter be or become entitled to, either in possession, reversion, remainder or expectancy, upon trust, in the first place, to collect and get in all my said estate, and convert the same into money, and thereout to pay all my just debts and funeral and testamentary expenses, and the expenses of proving this my will; and, in the next place, to raise and pay the several legacies hereinafter given and bequeathed, or which I may hereafter give or bequeath by any codicil to this my will." The testator then gave 3,000*l.* consols to his sister Eliza Sterling and various other legacies, and he gave 500*l.* to Charlotte Read, 500*l.* to

Mary Read, and 350*l.* to C. H. Stedman; and he appointed Charlotte Read, Mary Read, and C. H. Stedman executrices and executor of his will, and directed that C. H. Stedman should be employed as the attorney and solicitor of the trustees and executors for the time being, and that he should be paid all his professional and other costs, charges and expenses, notwithstanding his being a trustee and executor; and there was the usual power for the appointment of new trustees in the place of any dying, declining, or becoming incapable to act in the execution of the trusts of his will. The testator then declared that every trustee and executor should be charged with such monies only as he should receive, and that each should be entitled to retain his costs and expenses attending the execution of the trusts, or in relation to the will. The testator on the same day made a codicil, simply giving a pecuniary legacy. He also made a second codicil, dated the 14th of June 1855, whereby, after revoking some charitable legacies, the testator gave as follows:—"I bequeath to Charlotte Read, widow of my only late dear friend D. C. Read, late of Salisbury, artist, in addition to what I have before given her by my will, the sum of 1,000*l.* consols for her sole use and benefit, in testimony of my gratitude, and as an additional mark of my respect and esteem for her, in waiting and attending upon me with such continued, undeviating kindness, throughout the whole period of my long and painful illness, with which it has pleased God to afflict me."

The testator was illegitimate; he died shortly after the date of the last codicil, without having been married. The will was proved by Charlotte Read and C. H. Stedman; power being reserved to Mary Read to come in and prove. The question now discussed was as to the right to the residue undisposed of.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Southgate, for Charlotte Read.—The testator gave his personal estate and the residue to his executors; a limited trust was attached, but this was satisfied by the payment of debts, and by the appropriation and application of the legacies. No residue was mentioned as undisposed of; it must, therefore, be presumed, that the gift of the residue to the executors was for their own benefit. The testator was aware that he had no next-of-kin, and he must also have been aware that a residue would remain after debts and legacies were satisfied. His executors were his personal friends; he must, therefore, have intended to benefit them, especially as one was an infant when the will was made. There was no intention to die intestate; the apparent intention was an entire disposition of the property. It was only when there was an undoubted intestacy that the Crown could claim; it could not claim against the executors; as therefore the trusts were satisfied, the gift to the executors became absolute for their own benefit. It could not for a moment be presumed that a trust would be created for the Crown.—

Mr. Wickens, for the Crown.—The law formerly left this question in doubt, and an inference was raised in favour of the executors. It was, however, now clear, that a gift to executors upon trusts which did not exhaust the whole beneficial interest, did not give them the undisposed of residue. Such was now the rule of law, and there was no context in the will to alter it. Had the testator intended the executors to take, he would have made a different disposition of his property: the disposition which he had made was inconsistent with that idea. The executors took legacies of different amounts under the will; they were to be indemnified from loss, they had power to deduct their expenses, and they were to be charged with no more than they received. The residue, therefore, lapsed to the Crown.—

Feb. 11.—THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.

—The question is, whether the executors of the testator take the residue of his estate which is not disposed of by his will. Although the will is dated the 8th of February 1855, and the 11 Geo. 4. & 1 Will. 4. c. 40. was passed in 1830, that statute does not affect this question; because the legislature simply directed that the residue of personal estate undisposed of by a testator should, in case there was no evidence of a contrary intention to be discovered on the face of the will, go to the next-of-kin, and not to the executors. In effect, it merely shifted the burden of proof from the next-of-kin to the executors. But in this case, the testator left no next-of-kin, and, therefore, the statute does not apply; but the question arises between the Crown and the executors. The question is exactly the same as it would have been if the will had been made and the testator had died before the passing of that act, and had left next-of-kin. The circumstance that legacies of different amounts are given to the executors, does not in the slightest degree prejudice their claim to the residue. The property, however, is given to them in trust; it is not disputed, and it is settled by numerous authorities, that where property is given to persons as executors upon trust, they cannot take the residue undisposed of, so far as those trusts either fail or do not apply; but it goes to the next-of-kin. But a distinction is taken in Dawson v. Clark, which is applicable to this case. There, as here, the gift of the property was to certain persons by name, in trust, and in a subsequent part of the will the testator appointed the same persons executors; and Sir William Grant says, "There is no connexion between the appointment of executors and this trust in the first part of the will, nor are there any words accompanying their appointment or subsequent to it, which imply that the testator considered them as subject, in that character, to any other trust than the law imposed upon them, or as having any other interest than that which the law gives them. They are, therefore, entitled to the residue for their own benefit." The question was brought before Lord Eldon by appeal, who, upon the first hearing, expressed an opinion against the decision, giving at the same time reasons for the distinction, which no one can read without feeling the great force of them. His Lordship, however, took time to consider his judgment, and, after a year and five months, affirmed the decision of Sir William Grant, upon grounds on which the Master of the Rolls had expressed no opinion. Subsequently the question came incidentally before Sir William Grant, in Southouse v. Bate; when, after referring to Lord Eldon's judgment, he expressed his continued adherence to the opinion he had previously expressed in favour of the peculiar distinction upon which he had come to his decision. The question was again raised in Russell v. Clowes, when the opinion of Sir William Grant was supported, after a long and careful argument. This decision was again confirmed in Mapp v. Ellcock; it was, however, taken by appeal to Lord Cottenham, who concurred with the observations of Lord Eldon, and reversed the decision. This case was carried to the House of Lords, who affirmed the decision of Lord Cottenham; so that it is now to be considered settled by the highest authority, that the distinction upon which Sir William Grant rested his decision cannot now be supported. I cannot help observing, though I do not think it necessary to refer in detail to the observations of Lord Eldon in the case before him, that they appear to be wholly unanswered, and the observations of Lord Cottenham in Mapp v. Ellcock appear to be such as completely to govern the present case, if it were res nova, and not already adjudicated upon; and that no substantial answer could be given to these observations. The words are to this effect:—"Sir William Grant's opinion in Dawson v. Clark, and the Vice Chancellor's opinion in Mapp v. Ellcock, do not question the rule that a gift to executors as such, in trust, excludes their claim to any beneficial interest; and that if the property be left to any third persons in trust, for purposes which fail, the executors have no claim; but it is contended that if the property, instead of being left to the executors in trust, or to third persons in trust, be left to the executors, not as such, but in their own names, upon trusts which fail, or do not exhaust the property, those trustees, in their character of executors, are entitled to the residue as incident to their office. I cannot see any principle for this distinction. If the official and private characters of the persons appointed executors are to be considered as distinct, it would seem to be immaterial whether the trustees were the same persons who were named executors, or strangers; and if the two characters are to be considered as united, the case of a gift to executors in trust is complete. It seems to be admitted that Robinson v. Taylor would negative the supposed distinction, unless a gift in trust 'to the executors hereinafter named' be so different from a gift to persons by name, who are afterwards appointed executors, as to operate as a transfer of the residue from the next-of-kin to the executors. It would be to be regretted if the title to property were to depend on such unsubstantial distinctions as these." Now, there is no word in this passage in which I do not concur. If the property is given to the executors by their names—in this case to Charlotte Read, Mary Read and C. H. Stedman—not appointing them executors, but treating them quite distinctly from parties having any trust, it is quite clear they could take nothing respecting that property which was given to them in trust, except so far as the trusts were declared. If it is given to them in their character of executors, then it is also clear, upon the decided cases, that they cannot take it; and if the rule is to be applied to the present case, it is conclusive upon the point; and all the various passages contained in the will which relate to the duty of executors relative to this property would make me hesitate long, even if the case of Mapp v. Ellcock had not been decided as it was, before I could have followed Dawson v. Clark, and the subsequent decision which followed Sir William Grant's rule in that case. From these passages, and from taking the whole will together, it is conclusively shewn that the testator did not intend his executors to take the property beneficially beyond the amount of the legacies he gave to them. I must therefore declare that the Crown is entitled to the residue.

Common Law Procedure Act—Equitable Plea.

The 83rd section of the Common Law Procedure Act, giving a right to plead an equitable defence, is only permissive, and not compulsory; and a defendant at law who has not exercised his option of putting in an equitable plea may come for an injunction to restrain the action, as he might have done before that act.

This was a motion for an injunction to restrain an action at law upon two bills of exchange, and to restrain the defendant from continuing certain proceedings in bankruptcy. It appeared that the plaintiff was the holder of two bills of exchange for 150*l.* each, dated the 16th and 23rd of September 1858 respectively, and payable at four months after date. The bills were accepted by George Duyters, and were handed over by the plaintiff to the defendant; but they were not indorsed by the plaintiff. A guarantie was given by the plaintiff to the defendant in the following form:—

“Mr. A. G. Pooley,—In consideration of your receiving from me this day two bills, accepted by Mr. G. Duyters for 150*l.* each, dated September 16, at four months, and September 23, and for which you have given me valuable consideration, I engage, in the event of the said bills not being paid at maturity, to pay the same. Particulars of bills:—September 16, 1858, 150*l.* due January 19, 1859; September 23, 1858, 150*l.* due January 26, 1859.

“(Signed) Henry Gompertz.”

Some correspondence subsequently took place between the parties, and on the 22nd of November the defendant wrote to the plaintiff, agreeing to cancel half the guarantie on receiving his I O U for 20*l.* The plaintiff gave the I O U as agreed upon, and on the 19th of January 1859, the defendant sent a notice in writing to the plaintiff, that the first of the bills had been presented and dishonoured. The plaintiff then wrote to the defendant, appointing an interview for the next day, in order to pay the amount of the bill, but the defendant did not attend. The defendant then gave another notice to the plaintiff that the second bill had been dishonoured. The plaintiff remonstrated against this further application, and offered to pay whatever was fairly due from him. On the 1st of February the plaintiff received a demand and notice under the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act for payment of the whole 300*l.*; and an action for that amount was commenced against the plaintiff in the Court of Common Pleas. The plaintiff then filed this bill, alleging that, at the time of giving the guarantie, it was agreed that if the bills should be paid away “without recourse” to the defendant, or without requiring his indorsement, or if the defendant should take the risk upon receiving a money consideration from the plaintiff, the guarantie should be delivered up, and the plaintiff freed from liability on payment of 40*l.*; but if the guarantie should remain in force as to one bill only, then on payment of 20*l.* The plaintiff alleged, that he was advised the only defence he had to the action was an equitable plea, and he therefore prayed the injunction to restrain the action and the proceedings in bankruptcy, on payment of 150*l.*, the amount of one of the bills, for which he did not dispute his liability.

Mr. Roxburgh, in support of the motion, contended that the plaintiff was justified in filing this bill, and in declining to take advantage of the permissive clause as to filing an equitable plea to an action, contained in the Common Law Procedure Act. He cited Kingsford v. Swinford (1).

Mr. C. Swanson, for the defendant, submitted that this was a case contemplated by the Common Law Procedure Act, and the plaintiff was bound to take the course there pointed out, and file an equitable plea, if he had a defence of an equitable nature—Wild v. Hillas (2).

Mr. Roxburgh was not called upon to reply.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—In my opinion the injunction ought to be granted in the terms of the notice of motion. In the case of Kingsford v. Swinford I had occasion to consider this very question, as to the effect of the Common Law Procedure Act in giving power to a defendant to plead an equitable defence to an action. In that case the view which I took of the statute was, that it was permissive and not compulsory; and that it did not interfere with the right which a defendant at law had before the statute, in case he had an equitable defence, of coming to this court for an injunction to restrain the action. In the case of Wild v. Hillas the defendant had exercised his option, and had pleaded an equitable defence to the action; and the parties were at issue upon that plea. I was, therefore, of opinion that he could not come to this court to restrain the action after having exercised his option. Here the plaintiff in equity comes for the injunction without pleading to the action, and I think that he is entitled to the order in the terms of the motion; that is, upon paying the defendant 150*l.*, the amount of one bill not covered by the I O U, about which there is no dispute.

LOKDS JUSTICES. }
Feb. 10. } WYNNE v. HUGHES.

Jurisdiction—Courts General and Local—Stay of Proceedings.

The Master of the Rolls having decided that parties to a suit in a local court of limited jurisdiction could not apply to stay proceedings in a court of general jurisdiction, when part of the property in question was situate out of the limits of the local court, on appeal, the Lords Justices ordered all the proceedings in this suit to be stayed, the plaintiffs here to have the conduct of the suit in the Court of limited jurisdiction, they appearing in that court for that purpose.

This was an appeal motion, from a decision of the Master of the Rolls, (reported ante, p. 283,) who had refused to make an order upon a motion asking him to stay all further proceedings in this court, on the ground that since the commencement of this suit another suit had been instituted by other parties, in the Chancery of the Court of the County Palatine of Lancaster, and a decree therein obtained for administering the same estate. It appeared that John Edwards, Esq., deceased, was the owner of freehold property in Lancashire, and in Cheshire, and elsewhere, out of the jurisdiction of the duchy court. In 1848, he executed a deed, vesting his property in H. W. Banner and T. Hughes, as trustees, for sale; and by deed of even date, he declared the trusts, the object being the liquidation of his debts and liabilities. Mr. Edwards died, in 1854, intestate.

The case was fully argued on appeal, and most of the cases cited on the hearing at the Rolls were referred to, and the Lords Justices directed the proceedings in the Court of Chancery to be stayed, the plaintiffs in this suit having facilities afforded them of attending the proceedings in the Chancery of the Court of the County Palatine of Lancaster, the costs being referred to the Vice Chancellor of the latter court. The order was in terms as follows:—"The parties moving, and Mr. Read undertaking to consent to an order that Mr. and Mrs. Wynne (the plaintiffs) shall appear in the Lancaster Chancery suit, and have the conduct of the proceedings there, and that the costs of the suit at the Rolls, including the costs of this motion, shall be costs in that cause, stay all further proceedings in Wynne v. Hughes. Liberty to apply."

Mr. Selwyn and Mr. Little were for the appellants; and—

Mr. Lloyd and Mr. F. O. Haynes supported the order of the Master of the Rolls.

Feb. 22. } POTTS v. ATHERTON.

Legacy—Vested Interest—Death under Age—Annuity.

A testator gave a portion of his personal property to trustees, to invest the same in the securities therein mentioned, and pay out of the proceeds an annuity of 5l. to T. P., and apply the residue of the interest, &c. towards the maintenance and education of W. C. until twenty-one, and on his attaining that age to transfer the principal of the trust-monies charged with the said annuity of 5l. unto W. C. absolutely. But if W. C. should die before twenty-one, and during the life of T. P., then the trustees were to pay T. P. for life an annuity of 10l. in lieu of the 5l., and to pay the remainder of the interest during the life of T. P., as well as the principal after her death, to a third person absolutely. T. P., the annuitant, died before W. C., but W. C. died a minor:—Held, that the gift to W. C. was an absolute vested interest in him, and notwithstanding he died under twenty-one the estate was not divested, since the precise contingency of W. C. dying under twenty-one and during the life of T. P. never happened; that consequently the representatives of W. C. were entitled to the property.

James Pavitt, by his will, dated the 1st of June 1849, gave and devised two cottages at Worksop, and all other his real estate, to Simon Potts and Joseph Goy, the plaintiffs, their heirs and assigns, upon trust, to permit his sister-in-law Theodosia Pavitt and her assigns to receive the rents, issues and profits thereof for her life; after her decease to the use of the trustees and their heirs, until William Clark, the son of his housekeeper Harriet Clark, should attain the age of twenty-one years, upon trust, in the mean time, to pay and apply the rents and profits of the said hereditaments for or towards his maintenance, education and bringing up; and when he should attain twenty-one years, or in the event of his attaining that age during the life of Theodosia Pavitt, then from and immediately after her decease to the use of him, the said W. Clark, his heirs and assigns for ever. But in case the said W. Clark should depart this life before he should have attained his age of twenty-one years, then the trustees were, from and after the decease of the survivor of them the said Theodosia Pavitt and W. Clark, to stand and be seised of the said hereditaments and premises, to the use of Samuel Atherton, his heirs and assigns for ever. And the testator gave and bequeathed all and singular his monies, securities for money, and the debts which might be due and owing to him at the time of his decease, to the said trustees, their executors and administrators, upon trust, after paying thereout all his debts and testamentary expenses, to lay out and invest the same in government funds or upon real securities, and upon trust to pay to the said Theodosia Pavitt and her assigns for life, from and out of the interest, dividends and annual proceeds of the said trust-monies, one annuity or clear yearly sum of 5l., free from all deductions, by two equal half-yearly payments in the year, the first of such payments to commence and be made at the end of six months after his decease; and upon trust to pay and apply the residue and remainder of the interest, dividends and annual proceeds of the said trust-monies, in or towards the maintenance, education and bringing up of the said W. Clark until he should attain his age of twenty-one years, and when and so soon as he should attain that age, upon trust to pay, assign and transfer the capital or principal of the said trust-monies, and all securities for the same, subject nevertheless to, and charged and chargeable with, the payment of the said annuity or yearly sum of 5l. thereinbefore given and bequeathed to the said Theodosia Pavitt for her life, in case she should then be living, unto him, the said W. Clark, for his own absolute use and benefit. But in case the said W. Clark should depart this life before he should have attained the age of twenty-one years, and during the life of the said Theodosia Pavitt, then the testator directed his trustees to pay to her from thenceforth for the residue of her life, from and out of the interest, dividends and annual proceeds of the said trust-monies, an annuity or clear yearly sum of 10l. in lieu of the said annuity of 5l., and to pay as well the residue and remainder of such interest, dividends and annual proceeds, from time to time, as the same should become due and payable during the lifetime of the said Theodosia Pavitt, as also the capital or principal of the said trust-monies after her decease, unto the said Samuel Atherton, his executors and administrators, for his and their own absolute use and benefit, to whom he thereby gave and bequeathed the same accordingly. And the testator bequeathed all the residue of his goods, chattels and effects not before disposed of, unto and equally between the plaintiffs, his trustees, for their own absolute use and benefit.

The testator died on the 29th of July 1849, leaving Theodosia Pavitt and W. Clark him surviving.

Theodosia Pavitt, on the death of the testator, entered into possession of his real estate, and she died on the 18th of June 1851. W. Clark died in October 1858, an infant, under fourteen years of age. The plaintiffs, in pursuance of the directions contained in the will, during the life of W. Clark applied a sufficient sum in each year out of the rents and profits of the testator's real estate and the income of the trust fund, in the maintenance, education and bringing up of the said W. Clark; the annual income, however, exceeded the yearly expenses consequent upon maintaining and educating the said W. Clark, and at the time of his death there was in the hands of the plaintiffs a sum of money in respect of such annual income.

The questions arising upon the will were, whether the trust funds belonged to the defendant, Samuel Atherton, or whether the plaintiffs, the trustees, were entitled to retain such trust fund for their own benefit: and the representatives of W. Clark insisted that the trust fund vested absolutely in the said W. Clark, notwithstanding he died under twenty-one.

The bill prayed that the rights and interests of all parties in the trust fund and in the personal estate of the testator might be ascertained and declared.

Mr. Baily and Mr. Nalder appeared for the plaintiffs, and submitted that the gift to W. Clark was contingent upon his attaining twenty-one, and that as he had died under that age, the gift was void; and since the contingency of W. Clark dying under age and during the lifetime of Theodosia Pavitt, in which case alone the defendant Atherton could take, had not occurred, the property went to the representatives of the testator.

Mr. Glasse and Mr. Hobhouse, for the defendant, contended that as W. Clark had died under twenty-one, that was the contingency upon which the estate became divested, and notwithstanding that he died after Theodosia Pavitt, the defendant was entitled to the whole property absolutely.

Mr. Giffard and Mr. Southgate, for the representatives of W. Clark, were not called upon to address the Court.

The following cases were cited for the plaintiff:—

KINDERSLEY, V.C. — I have looked through all the cases cited, and I do not find that there is one in which the decision had the effect in a case like this of divesting a prior vested gift. I consider that the gift to W. Clark is an absolute vested interest; and supposing that to be the case, I think I may dispose of the case without further argument. The question then, in the first place, is, whether there is a gift to W. Clark contingent upon his attaining twenty-one, or whether it is an absolute vested interest in him. It appears to me that it is an absolute vested interest. It is a gift of a portion of the estate described thus: "All and singular my monies, securities for money, and the debts which may be due and owing to me at the time of my decease unto the said S. Potts and J. Goy, their executors and administrators, upon trust, after payment of debts, to lay out and invest the same in the stocks or upon real securities, and upon trust to pay to Theodosia Pavitt and her assigns for her life, out of the proceeds of this property, an annuity of 5*l.*, by half-yearly payments; and upon trust to pay and apply the residue and remainder of the interest, dividends and annual proceeds of the said trust monies in or towards the maintenance, education and bringing up of the said W. Clark until he shall attain his age of twenty-one years; and when and so soon as he shall attain that age, upon trust, to pay, assign and transfer the capital or principal of the said trust monies, and all securities for the same, subject to and charged and chargeable with the payment of the said annuity of 5*l.* thereinbefore given to the said Theodosia Pavitt, unto the said W. Clark for his own absolute use and benefit." Is this, then, a vested gift in W. Clark absolutely, or is it contingent upon his attaining twenty-one? It is admitted that, if it was not for the gift of the annuity of 5*l.* to Theodosia Pavitt, it would be a vested interest; for it is a portion of the property separated from the general assets of the testator, and a trust to apply the income for his maintenance and education until twenty-one. If there were no direction as to education, it would still be a vested absolute gift; for though there is no direction to give him the capital till he attains twenty-one, it is still vested absolutely. The question then is, whether the gift of the annuity prevents this from being a vested interest, and it appears to me to come within those cases in which there is a gift of a limited portion of the income. The rule applicable to such cases is, that whatever is the capital given, if you give the income of it you do satisfy the exigency of the rule. Now, suppose this were a perpetual annuity of 5*l.*, it is quite clear that that would not prevent the gift from being a vested gift of the whole capital, which is given to W. Clark when he attains twenty-one. Instead of that, it is an annuity for the life only of Theodosia Pavitt; but if she survive the time of his attaining twenty-one, she is to have the annuity nevertheless, and the capital is given to him on attaining that age, subject to the annuity; but if she dies before he attains twenty-one, then he gets the whole income applicable for his maintenance and education; so that, although this is only terminable with the life of Theodosia Pavitt, still that does not prevent the gift from being vested. Now this being, in my view of the case, a vested interest, the question arises, whether by the subsequent clauses that gift is divested in the event of W. Clark dying under twenty-one. The language is this:—"But in case the said W. Clark shall depart this life before he shall have attained the age of twenty-one years, and during the lifetime of the said Theodosia Pavitt, then I direct the said trustees to pay her from thenceforth for the residue of her life, out of the proceeds of the trust-monies, an annuity of 10*l.* in lieu of the annuity of 5*l.*, and to pay the residue of such proceeds from time to time as the same shall become due during the life of Theodosia Pavitt, as also the capital of the said trust-monies, unto the said Samuel Atherton, his executors and administrators, for his and their own use and benefit, to whom I hereby give and bequeath the same accordingly." Now, it appears to me that if this is not divesting a prior vested interest, there would be strong ground for saying that the introduction of the annuity was only to provide a fund, from which Theodosia Pavitt was to have the increased annuity; but I do not think there is any case to justify the argument, and that none of them amount to this—that where there has been a prior vested gift, and then a clause divesting the gift on certain contingencies expressed, the Court has ever been found to divest that gift, unless the precise contingency referred to should occur; and as the precise contingency has not happened, I think I am bound to come to the conclusion that neither the plaintiffs nor Atherton are entitled; but that the representatives of W. Clark are entitled to the fund.

Succession Duty Act, 16 & 17 Vict.
c. 51. ss. 2, 4, and 12.—General Powers of Appointment.

It was held by one of the Vice Chancellors that the 2nd section of the Succession Duty Act, 1853, did not apply to the case of donees of powers; and that the 4th section of the same act did not operate by way of exception out of that section, but laid down the general rule to commence from a given time, for donee and predecessor in every case. Therefore where a settlor, having by a settlement executed prior to the time fixed for the coming of the act into operation, reserved to herself a general power of appointment, executed that power by will, and died after the act came into operation, his Honour held, that the case was governed by the 4th and 12th sections of the act, and the property was not liable to succession duty.

Held, upon appeal, reversing that decision, that the property was subject to the payment of the duty, and that the case was within the 2nd section of the act; that the 4th section had no application, nor did the 12th section have any bearing on the question.

By the settlement made upon the marriage of Maria Vanneck with Charles Lovelace, and dated the 21st of April 1817, Maria Vanneck assigned to trustees the one-fourth part or share of her, the said Maria Vanneck, in the monies to arise from the sale and conversion of such parts of the residuary real and personal estates directed by the will of her late father, Lord Huntingfield, to be sold as were not then sold, and also the one-fourth share in certain sums directed by the same will to be raised, upon trust, when and as they should receive the same, to invest it in government or parliamentary security. And it was declared, that the trustees should stand possessed of the money so to be invested, and of a sum of 12,000*l.* 3*l.* per cent. reduced annuities, transferred into their names by the said Maria Vanneck, upon trust, after the marriage, to pay out of the interest and dividends 200*l.* a year to the said Maria Vanneck, during the joint lives of herself and her husband, for her separate use, and to pay the residue thereof to the husband; and in the event (which happened) of the said Maria Vanneck surviving her husband, upon trust to pay the interest and dividends to her for life, and after her decease, upon certain trusts, for the children of the marriage; and in the event of there being no children who should attain a vested interest, then that the said trust-monies, funds and premises, or the unapplied or unadvanced part thereof, should be and remain (but subject to a power therein contained for the said Charles Lovelace to dispose of 5,000*l.* thereof) upon such trusts, and to and for such intents and purposes, and with, under and subject to such powers, provisos and declarations as the said Maria Vanneck, at any time or times, and from time to time, notwithstanding her intended or any future coverture, or whether she should be sole or married, by any deed or deeds, or by her last will and testament in writing, should direct or appoint; and in default of any such direction or appointment as aforesaid the said trust-monies, funds and premises, or the unadvanced part thereof, should be and remain upon trust for such person or persons of the blood and kindred of the said Maria Vanneck (living at the time of her decease) as would by virtue of the Statute of Distributions have become entitled to her personal estate, in case she had died without having been married and intestate, and in the same shares and proportions as he, she or they would in that case have become entitled to the same.

Mr. and Mrs. Lovelace left England soon after their marriage, and became domiciled at Bordeaux. Mr. Lovelace died at that place, in March 1852. Mrs. Lovelace continued to reside at Bordeaux, after the death of her husband, until her own death, which happened on the 21st of April 1856. There were no children of the marriage.

By her will, dated the 15th of April 1852, Mrs. Lovelace bequeathed to the petitioners, M. Facioli and Madame Werth (who were natives of France, residing at Bordeaux), the sum of 10,000*l.*, to be equally divided between them. The only property, except household furniture, &c. of which Mrs. Lovelace was possessed at her death, consisted of the trust funds comprised in the marriage settlement; and the question which arose on the petition was, whether legacy or succession duty was payable upon the 10,000*l.* in respect of this appointment by will. The right to legacy duty was given up by the Crown without argument.

Mr. Willcock and Mr. J. Hinde Palmer, for the petitioners, contended that no succession duty was payable.

WOOD, V.C.—The point to be determined on the petition in this case is simply whether or not succession duty is payable in respect of a bequest under a testamentary appointment made by the Hon. Mrs.

Lovelace, under a power contained in the settlement made previously to her marriage. By this settlement personal property to a considerable amount was settled; and in the events which have happened Mrs. Lovelace took a life estate, with an absolute power of appointment. The lady who made this testamentary appointment was domiciled in France at the time of her decease, and at the time of executing her testamentary appointment. She made an appointment, attested in the manner required by the settlement; and the appointment itself is undoubtedly effective. It is conceded, on the part of the Crown, that no legacy duty would be payable in a case of this description; but the question arises, whether under the Succession Duty Act succession duty is payable. The point seems to be a very short one; it was argued by the Solicitor General very tersely and briefly; and it depends, as it seems to me, simply upon three sections of the Succession Duty Act.

The difference between power and property has been so long established, that I was surprised to hear any argument attempting to treat this as the property of the lady, which she was thus disposing of by her power of appointment. No doubt there is a substantial difference, which is recognized in many respects by the Courts between a general power of appointment and a power of appointment amongst particular objects. In order to dispose of a property in which you have only a limited interest, but at the same time have a power enabling you to dispose of it, you may displace the original limitations of a settlement by the exercise of the power; else they will remain in full effect; you have no property which is subject to your power, but you have simply a power to displace the arrangements made by a settlement, and to substitute others in its room. There is a substantial difference between an unlimited and absolute power of substituting an entirely new series of limitations, and a mere power of saying in reference to particular classes of limitations, "I am the person to determine which of the classes of limitations shall take effect with reference to the property over which I have a control." The difference is, I say, substantial, and it was recognised in the case of Holmes v. Coghill. Where a general power of appointment or a complete and absolute power of appointment is intrusted to a donee of a power, when such a power is executed the Court is enabled to say, you have displaced all the estates limited by the settlement, and you have made a certain disposition of the property; we now will fasten on that property over which you have exercised the control and ownership conferred upon you, and we will treat it as your property, for the purpose of drawing out of that property that which will be sufficient for the payment of your debts, before we allow it to pass according to the disposition which you have made by virtue of your power. That is a clear and substantial position. Both in the Legacy Duty Act and in the Succession Duty Act, unquestionably, as to all instruments taking effect after the particular period there mentioned, the legislature has acted upon this distinction, and it has provided that where there is an absolute power of appointment, the donee of the power shall be taken to be the owner from the moment at which he exercises the power. In the one case legacy duty is payable, in the other succession duty is payable in respect of the donee of the power being treated as the absolute owner from the moment that he takes upon himself to exercise that power. Now, with regard to a limited power, both the acts to which I have referred provide, that the persons taking under an appointment by virtue of a limited power shall be deemed to take under the donor of the power, and not under the person who exercises it. The point here arises, as I said, upon three sections of the Succession Duty Act, and it involves the question, how they are to be interpreted, looking at the general state of the law upon the subject. The first of these three sections of the Succession Duty Act, under which the Crown claims, is the 2nd. It runs thus:—"Every past or future disposition of property"—these are most general terms—"by reason whereof any person has or shall become beneficially entitled to any property, or the income thereof, upon the death of any person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of this act, either immediately or after any interval, either certainly or contingently, and either originally or by way of substitutive limitation, and every devolution by law of any beneficial interest in property, or the income thereof, upon the death of any person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of this act, to any other person, in possession or expectancy, shall be deemed to have conferred, or to confer on the person entitled by reason of any such disposition or devolution, a 'succession'; and the term 'successor' shall denote the person so entitled; and the term 'predecessor' shall denote the settlor, disponent, testator, obligor, ancestor or other person from whom the interest of the successor is or shall be derived." Now, if there were nothing else in the act of parliament I certainly think, interpreting this clause alone, and not looking to the other sections of the act (a mode of proceeding which is not open to me, for I must construe this act of parliament, like every other instrument, by all its parts,) I say, if it rested here, I think it would be extremely difficult for those who contend that succession duty is not payable, to say that it is not included within the general terms and provisions of this section. Certainly they are not so pointed to a particular case as might have been expected; and hence it affords a ground for the Court to say whether, on looking to the whole of the arrangements and dispositions made by the act relating to the succession duty, the true construction of the act ought to be a construction, which would include in this section all descriptions of property taken under a general power of appointment. Of course, under this 2nd section, a person taking under a general power of appointment would come in under these words: he would take "either originally or by way of substitutive limitation." These are the words that would carry the case where a general power was exercised. You might in a certain sense, although it might be expressed in much more apt terms—especially with reference to a general power of appointment—say the settlor has provided a certain series of limitations; he has provided such substitutive limitations as A. B, the donee of the power, may indicate, and it shall go in this course, unless A. B. indicating some other course; and if he does indicate another course, then it shall go to such uses and purposes as he shall appoint, which is, in a sense, a "substitutive limitation." Therefore, in that case it would be found that, by the 2nd section, the successor would be the appointee under the power, and the predecessor would be the settlor, that is to say, the person creating the settlement. Now then, that being so generally, qualified only by the circumstance that the instrument may be executed at any time, however remote, but the interest must come into possession with reference to the decease of some person who shall depart this life after the passing of the act, one would conceive that the whole thing was disposed of and for ever settled (for throughout the act one finds the successor to be the appointee, and the predecessor to be the settlor), unless there were something by way of proviso, which would restrict the general operation of the words. What you find next is no such proviso, no limitation of this 2nd section. The 3rd section is totally different. The marginal note is, "joint tenants taking by survivorship to be deemed successors." I do not think it necessary to dwell upon this, except simply to observe, that the interposition of that section between the previous section and the next tends strongly to shew that the 4th section, which is the important one, was not intended by the legislature as a proviso, excepting a certain class of cases out of the operation of the 2nd, but was intended as a substantive and distinct provision, indicating, as it appears to me, really what is the intention of the legislature with reference to persons taking under a general power, and not saying that that is an exception out of the former clause. This affords, as it appears to me, I confess, with regard to the construction to be put upon the 12th section, which I shall come to presently, an indication that the legislature did not intend by the words of the 2nd section—although large enough, uninterpreted by anything else you find in the act—to include the particular case in question, and did not intend to deal with the case of a disposition by virtue of a general power. I find that the 4th section is this:—"Where any person shall have a general power of appointment, under any disposition of property taking effect upon the death of any person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of this act, over property, he shall, in the event of his making any appointment thereunder, be deemed to be entitled, at the time of his exercising such power, to the property or interest thereby appointed, as a succession derived from the donor of the power." The opening portion of this section, stopping at the words "over property," is very awkwardly worded; but it is so worded that I think it impossible in grammatical construction to read the words, "taking effect upon the death of any person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of this act," as applying to anything else than the instrument making the disposition. The reason why I say it is impossible grammatically to interpret it in any other way is, that after the long parenthesis I have just read, I find the words, "over property"; and hence I hardly see any other way in which it can be construed. One must throw out the intervening sentence which is printed between the two commas, and consider the words "power of appointment" as followed by the expression "over property." I think, therefore, it is plain by this section that the legislature, for some reason or other, has restricted the operation of the succession duty, with reference to the execution of powers of appointment, to cases which shall take place under dispositions of property taking effect on the death of some person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of this act; in other words, either to wills taking effect, or to settlements made, after the commencement of the act. The effect of the section is, that the donee of a general power shall be deemed to be the predecessor, and that the appointee shall be deemed to be the successor; that the donee of a particular power shall not be the predecessor, but that the settlor shall be the predecessor, and the appointee shall be the successor. Now, I will turn to the 12th section of the act, and when I have looked at that, I think I shall have looked at everything that is necessary for the determination of this case. The words are,

"Where any person shall take a succession under a disposition made by himself." That is the case before me. This lady, Mrs. Lovelace, made a settlement when she was Miss Vanneck; it was a disposition made by her. The section proceeds, "then, if at the date of such disposition he shall have been entitled to the property comprised in the succession expectantly on the death of any person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of this act, and such person shall have died during the continuance of such disposition, he shall be chargeable with duty on his succession, at the same rate as he would have been chargeable with if no such disposition had been made; but a successor shall not in any other case be chargeable with duty upon a succession taken under a disposition made by himself, and no person shall be chargeable with duty upon the extinction or determination of any charge, estate or interest created by himself, unless, at the date of the creation thereof, he shall have been entitled to the property subjected thereto expectantly on the death of some person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of this act." Now, what is the result of section 4. and section 12. taken together, in cases where a disposition takes effect upon the death of any person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of this act. It is plainly this: that the donee of a general power created by himself over his own property will not pay any duty on exercising his power; that is plain and clear. Having these three sections before me, I thus put the case to myself:—The 2nd section is general in its terms; it may include, unless I get a clue to the construction by the subsequent words of the act, the case of an appointment under a general power; but the words do not so absolutely and necessarily include that, as to enable me to say that the subsequent section may not be an interpretation of the meaning of the legislature. In one sense it may be said, that a person is not entitled to any property by reason of the disposition mentioned in the section simpliciter; it requires that disposition and something more; it requires that disposition, plus a will or an instrument, which the person having that general power is obliged to execute. And, therefore, although I might, under the words "substitutive limitation," if the word "disposition" stood quite alone, be bound to construe it as taking in every class, there might be indications in the act to shew it was not so intended. If I found a clause pointing in this general way, and making appointees under a general power successors to the person creating the power, that is, to the settlor, and I found nothing else in the act, then I might be bound to construe it in that way; but if I found another clause, not by way of provision or exception out of this, but another positive, distinct and separate clause, saying that the appointee under a general power should not be successor to the settlor, but that the donee himself of the power, when he executed a general power, should be the successor to the settlor, there would be at once such a contradiction, that I should say the general words of the 2nd section are not intended to apply to that case; the only doubt being this, whether, as this is applied to a particular case, namely, a settlement taking place, and a person dying after the particular time of the passing of the act, that ought to make any difference. I apprehend that it ought not to make a difference, unless the Court is satisfied that it is a proviso limiting this class of cases, and taking it out of the 2nd section. I have given a reason why, technically, it does not look like a proviso, because it does not come in as a proviso to the 2nd section, but another section on a somewhat different subject is interposed. That, perhaps, is technical; but when you look at the substance, can any reason be suggested for its being a proviso taking it out of the general case? I waited for the Solicitor General to explain that; but the Solicitor General's case was this, that probably there was some blunder in drawing the section. A reasonable suggestion, certainly; but it is clear that it is not intended to be excepted; for, taking the 4th and 12th sections together, if this be not the general rule, we should come to this plain and palpable absurdity, that any person taking after the passing of this act, shall not be liable in respect of a settlement made by herself, if she has reserved to herself a general power, and executes that general power; but if she takes under a settlement executed before the passing of the act, then she is to be subjected to that provision. One would have thought that the rule ought to be just the contrary, if there is any rule at all. I cannot impute to the legislature the intention of saying, this is an intended special exemption out of the general clause; whereas, by the general clause, we have made everybody, before the passing of the act, who never dreamt of the act being passed, liable in respect of their execution of a general power created by themselves; yet, after the passing of the act, when all the world has had notice of the act, or had notice of its being about to be passed, and might have prayed the legislature not to pass an act affecting their interests, they shall be all exempted from the liability and the burthen which can be imposed upon persons who never dreamed of any such act being passed. That would be the result of such a conclusion. I think the sound conclusion is this: that the second clause does not apply to the case of donees of powers at all; that the fourth clause is not an exception out of the general clause, but is a general rule laid down, to commence from a given time, for donees and predecessor, in every case, although the rule of construction will not come into operation upon any settlements except those executed after the passing of the act; and, therefore, that this particular property in question is not liable to succession duty.

Mr. Willcock.—With reference to the costs of this application?

The VICE CHANCELLOR.—I think it would not be proper to give the costs; the Crown could not be expected in such a case not to have it discussed.

From the above decision (except as to costs) the Attorney General, on behalf of the Crown, appealed, and the case was argued by the same counsel as appeared in the court below, with the addition of Mr. R. E. Turner, for the respondents. The same authorities, and the same sections of the Succession Duty Act were also relied upon. The case was argued on the 3rd and 4th of June, when judgment was reserved.

June 14.—LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—On the occasion of the marriage of Miss Vanneck with Mr. Lovelace, in the year 1817, a settlement was made, under which the question in the present case arises. The settlement was dated in that year, and by the terms of it Mrs. Lovelace, as there was no issue of the marriage, and she survived her husband, who died in 1852, became tenant for life of the property—personalty altogether—which was settled by him, with an absolute power of appointment over the capital, exercisable by her either by deed or will, and in default of execution of the power, the property, after her death, was not to belong to herself or her estate, but was to devolve on her next-of-kin. She executed the power by a will made in the year 1852, after her husband's death; it was a full and valid appointment and perfectly effectual, and she died after the year 1853, without having revoked or altered it. The respondents in the present case are some of the appointees, and being strangers in blood to Mrs. Lovelace, and not connected with her by marriage, a duty of 10*l.* per cent. on the amount appointed—a considerable amount—is claimed by the Crown from them by force of the Legacy Duty Acts prior to the statute 16 & 17 Vict. c. 51, and of that statute, or, at least, by force of the statute 16 & 17 Vict. c. 51. The settlement was an English marriage settlement, made in England upon the marriage of two English persons; it affected English property only, but the lady's English domicile of origin was, I think, before the year 1852, changed for a foreign—I believe for a French—domicil, which newly-acquired domicil she retained probably, or certainly, throughout that year, and thenceforth to her death. I doubted at one time whether that change of domicil might not affect the controversy, which, as I have said, was as to the alleged title of the Crown, if not under the Legacy Duty Acts preceding the statute 16 & 17 Vict. c. 51, at least under that statute, to a duty of 10*l.* per cent. on the amount of the settled personalty appointed by the lady to strangers in blood, and not connected with her by marriage, under a general power given or reserved to her by the settlement. The change of domicil now seems to me to be not material. The appointed property would, if she had not exercised her power of appointment, not have been a part of her estate; it would, in that event, have devolved, on her death, upon her next-of-kin, as the persons designated by the settlement. The Crown appears to me clearly to have a right to the duty claimed, unless excluded by the 4th section of the statute, the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 51, which section—and I say so with the utmost deference towards the learned Judge who is stated to have thought otherwise—does not, I think, bear on the controversy. The husband and wife were the donors, or one of them was the donor, of the power, which the wife duly exercised; but I do not collect from the 4th section any intention of conferring an exemption from duty in consequence of the execution of the power in such circumstances as existed in the present instance. I also think the 12th section of the act, from the fact that the respondents, the appointees, are aliens, immaterial for every present purpose; and my opinion is in favour of the Crown, claiming, as it does, only a single duty, that is to say, no duty in respect of any acquisition, or supposed acquisition of property by Mrs. Lovelace—no duty as against that lady or her estate—only a duty in respect of her execution of the power as against those, or some of those, in whose favour she exercised it.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—This is a question upon the Succession Duty Act of 1853. The late Mrs. Lovelace, under her marriage settlement, dated long before the passing of the act, was tenant for life in remainder after the death of her husband, who died before the act was passed, of considerable personal property in this country, originally vested in trustees resident here, but afterwards paid into court under the Trustees' Relief Act. She had a general power of appointment over the property by deed or by will, which power, from the failure of intermediate limitations, followed immediately after her own life estate. After her marriage she became domiciled abroad, and whilst so domiciled abroad she exercised her power of appointment by will, dated before the passing of the act, in favour of persons who appear also to be domiciled abroad.

She died after the time appointed for the commencement of the act, and the question is, whether succession duty is payable by her appointees. Vice Chancellor Sir W. P. Wood has been of opinion that it is not, and the appeal before us, presented by the Attorney General, brings his Honour's judgment under review. Having considered the case, both during the argument and since, I find myself compelled to dissent from the conclusion at which his Honour has arrived. The case depends, as it seems to me, upon the 2nd and the 4th sections of the act, the point raised upon the 12th section not appearing to me to arise. By the 2nd section it is enacted in these terms: "Every past or future disposition of property by reason whereof any person has or shall become beneficially entitled to any property, or the income thereof, upon the death of any person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of this act, either immediately or after any interval, either certainly or contingently, and either originally or by way of substitutive limitation, and every devolution by law of any beneficial interest in property, or the income thereof, upon the death of any person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of this act, to any other person in possession or expectancy, shall be deemed to have conferred, or to confer on the person entitled, by reason of any such disposition or devolution, a 'succession'; and the term 'successor' shall denote the person so entitled, and the term 'predecessor' shall denote the settlor, disponent, testator, obligor, ancestor or other person from whom the interest of the successor or shall be derived." Taking this section by itself, there cannot, I think, be any reasonable doubt that appointees under general powers of appointment were meant to be included, and are included, within it. It extends to all persons who are, by reason of any past or future disposition of property, entitled, either originally or by substitutive limitation; and it cannot, I think, be said that appointees under a general power are not entitled by reason of the disposition which created the power. They derive their title, indeed, through the instrumentality of the donee of the power; but they could have no title if the disposition creating the power had not existed. I have had less difficulty upon this point, as the Vice Chancellor has arrived at the same conclusion upon it; but then his Honour has held, that, taking the 4th section of the act in connexion with the 2nd, it sufficiently appears that powers of appointment, and successions under them, were intended to be dealt with by the 4th section only, and that appointments under general powers, and—as I presume, in his Honour's judgment—appointees under limited powers also, are not therefore affected by the 2nd section; and he has further held, that the 4th section has restricted the operation of the succession duty, with reference to the execution of powers of appointment, to cases which take place under dispositions of property taking effect upon the death of some person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of the act; in other words, to wills taking effect or to settlements made after the commencement of the act; and upon these grounds he has determined that no succession duty is payable in the case before us. With the most unfeigned respect for the judgment of the Vice Chancellor, from whose opinions I never differ without some considerable degree of apprehension, I cannot agree with him in either of these conclusions. The 4th section is in these terms:—"Where any person shall have a general power of appointment under any disposition of property taking effect upon the death of any person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of this act, over property, he shall, in the event of his making any appointment thereunder, be deemed to be entitled, at the time of his exercising such power, to the property or interest thereby appointed as a succession derived from the donor of the power; and where any person shall have a limited power of appointment, under a disposition taking effect upon any such death, over property, any person taking any property by the exercise of such power shall be deemed to take the same as a succession derived from the person creating the power as predecessor." This section provides, therefore, that where there is a general power of appointment under a disposition "taking effect upon the death of a person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of the act," whatever may be the meaning of those words—a point to which I shall presently advert—the donee of the power, if he exercises it, shall be deemed to be entitled to the property appointed as a succession derived from the donor. But it does not appear to me to follow that, because in the particular case pointed out by the section, the donee of the power is to be the successor to the donor, therefore in other cases not falling within this section, the appointee is not to be liable under the 2nd section. If indeed all the cases of appointment under general powers which could fall under the 2nd section would also fall within the 4th section, there would, I think, be strong ground for supporting the construction of the Vice Chancellor; but there certainly may be cases which would fall within the 2nd section, and would not fall within the 4th; the very case before us is one, as I shall presently have occasion to point out. If his Honour's construction as to the 4th section applying only to wills taking effect, and to settlements made after the commencement of the act, be upheld, there would plainly be numberless others. The consequences of this construction of the act cannot be disregarded. The effect would be that in all cases not falling within the 4th section there would be no duty payable by the appointee if the power was exercised, although the parties entitled in default of appointment would certainly be liable to the duty if the power had not been exercised. It is difficult to suppose that this could have been the intention of the legislature. It may be said that, unless the Vice Chancellor's construction be adopted, there would be this difficulty: that the 4th section, in the cases in which it applies, would make the donee of a power a successor, and that the 2nd section would at the same time place the appointee in that position; and that in cases in which the donee and the appointee would be liable to different rates of duty, it could not be determined which rate of duty would be payable. But this difficulty is, I think, more seeming than substantial; for I apprehend that the express provision of the 4th section, that the donee of a power should be a successor, would, in the cases in which it applied, override the general provision of the 2nd section, placing the appointee in that position. I have gone into this part of the case, as it seems to me to bear directly upon the question before us; but this part of the case is of no great general importance if considered independently of the question as to the 4th section applying only to wills taking effect, or settlements made, after the time appointed for the commencement of the act; for, independently of that question, there could be but few cases in which duty would not be payable by the donee of the power. I have thought it right, therefore, to consider the case before us with reference to that point also, and I am of opinion that the decision upon it cannot be maintained. The decision is arrived at by treating the words, "taking effect upon the death of any person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of the act," as immediately connected with the words, "under any disposition of property," reading the sentence thus: "Under any disposition of property taking effect upon the death of any person dying after the time for the commencement of the act." But the disposition of property here referred to is a disposition under which a person is to have a general power of appointment, and may be, therefore, a disposition either by deed or will; and the legislature surely cannot have intended to speak of a disposition by deed, which must take effect upon the execution of the deed, as a disposition taking effect upon the death of a person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of the act. It appears to me, therefore, that the true construction of the section is, to refer the words, "taking effect upon the death of any person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of the act," to the power, and not to the disposition of the property. The respondents, not relying wholly upon the judgment of the Vice Chancellor, argued that this case came within the 4th section, but they failed to convince me of this. I think, looking to the context, that the words of the section refer to a power coming into operation, and not to the appointment under it taking effect; and it is for this reason that I think this case does not fall within the 4th section—the power having come into operation on the death of Mr. Lovelace, who died before the passing of the act, and that it is not affected by the 12th section, as Mrs. Lovelace, not being a successor at all, could not, of course, be a successor to herself. The respondents also argued that the property in question ought to be regarded as the property of Mrs. Lovelace, and that, her domicile having been a foreign domicile, this duty ought not to attach, and would not have attached upon her property under the Legacy Duty Act. I can find nothing in the act which can make this property the property of Mrs. Lovelace, unless the case falls within the 4th section, and I have already stated that, in my opinion, it does not; and if the property cannot be considered as the property of Mrs. Lovelace, the principle on which the cases under the Legacy Duty Act proceed, has not, as it seems to me, any application. It was further argued, for the respondents, that the act must be regarded as applying to British subjects only, and several of these provisions were referred to as shewing that it was so intended—but the provisions referred to go no further than to shew that there may be cases in which it may be difficult to recover the duty; and I cannot go the length of holding that this act of parliament, general in its terms, does not apply to the case of a succession under a British settlement, of British property, vested in British trustees, and falling under the jurisdiction of a British Court. Upon the whole, therefore, my opinion is that the duty in this case is payable. I think the case is within the 2nd section, not within the 4th section, and that it is not affected by the 12th section.

The question of costs was then spoken to, and it appearing that a sum had been retained in court to meet the claim of the Crown to duty, the Solicitor General agreed that the costs of the hearing before the Vice Chancellor, and on appeal, should be paid out of that sum. The Lords Justices said they considered such a course very reasonable, the question of construction being difficult.

 May 6, 7, 9, 27. } DE MATTOS v. GIBSON.

Ship — Charter-party — Mortgage of Ship—Specific Performance.

A. being equitably entitled to a ship entered into a charter-party with C, and afterwards mortgaged the ship to B, B. the mortgagee having notice of the charter-party. The ship proceeded on its voyage, but shortly afterwards was obliged to put into port for repairs, which were paid for by B, and B. took possession of the ship. C. filed a bill against A. and B, praying specific performance of the charter-party and for an injunction to restrain the use of the vessel for any other purpose than in performance of the contract entered into with C. One of the Vice Chancellors dismissed the bill; and, on appeal, this decision was affirmed, the Lord Chancellor considering that specific performance of the charter-party could not be decreed, the highest right against B. being to prevent him from actively interfering to stop the performance of the contract, while the contract remained in force, but that under the circumstances of the case the contract was virtually at an end, upon B's taking possession of the ship.

This was an appeal, by the plaintiff, from the decision of Vice Chancellor Wood, who had dismissed the bill. The case has already been reported (ante, p. 165), upon an appeal motion for an injunction, but some additional facts having been before the Court upon the hearing of the cause, the following statement, with which the Lord Chancellor prefaced his judgment, will give the entire case upon which the questions arose:—

The bill was filed for the purpose of obtaining the specific performance of a charter-party, and also to restrain the mortgagee of the chartered vessel from interfering to interrupt the voyage for which she was engaged. The defendant Curry, in October 1857, had contracted to purchase a vessel called the Allerton, which had been mortgaged to Mr. Dickinson, a member of the firm of Bramley, Moore & Co., for 1,935*l.* Before the purchase was completed, and on the 23rd of October 1857, Curry entered into a charter-party with the plaintiff, by which it was agreed that the Allerton, which was then in the port of Shields, should proceed to the Tyne, and there take a full and complete cargo of coals, and therewith proceed to Suez, or so near thereunto as she safely could, and deliver the same, the freight at 60*l.* sterling per keel to be paid one-third by the charterer's acceptance at three months, and one-third by a like acceptance at six months, from the sailing of the vessel from her lading port in Great Britain, the same to be returned if the cargo were not delivered at the port of destination; and the remainder by a like bill at three months, at the charterer's office in London, from the date of the certificate of the right delivery of the cargo: penalty for non-performance of the agreement, the amount of the freight. Curry was unable, from his own resources, to provide means for the completion of the purchase; and for the purpose of obtaining the necessary funds, he engaged to mortgage the vessel to the other defendant, Mr. Gibson, for the sum of 1,500*l.* The mortgage to Gibson was executed on the 12th of January 1858, before Curry had become the registered owner of the vessel, and it contained a power of sale which was not to be exercised for six months. It was admitted that Gibson took this mortgage with full knowledge of the existence of the plaintiff's charter, and there was no doubt that the plaintiff knew the terms of the power of sale in Gibson's mortgage deed. On the 6th of January 1858, Dickinson sent the mortgage and the bill of sale to Curry, executed, to Heald & Co., of Newcastle, with instructions not to part with the bill of sale until the whole of the purchase money was paid. On the same day, Curry drew on the plaintiff two bills for the stipulated proportion of freight, which were accepted by him and returned to Heald & Co., with orders not to deliver them until the vessel had sailed. On the 7th of January 1858, Gibson sent a Liverpool Dock bond for 1,200*l.* to Dickinson, for him to sell and apply the proceeds in part payment of the purchase-money for the vessel. The dock bond produced the sum of 1,080*l.*; and upon its receipt, Dickinson sent instructions to Heald & Co. not to detain the bill of sale, and it was accordingly delivered by them to Curry on the 11th of January 1858. On the 19th of January, Curry was registered at Shields as the owner of the vessel, and on the following day, the mortgage to Gibson was registered at the same port. The vessel, having received her cargo of coals, sailed on her voyage on the 29th of January 1858. It had been arranged by Gibson and Curry with Heald & Co., that as soon as the vessel sailed they should get the plaintiff's bills discounted, and pay the residue of Dickinson's mortgage out of the proceeds; and, accordingly, on the 30th of January, the day after the sailing of the vessel, the discount of the bills was procured, and a sum of 735*l.* was handed to Heald & Co., for Dickinson, and also a cheque of Gibson for 120*l.*, which fully paid the purchase-money. The vessel, shortly after the commencement of the voyage, met with bad weather, and was obliged to put into Portsmouth to be repaired, and the repairs amounted to 250*l.*, which was paid by Gibson. The vessel then sailed, but had not proceeded far before it became necessary to put into Penzance, where she arrived in a leaky condition on the 24th of February. On the 2nd of March, the surveyor of that port ordered the cargo to be discharged, in order that the vessel might be repaired. The coals were accordingly taken out of the vessel, and deposited in an inclosed yard on the 16th of March, and a shipwright at Penzance commenced the repairs by the order of Adamson, the master of the vessel. He, however, soon became dissatisfied with Adamson's responsibility, and on Gibson's refusal to be answerable for the repairs, they were stopped. There was an entire blank in the evidence from this period down to the beginning of July; the plaintiff offering no explanation of his conduct during these three months. He did nothing until the 2nd of July, when he wrote to Mr. Gibson a letter, in these terms:—"The delay in the despatch of this ship is becoming a very serious matter, and must be attended to. The owner, Mr. Curry, is, and has now been detained at Genoa for months past for your benefit, and as I cannot continue to be the sufferer by this, I must beg of you to see that immediate arrangements are made to despatch her, and I have no doubt that Mr. Mathews, of Penzance, will grant you any reasonable facilities to this end." This letter was not answered by Mr. Gibson until the 13th of July, which was the day after the power of sale in the mortgage-deed could be exercised. In his reply he said, "I duly received your letter of the 2nd instant, and it was my intention to have called upon you when I was in town, from whence I only returned on Monday, but I was so occupied that I had not time to do so. I can only repeat what I said to you at our last interview, that I am advised to sell the ship as she now is. Capt. Curry will, I expect, be here in a day or two, when I have no doubt but he will make an arrangement respecting the ship which will be satisfactory both to you and Mathews, of Penzance." It appeared by this letter, that there had been a previous interview between the plaintiff and Gibson, in which the plaintiff had been informed of the power of sale possessed by Gibson. Curry, as Gibson anticipated in this letter, did call on the plaintiff afterwards, and proposed to carry the plaintiff's coals by a vessel called the Mary Ann, instead of the Allerton, or to carry them by the latter if the plaintiff would advance some more freight in order to assist him in doing the requisite repairs. The plaintiff refused both these offers; the first, on the ground that he had no confidence in Curry, and did not wish to lose the benefit of his agreement for the Allerton; and the other, because, although the plaintiff was willing to make an advance, it was on the condition that Curry would bring him a certificate of the vessel being in a state of repair fit for sea, which he was unable to do. From this time there was again considerable delay on the part of the plaintiff until September, when, under an apprehension that Gibson might exercise his power of sale without notice to the purchaser of the charter-party, he filed a bill on the 15th of September against Gibson only, praying that he might be restrained from selling the vessel otherwise than subject to the burden of the charter-party. The injunction was refused. The defendant Gibson then put in his answer, by which it appeared that Mathews, the shipwright, claimed a lien on the vessel for repairs; that the vessel was unable to prosecute the voyage to

Suez, because Curry could not pay for the repairs, and because he had made default in payment of the mortgage-money to Gibson; and that Gibson intended to sell the vessel under his power of sale without reference to the engagement under the charter-party, and with that view he had sent instructions to Mathews to allow the vessel to be removed out of dock and sent back to Newcastle. On the 18th of October Gibson took possession of the vessel, and he afterwards authorized repairs upon her, which were completed, and he paid the sum of 850*l.* for these repairs to Mathews, whose lien was consequently withdrawn on the 19th of November. The bill was amended, and Curry was made a defendant. Specific performance of the charter-party was prayed against him, and also that he might be restrained from permitting the vessel to remain at Penzance, or at any place other than Suez. There was an additional prayer against Gibson that he might be restrained from removing the vessel to Newcastle, or otherwise interfering to interrupt the voyage. On the 25th of November, the motion for the injunction was made before Wood, V.C., and refused: but upon an appeal to the Lords Justices, they granted an injunction to restrain Gibson from removing the vessel. Upon that occasion, Lord Justice Turner intimated his opinion that the questions which would have to be determined upon the hearing of the case would be, first, whether the plaintiff was entitled to the specific performance of the contract; secondly, whether, if he were not so entitled, he might not nevertheless be entitled to an injunction to restrain the breach of the contract contained in the charter-party; and, thirdly, whether the charterer of the vessel might not be entitled to the benefit of the equity which Curry would have against Gibson, the mortgagee, to prevent his permitting or compelling a breach of the contract.

These questions were fully argued before Wood, V.C., and he gave judgment against the plaintiff, and dismissed his bill without costs as against Curry, and as to Gibson with costs, except so far as they were occasioned by the motion for the injunction. The same questions were also fully argued upon this appeal.

Mr. Amphlett and Mr. E. Macnaghten, for the plaintiff, the appellant.—No opinion had been expressed by the Vice Chancellor as to the right to specific performance of the charter-party. But whether there were this right or not, the plaintiff was entitled to an injunction against Curry and Gibson, to restrain them from using the vessel in any other way than that in which it had been contracted that it should be used.—

Webster v. Dillon, 3 Jur. N.S. 432.

Many illustrations might be given of this: for instance, if the Government were induced to advance a large sum to complete the Great Eastern ship on a contract that, when completed, the ship should be used for conveying troops to India, the proprietors could not, according to the defendant's argument, be restrained from selling the ship and allowing her to be used in any other way; but the Government would be left to a remedy for damages against the proprietors.

Mr. Rolt and Mr. Bedwell, for the defendant.—The case of the plaintiff had been set up as if it were a mere question of priorities, which was not at all the fact. At the date of the charter-party, Curry had a mere equitable interest in the ship, and the defendant was entitled to claim the benefit of the Ship Registry Acts, and to say that the registered owner was still the owner. The sections of the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104. applicable to the present case were 38, 39, 62, 65, 67, 100 and 103, and section 10. of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 91. The decisions on the old Registry Acts on this question were—

Hughes v. Morris, Ibid. 349; s.c. 21 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Chanc. 761.

If the plaintiff made out his right to an injunction, it must be upon the same principles as those upon which he would be entitled to specific performance. But specific performance he was clearly not entitled to: there was no privity between the parties; and no lien, either express or implied, could be established against the ship.—

May 27.—The LORD CHANCELLOR (after stating the facts as before set forth) said—In dealing with the case, it will be necessary, in the first place, to consider the relative positions of the several parties, arising out of their different engagements with each other. The charter-party is merely a contract for the conveyance to Suez of a cargo of coals for the plaintiff, leaving Curry the complete ownership of the vessel, but subject to an engagement to carry the coals and deliver them at their place of destination. This contract he is bound to perform, unless disabled by any of the causes excepted in the charter-party; and if his vessel sustains any injury, by which repairs become necessary before he can proceed on the voyage, he must have those repairs done with all reasonable dispatch. His engagement under the charter-party is one of which he cannot divest himself by transfer of the vessel, nor would the assignment of the property in the vessel transfer to the assignees either the benefit or the obligations of the stipulations in the charter-party. Except through him, Gibson, as mortgagee, though with full notice of the charter-party, incurred no liability in respect of the contract with the plaintiff, nor was he bound to do anything to forward its performance. He is not the owner of the vessel, as all the Shipping Acts, from the reign of George the Fourth downwards, have always provided; and by the act of 1854 he would have had the power of sale, though it was not expressed in the mortgage deed, but which he agreed to postpone for a period of six months. The highest right which the plaintiff could assert against him would be that he should not interfere actively to interrupt the prosecution of the voyage. Under these circumstances, what course ought the plaintiff to have pursued upon the long detention of the vessel at Penzance, without anything being done towards repairing her, so as to enable her to proceed with the voyage? I apprehend he was entitled to treat the unreasonable delay as a breach of the contract, for which he might have maintained an action; and if it clearly appeared that Curry had no intention of putting the vessel in a position to proceed on her voyage, he would have been justified in engaging another vessel to carry his coals to Suez, and making Curry answerable for the damages he so sustained. But, assuming that Curry had shewn no disposition to fulfil his contract, but had passively permitted the vessel to remain un-repaired and in a state in which the further prosecution of the voyage was out of the question, is the plaintiff entitled to resort to a court of equity to compel a specific performance of the charter-party? A contract of this kind consists of various stipulations, as to many of which it is beyond the power of the Court to enforce performance. The vessel must be in a fit state to perform the voyage; she must be provided with a skilful master and a competent crew; she must be found in all things necessary; and she must commence and pursue her voyage with reasonable despatch and without deviation. But how can the Court decide on the skill of the master, the competency of the crew, or the sufficiency of the vessel, so as to compel the observance of the contract in all those particulars? Even with respect to enforcing the repairs of a vessel, though it may be conceded if an agreement for repairs "is in its nature defined," in the words of Lord Rosslyn in Moseley v. Virgin, "perhaps there would not be much difficulty in decreeing specific performance," yet the repairs to be done under the charter-party being such as will render the vessel seaworthy, the contract is far too uncertain and indefinite to enable the Court to carry it into effect. So far, therefore, as Curry is concerned, who has been merely guilty of omission, and has done nothing actively to hinder the voyage, the bill cannot be maintained either to enforce specific performance of the charter-party, or to restrain him from permitting the vessel's remaining at Penzance or at any other place than Suez, which is, in other words, to require him to perform the voyage and do all acts which are necessary to put the vessel in a seaworthy state for the purpose. We may, therefore, confine our attention entirely to the case of Mr. Gibson, and the relief prayed against him. Ought the Court, under all the circumstances, to interfere to restrain him from exercising his rights under his mortgage, and thereby preventing the performance of the contract by Curry? I will first of all consider what the case would have been as against Curry if he himself, instead of remaining passive, had done or threatened to do some act which had been a breach of his engagement to employ the vessel in the plaintiff's service. Could the Court have restrained him, and so, indirectly, perhaps, have compelled him to perform his contract? It is said there was no negative stipulation in the charter-party which could be thus enforced, for there was nothing to prevent Curry carrying coals in his vessel for other persons; but I agree with Vice Chancellor Wood's view in the case of Webster v. Dillon, that an affirmative agreement may involve a negative, and when by this charter-party Curry undertakes to carry to Suez a full and complete cargo of coals for the plaintiff, it necessarily implies that if the plaintiff provides a full cargo, the vessel shall not be employed for any other purpose or person. It is also said that any other vessel might have carried the plaintiff's coals as well as the Allerton; that the charter is a mere contract to deliver goods at a certain time and place; and that Lord Cottenham, in Heathcote v. the North Staffordshire Railway Company puts this very case as one in which the Court will not interfere. But it seems to me that these arguments are not well founded. A person who hires a vessel under a charter-party does so, not merely from a wish to have his goods taken to a particular place, but upon a careful choice of the vessel itself as the vessel best adapted for his purposes. Many considerations may have influenced him in the determination of his choice; and after these have determined him to make a contract for a particular vessel, he would be surprised to be told that all he wanted was to have his goods conveyed to their destination, and that it was immaterial to him in what manner, or by what conveyance, it was accomplished. I think a vessel engaged under a charter-party ought to be regarded as a chattel of a peculiar value to the charterer; and that though the Court of equity cannot enforce a specific performance, yet it will restrain the employment of the vessel in a different manner, whether such employment is expressly or impliedly forbidden, according to the principles so fully expounded in the case of Lumley v. Wagner. In such cases the Court repudiates the idea of indirectly compelling a performance where it could not directly decree it. It gives all the relief in its power without looking to the effect which may be ultimately produced by the restraint it places on the party who is disposed to break his contract. I have no doubt that the plaintiff would have been entitled to the interference of the Court to this extent, if the case had been the one supposed of Curry attempting to employ the vessel in a manner not in accordance with the terms of the charter-party; but Gibson's position is entirely different from Curry's. He is not bound by any engagement with the plaintiff. It is true he took his mortgage with a full knowledge of the charter, and he must therefore abstain, of course, from any act which would have the immediate effect of preventing its performance. If, for instance, when the vessel put into Penzance, and before a reasonable time for Curry to do the repairs had elapsed, supposing his power of sale to have been then available, he had determined to exercise it, expressly declaring that he meant to conceal the charter from the purchaser, or much more certainly if he had endeavoured to hinder the voyage by sending the vessel in a different direction, I think he might have been restrained from doing such acts as those by injunction. But Mr. Gibson has not in any way interfered with the performance of the charter-party, until it was evident that Curry was wholly unable to perform it. On the contrary, he assisted Curry in carrying it into effect by advancing money for the repairs at Portsmouth, by which the vessel was again in a position to prosecute her voyage. He was not bound to provide for the repairs at Penzance, nor would it have been reasonable to have expected him to do so before the power of sale became operative. In the mean time what does the plaintiff do? Literally nothing. He took no steps to procure the repair of the vessel from her arrival at Penzance in February until his letter to Gibson in July, nor again from that month until September. He must have known perfectly well that Curry was without means to enable him to do the repairs. On the other hand, what was Gibson doing? He had advanced the money upon his mortgage; and he also paid 250*l.* for the repairs. If the vessel had remained in the possession of Curry it was clear no repairs would have been effected, and without them the vessel could not put to sea. The actual performance of the contract as between the plaintiff and Curry was, therefore, virtually at an end when Gibson, on the 18th of October 1858, took possession of the vessel, and some time after repaired her at an expense of 850*l.* In order to entitle the plaintiff to an injunction against Gibson, he must shew that he has done or threatened to do some act which has interfered with the performance of the contract, of which he had notice; but does any one believe that if Gibson had not interfered at all, Curry could possibly have effected the repairs and enabled the vessel to proceed to sea? If not, how can it be said that Gibson has done anything to hinder the voyage, which had been completely stopped by Curry's utter inability to perform it before any active interference by him? I think, under these circumstances, it would be most unjust to restrain Gibson from exercising any rights, which his possession of the vessel and his title as mortgagee have enabled him to exercise. It is only necessary to advert to the question of the possible equity which the plaintiff might derive from Curry, to prevent Gibson doing anything to hinder Curry in the performance of the contract for the purpose of dismissing it in a word. How could Curry succeed in restraining Gibson from exercising any right as mortgagee, and thereby interfering with his performance of his contract, which he was wholly incapable of performing? No equity could possibly exist between Curry and Gibson under such circumstances, and therefore the plaintiff could derive no equity against Gibson. Under these circumstances, I am of opinion that the Vice Chancellor's decree must be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed, with costs.

On the 20th of July 1852, a decree was made giving an infant defendant costs out of the estate, upon an undertaking not to appeal. On the 9th of May 1857 the infant attained twenty-one, and in May 1859 applied for leave to enrol the decree, with a view to appeal to the House of Lords:—Held, that the application was too late, the defendant having allowed two years to elapse from his attaining twenty-one before applying.

This was a petition for leave to enrol a decree, dated the 20th of July 1852, notwithstanding five years had since elapsed.

The petitioner was a party to the suit when the decree was made, and by an arrangement made upon the requisition of Lord St. Leonards, L.C., the costs of all parties, including the petitioner, were paid out of the estate, upon the understanding that no further proceedings, by way of appeal, should be taken—Monypenny v. Dering (1). The petitioner, R. P. D. Monypenny, was then an infant, and he came of age on the 9th of May 1857. The 5th Order of the 7th of August 1852, provided "that no enrolment of any decree, order or dismissal shall be allowed after the expiration of five years from the date thereof"; but the 6th Order provided "that the Lord Chancellor, either sitting alone, or with the Lords Justices, or either of them, shall be at liberty, when it shall appear to him, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, to be just and expedient, to enlarge the periods hereinbefore appointed for a rehearing or an appeal, or for an enrolment." The 118th of the Standing Orders of the House of Lords allowed an infant to appeal within two years after coming of age; but as in order to appeal to the House of Lords an enrolment was required, this application was rendered necessary.

Mr. Malins and Mr. Berkeley, in support of the petition.—When the decree was made the petitioner was only sixteen years old; and although his costs were given to him by an arrangement to prevent an appeal, the terms were imposed upon him by Lord St. Leonards, and ought not to be so binding upon him as to prevent his having the opportunity of appealing—Taylor v. Philips (2) and Turner v. Turner (3). The case of Wellesley v. Wellesley (4) was a very different case from the present, as there the effect of the enrolment would have been to extend the time for an appeal beyond the seven years.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (without hearing Mr. Selwyn and Mr. C. Hall, contrà) said, that it appeared to him that he was not called upon to consider whether he could bind the estate or enforce the contract of an infant upon such an undertaking as had been given here; but whether, "under the peculiar circumstances of the case," it was "just and expedient" that the petitioner should be allowed to enrol the decree. Undoubtedly, if there had been no agreement or undertaking at all on behalf of the infant, and the five years had expired, and even the two years since attaining his age, and he had come for leave to enrol the decree, his Lordship might have been disposed to yield to the application. But, in considering whether it was "just and expedient," the Court must look at the circumstances of the case. Here there had been much litigation, the case having been before various tribunals, and, at last, Lord St. Leonards gave his decision adverse to the petitioner, and the question arose as to the costs. It was then proposed that the costs should come out of the estate. Lord St. Leonards considered that there should be an end put to the litigation, and he was not disposed to give costs unless consent was given that the contest should end there. On the part of the infant consent was given, and his costs were paid out of the estate under the arrangement then made, of which he thus received the benefit. It was now said that this was an imprudent bargain. If the party had been adult the Court would not have entered into a consideration of the prudence of the arrangement; but the petitioner, being an infant when the arrangement was made, might have had the arrangement considered on this ground, if he had come promptly upon attaining his majority. But he attained twenty-one two months before the expiration of the five years within which the decree should be enrolled; and he allowed two years to elapse without attempting to disturb the arrangement. The parties might naturally have expected that there was no intention to interfere with it, and new rights in the property had consequently arisen. The petitioner now sought to undo all that had been done, under the assumption that he would be able to set aside the decree in the House of Lords. Was it then "just and expedient" that this application should be granted? Certainly not. Except a strong and peculiar case were made out, his Lordship considered that it would be making the order a dead letter if he granted the application. The petition must be dismissed, with costs.

MARGARET LEWIS AND OTHERS.

Will—Accumulation—Remoteness.

A testator was possessed of leasehold estates; he created a term for thirty years, which he vested in trustees to pay debts and to accumulate rents until the legacies were paid, and then to permit his son Benjamin to take the rents "until the son of my son Benjamin (if he shall have a son) shall attain twenty-one," when this son of Benjamin was to take the rents for life, "and after his decease, to the heirs male of such son, and the heirs male of their bodies." There were exactly similar provisions (in default of Benjamin having children) as to the next son, Lewis, and on failure of Lewis and his sons, then to the son of the testator's daughter Abigail. Benjamin and Lewis entered successively into possession of the rents, and died without issue. Abigail had a son who attained twenty-one:—Held, that the devise over was not void for remoteness, but that the rule as to freeholds applied in this case to leaseholds, and as in freeholds Abigail's son would have taken an estate tail, so here he took an absolute interest. Also, that as the only legacy in the will was to be paid to a person in being at the time of the testator's death on her attaining twenty-one, the direction to accumulate was not void.

Lewis Williams, being possessed, among other property, of certain leasehold estates for the residue of two several terms of 999 years, made his will, dated the 3rd of October 1799, containing, among other things, the following provision:—"I give and bequeath unto my trustees, Lewis Williams and William Perry, their executors and administrators, all my messuages, &c. called Pentwyn, Troscod and Tir Kenol, situate, &c., in the hamlet of Troscod, in the parish of Gwenddwr, in the county of Brecon, to hold the same for and during the term of thirty years, to commence from and immediately after my decease, upon the trusts and to and for the several uses, intents and purposes hereinafter mentioned, &c., that they, the trustees, &c., shall and may receive, perceive, dispose and employ the rents, issues and profits of the said messuages, &c., to the uses and purposes following: in the first place to pay all such debts and sums of money as shall be due and owing from me at the time of my decease; to lay out and continue at interest upon the best security or securities that they can get for the same, and accumulate and improve the same yearly, by making the interest thereof principal, and to bear interest until the several legacies hereinafter by me given and bequeathed, and hereby made chargeable thereon, shall be satisfied and paid; then I give and bequeath the said premises and every part thereof, with their appurtenances, unto the trustees, &c., for the term thereof to me granted, upon trust to permit and suffer my son, Benjamin Williams, to have and receive and take the rents, issues and profits thereof, and of every part thereof, to and for his own use, until the son of my said son Benjamin, if he shall have a son, shall attain his age of twenty-one years, and from and immediately after such son of Benjamin shall attain his age of twenty-one years, then to the trustees, &c., to support contingent remainders, and to permit and suffer such son to have, receive and take the rents, issues and profits thereof, for and during the term of his natural life, and after his decease to the heirs male of such son, and for want of such issue to the second, third, fourth, fifth and all and every other son and sons of the body of the said Benjamin, lawfully begotten, severally, successively," &c. There was then a like provision for the testator's son Lewis and his issue; and in default, &c. then for the son of the testator's daughter Abigail and her issue; and in default, to the son of the testator's daughter Winifred and her issue. And the testator, after giving certain specific legacies, gave the residue to his wife, his son Philip, and his daughters Abigail and Winifred, in equal shares.

The testator died in 1799. The sons Benjamin and Lewis successively entered into possession, and died without male issue, in 1832 and 1846. Abigail had died in 1809, but left a son, E. W. Lewis, and a daughter, Margaret; the son attained twenty-one, but died the following year, a bachelor, leaving his sister Margaret (the respondent) his personal representative.

The testator's eldest son (Philip), who was the testator's executor and residuary legatee, died in 1837, leaving a widow, the appellant.

In 1855 Margaret Lewis filed her bill against Mrs. Williams and the representatives of the trustees, for the recovery of the leaseholds, and in November 1856 Vice Chancellor Kindersley made a decree in her favour (1). This decree was afterwards affirmed by Lord Chancellor Cranworth. The present appeal was then brought.

Mr. Malins and Mr. Harris Prendergast contended that all the limitations subsequent to those in favour of the son of Benjamin were void for remoteness, and that the same objection affected the direction as to the term for accumulation for payment of legacies. They cited—

Mr. J. Baily and Mr. W. W. Cooper were not called on.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (LORD CHELMSFORD) adopted the rule with respect to legacies, as stated in Roper (c. xxii.), that if personal estate be given by will to A. and the heirs of his body, as such words would create an express tail in freehold lands, so, in personal estate, they would vest the absolute interest, and the remainder and the subsequent limitation depending on a failure of them will be of no effect. It was, however, contended that this was not an inflexible rule; but was adopted to prevent the intention of the testator from being defeated, and that where the existence of this absolute interest would have the effect of defeating the testator's intention, it could not be allowed to take effect; and Ex parte Wynch was cited. There the bequest was to a married woman of an annuity for her life, and the issue of her body lawfully begotten, on failure of which to revert to her heirs, with a request that K. and C. would act as trustees for her; so that the annuity might be secured for her sole benefit. This was held to be a life interest only, with a gift to the issue by way of remainder. There the words were "issue lawfully begotten"; which were, as Lord Cranworth observed in that case, much more flexible than the words "heirs male." The appellant had attempted to shew that the words "heirs of the body," in order to effectuate the intention of the testator, had been, with reference to personal property, treated as words of purchase; and to support this argument Hodgeson v. Bussey and Sands v. Dixwell were cited. The former was the case of a settlement, which, although it was executed, yet being evidently a provision for the children, shewed a plain intention that it should not vest in the wife absolutely; and the superadded words, such as "executors, administrators and assigns," shewed clearly that "heirs of the body," which were those used, were not meant as words of limitation. In Sands v. Dixwell the trust was to the executors, and the devisees in trust were to convey. The intention, therefore, had room to operate; and the separate trusts to the use of the wife were considered an indication of the intention. The intention in all these cases was collected from the words of the will. But none such could be so collected here; and the appellant actually assumed an intention different from the words used, and then insisted, upon authorities cited for that purpose, that no such assumed intention could be carried into effect. It was better, where words capable of a definite meaning were used, not to speculate upon intention, but to take the ordinary meaning of the words used. The declarations in this will were certainly capricious; but if capable of execution they must be executed. Benjamin was to be supplanted by his own son (a curious provision certainly), when that son attained twenty-one; but the testator did not shew by any words in the will an intention that if Benjamin died without a son who attained twenty-one, the estate should not go over to Lewis and his issue. On the contrary, he had provided with respect to Lewis, and after him to Abigail's sons, precisely the same set of devolutions of the property. Under these circumstances, the analogy of freehold limitations must be taken, and the words "heirs male" must be taken as words of limitation. This would give Benjamin's son an estate tail in freehold, and must therefore give him an absolute interest in leasehold property. The other limitations were consequently alternative limitations, which took effect on the failure of the first. The decree of the Court below was therefore correct, and must be affirmed.

But another point, involving the same objection of remoteness, had been raised, as to the trust for accumulation for payment of debts and legacies under the term of thirty years. This was alleged to be a trust for accumulation for an arbitrary period, the persons who were ultimately to take the fund not being in existence, and the trust therefore being void as tending to a perpetuity. But that was not so. The trust was for the payment of "legacies." Had it been to apply the rents and profits in satisfaction of the legacies during the term of thirty years, that would have been good. This was a trust for the payment of legacies; but the only "legacies" to be found in the will was one legacy of 600*l.*, which was to be paid to a person on her arriving at twenty-one; so that, in fact, the object was to accumulate funds for the payment of one legacy, which was payable not beyond the period allowed by law. There was, therefore, a definite limitation given to this period of accumulation by the character of the legacy in respect of which it was to take place. In his opinion, the judgment of the Court below ought, on both points, to be affirmed.

LORD CRANWORTH wished only to add a word, to declare that he fully adhered to the opinion he had expressed in the Court of Chancery; and to say, that if intention were to be taken as the ground of decision, he believed that the construction contended for by the appellant, so far from effectuating, would defeat the testator's intention.

LORD KINGSDOWN expressed his concurrence with his noble and learned friends.

April 15. } MOLLETT v. ENEQUIST.

Injunction—Bill of Discovery.

A plaintiff, who filed a bill against parties abroad, and on an affidavit of merits obtained an injunction to stay proceedings at law, cannot, upon a sufficient answer being put in, retain the injunction upon inferences to be drawn from a previous evasive answer and the proceedings taken upon the exceptions. And though it was suggested that the bill had been amended and filed, the injunction was dissolved (1).

The bill was filed, by John Mollett and others, trading under the firm of John Henry Schroeder & Co., against Lawrence Nicholas Enequist, G. F. Thomson, Quincey Rew and David Wallace, to obtain a discovery of facts, and also relief from any agreement to pay a large sum for the salvage of five casks of gold, which had been shipped per Eagle from Cronstadt to Hull.

On the 5th of November 1857 the ship struck on Fahludd Reef, on the south-east coast of Gottland.

On the same day it was alleged that Capt. Ford, on behalf of the owners, agreed with G. F. Thomson that upon his taking upon himself the responsibility of landing the gold and transmitting it to Wisby, and delivering it into the hands of L. N. Enequist, he should, after having fulfilled the conditions, receive one-tenth part thereof as salvage.

The gold was safely delivered to L. N. Enequist, who was British Vice Consul and Lloyd's agent at Gottland, and he forwarded it to Messrs. Rew and Wallace, of London, with a claim of 4,678*l.* for salvage, &c.; this claim was disputed. The gold was given up to the plaintiffs on their depositing 5,120*l.* with Messrs. Prescott & Grote, the bankers, in the joint names and to the joint order of the plaintiffs and Messrs. Rew & Wallace.

The plaintiffs then filed this bill to have the agreement for salvage declared void, and after payment of a reasonable sum for salvage to obtain the surplus of the 5,120*l*. The bill also prayed, in the alternative, for an issue to try the validity of the agreement, and for an injunction to restrain the defendants from proceeding at law upon the agreement.

An answer was put in to this bill, and exceptions were taken to it for insufficiency, some of which were allowed.

On the 1st of June 1858 Mr. Enequist brought two actions against the plaintiffs for sums amounting to 4,678*l*. on account of salvage, and for charges of watching, carriage and safe keeping the gold, as well as for average charges, commission and forwarding the gold to London.

The plaintiffs then moved for an injunction to restrain the defendant from proceeding with the actions; and on the 28th of July 1858, upon an affidavit of the plaintiffs as to merits, the same was granted.

On the 11th of March 1859 the defendants put in a further answer, and the time having expired without any further exceptions being taken to the second answer, the defendants moved to dissolve the injunction.

Mr. Selwyn and Mr. Piggott, in support of the motion, cited Fox v. Hill (2).

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Druce appeared for the plaintiffs.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—It is material to consider in what way the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86. has altered the law. By the old practice, when a plaintiff filed a bill for an injunction to restrain proceedings at law, he was entitled to an injunction until the defendant filed a sufficient answer, and when exceptions were allowed to the answer the common order obtained was for leave to amend the bill, with a direction that the defendants should answer the amendments and exceptions together; in that case the injunction was continued until a sufficient answer was put in to the amended bill. But if the plaintiff allowed the exceptions to be answered, and afterwards amended his bill, then the injunction dropped of itself as a matter of course, that is to say, the time for excepting to the answer having expired, the injunction was dissolved upon a mere motion of course. When the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86. was passed it required the Court to assimilate the practice, to some extent, to the case of an injunction upon merits; and section 58. required the plaintiff to make an affidavit of merits with respect to the case which he had—for a defence to the action at law—or for a case for coming into equity, and for that purpose it assimilated the case as nearly as possible to that of a special injunction, although it was the case of a common injunction, and thereupon it was supposed that they were identical in all respects. But, having been a member of the commission who recommended the alteration of the law, I expressed an opinion that the statute did not by that alteration intend to take from the plaintiff the advantage which he would gain of having the right to a full discovery from the defendant; and accordingly not only have I acted upon that, but the Vice Chancellors have concurred with me, and have acted in the same manner.

The plaintiff here has had the benefit of that practice upon the present occasion; he has had a full discovery; a complete answer has been put in; and all that occurs now is, that I am informed that the bill has been amended either to-day or yesterday, and that this amended bill is put upon the file, but of this I have no evidence; but if I had, I do not think it very material, because all that I am asked to do now is upon inferences to be derived from the evasive answer given to the original bill, coupled with the facts arising from the answers to the exceptions which, it is alleged, shew very great cause of suspicion. On that, however, I say nothing, not wishing to prejudice any question, whether it be tried here or at law; but assuming all that is urged to be correct, it would not make out a case in which this Court has a question to try in equity, when there is an equitable question to be established; but it only shews that the ultimate question must be tried at law. It is one that may possibly be tried in this court, but it is a legal question—a pure question of fact to be determined by a Court of law, and in which it is justly observed, that if I entertain very considerable doubt with respect to the contradiction of the testimony before me at the hearing of the cause, I should, in case there were no action, either direct an issue to try the question, or summon a jury and have witnesses examined before me visd voce for the purpose of determining that question. If the plaintiff is able to make a new case, which may entitle him to an injunction, nothing I have said will preclude him from adopting that course; but the full discovery required having now been given, and it appearing that the question is one properly to be tried at law, this injunction must be dissolved.

April 20, 27. } BATES v. JOHNSON.

Mortgage—Tacking—Notice—Trustee.

A mortgagee of an equity of redemption without notice of prior equitable charges, is entitled, even after a foreclosure bill, filed by the intervening incumbrancer, to get in the legal estate and tack his mortgage.

T. E. B., by ante-nuptial settlement, covenanted to convey certain freehold hereditaments of which he was seised in fee, to trustees, upon trusts, for the benefit of himself and his wife and the children of the marriage. No conveyance was ever made, and T. E. B. afterwards, in fraud of the settlement, executed a mortgage of the premises, and subsequently mortgaged the equity of redemption, none of the mortgagees having notice of the trusts of the settlement. The first mortgagee having afterwards received notice of the trusts of the settlement, it was held, that, notwithstanding such notice, he was at liberty to transfer the legal estate to any person who would pay off his incumbrance, being in a different position from a dry trustee or a satisfied mortgagee.

By an indenture, made in contemplation of the marriage of Thomas Ellis Bates with Lucy Baden, and dated the 28th of July 1823, certain freehold hereditaments, of which T. E. Bates was seised in fee, were covenanted to be conveyed to the use of trustees, upon trust during the joint lives of T. E. Bates and L. Baden, to pay the rents to her separate use, with remainder upon trust for the survivor of them for life, with remainder upon trusts for the children of the marriage; and it was declared, that from and immediately after the solemnization of the marriage, and until the premises should be conveyed, the same premises and the rents and profits thereof should be held, paid, applied and disposed of, upon and for such and the same or the like trusts, &c., and subject to the same powers and authorities as were thereinbefore mentioned and agreed upon concerning the same, to be inserted and contained in the said settlement or settlements to be made as aforesaid, and that all such trusts, &c. should and might be executed in as ample a manner as if such settlement was actually made and executed, or as near thereto as might be.

The marriage was solemnized on the 29th of July 1823, and the plaintiffs were the only issue of the marriage.

No settlement was ever made in pursuance of the above-mentioned agreement, and T. E. Bates continued to receive the rents down to his bankruptcy in January 1858.

In 1847 and 1848, T. E. Bates mortgaged the premises comprised in the agreement, together with other hereditaments, to Henry John Brooke, for 4,000*l.*, and delivered the title-deeds to the mortgagee. In 1851, 1853 and 1855, he mortgaged the equity of redemption in the various premises to Edwin Nash, for 1,200*l.*, and in 1856 he again mortgaged the equity of redemption to Edward Browne Hooke. None of the mortgagees had notice of the indenture of 1823.

The bill was filed, by the infant children of the marriage, against the assignees in bankruptcy of T. E. Bates, the several mortgagees, and T. E. Bates and Lucy Bates. It alleged, that the plaintiffs had not until the bankruptcy any notice of the mortgages or any of them, and it claimed for the plaintiffs that the legal mortgage to Brooke was the only subsisting charge upon the premises comprised in the deed of 1823, except the charge created by that deed, and that they were entitled, upon redeeming the legal mortgage, to hold the premises discharged of the other incumbrances, and prayed a reconveyance to new trustees upon payment of what should be due to the first mortgagee.

After the institution of the suit, Hooke, the third mortgagee, redeemed the prior incumbrancers, and obtained transfers of their mortgage securities, and he claimed to be entitled to the benefit of all the mortgage securities in priority to the trusts of the deed of 1823.

Mr. Giffard and Mr. Swanston, jun., argued the case on behalf of the plaintiffs.

Mr. Willcock and *Mr. Daune*y, for the defendant Hooke.

Coote on Mortgages, 569.

April 27.—Wood, V.C.—The question is, whether Thomas Ellis Bates, the father of the plaintiffs, having made a settlement by which he agreed to convey certain property to himself for life, and to continue it in trust for his children afterwards, and having suppressed that settlement, and in fraud of it executed mortgages which are now vested in the defendant Hooke, who has, since the institution of the suit, got in the legal estate in the first mortgage, none of the mortgagees having had notice of the settlement, that legal estate can now be insisted on as against the plaintiffs, who have filed their bill to redeem Brooke, as against whom they admitted that they could not establish any priority, but insisted that, upon redeeming him they would be entitled to the estate discharged of the subsequent mortgages, notwithstanding the legal estate had been got in by a subsequent mortgagee. The plaintiffs admitted the long-established doctrine that where there is a mortgage to a first, second and third mortgagee, and all of them take without notice of the securities of the others at the time of advancing the money, if the third mortgagee can manage to obtain the estate of the first mortgagee he can squeeze out the second mortgagee; so that the first mortgagee, should both the subsequent incumbrancers desire to redeem him, can give the preference to whom he pleases. It has been held in every case down to Peacock v. Burt, which is probably one of the most striking cases of the kind, that a person advancing his money without notice stands in an equally good position in every respect with the other incumbrancers, except as to time; and having afterwards got in the legal estate, he has a right to avail himself of that legal estate, there being no equity to deprive him of it until the whole of the incumbrances have been paid off. In Peacock v. Burt the first mortgagee had notice of the second mortgage; then he made further advances; and then, though with notice of the intervening mortgage, transferred his mortgage and conveyed his legal estate to the third mortgagee without informing him of the intervening incumbrance. It was there held, that the third mortgagee was entitled to hold the legal estate discharged of the intervening mortgage, of which the first mortgagee had notice when he transferred the legal estate. It has been contended that the agreement from and after the marriage, and until the property shall be conveyed and assured, as hereinbefore mentioned, "to stand seised," &c., was a covenant running with the land, and that it would bind Brooke if he had notice, and that it might even bind him if he had not notice; at all events, that it would bind him after he had received notice, being equivalent, in fact, to a declaration of trust inserted in Brooke's own deed, by which, after satisfying his own mortgage, he would be bound to hold the property subject to the trusts of the settlement. It was further said, that it would be a breach of trust in Brooke, who was distinctly affected by the trust of the settlement, to convey the property to a subsequent mortgagee without conveying it upon those trusts by which he was himself affected. After carefully considering the authorities referred to in Carter v. Carter, I do not see that there can be any doubt upon the doctrine, as it appears to me established by the authorities, that any person holding an unsatisfied mortgage or charge, may at any period convey the legal estate in respect of his unsatisfied mortgage or charge to any subsequent incumbrancer who may have advanced his money without notice of any intervening incumbrance, and he may, by so doing, give a benefit to such other incumbrancer of which the Court cannot deprive him, viz., a right to insist upon that legal estate which he has thus properly acquired. I do not find any case where a person holding as a trustee a dry legal estate, and fixed with notice, has been allowed to convey that estate after he has had notice, or to give to others a security which he only obtained by committing a breach of trust. Mawdrell v. Mawdrell (1), Saunders v. Dehew (2), and Allen v. Knight (3), have determined that where there is an express declaration of trust, the trustee cannot convey the trust property otherwise than as he holds it, viz., fettered and accompanied by the trusts upon which the estates are held; and I had occasion in Carter v. Carter to say that I had not been able to find any case of a dry trust of a satisfied mortgage or a satisfied term of years attendant upon the inheritance, where a second mortgagee, without notice of a previous incumbrance, had been held to be entitled to obtain from the trustee with notice a conveyance of the legal estate.

In the present case there was a first mortgagee unsatisfied, and taking without any notice whatever of the trust upon his mortgage deed, without any engagement on his part to enter into, fulfil or undertake any trust, and being merely informed afterwards that there was a trust affecting the property upon which he held his mortgage. Under these circumstances, he is in the condition of any other unsatisfied mortgagee, and he has a right to transfer that mortgaged estate which has so vested in him to any one who will pay off his debt. He is not to be fettered with anything whatever relating to the trust, which he has not undertaken, and which he has not assumed, but of which he is informed after advancing the money and obtaining the legal estate. He is not obliged to incumber himself with any of those considerations, and he is fully justified in transferring the legal estate as he took it from the mortgagor, subject simply to the equity of redemption, to the second or third incumbrancer. What equity, then, is there against a second or third incumbrancer, who, having advanced his money without notice of any prior charge, has fairly and properly obtained the legal estate? The position is correlative. If the holder of the legal estate can lawfully part with it, the acceptor of the legal estate can avail himself of it for every purpose and for every charge which he has obtained upon the property without notice of the rights of any person in priority to his own. He is entitled to do so at any period after as well as before bill filed, according to the class of authorities ending in Peacock v. Burt, from which this case cannot be distinguished. Upon the authorities there is nothing to justify me in holding that Brooke could not lawfully part with his legal estate as long as his debt remained unpaid; and having parted with it, that legal estate cannot be taken from the person holding it until the whole of his debt has been satisfied. The bill, therefore, must be treated as a redemption bill, and the accounts must be taken in the common form.

May 12. } v. HANMER.

Practice—Costs—Information—Form of Order—Attorney General.

In an information filed before the passing of the act, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 90, 'An act for the payment of costs in proceedings instituted on behalf of the Crown in matters relating to the revenue, and for the amendment of the procedure and practice in Crown suits in the Court of Exchequer,' the Court has no jurisdiction to order the Attorney General to pay the costs of a successful defendant: aliter, with respect to defendants made parties after the passing of the act.

This was an appeal from a decision of Vice Chancellor Stuart, in the above-named

(1) 10 Ves. 246.

(2) 2 Vern. 271; a.c. 2 Freem. 123.

(3) 5 Harc. 272; a.c. 15 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Chanc. 430; 16 Ibid. 370.

case, reported 27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 837.

The information was filed on the 5th of January 1854; was amended on the 2nd of July 1855; and re-amended on the 10th of June 1856. By the latter amendment, Wyndham Edward Hanmer, and Edward Henry John Hanmer and James Eyton were made defendants. In June 1858 the information was dismissed, with costs; and from so much of the decree as directed the Attorney General to pay the costs of Sir John Hanmer the Crown appealed.

By the 1st section of the act mentioned in the heading of this report, and which statute received the royal assent on the 14th of August 1855, it is enacted (after reciting, "whereas it is expedient to assimilate the law relating to the recovery of costs in such proceedings, by or on behalf of the Crown, to that in force as to proceedings between subject and subject"), "that in all informations, actions, suits and other legal proceedings to be hereafter instituted before any Court or tribunal whatever in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, by or on behalf of the Crown, against any corporation, or person or persons, in respect of any lands, tenements or hereditaments, or of any goods or chattels belonging or accruing to the Crown, the proceeds whereof," &c. the Attorney General shall be entitled to recover costs on behalf of the Crown, when judgment shall be given for the Crown, in the same manner as in proceedings between subject and subject. And by the 2nd section it is enacted, "that if in any such information, &c. judgment shall be given against the Crown, the defendant or defendants shall be entitled to recover costs in like manner, and subject to the same rules and provisions as though such proceedings had been had between subject and subject," &c.

The Solicitor General, Mr. W. M. James and Mr. Hanson, for the Attorney General, supported the appeal, contending that the costs of Sir John Hanmer, against whom the information was originally filed, in January 1854, and therefore, before the statute (18 & 19 Vict. c. 90.) came into operation, had been improperly given against the Crown by the Vice Chancellor; for inasmuch as the act of parliament had no retrospective operation, the rule in respect to costs then prevailing must be held to apply. That rule was, that the Attorney General, suing on behalf of the Crown in the performance of his public duty, should never be called upon to pay costs in a court of equity. Nor was it to be lost sight of that there was no fund out of which Sir John Hanmer's costs could be paid; and if the order of the Vice Chancellor were to stand, the present Attorney General, Sir Fitzroy Kelly, who was not Attorney General when the information was filed, must personally bear them. The learned counsel said, that no complaint was made against the order for costs as to the defendants Wyndham Edward Hanmer, Edward Henry John Hanmer and James Eyton, inasmuch as those persons were made defendants, by amendment, after the act of parliament came into operation. As to Sir John Hanmer's costs, they cited and relied upon the following cases:—

Macq. 46.

Smith v. the Earl of Stair, 2 H.L.
Cas. 807.

Mr. E. F. Smith appeared for the defendants other than Sir John Hanmer, who did not appear upon the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—I wish we could do as Sir John Stuart has done; but I fear we cannot. The precedents and the course of proceeding are too strong against our doing so. Still I hope that the Crown will be able to provide for the costs of this gentleman. I fear we have not the means of finding them for him.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—I entirely concur, both in the view that we have no power to give these costs, and in the expression of my regret at feeling compelled so to decide.

After some further discussion, the order made was similar to that made by Vice Chancellor Wood, on the 9th of November 1858, in The Attorney General v. Mathias (1). The Court doth order, that the costs of the defendants, Wyndham Edward Hammer, Edward Henry John Hammer and James Eyton, of this application, be taxed by the proper Taxing Master of this court; and that the same, when taxed, be paid to the said defendants, in the manner directed by the act of parliament, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 90, intituled, &c., with liberty to the said defendants to apply to this Court, as they may be advised, with respect to such costs.

Practice—Enrolment of Decree—Vacating Enrolment.

A defendant entered a caveat against enrolment of a decree on the 22nd of December. On the 2nd of March he obtained an order to set down the appeal, and served the order on the 23rd of April. On the 29th of March notice was given that the docket for enrolment would be presented for the Lord Chancellor's signature, unless the appeal were lodged, and an order for setting down the same served within twenty-eight days. The appeal was set down on the 29th of April, after the expiration of the twenty-eight days, and the enrolment was signed on the following day:—Held, that although to prosecute the caveat with effect, according to the 4th Order of August 1852, the appeal ought to have been set down and notice of it served within the twenty-eight days, yet, as the defendant appeared to have been misled, the enrolment was vacated on the ground of indulgence.

This was an application by the defendants to vacate the enrolment of a decree, dated the 21st of December 1858, on the ground of irregularity and surprise. On the 22nd of December 1858, the defendants lodged a caveat against enrolment. On the 2nd of March 1859 the defendants presented their petition of appeal, and obtained the usual order for setting down the same, upon payment of 20*l.* deposit within a week. On the 4th of March the deposit was paid. On the 29th of March, the appeal not having been set down, the defendants received notice, from the Record and Writ Clerks' Office, of the docket of enrolment having been left by the plaintiff for signature by the Lord Chancellor; and the defendants were then informed that the docket would be presented for signature, unless the defendants lodged their appeal, and served an order for setting down the same, within twenty-eight days. On the 23rd of April the defendants served the order to set down the appeal. The twenty-eight days from the 29th of March expired on the 26th of April, which was Easter Tuesday, and, consequently, the offices were closed. The appeal was set down on the 29th of April, but on the 30th the plaintiff obtained the Lord Chancellor's signature to the enrolment, and on the 2nd of May the decree was enrolled.

Mr. Giffard and Mr. Habershon Cox appeared for the defendants, in support of the application to vacate the enrolment, and referred to—

Mr. Roll and Mr. E. R. Turner, for the plaintiff.—In the cases which had been cited it was assumed, that if the order for rehearing had been obtained, it had been set down; it was not the practice to obtain the order and not to set it down. In fact, no notice of this having been set down had yet been given, although notice of the order for setting down had been. But if notice was not necessary, setting the cause down within the twenty-eight days was necessary. The defendants said that it might be set down at any time before the presentation for enrolment. They did set it down on the 29th of April, but the decree was presented for enrolment on the 28th of April, after the caveat was exhausted; and on the 30th of April the signature was obtained, upon motion in open court. In fact, the thing was done on the 29th of March, when the enrolment was applied for, and was only stayed by reason of the caveat. They cited—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (without hearing a reply) said, that this was an application to set aside an enrolment on the ground of irregularity and surprise; and the question was on the effect of the Orders of the 7th of August 1852, as to enrolment of decrees, &c. The fourth order provided, "That where a caveat is entered with the proper officer to stay the signing of the docket of the enrolment of any decree, order or dismissal, such caveat shall be prosecuted with effect within twenty-eight days after the docket of such decree, order or dismissal shall be left to be signed with the proper officer by the party who entered the same, otherwise such caveat shall be of no force; and the docket of such decree, order or dismissal may, immediately after the expiration of the said twenty-eight days, be presented to be signed, as if no such caveat had been entered." The question was, what was the meaning of the words "prosecuted with effect"? It was contended on the part of the defendants that it was sufficient to satisfy these words if they were to present their petition for leave to appeal, obtain an order thereon, and serve upon the opposite party notice of such order. On the other side it was contended, that the requisitions of the fourth order were not satisfied unless the appeal were actually set down for hearing, and notice of it served on the opposite party. It appeared to his Lordship that the words "prosecuted with effect" were not satisfied by merely obtaining the order for setting down a cause for rehearing and serving such order. This was not equivalent to setting down the cause, and therefore, if he had to determine the case entirely upon the proper construction of the orders, he should be compelled to say that the defendants had not brought themselves within the terms of the orders. But had the practice been in accordance with this view? The parties might well have been misled by the authorities to suppose that it was not necessary to set the cause down, and more particularly by the notice from the office to a party lodging a caveat, that unless he lodged an appeal, and served the order for setting down the same, within twenty-eight days, &c. The parties might well have been misled by this, and supposed that to lodge an appeal and serve an order for setting it down, were sufficient. Had his Lordship been satisfied that the defendants had been trifling with the order, he should not have considered them entitled to what they asked; but from the affidavits he did not think that this was the case. He was clearly of opinion that in order to comply with the fourth order, a party ought not merely to obtain the order and serve it, but that he should go on, and set down the appeal and serve notice of the setting down; but, considering that these defendants might have been misled by the practice, he should grant the application on the ground of indulgence, but make no order as to costs.

Practice—Married Woman—Formd Pauperis—Next Friend.

A bill was filed, by a married woman by her next friend, to enforce payment of an annuity settled to her separate use, and at the hearing the same was dismissed. The plaintiff wished to appeal, but the next friend refused to allow his name to be used. The plaintiff applied to the Lords Justices, and filed an affidavit stating that she was unable to find any other person whose name could be substituted for the present next friend, and that she was subsisting entirely by charity; and their Lordships made an order, that she should be at liberty to present the appeal and take any other proceedings in the cause in formâ pauperis without a next friend.

This was a motion made, on behalf of a married woman, Emma Christiana Crouch, by William Jefferys, her next friend, that she might be at liberty to prosecute an appeal from a decision of the Master of the Rolls dismissing her bill (filed to enforce the payment of an annuity alleged to be settled upon her for her separate use for life) in formâ pauperis and without a next friend.

Mr. Cole, in support of the motion, read an affidavit of the plaintiff, saying that she was an inmate of the Gravesend Union Workhouse and subsisted wholly by charity; that William Jefferys refused to allow his name to be further used than for the present application; that she was desirous of appealing; that she had no friend or acquaintance who would allow his name to be used as next friend, and that she was supported entirely by parochial relief. The learned counsel stated, in answer to a question from the Bench, that the case came within the principle of that of The Countess of Mornington (1), and that the plaintiff wished the order to extend to all other proceedings in the cause as well as to the appeal.

Their LORDSHIPS made the order.

Practice—Plaintiff becoming insolvent—Costs.

When a plaintiff becomes insolvent, and a vesting order is made by the Insolvent Court, this Court will, on the provisional assignee expressing his desire to prosecute the suit, make an order that he do bring himself before the Court within a time limited in the order, or that the bill be dismissed without costs.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Master of the Rolls, declining to make any order on a motion to dismiss the plaintiff's bill.

The facts, as disclosed by the clerk of the solicitors for the defendant, were uncontradicted, and as follows:—On the 8th of December 1858 the defendant moved to dismiss the plaintiff's bill for want of prosecution, when it was ordered that the plaintiff should file replication on or before the 11th of December 1858, or that the bill should stand dismissed, and that the plaintiff should pay the costs of the motion. Replication was accordingly filed on that day, and the costs were taxed at 10*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.*, which the plaintiff had not paid, and he in contempt for the non-payment, as a prisoner in the Queen's Prison debts. The plaintiff, on the 2nd of February 1859, served a summons to give time for closing evidence, and on the fourteenth days were given notwithstanding the attachment for non-payment of the same day a summons was issued for time to put in an affidavit as to documents, under an order of the 12th of November 1857, and a week's time was given. The plaintiff was in contempt for non-compliance with the last-named order, viz. that of the 12th of November 1857. On the 14th of February 1859 the fourteen days expired, when the defendant filed affidavits in support of his case; but the plaintiff had not filed any affidavits nor set down the cause, nor served a subpoena to hear judgment.

On the 26th of March the defendant moved, before the Master of the Rolls, to dismiss the bill for want of prosecution; but his Honour declined to make any order. On the day on which the motion was heard on the plaintiff caused a notice to be served on the defendant, that by an order of the Insolvent Debtors Court, dated the 16th of October 1858, all the plaintiff's estate had become vested in the provisional assignee of that court.

On the 15th of April the defendant moved, before the Master of the Rolls, that Samuel Sturgis, the provisional assignee of the Insolvent Debtors Court, should make himself a party to the suit, or that the plaintiff's bill should be dismissed with costs. An order being refused, this was a renewal of the motion by way of appeal.

Mr. Lonsdale, in support of the appeal, said that there was no settled rule that the bill of a plaintiff who had become bankrupt or insolvent should be dismissed without costs, and suggested that, looking to the very improper conduct of the plaintiff, the fact of his insolvency, his giving no notice of it to the defendant, and allowing him to incur heavy expenses, the plaintiff had disintitiled himself to any indulgence, and that therefore the bill ought now to be dismissed with costs; the defendant undertaking, as he now did, not to proceed personally against the plaintiff in respect of the costs incurred prior to the vesting order. The learned counsel cited Daniel v. Harding (1) and Fisher v. Fisher (2). Mr. Rogers, for the plaintiff and the provisional assignee, insisted that the proper order was that the bill should be dismissed without costs, if the assignee did not bring himself before the Court within a reasonable time; and that order the Master of the Rolls was willing to make. Such being the case, the defendant ought to pay the costs of the motion. Mr. Lonsdale was heard in reply.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE consulted with the Registrar, who said the practice was to dismiss without costs when a plaintiff became bankrupt or insolvent, and expressed his own opinion to be that, were he sitting alone, he should be disposed to order the plaintiff to pay the costs incurred since the insolvency. His learned Brother did not, however, appear to agree in that.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER said, although he felt that the defendant had been hardly treated, he thought it would be establishing a dangerous precedent to draw a distinction between costs incurred prior to and after bankruptcy or insolvency.

The order made was as follows:—"M. R. Sturgis by his counsel expressing a desire to prosecute the suit, the Court doth order that he do within three weeks from the 12th day of May instant take the necessary steps for bringing himself before Court; or in default, let the plaintiff's bill stand dismissed without costs. No costs of the motion."

Merchant Shipping Act, 1854—Is a valid Bill of Sale—Registration—Equitable Interest.

The registration of a bill of sale of a ship does not confer an absolute title at law, unless the bill of sale itself not only appears to be, but is actually valid.

Where a valid title has been acquired at law, quære, whether a Court of equity has jurisdiction to deal with the equitable interests.

In August 1857 the plaintiff, being the sole owner of the brig Polly Hopkins, and registered as such on the register of ships at the Custom-house, at Charlotte Town, Prince Edward's Island, executed to the defendant M'Calman, a partner in the firm of Wilson, Brown & Co., ship-brokers, of Liverpool, a certificate of sale in the form set out in Schedule N. to the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, and thereby authorized him to sell the brig for a sum not less than 1,300*l.* Wilson, Brown & Co., being in embarrassed circumstances, agreed to mortgage the ship to the defendant Dickinson by way of conditional sale for 900*l.*; and accordingly on the 8th of September 1857 M'Calman, as the attorney of the plaintiff, executed a printed form of a bill of sale to Dickinson for 900*l.* Upon this document being presented to the registrar at the Liverpool Custom-house for registration, that officer declined to register it, on the ground that by the certificate of sale the minimum price was fixed at 1,300*l.* In order to obviate this objection the bill of sale was altered, by striking out the amount of 900*l.* and substituting for it the sum of 1,300*l.* In December 1857 the plaintiff arrived in England, and being informed by Messrs. Wilson, Brown & Co. that they had been in difficulties, and had pledged the ship's papers, executed a revocation of the certificate of sale, which was entered at the Liverpool Custom-house, and thence transmitted to Prince Edward's Island, where it was recorded and returned to Liverpool, at which place it was received on the 25th of January 1858. On the 30th of January 1858 Dickinson procured the bill of sale, as altered, to be registered, and his name was accordingly entered on the register as sole owner of the brig. On the 1st of February the bill was filed, in ignorance of the registration, against the defendants Dickinson and M'Calman, charging that no bond fide sale of the vessel had ever taken place; and praying that the defendants might be restrained from dealing with the vessel and detaining her documents, and from causing her to be registered, except for the benefit of the plaintiff; and that the vessel and her documents might be delivered up to the plaintiff.

An ex parte injunction having been obtained, which was afterwards continued to the hearing, the cause now came on to be heard.

Pending the suit Wilson, Brown & Co. became bankrupts, and the ship was sold by arrangement between the parties.

Mr. Rolt and Mr. Robinson appeared for the plaintiff, and claimed to be entitled to the proceeds of the sale.

Daubigny v. Duval, 5 Term Rep. 604.

Jan. 21.—Wood, V.C.—I do not think any difficulty exists as to the minor question that has been raised, that is, the ownership of the vessel, for I must take John Orr to be the true owner of the vessel. Nor have I found any difficulty upon the equities alleged with regard to lien on the proceeds. I think the real pressure of the case has been with reference to the fact that Mr. Dickinson is, in a sense at all events, the registered owner at the time of the bill being filed. A question has been suggested whether, under the change which has been made by the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act, the doctrine, with reference to the jurisdiction of this Court, which was formerly considered on the policy of the acts of parliament having relation to the registry of ships to have had no existence, still applies. That is a question undoubtedly of extreme importance, but I am not clear that it arises in the present case, for I think there is a way of dealing with the matter which does not render it necessary to determine the point. The Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, s. 76, enacts, that "any registered owner, if desirous of disposing by way of mortgage or sale of the ship or share in respect of which he is registered at any place out of the country or possession in which the port of registry of such ship is situate, may apply to the registrar, who shall thereupon enable him to do so by granting such certificates as are hereinafter mentioned." The schedule to the act furnishes the form of these certificates, and according to the form for the certificate of sale the minimum price at which the ship is to be sold is to be stated therein. In this instance John Orr has signed a certificate of sale to the bankrupts Wilson, Brown & Co., fixing the minimum price at 1,300*l.* Then, the 81st section of the act enacts, that certain rules shall be observed as to certificates of sale. By the second rule "The power shall be exercised in conformity with the directions contained in the certificate." Therefore, in this case, the power not being exercised in conformity with the directions contained in the certificate, the attempt to exercise it is ultra vires. Following the rule to which I have already adverted, is the third, which is not unimportant to observe for a different reason, to which I shall presently advert. This rule is as follows: "No sale bond fide made to a purchaser for valuable consideration shall be impeached by reason of the person by whom the power was given dying before the making of such sale." I next refer to the eighth rule, which provides that the registrar "shall retain the certificates of sale and registry, and after having indorsed on both of such instruments an entry of the fact of a sale having taken place, shall forward the said certificates to the registrar of the port appearing on such certificates to be the former port of registry of the ship, and such last-mentioned registrar shall thereupon make a memorandum of the sale in his register book, and the registry of the ship in such book shall be considered as closed, except as far as relates to any unsatisfied mortgages," &c. And the 12th rule is this:—"If no sale is made in conformity with the certificate of sale, such certificate shall be delivered to the registrar by whom the same was granted; and such registrar shall thereupon cancel it, and enter the fact of such cancellation in the register book; and every certificate so cancelled shall be void to all intents."

Now, what happened in this case was this: The ship not having yet arrived, but the certificate of sale, limited to a power of sale for 1,300*l.*, having been transmitted, Wilson, Brown & Co., who had business transactions with Mr. Dickinson, and were indebted to him, and had obtained from time to time arrangements for accommodation, received at the time they were dealing with him in respect of other matters, certain bills, one for 1,400*l.* and the other for 1,000*l.* The bills, I think, were given a day or two before the matter was finally settled on the 8th of September 1857. Dickinson says here was no sale of the ship at all, but the arrangement was, that if the ship was sold at any time before the bills came to maturity, then the ship was to be handed back on his being paid 900*l.*, otherwise he was to retain the ship. His statement is very singular. He says, "I purchased the vessel on the 7th or 8th of September, and on presentation of the bill of sale at the custom-house, and the same transfer to me being found in order, I paid the purchase-money for her as agreed, and as therein declared." On cross-examination, the transaction appears to be this, that there was originally inserted 900*l.*, the agreement being that, while the bills were running, the ship was to be taken back at that price; and if not, he was to retain it as a purchaser for 900*l.* Then the bill of sale being made, purporting to be in pursuance of the certificate, it is sent to the proper officer at Liverpool filled up with 900*l.*, which was the real transaction, so far as it was any sale at all. The registrar told him, as it was his duty to tell him, that a bill of sale for 900*l.* was bad, and he could not register it. [His Honour then proceeded to read several passages from the examination of Mr. Dickinson, and stated the result of the evidence as follows.]—It comes to this, that he never bought for 1,300*l.* at all, although there is evidently an attempt all through to shew that it is really a sale for 1,300*l.*, 400*l.* remaining due in respect of it; he only bought for 900*l.*, and that was a sort of conditional purchase, the ship being returnable if the 900*l.* should be paid within a given time; and the concluding passage of his evidence proves this. He says, If you do find 1,300*l.*, that must have been owing to some regulation of the Custom House. This regulation of the Custom House is the regulation of the law, that a man who has given a power of attorney to another to sell for 1,300*l.* has not authorized the attorney to sell for less. That the statute says—that common sense and every principle of law requires; and we are not to hear that it is the custom at Liverpool to put this high minimum into the power of attorneys in order that it may be a sort of puff for the ship, and that it is never intended that the attorney should be bound by the power under which he professes to act. I cannot listen to such a statement. If there had been a statement of an express agreement with John Orr, that would be another matter; but the only evidence of that is in the paragraph in which it is said he would have been willing to sell the ship for less. He denies its being a puff. He says "The ship cost me 1,500*l.*; I inserted 1,300*l.* thinking at the then prices I should be obliged to accept that." It is quite plain, on the evidence of Mr. Dickinson himself, that the bill of sale, though it purports on the face of it to be a bill of sale for 1,300*l.*, was originally a bill of sale for 900*l.*; that it was intended by everybody to be so, and the sale was made to him for 900*l.* only. In reality, therefore, there never has been an exercise of the power in conformity with the directions contained in the certificate, and therefore the bill of sale, though purporting to be good so that the registrar would be obliged to treat it as a perfectly valid instrument, was a nullity, and there was no power to pass by such a bill of sale as that any interest in the vessel. The attorney being simply an attorney, and being only competent to pass the vessel for 1,300*l.*, his signing a bill of sale for 900*l.* is no more than if anybody now sitting in this court had signed his name to such a bill of sale, and had proposed to make a sale to that amount. But then this question arises—having such an apparent title, so that the registrar of the port would be bound to act on it, how far can it be said that the legal title is acquired? If a legal title is acquired, then the question would arise whether the plaintiff would be at liberty to assert an equitable title in derogation of this legal title acquired in this improper manner. That would bring us back to the question, whether the Court has jurisdiction to interfere with the legal title of the registered owner. I do not think that here the defendant Dickinson has acquired the legal title to the ship; and the subject is one which must therefore be considered as yet open to question, and one which will require a good deal of grave consideration on all the provisions of the statute. I am not by any means convinced that the argument raised in consequence of the late statute 18 & 19 Vict. c. 91. enacting, that shares in ships shall be deemed within the Trustee Act, 1850, or the recognition in certain cases of trusts throughout the act of 1854 is of great cogency, inasmuch as there are in all the recent shipping acts trusts, for instance, in respect of property which devolves on the next-of-kin through the medium of the administrators—trusts in respect of ships which are allowed to be registered in the names of joint-stock companies, and in the names of trustees for those companies. It would be necessary to make provision for those equitable interests, and that, perhaps, would be sufficient to answer the particular clauses of the acts of 1854 and 1855, to which I have been referred. There are other clauses, too, in those acts, which will require deliberate consideration whenever the question of jurisdiction fairly arises; but I have now to consider whether the defendant Dickinson has acquired the legal title to the ship. I think that the rules in the 31st section of the act of 1854 shew, that the bare fact of registration of a bill of sale valid on the face of it, would not of itself give an absolute title at law, otherwise the 3rd rule, which I have already noticed, having reference to the case of the death of the person giving the power of an attorney before the bill of sale is registered, would be unnecessary. The legislature contemplated that, unless they inserted a special clause that the death should not have any effect in vacating the bill of sale, the bill of sale would have been void. Therefore I must conclude that the purport of this clause is, that where the registrar registers bills of sale it must mean that he registers valid bills of sale, and the legislature feels itself compelled to enact expressly that the bill of sale shall be valid, although the person giving the power is dead; and if it had not so enacted, although there was a perfect bill of sale on the face of it, if that person were dead it would not have been a valid bill of sale, even though registered. Here it is declared that the power shall be exercised according to the certificate; and I am entitled, according to this construction of the act, to ascertain whether the power has actually been exercised in conformity with the certificate. I find it has not, and it appears to me that the mere writing in of that 1,300*l.* in order to make it an execution by the attorney, which it was not, has no more effect than if the bill of sale had been a forgery. And though Mr. Simpson tells me that a case of the sort has arisen, in which it has been doubted very much whether the remedy must not be against the forger, I can find nothing in the principle of national policy, which requires that registration shall give operation to that which is a nullity, or that when the legislature says the ship is only to be passed by a valid bill of sale of the owner, that which is no bill of sale of the owner can possibly pass it. There would be no place where you could stop if that were the policy of the law. It would be in the power of the registrar to register at any port all ships according to his fancy, or for any bribe that might be given to him by anybody. It would be very strange if any such doctrine as that could be upheld. I have come to the conclusion that no valid bill of sale has ever been executed; that, therefore, the registration has been made of that, the validity of which the registrar could not try; that the registration was an irregular registration in every sense of the word; and that, according to the 12th rule of section 81. no sale having been made in conformity with the certificate of sale, the certificate ought to be cancelled. In this particular case it is satisfactory to find that, although the certificate of sale was presented on the 8th of September with the 900*l.*, which was the true consideration, filled in, and, on its being found that would not do, afterwards sent with a false representation in order to make it do, yet no indorsement being made upon it, nothing was done at that time in order to enable the transmission of the title; but the thing stood in that state, with every apparent indication of Messrs. Wilson, Brown & Co. remaining the persons who were about to sell, until the plaintiff thought it right to revoke the power of sale, which he had full power to do. That had to be done at Prince Edward's Island, the port of registry, and it had to be returned to Liverpool. It is returned to Liverpool, and the revocation is in the hands of the registrar before he is called on to make any entry on this void bill of sale; therefore, the revocation was complete before the registrar made this blunder—a very pardonable one on his part, arising simply from his not being aware of the irregularity, which was probably concealed from him. But having made the registry simply in pursuance of that which was no bill of sale at all, I think the registry of sale must be treated as a nullity. I hold that there has been no acquisition of legal title at all; there has been no bill of sale which has actually transferred the title; the registration has been made under an error, created by the act of those who improperly obtained the registration; and there must be a declaration that the registration of the brig Polly Hopkins in the name of John Henry Dickinson, on the 30th of January 1858, was void, the alleged sale having been made for a less price than that named in the certificate of sale; and the ship having been sold by arrangement pending this suit, Declare, that the plaintiff (subject to the account hereinafter directed) is entitled to the net proceeds of such sale. And let an account be taken of all payments and disbursements for insurance, dock dues or otherwise, properly made by Messrs. Wilson, Brown & Co. and the defendant Dickinson, or either of them, before the 2nd of December 1857; regard being had to the circumstance that Messrs. Wilson, Brown & Co. were up to that date agents for the sale of the ship under the certificate of sale.

Railway Company—User of Joint Line —Agreement for Lease of Railway.

By virtue of an act of parliament, passed in 1847, a railway, from H. to P, and the station at P, became vested in the S. W. and S. C. Railway Companies as joint tenants, the joint line and station being under the management, as to expenses, &c. of a joint committee, appointed by the two companies. The D. P. Railway was afterwards completed, joining the S. C. Railway at a point a short distance from H. That short distance of the S. C. Railway the D. P. Company became entitled to use. In 1858 the S. W. Company agreed with the D. P. Company to apply for an act to enable the S. W. Company to accept a lease of the D. P. Railway for 999 years, at 18,000*l.* per annum; the S. W. Company in the mean time, until the act was obtained, working the D. P. Railway and paying that company at the rate of 18,000*l.* per annum. Shortly afterwards another agreement was made between the S. W. and D. P. Companies, alleged to be under the 87th section of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, for the regulation of tolls, &c., but providing that, out of the joint fund therein mentioned, there should be paid to the D. P. Company 18,000*l.* per annum, in priority to all charges. A third agreement was made in 1859, between the S. W. and D. P. Companies, which was stated to be a temporary arrangement respecting the user by the S. W. Company of the D. P. Railway until an agreement should be sanctioned by the Board of Trade, or an act obtained for a lease of the D. P. Railway to the S. W. Company. By this agreement the S. W. Company was to have the use of the D. P. Railway, and pay all expenses, &c., and should cause such an amount of traffic to pass over the D. P. Railway as should cause the payments under that agreement to the D. P. Company in respect of tolls to be after the rate of 18,000*l.* per annum at least. The S. W. Company attempted to use the joint station at P. for the purposes of the traffic by them passed over the D. P. Railway. The S. C. Company objected to this, as the right of the S. W. Company to use the joint station was only in respect of traffic lawfully carried by them, and filed a bill for an injunction. Upon the motion for injunction being made Wood, V.C. refused it. Upon the motion being renewed, by way of appeal, it was directed to stand over, in order that the cause might be brought on by motion for decree, the evidence on both sides being in the mean time to be completed: and upon the cause being thus brought on, it was held, that the agreements between the S. W. and D. P. Companies being illegal, the injunction to restrain the use by the S. W. Company of the joint station for traffic passed over the D. P. Railway must be granted.

This case came on to be heard on the 8th of February, on motion by the plaintiffs for an injunction, Wood, V.C. having refused to grant it.

The case was then adjourned for further evidence, and to enable the cause to be brought on by way of motion for decree, and it was accordingly thus brought before the Court.

In 1847 the Brighton and Chichester Railway Company had a line of railway called the Portsmouth Extension, part of which ran between Havant and Portsmouth. It was agreed between the London and Brighton Company and the South-Western Company that they should jointly become the owners of this portion of the Portsmouth Extension, and accordingly an act was obtained, empowering the London and Brighton and the Brighton and Chichester Companies to sell, and the London and Brighton and the South-Western Companies to purchase, such parts as the companies should agree upon, of the portion of the Portsmouth Extension as lay next to the junction near Havant, between the line of the Extension Railway and the line of the then intended Direct London and Portsmouth Railway Company, and the stations, works and conveniences therewith; and the companies were to be at liberty to enter into and complete such contracts for the purposes aforesaid, and the sale and purchase might be upon such conditions, &c. as the companies might agree upon. A form of conveyance was provided by the act, which enacted that the conveyance, when executed, should be effectual to vest the joint line, and all the rights, privileges, powers and authorities by any act relating thereto, jointly in the companies purchasing.

The 9th section provided for the appointment of a joint committee, consisting of three directors of each of the companies, for carrying the provisions of the act into execution.

The 12th section provided for the appointment, by the joint committee, of officers and servants for the joint line, but each of the two companies might, at the expense of such company, appoint its own booking-clerks, who were not to be removable by the joint committee.

The 13th section enacted that, subject to the control and management of such joint committee, and the provisions of any act relating to the joint line, or to the two companies, or either of them, each of the two companies might at all times thereafter use the joint line for the purposes of conveying passengers, &c. upon the same, and for all such other purposes as should be necessary for the traffic or business thereon of the same company.

The 18th section provided for the tolls to be demanded; and the 22nd section for the mode in which, after payment of expenses, the profits were to be divided, which was to be in equal shares.

The 27th section enacted that, notwithstanding anything therein contained, the two companies might from time to time enter into and carry into effect any contract between themselves with reference to the mode of ascertaining and dividing the profits of the joint line.

On the 9th of October 1848 the two companies entered into a contract under their common seals, which related to the profits of what was called "London traffic," as well as the profits of the joint line, and in which a division of profits was agreed upon different from the equal division directed by the act, and a definition of the term "London traffic" was there given. The 11th clause of this agreement provided that, by the term "London traffic," employed in the 9th and other articles of this contract, should be meant, as regarded the Brighton Company, all passengers, animals and things conveyed or transmitted by the said company, and which, going northward, should pass over the joint line, or any part thereof, or any part of the said Portsmouth Extension of the Brighton and Chichester Railway, lying within three miles of the point at which the joint line crosses or nearest approaches the Sheet turnpike-road, and be delivered at any point within ten miles to the southward of the New Cross station of the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway, or at the same station, or at any point to the northward of the same station, or which going southward shall pass from any point to the northward of the same station or from any point within two miles to the southward of the same station. By the 12th article it was provided that "Except as regards passengers, animals and things carried on the joint line only, and London traffic as defined in the 11th article of this contract, each of the two companies shall be entitled for its own exclusive use to all such rates, tolls and charges as shall be received by the same respective company in respect of the joint line."

A provision was made by the 18th and 19th articles against the companies diverting traffic improperly to their own lines which would otherwise be common property, or acting at all against the spirit of the agreement. The 18th article provided, that the South-Western Company should not at any time thereafter make, or attempt to make, any arrangements, or hold out any inducements for the purpose, or with the tendency of unfairly and in any way contrary to the spirit of this contract and the intent of the Brighton Company in entering into the same, attracting or otherwise diverting to the line of the South-Western Railway running through Fareham to or from Gosport, any of the traffic which in the ordinary and regular course of business, and but for such arrangements or inducements would be traffic on the joint line or London traffic, defined by the 11th article as traffic of the Brighton Company. By the 19th article, it was provided, that neither of the two companies should at any time thereafter make, or attempt to make, any arrangements or hold out any inducement for the purpose or with the tendency of unfairly, and in any way contrary to the spirit of the contract and the intent of the other of the two companies in entering into the same, attracting or otherwise diverting to the line of such respective company any traffic, whether coming or going by sea or by land, or partly by sea and partly by land, which in the ordinary and regular course of business, and but for such arrangement or inducement, would be or have been traffic on the joint line, or London traffic, as thereinbefore defined as traffic of such other company.

The conveyance under the act was executed on the 10th of March 1851, and by it, in consideration of 60,000*l.* paid by the South-Western Company to the Brighton Company, the portion of the Portsmouth Extension, which was called the joint line, was conveyed to the two companies, together with the stations, works, &c. In August 1852 the two companies arranged the terms of another agreement, not however under seal, and therefore not binding on them, but shewing their apprehension of their interests being affected by a new line of railway being formed in the district intermediate between the two lines, and their determination to co-operate in opposition to any such project. It was through this district that the Direct Portsmouth Railway was afterwards made. The power to make this railway was conferred upon the Direct Portsmouth Company, by an act passed in 1853, by which they were empowered to make a railway from Havant to Godalming. In 1858 this company obtained powers, by an amended act, to extend their line from Havant to Hilsea, but as in this extension of their line they would have to carry it the whole way by the side of the railway belonging to the South Coast Company, powers were given them of acquiring the right of using this portion of the South Coast Company's line; and also as to the joint line of the South Coast and South-Western Companies between Hilsea and Portsmouth, and their joint station at Landport. The 35th section of the amended act provided, that it should be lawful for the company, and all other companies and persons lawfully using the Portsmouth

Railway, to pass over and use with their respective engines and carriages the railways, or portions of railways thereafter mentioned, amongst others, so much of the railway of the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway Company as is situated between the point of junction with that railway in the parish of Havant on the Portsmouth Railway, and the point at or near Hilsea Redoubt, where the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway united with the line to Portsmouth, belonging to that Company and the London and South-Western Railway Company, or one of them, and also of the line of railway to Portsmouth belonging to the two last-mentioned companies, or one of them, between the before-mentioned point at or near Hilsea Redoubt and the terminus of the said railway at the Landport Road. Such powers of passage and of user were in each case to be exercised on such terms and conditions as, failing an agreement between the companies, should be settled by the principal engineers thereof, or if they differed by an umpire or by the Board of Trade, and all reasonable accommodation was to be provided within the station. It was provided, nevertheless, that (except as thereafter provided) nothing in this act contained should confer on the company, or on any such other company or person as aforesaid, any powers of user of the joint station at Landport, in the parish of Portsea, of the London, Brighton and South Coast, and London and South-Western Railway Companies for any purpose other than the transmission upon the lines of railway laid down in the said station of traffic conveyed on the public service. The 36th section provided, that the company and the owners for the time being of the said joint station at Landport might agree for the use by the company, or such other company or person as aforesaid of the said joint station, or any part thereof, for the general traffic of the company on such terms and conditions as should be mutually agreed on for the use of the joint station, and if no such agreement should be come to, then the company, before the expiration of a year, were to erect a station for themselves.

On the 23rd of December 1858 an agreement was entered into between the South-Western Company and the Portsmouth

Company to apply to parliament in the ensuing session to authorize the Portsmouth Company to grant, and the South-Western Company to accept, a lease of the Portsmouth Company's undertaking for a term of 999 years, from its opening for traffic, or until it should be merged in the South-Western Company, at a rental of 18,000*l.* a year, and it was further agreed that if they should not succeed in obtaining an act, they were to repeat their efforts in 1860. It was also agreed that the South-Western Company should work the Portsmouth undertaking in the mean time, keeping the same in good and efficient repair, and paying to the Portsmouth Company the sum of 18,000*l.* per annum.

By a second agreement, dated the 24th of December 1858, reciting that by the local act, 1 Vict. c. lxxi. s. 50, it was, after reciting that it would tend much to the convenience of the public if railway companies were empowered to enter into mutual arrangements so as to avoid the necessity of a change of carriages and other delays arising from a diversity of interest, enacted that the South-Western Company, and all other railway companies might enter into contracts for the division or apportionment of tolls or rates for the passage of engines or carriages over their respective lines of railway upon the payment of such tolls or rates, and under such conditions and restrictions as might be mutually agreed upon; that the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, applied to the Portsmouth Company, and that under section 87. they had the ordinary power to make contracts with respect to the passage over their line of railway of the engines, coaches, waggons or other carriages of the South-Western Company upon the payment of such tolls and under such conditions and restrictions, as might be mutually agreed on between the two companies, and for that purpose to enter into any contract for the division or apportionment of the tolls to be taken on their respective railways; that by the Portsmouth Railway Amendment Act, 1857, power was given to the Portsmouth Company and the South-Western Company to enter into and carry into effect such agreements and arrangements as they might think fit in respect of the regulation and management by the Portsmouth Company and the South-Western Company, or either of them, of the traffic upon or over their respective railways, or either of them, or any part thereof; that it would tend to the convenience of the public and would be of mutual advantage to the two companies if arrangements were made with respect to the user by the South-Western Company of the railway of the Portsmouth Company and the regulation and management by the South-Western Company of the traffic thereon in connexion with the traffic of the railway of the South-Western Company, and that the two companies had accordingly determined to enter into the following agreement, which had been duly assented to by three-fifths of the shareholders of each of the two companies: it was witnessed that the agreement should continue in force from the 1st of January 1859 until either the Portsmouth Railway was leased to the South-Western Company or the two companies became united, or one of them was merged in the other; that the South-Western Company should be entitled during the continuance of this agreement to use the Portsmouth Railway for the passage over and along the same of their engines, &c., and that they should receive, collect and recover all tolls, fares, rates and charges receivable in respect of the traffic, and that during the continuance of the agreement all sums received or receivable by the Portsmouth Company in respect of the Portsmouth Railway, and the local traffic, and all sums received by the South-Western Company in respect of the tolls, fares, rates and charges for the traffic in respect of the South-Western Company's line of railway between London and Godalming, should form a joint fund to be divided and apportioned between the two companies half-yearly, paying thereout to the Portsmouth Company in the first place and as the first charge thereon the sum of 9,000*l.*, and after paying the two companies respectively their respective expenditure in working the traffic, and in wages, salaries and other matters therein particularly mentioned, the residue of the joint fund to be paid to the South-Western Company.

By a third agreement, dated the 24th of February 1859 (after the filing of the bill) reciting that the two companies had agreed to enter into a temporary arrangement respecting the user by the South-Western Company of the Portsmouth Railway until a more extended agreement should have been approved by the Board of Trade, or until a bill then before parliament for authorizing an amalgamation or lease of the Portsmouth Railway with or to the South-Western Railway Company should have become law, it was witnessed that, in exercise of every power enabling them respectively in that behalf, the said companies mutually agreed (amongst other things) that the said reciting agreement should commence from the 1st of January 1859, and continue in force until a more extended agreement should have been approved by the Board of Trade, or until the before-mentioned bill should have become law; that the South-Western Company should be entitled during the continuance of this agreement to use the Portsmouth Railway for the free passage over and along the same of the engines and carriages of every kind of the South-Western Company; that they should pay all the expenses incident to the exercise of their rights in this respect, and pay to the Portsmouth Company the full maximum tolls demandable or receivable by the Portsmouth Company in respect of the same; that the South-Western Company should cause to pass over the Portsmouth Railway such an amount of traffic as should cause the payments to be made to the Portsmouth Company in respect of tolls, to be after the rate of 18,000*l.* per annum at the least, for the whole of the period during which the agreement should continue in force.

This suit was instituted by the South Coast Railway Company to restrain the South-Western Company from using the station at Landport and the joint line for the booking or transit of passengers or goods destined for or coming from the Portsmouth Railway or any part thereof. It was contended, by the South-Western Company, that they were entitled, under the act of 1847, to use the joint line and station for all purposes that were necessary for their traffic and business; and that having arranged with the Portsmouth Railway Company to pass their traffic over that line, they had a right to use the joint line and station when the traffic arrived there. The South Coast Railway Company, on the other hand, insisted that the intention of the act of 1847 was, that the joint line and station should be used for that which was strictly the traffic belonging to the respective companies, and that it was never intended to enable either company to bring traffic to the joint line which had passed over another independent railway. They also submitted that the agreements of December 23 and 24, 1858, and February 24, 1859, which the South-Western Company had entered into with the Portsmouth Railway Company, by which the Portsmouth Railway was virtually transferred to the South-Western Company for an annual rent of 18,000*l.* per annum were illegal and void. The bill also prayed for an account. Wood, V.C. refused an injunction; but the agreements between the South-Western and the Portsmouth Companies were not before him.

Mr. Rolt, Mr. Willcock and Mr. J. H. Taylor were for the plaintiffs.

Sir R. Bethell, Mr. Giffard and Mr. Baggallay appeared for the South-Western Company; and,

Mr. C. T. Simpson, for the Portsmouth Company.

The arguments upon the hearing will sufficiently appear in the judgment.

June 8.—The LORD CHANCELLOR, after stating the case, said—It appears quite clear that the 35th section of the Direct Portsmouth Company's act of 1858 does not intend to restrict in any way the user by the companies of their own lines, whether belonging to them separately or jointly, and that it is wholly directed to enabling the Portsmouth Company and the other companies to obtain the right of using these lines. The question, therefore, between the companies will be found not to depend upon this act, but upon entirely different grounds. Of course, this observation does not apply to the portion of the line between Havant and Hilsea; but of this the case may be entirely cleared, for though at the time of the filing of the bill there had been no agreement under the 35th section of the act of 1858, and therefore the plaintiffs prayed for an injunction to restrain the use of so much of their line, yet since the bill was filed the matter has been settled in the manner provided for by the act, and therefore this part of the relief prayed may be put out of consideration. The case which the South-Western Company make is this: they say, under the 13th section of the act of 1847, we are entitled to use the joint line, which includes the joint station, for the purpose of conveying passengers and goods upon the same, and for all such other purposes as shall be necessary for our traffic and business thereon. There is nothing in that act to confine us to the particular line of our railway which then alone existed. We might, by extending that line, or by throwing out branches, have brought down any increased quantity of traffic to the joint line. We have arranged with the Portsmouth Company to pass our traffic over their line, and when it arrives at the joint line we use that which is our own property, and which existed in us prior to the act of 1858. That act conferred no powers upon us as to this joint line, which would have been wholly unnecessary, because we possessed all the powers we required without its aid. The South Coast Company, on the other hand, say that the intention of the act of 1847 was that the joint line should be used for that which was strictly the traffic which belonged to the railways of the respective companies; that this did not exclude the legitimate extension of those railways, but that it never was intended to enable either company to bring traffic to the joint line, which had passed over another and independent railway; that this would be unjust to them, as they have to bear a moiety of the expense of maintaining the joint line; and yet, if the traffic comes on to the joint line, having commenced on some part of the Portsmouth line, or proceeds upon the joint line, and is destined only for some place on the Portsmouth line, they would not be entitled to a share in the profits of the conveyance of the passengers or goods; and they contend that the agreements which the South-Western Company have entered into with the Portsmouth Company are illegal and void, and therefore they are either not lawfully using the Portsmouth Railway, or at all events the traffic which depends on these agreements cannot be the traffic or business contemplated by the act of 1847, which must be the lawful traffic or business of the South-Western Company. I have already intimated my opinion that the act of 1858, as to companies lawfully using the Portsmouth Railway, does not apply to the London and South-Western Company. But the other question remains, and it is a very important one, whether the circumstances under which that company has acquired the use of the Portsmouth Railway enables them to claim the traffic which passes over it as their traffic and business. To determine this question it will be necessary to examine the agreements which have been entered into between the two companies. They consist of three different instruments: one called "the Heads of Arrangement," dated the 23rd of December 1858; and another an agreement for traffic arrangements, dated the 24th of December 1858; and the third an interim agreement for the user by the South-

Western Company of the Portsmouth Railway, dated the 24th of February 1859. I think that all these must be deemed and taken to be one agreement, under which the use of the railway is transferred to the South-Western Company. What, then, is the nature of these instruments? They are nothing more or less than an abandonment of the management and use of their line by the Portsmouth Company to the South-Western Company, in consideration of a sum of 18,000*l.* a year. They are ingeniously and carefully worded, with the object of evading the objection, which must be well known to exist, to the transfer by one railway company to another of the rights and powers conferred by the legislature. The last of these instruments, which was entered into after the bill was filed, viz., on the 24th of February 1859, has been properly described as the result of a selection of the least objectionable parts of the former agreements for the purpose of more completely colouring the real objects of the parties, but it has been argued that this last agreement at least must be valid, because it is a mere interim arrangement which it is expressly provided shall only continue in force until a more extended agreement shall have been approved by the Board of Trade, or until a bill before Parliament for authorizing an amalgamation or lease of the Portsmouth Railway to the South-Western Company shall have become law. But surely this cannot be maintained. If the sanction of the Board of Trade or of the act of parliament is necessary to render the agreement good, any agreement made before the authority is obtained, which is essential to its validity, must be bad, and we are dealing with such an agreement. Can then these agreements, by which the management of the line and the benefit of the traffic of the Portsmouth Company are virtually transferred to the South-Western Company for a fixed sum annually, be held to be legal and binding on the two companies? If not, the conveyance under this agreement of passengers and goods, which would otherwise belong to the Portsmouth Company, cannot make them part of the traffic and business of the South-Western Company. I think that the illegality of this agreement is established by the cases which were cited in the course of the argument, particularly by the cases of The Great Northern Railway Company v. the Eastern Counties Railway Company, and The East Anglian Railway Company v. the Eastern Counties Railway Company, and by The Shrewsbury and Birmingham Railway Company v. the London and North-Western Railway Company, in the House of Lords, where the Lord Chancellor, Lord Cranworth, in advising the House, said, "There is abundant authority to shew that there are many contracts into which, without express authority, a railway company cannot enter. The Railway Clauses Consolidation Act (8 Vict. c. 20. s. 86.) authorizes every such company to run carriages, and generally to act as a carrier on its own line of railway, and by the next section the company is enabled to make arrangements with other companies having continuous railways for the use of their respective lines, for their mutual benefit. All this would have been unnecessary if it had not been considered that, but for such enactments, no such power would have existed under the mere incorporation of the company for the purpose of making and maintaining a railway." I cannot better express my opinion of this agreement than in the language of Lord Justice Turner, when Vice-Chancellor, in the case of The Great Northern Railway Company v. the Eastern Counties Railway Company: "It is framed in total disregard of the obligations and duties which attach upon these companies; and is an attempt to carry into effect, without the intervention of parliament, what cannot lawfully be done except by parliament in the exercise of its discretion with reference to the interests of the public." But it is said, supposing the agreements are illegal, why is the South Coast Railway Company to interfere? If they are in violation of the act of parliament, or are against public policy, it is the duty of the Attorney-General, and not of private parties, to question them. If they involve an application of the funds of the company to a purpose foreign to those for which it was incorporated, it is for the shareholders to complain. But the South Coast Railway Company do not attempt to impeach these agreements on account of their ab-

abstract illegality, but merely urge their illegality for the purpose of shewing that the South-Western Company can acquire no rights under them which can affect their interests or property. So long as the South-Western Company confine themselves to the limits of the Portsmouth line the South Coast Company have no interest in the question of the validity of these agreements. It is only when they are attempted to be connected with the use of the joint line that they become complicated with the rights of the South Coast Company. But it is argued on behalf of the South-Western Company that whatever may be thought of traffic which commences or terminates upon the Portsmouth line, in connexion with the joint line, yet the traffic which begins on any part of the South-Western, or which ends on any part of that line, although the Portsmouth line is used in the course of its transit, must at all events be regarded as traffic of the South-Western Company, and that the South Coast Company can have no right to inquire by what means it arrived at the joint line, or how it is carried from the joint line to its destination on the South-Western Railway. This has always appeared to me to be the only difficult part of the case; but after carefully considering it, I have arrived at the conclusion that, as all the traffic which passes over the Portsmouth line is carried over it under the agreements, which are illegal, it is immaterial where it comes from or what is its ultimate destination, and that none of it can be regarded as traffic and business of the South-Western Company within the meaning of the 13th section of the act of 1847, upon which the whole question depends. It was suggested that the South Coast Company were opposing the user of the line by the South-Western Company to their own disadvantage, as the additional traffic which would be brought upon it would increase their own profits; but it is obvious that, under the definition of London traffic in the agreement entered into in pursuance of the act of 1847, a great portion of traffic might be brought on the joint line, in the benefits of which it would not be entitled to participate, and at the same time the increased wear and tear of the line in which they participate they must contribute to make good. But whatever may be the prudence or propriety of this proceeding on the part of the South Coast Company, they are clearly entitled to resist all use of the joint line and station for anything not part of the legitimate traffic and business of the South-Western Company. I think, therefore, that it will be proper for the Court to make a declaration that the South-Western Company are not entitled to use the joint station at Landport for passengers or goods carried or conveyed under the agreements of the 23rd and 24th of December 1858, and the 24th of February 1859, and to grant an injunction restraining them from using the joint station for the booking or transit of passengers or goods destined for or coming from the Portsmouth Railway, or any part thereof, until further order. This will leave the question open to the South-Western Company, if they obtain valid agreements, or, of course, if they obtain any powers under an act of parliament, to come again to the Court. With respect to the application for an account, I think that that cannot be granted. As the joint committee are to fix the amount of tolls, there can be no account taken unless they have performed their office in that respect; and, therefore, the Court can give no relief in that particular. With respect to the costs, of course as to the first part of the prayer the injunction to restrain the South-Western Company from using the portion of the Portsmouth line between Havant and Hilsea, the plaintiffs were perfectly right at the time the bill was filed; therefore, at all events, under any circumstances, they would be entitled to their costs of that, but we think also that the South-Western Company ought to pay the costs of this appeal. With regard to the Portsmouth Railway Company, we say nothing as to the costs with respect to it.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—The principal question remaining to be decided in this case is, whether the South-Western Company are entitled to use the station at Landport belonging jointly to them and the plaintiffs, the South Coast Company, for the booking and transit of passengers or goods destined for, or coming from, the Portsmouth Railway or any part thereof, except for the transmission of traffic conveyed on the public service to or from the line belonging to the Crown leading to the Dockyard or other public establishments at Portsea or Portsmouth. The bill raises the same question as to the right of the Portsmouth Company to the use of the Landport station, but they have not claimed, and do not claim, any such right, and this part of the case may, therefore, be laid out of consideration. There is a subordinate question, which it will be necessary to dispose of, as to the accounts which are prayed for by the bill. The defendants, the South-Western Company, having entered into agreements with the Portsmouth Company with respect to the use of their line and to the traffic upon it, claim the right to use the Landport station for the booking and transit of passengers and goods destined for, and coming from, the Portsmouth Railway, under the provisions of an act of parliament passed in the year 1847. On the other hand, the plaintiffs insist that this act of parliament gives the South-Western Company no such right, and they also, in the first instance, insisted on some agreements entered into between them and the South-Western Company, as having precluded the exercise of such right, if in fact given by the act; but they afterwards abandoned that ground, and relied upon those agreements, merely as expounding, as it was said, the act of 1847. They further insisted, however, that the South-Western Company were precluded from this user of the Landport station by another act of parliament, passed in the year 1858, and they contended that the South-Western Company were not lawfully using the Portsmouth Railway within the meaning of that act, the agreements entered into by them with the Portsmouth Company being, as the plaintiffs insisted, illegal and void. But the South-Western Company, on the other hand, contended, that the act of 1858 did not in any way affect their rights, and that the agreements between them and the Portsmouth Company were valid, and they insisted that, at all events, the plaintiffs were not entitled to question the validity of those agreements. The first question to be considered, therefore, is whether the South-Western Company are entitled to use the Landport station for the purposes in question, by virtue of the act of 1847. By this act, after reciting that it would be of public advantage to vest in the South-Western Company and the plaintiffs so much of the Portsmouth Extension of the Brighton and Chichester Railway as was or might be constructed between Havant and Portsmouth, which Extension Railway the plaintiffs are mentioned in this recital to have contracted to purchase, powers are given, by section 2, to the plaintiffs to sell, and to the South-Western Company and the plaintiffs to purchase, such part of the portion of the Extension Railway lying westward of the junction near Havant, between the line of the Extension Railway and the line of the then intended Direct Portsmouth Railway, as the companies should define and agree upon, and the stations and other works and conveniences connected with the same portion, and the parts so to be defined and purchased, and the stations, works and conveniences connected therewith, are mentioned to be thereafter referred to as "the joint line"; and after providing for the conveyance to be made upon the completion of the sale and purchase, it was enacted, by section 5, that the conveyance, when executed, should be effectual to vest the joint line, and all the rights, privileges, powers and authorities, by any act or acts of parliament relating thereto or otherwise given to or vested in the companies selling, or either of such companies, with reference to the same, with the appurtenances, jointly in the companies purchasing; and, by section 6, that when the conveyance should have been executed, all the powers, rights and privileges by any act or acts of parliament, or otherwise given to or vested in the Brighton and Brighton and Chichester Companies, or either of them, and for the time being in force, should, so far they might relate to the joint line, apply to and be vested in the South-Western and Brighton Companies jointly, and might be used, exercised and enjoyed by the same companies jointly, and by such joint committee as thereafter provided for respectively. It was further enacted, by section 9, that for the better management of the joint line, a joint committee, consisting of three directors of each of the two purchasing companies, should be appointed for carrying the provisions of the act, so far as the same related to the making and maintaining the joint line and to the other things to be done by the joint committee as therein provided, into execution, and that the joint committee should have the like powers, privileges and indemnities as might have been exercised by the companies selling, or either of them, if they had not sold. By section 11, that the joint committee should be subject to all such by-laws, regulations and provisions as might from time to time be agreed upon by the board of directors of the two purchasing companies respectively, and that, except so far as should be otherwise provided by such by-laws, regulations and provisions, the majority present should at all meetings of the joint committee bind the minority and all absent members, and the chairman should be selected alternately from among the members appointed by each of the boards and should have a casting vote, and three members of the joint committee should form a quorum, with a proviso that such three members should not be those appointed by one of the boards, except in certain cases therein mentioned arising from the default of the other board. By section 12. it is enacted, that the joint committee should appoint the officers and servants to be employed, but with power to each of the companies to appoint their own booking-clerks. Section 13. I shall have occasion to refer to presently. By section 14, that the joint and several funds of the two purchasing companies should be liable for the payment and satisfaction of all liabilities incurred by the joint committee. By section 15, that an equal half-part of the cost and expenses of making, maintaining and managing the joint line should be paid by each of the two purchasing companies. By section 18, that the rates, tolls and other charges to be demanded and received from and by the two companies respectively in respect of passengers, animals and things conveyed by the same companies respectively upon the joint line, or any part thereof, and for the use of carriages and engines or other power supplied by the same companies respectively thereon, should from time to time be determined by the joint committee; and by section 20, that the joint committee might demand and receive from any other railway company or railway companies who might use the joint line, or any part thereof, such rates, tolls and charges for the use thereof as such joint committee should from time to time think fit and determine. It was also enacted, by section 22, that the profits to be received by each of the purchasing companies in respect of the joint line should be paid to the joint committee, and after payment of the expenses payable by the joint committee in respect of the joint line, should be paid by the joint committee to the two companies in equal shares. By section 23. all the expenses incurred in respect of the joint line, exclusive of those which are incurred by the two purchasing companies, or either of them, in the conveyance on that line, and the liabilities which may be incurred in respect thereof, all those expenses are to be paid by the joint committee, and the surplus of those funds is to be paid in equal shares between the two companies. By section 23. provision is made for a deduction to be made by each company for the working of the joint line. By section 27. there is power to the companies to agree with each other for different terms than those prescribed by the act. Under the provisions of this act, the South-Western Company and the plaintiffs purchased part of the Extension Railway lying westward of the point of junction of the intended Direct Portsmouth Railway, referred to in the act, and the part thus purchased was conveyed to the South-Western and Brighton Companies accordingly. This purchased part of the Extension Railway lies between Hilsea and Portsmouth, at the western or Portsmouth end of the Extension Railway. It is not in immediate connexion with the point of junction of the Direct Portsmouth Railway above referred to, there being a part of the Extension Railway not included in the purchase, which intervenes between the part of it which has been purchased and the above-mentioned point of junction, and which intervening part now belongs to the Brighton Company. The purchased part of the Extension Railway is, however, connected with the South-Western Railway at

Cosham, near Hilsa. The Landport station, which is in question in this suit, is at the Portsmouth end of the purchased part of the Extension Railway. Since this purchase was made, the Direct Portsmouth Railway, mentioned in the act as having been then intended to be made and to join the Brighton Railway near Havant, has been completed. It belongs to the defendants, the Portsmouth Company, and it may be convenient here to mention that, at the time of the filing of this bill, the defendants, the Portsmouth Company, had no right to carry passengers or goods over the intervening part of the extension railway, above mentioned as belonging to the Brighton Company, and were, therefore, cut off from any connexion with the joint line belonging to the South-Western and Brighton Companies, and that one object of this bill was to restrain the South-Western and Portsmouth Companies from using this portion of the Extension Railway, but that since the filing of the bill the Portsmouth Company, and as it was said in the argument and not denied, the South-Western Company also, have acquired the right to use that intervening portion of the extension railway by virtue of an award, made under the provisions of the act of 1858; and this part of the plaintiffs' case therefore was admitted at the Bar to be at an end, thus reducing the case to the question as to the right to use the Landport station. The South-Western Railway Company, who have entered into agreements with the Portsmouth Company, which must presently be mentioned, claim the right to use the Landport station, both for the purposes of their own traffic carried over the Direct Portsmouth Railway, and for the purpose of the traffic of the Direct Portsmouth line carried by them, upon two grounds: first, that the act of 1847 created a joint tenancy between them and the Brighton Company in the joint line, including, of course, the Landport station, and that every joint tenant is entitled to the full use and enjoyment of the joint property; and, secondly, that this right is expressly given to them by the 13th section of the act of 1847. As to the first point, whatever might have been the effect of the act of 1847, had the case depended upon the earlier sections of it, the 9th and subsequent sections seem to me sufficiently to shew that it was not the intention of the legislature that the joint ownership of the joint line by the two purchasing companies should be attended with the incidents of joint tenancy to the extent contended for by the defendants, the South-Western Company, for, by the 9th and subsequent sections, not only is the management of the joint line vested in the joint committee comprised, it is true, of an equal number of the directors of each company, but empowered, it is to be observed, to act when the companies are not equally represented, but the profits to be derived by each of the two purchasing companies are made, in a great measure, to depend upon what may be done under the exercise of the powers vested in the joint committee; and several sections of the act, and more especially the 13th section, refer to and provide for the separate interests of each of the two companies. I think, therefore, that the rights of the two companies must depend upon the provisions of the acts, and not upon the incidents of joint tenancy, and that the argument on the part of the South-Western Company, so far as it is founded on the joint tenancy, cannot be maintained. Then as to the claim of the South-Western Company to the user of this station under the provisions of the act: the question seems to me to depend upon the construction of the 13th section; for, if we lay out of consideration the right depending upon joint tenancy, I see nothing in the act which can give the right contended for unless it be given by that section. The words of the section are, no doubt, very wide and extensive. They are that, subject to the control and management of the joint committee and the provisions of any and every act of parliament for the time being relating to the joint line, or to the two companies, or either of them, each of the two companies may at all times thereafter use the joint line for the purpose of conveying passengers, animals and things upon the same, and for all such other purposes as shall be necessary for the traffic or business thereon of the same respective company. But wide and extensive as these words are, they must receive a just and reasonable interpretation. This is an act of parliament, which, as I view it, not only empowered the South-Western and Brighton Companies to purchase the part of the extension line, which was purchased by them, but also gave effect to an agreement between these two companies with reference to that purchase and the mode in which the property, when purchased, was to be held and dealt with between them. If we look at the act, with reference to the agreement between the two companies, it is surely unreasonable to suppose that these general words were intended by either of them to extend to the user of the joint line, including, of course, the Landport station, for the conveyance of passengers, animals or things which either of the two companies was not lawfully entitled to convey, or to traffic or business which either of the two companies was not lawfully entitled to carry on; and if we take into account the intervention of parliament in giving effect to this agreement, it is, I think, still more difficult to suppose that parliament could have intended, by these general words, to authorize or sanction the user of the joint line for any such conveyance or traffic. It seems to me, therefore, that, even admitting that these general words extend to authorize the user of the joint line, including this station, for the conveyance of all passengers, animals and things, which either of these companies was or might lawfully be entitled to convey, and for traffic or business which either of these companies was or might be lawfully entitled to carry on; and I am not prepared to say that this extended meaning ought not to be given to the words: we are bound in construction to limit them to passengers, animals and things lawfully conveyed and to traffic or business lawfully carried on. It may be said that this act of parliament contains no such limitations of these general words, but I should be sorry to hold that express provision was necessary in an act of parliament in order to prevent general words from operating as sanctioning an infringement of the law. Where the words of an act of parliament extend to what is lawful and to what is unlawful, I apprehend that, in the absence of express provision or necessary construction, they can only be applied to what is lawful. Express provision or necessary construction is, I think, required to extend the general words, and make them operate to authorize what is unlawful, not to prevent them from being so extended. This being my view of the construction of this act, we have to look into the agreements between the South-Western and Portsmouth Companies, for the purpose of seeing, not merely whether the South-Western Company are lawfully using the Portsmouth Railway within the meaning of the act of 1858, but whether they are lawfully carrying the traffic in question so as to bring the case within the act of 1847. These agreements are three in number: the first of them is dated the 23rd of December 1858: by this agreement the two companies are to apply to parliament the then ensuing session for an act to authorize the Portsmouth Company to grant, and the South-Western Company to accept, a lease of the Portsmouth Company's undertaking for a term of 999 years from its opening for traffic, or until it should be merged in the South-Western Company, at a rental, payable half-yearly, of 18,000*l.* a year, commencing on the 15th of January 1859; and the third clause of the agreement was as follows:—"The application to parliament, mentioned in article 1, shall be at the joint and equal expense of the two companies, and shall, in the event of failure, be repeated in 1860, at the like expense, and the South-Western Company shall, exclusively as regards the Portsmouth Company and all others claiming under their licence, or by contract with them, work and use the Portsmouth undertaking in the mean time, keeping the same in good and efficient repair and working order, and paying, half-yearly, to the Portsmouth Company a clear sum, at the rate of 18,000*l.* a year, and the outgoings which would have been payable in respect of the time of such working by the South-Western Company, according to article 1, if the intended lease had been authorized and executed, and so in proportion for any less period than a year." I think this is an agreement which these two companies were not lawfully entitled to enter into. It is an agreement by the South-Western Company, if not to become tenants to the Portsmouth Company of their undertaking, at all events to work and use their undertaking in the mean time, until parliament should determine whether they should be authorized to become tenants of it or not—and I am not aware of any power given by law to railway companies to take upon lease or to work or use the lines of other railway companies either permanently or temporarily. It is an agreement, as it seems to me, beyond the powers of the incorporation of either of these companies. The second agreement is dated the 24th of December 1858. It recites that, by a local act of the first of Her present Majesty it was, after reciting that it would tend much to the convenience of the public if railway companies were empowered to enter into mutual arrangements, so as to avoid the necessity of a change of carriages and other delays arising from a diversity of interest, enacted, that the South-Western Company, then called "The London and Southampton Railway Company," and all other railway companies, might enter into contracts for the division or apportionment of tolls or rates, or for the passage of engines or carriages over their respective lines of railway upon the payment of such tolls or rates, and under such conditions and restrictions as might be mutually agreed upon. Then it recites that the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, applies to the Portsmouth Company, and under section 87. thereof they have the power to make contracts with respect to the passage over their line of railway of the engines, and so on, of the South-Western Company, upon the payment of such tolls, and under such conditions and restrictions as may be mutually agreed on between the two companies, and for that purpose to enter into any contract for the division or apportionment of the tolls to be taken on their respective railways. Then it recites the Portsmouth Railway Amendment Act of 1857, by which power is given, as it is said in this recital, "to the Portsmouth Company and the South-Western Company to enter into and carry into effect such agreements and arrangements as they may think fit, in respect of the regulation and management by the Portsmouth Company and the South-Western Company, or either of them, of the traffic upon or over their respective railways, or either of them, or any part thereof, and with respect to the division and apportionment between those companies of the expenses incurred and of the tolls, rates and charges received in respect of such traffic," wholly omitting a condition which was annexed to that clause in the act of parliament itself, that the agreement should not operate until approved of by the Board of Trade. Then it recites that "It would tend to the convenience of the public, and would be of mutual advantage to the two companies if arrangements were made with respect to the user by the South-Western Railway Company of the railway of the Portsmouth Company, and the regulation and the management by the South-Western Company of the traffic thereon, in connexion with the traffic of the railway of the South-Western Company, and the two companies have accordingly determined to enter into the agreement hereinafter appearing, but subject and without prejudice to the rights of all other companies." Then the first clause of the agreement is, that "This agreement shall commence and take effect as on and from the 1st day of January 1859, and shall continue in force until either the railway, as hereinafter defined, is leased to the South-Western Company, and the two companies become united or one of them is merged in the other," the lease or the union being with the sanction of parliament. By section 3, local traffic, wherever hereinafter used, means and includes traffic of all kinds originating and terminating on the Portsmouth Railway, and all other traffic on the Portsmouth Railway not coming from or proceeding to any railway of the South-Western Company, or over which they are entitled to pass and run independently of this agreement. And, by article 4, "The expression, 'through traffic,' wherever hereinafter used, means and includes all other traffic on both the Portsmouth Railway and any railway of the South-Western Company respectively to which this present agreement relates." Article 5, the word 'traffic,' wherever hereinafter used, "means and includes both local traffic and through traffic." Article 11, "The South-Western Company may and shall, during the continuance of this agreement, demand, receive, collect and recover all tolls, fares, rates and charges receivable in respect of the traffic, "including, therefore, both the through traffic and the local traffic," and the Portsmouth Company will do and concur in all such things as may be necessary or reasonably required for enabling the South-Western Company, by themselves or in the name of the Portsmouth Company, to demand, collect and receive the same." Article 15, "All sums received or receivable during the continuance of this agreement by the Portsmouth Company for or in respect of the Portsmouth Railway, and the local traffic whatsoever, and the through traffic whatsoever respectively thereon, and all sums received or receivable during the continuance of this agreement by the South-Western Company for or in respect of the tolls, fares, rates and charges for the local traffic whatsoever, and the through traffic whatsoever respectively, for or in respect of the South-Western Company's line of railway between London and Godalming, and the traffic whatsoever thereon shall form a joint fund, to be divided and apportioned between the two companies, according to this agreement." Then, by article 17th, "The amount of the joint fund shall from time to time be divided or apportioned between the two companies half-yearly during the continuance of this agreement, the half-years ending respectively on the 30th day of June and the 31st day of December in every year, as follows, that is to say, there shall be paid thereout to the Portsmouth Company, in the first place, and as the first charge thereon, the sum of 9,000*l.*, and all arrears, if any, thereof not paid for any preceding half-year; but if this contract shall expire or determine during any half-year, the payment for the broken half-year shall be only a due proportion." So that there is first an agreement to pay out of the joint funds 18,000*l.* a year, without any reference whatever to the expenses of working the joint line, and then the joint fund is to be applied in payment of the costs and charges of working the joint line, and then the surplus is not to be divided between the two companies, but, subject to all these charges, is to be paid to the South-Western Company. Now, this second agreement seems to me to be, if possible, more vicious than the first. It is, indeed, more artfully drawn, for the purpose of making it appear that what was contemplated was a mere arrangement of tolls; but the effect of it is to transfer all the tolls of the Portsmouth Company, both for what is called the through traffic and what is called the local traffic, to the South-Western Company, they paying 18,000*l.* a year to the Portsmouth Company, out of a joint fund, constituted of their own tolls and of the tolls of the Portsmouth Company, to be received by them in priority to all charges on the joint fund,—the South-Western Company thus not only taking all the tolls of the Portsmouth Company, but charging their own tolls with the payment of the 18,000*l.* a year. Little was said at the Bar in support of either of these agreements, but much reliance was placed on the third agreement, which is dated the 24th of February 1859, after the filing of this bill. By that agreement, after reciting that the two companies have agreed to enter into a temporary arrangement respecting the user by the South-Western Company of the Portsmouth Railway until a more extended agreement shall have been approved by the Board of Trade, or until a bill now before parliament for authorizing an amalgamation or lease of the Portsmouth Railway with or to the South-Western Railway Company, and for other purposes, shall have become law; it is witnessed by article 1, "This agreement shall commence and take effect as on and from the 1st day of January 1859, and shall continue in force until a more extended agreement shall have been approved by the Board of Trade, or until the before-mentioned bill shall have become law." By article 2, "The South-Western Company shall be entitled, during the continuance of this agreement, to use the Portsmouth Railway for the free passage over and along the same of the engines and carriages of every kind of the South-Western Company." Article 4, "The South-Western Company, during the continuance of this agreement, shall fairly and efficiently work their traffic upon and over the Portsmouth Railway, and make proper and sufficient arrangements for all the exigencies thereof." Article 5, "The South-Western Company shall, during the continuance of this agreement, pay all the expenses of and incident to the exercise of their rights under this agreement, and will indemnify the Portsmouth Company from and against the same and all claims and demands in respect thereof." Article 7, "The South-Western Company, in respect of their user of the Portsmouth Railway under this agreement, will pay to the Portsmouth Company the full maximum tolls demandable or receivable by the Portsmouth Company in respect of the same." Article 10, "The South-Western Railway shall cause to pass over the Portsmouth Railway such an amount of traffic as shall cause the payments to be made to the Portsmouth Company under this agreement for and in respect of tolls as aforesaid, to be after the rate of 18,000*l.* per annum at the least for the whole of the period during which this agreement shall continue in force." Article 12, "Either of the companies may, at any period of the year, without regard either to the date of the commencement of this agreement or any half-yearly day of payment, determine this present agreement by giving notice in writing under their common seal of such their desire to the said company." And then there is a provision for the service of the notice. If this agreement stood by itself, and was clearly confined to the traffic of the South-Western Company carried over the Portsmouth line, it might perhaps, and I say no more than perhaps, be maintained upon the authority of the case which was referred to in support of it, The South Yorkshire Railway Company v. the Great Northern Railway Company. I give no opinion upon that point, but it seems to me that this was not a bond fide agreement,—that it was a mere subterfuge for carrying into effect what had before been illegally agreed upon. It is to be observed that this agreement, when referring to the South-Western traffic, speaks of their traffic; and I am by no means satisfied that those words, "their traffic," were not intended to include the traffic of the Portsmouth Railway, treated as belonging to them under the previous agreement. If so, this last agreement must, as it seems to me, be vicious, upon the same grounds as apply to the other agreements; but if, upon the other hand, the words "their traffic" were not meant to include, and do not include, the traffic of the Portsmouth Railway, then the defendants, the South-Western Company, as they are undoubtedly carrying the traffic of the Portsmouth line, must be working under all the agreements, and not under the last agreement alone, and the three agreements constitute together but one agreement, and the case cannot fall within the 87th section of the Railway Act. In the argument on this part of the case some reference was made to a local act, the 1st of Victoria, and to the Portsmouth Railway Amendment Act, 1857; but it does not appear to me that the case of the South-Western Company is aided by either of these acts. The former of them clearly does not extend to authorise the working of the traffic of the Portsmouth line, and the latter of them expressly provides that no agreement or arrangement made under it shall have any effect until approved by the Board of Trade, and no such approval has been given.

It was much insisted upon on the part of the South-Western Company that the plaintiffs could have no right to inquire whether the traffic which was carried by the South-Western Company was or was not lawfully carried by them, but if the act of 1847 gives no rights to the South-Western Company, except in respect of traffic lawfully carried, the right to have the question determined, whether the traffic was lawfully carried or not, seems to me to follow upon the construction of the act. It was said that the plaintiffs could not be entitled to stop the trains of the South-Western Company and inquire whence the passengers and goods had come, and whether they had lawfully come upon the South-Western line, but this seems to me to be only a difficulty in working out the act. No doubt there may be great difficulties in working it out, but it does not, I think, follow, that because there may be cases in which it may be difficult, or perhaps impossible, to prove the infringement of the right, the Court ought to hold its hand when that infringement is established. Another argument which was advanced on the part of the South-Western Company was this, that as they had acquired by the award the right to bring their passengers and goods down to the joint line, it could not be said that their traffic was unlawful; but although the award may legalize the traffic so far as the passing over the Brighton line is concerned, it cannot, I think, legalize it in other respects and render traffic carried under unlawful agreements lawful traffic. Upon the whole, therefore, the conclusion at which I have arrived is, that the act of 1847 does not give to the defendants the right contended for by them, and I think, therefore, that the injunction prayed by this bill as to the joint station is due. But I think it should be granted only until further order, with liberty to apply. In the view which I have taken of this case, it has not been necessary to consider the effect of the agreements between the plaintiffs, the Brighton Company, and the South-Western Company, or the question whether the South-Western Company ought or ought not to be considered as a company lawfully using the Portsmouth Railway within the meaning of the act of 1858, although I very much incline to agree with the opinion of the Vice Chancellor and of the Lord Chancellor on that point; but with reference to the act of 1858 it may be right to observe, that independently of the question whether the South-Western Company falls within its provisions, it seems to me to afford an argument of some importance in favour of the plaintiffs' case. That act proceeds upon the assumption that the Portsmouth Company were not then entitled either to the use of the joint line of railway, or to bring their traffic into the joint station, and after enabling them to acquire the use of the joint line of railway, it positively excludes them from the joint station except by agreement with the owners of that station, the South-Western and South Coast Companies; and provides that if no such agreement shall be come to within the time mentioned in the act, they shall purchase land and build a station of their own. The legislature having thus empowered the Portsmouth Company to acquire the use of the joint station by agreement with the two companies, and having rendered it compulsory upon them to build a station of their own if no such agreement was come to, it can hardly be taken to have supposed that they were already authorized to acquire the right to use the joint station by agreement with one of the companies. This observation, it may be true, applies to the Portsmouth Company and not to the South-Western Company; but then it is to be observed, that according to the terms of the act, an agreement with one of the two companies, the joint owners of the joint station, could not absolve the Portsmouth Company from building a station of their own; and if, notwithstanding such an agreement, they were bound to build their own station, it would seem that their traffic must, notwithstanding such an agreement, have been intended to be carried into that station. Looking to the frame of this record and the absence of the joint committee, I do not think we can direct the accounts prayed by this bill, and the decree, therefore, must be confined to the injunction. I think the South-Western Company must pay the plaintiffs' costs of the suit, and that there should be no costs to the Portsmouth Company.

June 4. } Re GROVE'S TRUSTS.

Annuity—Right to Corpus.

A testator bequeathed all his money and securities for money to his executors upon trust to employ 400l. or 500l. in purchasing a house, and allow L. to reside therein and have the use thereof for her separate use, and after her decease the same to go to her children (if any) equally. He further requested his said trustees to invest sufficient money in their names to produce 40l. per annum, and to pay the same, quarterly, to the said L. to her separate use. The Court refused, upon the petition of L. to direct the corpus of the fund to be paid to her, but declared her entitled to an annuity for her life only, and to have a sufficient fund appropriated to answer such annuity.

C. H. Grove, by his will, dated in 1843, bequeathed to the executors therein named all his money and securities for money whatsoever, upon trust to employ 400l. or 500l. in purchasing a house, and to allow Miss Matilda Lloyd to reside therein, and to have the use thereof for her sole and separate use; after her decease the same to go to her children, if any, equally. He then requested his trustees aforesaid, after buying the house aforesaid, to invest in government securities sufficient money in their names to produce 40*l.* per annum, and to pay the same, quarterly, to the said Matilda Lloyd, for her sole and separate use, free from the debts and engagements of any husband with whom she might intermarry, her receipt alone to be a good discharge for the same, not by way of anticipation.

The testator, after bequeathing certain other legacies, gave the residue of his property to J. Grove.

The executors had proved the will, and invested a sum sufficient to produce 40*l.* a year.

The petition was that of the legatee, Miss Matilda Lloyd, claiming to have the corpus of the annuity paid to her.

Mr. Rogers, in support of the petition, cited—

Mr. Locock Webb, for the residuary legatee, was not called upon.

STUART, V.C. referred to Savery v. Dyer (1) and Yates v. Madden (2), as settling the rule that where, as in this case, an annuity not existing before (that is, an annuity not existing at the date of the will, but created by the will) was given to a legatee, he took it only for life, and observed that there was in the context of the will nothing to affect the application of the ordinary rule, or to indicate an intention to give the legatee the corpus of the fund, or more than an annuity for life. There must, therefore, be a declaration that the petitioner was entitled to the annuity for her separate use, during her life, and entitled also to have a sufficient fund appropriated to produce the annuity.

Building Society—Termination—Mortgage—Redemption—Deficient Fund—Members—Continuing Liability.

Members of a building and investment society, which contemplated equal advantage to all, cannot borrow from the fund of the investing members without returning the benefits held out to them by the rules.

*A period fixed for the termination of a building society expired by effluxion of time; the funds, however, were insufficient to pay the investing members the sum it was by the rules calculated they ought to receive upon their shares:—Held, that the borrowing members were, by their rules, entitled to have the deeds relating to property purchased by them with the borrowed money delivered up at the end of the time fixed for the termination of the society, and also to have a receipt indorsed on the deed mortgaging the property to the society, acknowledging the payment of all monies intended to be secured thereby; but as the object of the society was not complete, that all the members still continued liable to pay monthly subscriptions to the funds until they were sufficient to pay to each investing member the sum he was to receive per share if the calculations had realized the proposed objects of the society.

The British Building and Investment Company was established in 1845, under the provisions of the 6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 32. It was duly enrolled, and rules for the government of the company and its members were prepared; these were approved of by the barrister appointed to certify the rules, and a duplicate was sent to the clerk of the peace for the city of London. It was represented that the company was formed upon a simplified and improved plan. Each of the members was to hold one or more shares in the company, and each of these shares was to be of the value of 120*l.*, that sum being the amount which, from the monthly payments of 10*s.* per share, it was calculated each investing member would be entitled to receive, at the expiration of thirteen years from the formation of the company. The members consisted of two classes: the advanced or borrowing members, who received an advance on their shares out of the funds of the company, upon the security of property purchased by them, and mortgaged to the trustees; and the unadvanced or investing members, who received no advances from the company, but who made their monthly payments with a view to obtain 120*l.* per share at the termination of the company. These monthly payments were made by the advanced and the unadvanced members in the same manner. The company was carried on up to September 1858, when it was to have expired by effluxion of time; it was, however, found that the calculations on which the company was based, and had been carried on, had failed, and that the funds of the company were insufficient for the payment to each of the unadvanced or investing members of the sum of 120*l.* per share.

Samuel Lewis Sparrow became a member of the company in 1850; he, subsequently, became the purchaser of a leasehold messuage and premises, No. 43, Charrington Street, Somers Town, and to enable him to pay for the same he obtained from the company a sum of 336*l.*, which was advanced to him by way of anticipation out of their funds in respect of four shares and four-fifths of another share which he held in the company.

By an indenture, dated the 25th of April 1850, and made between S. L. Sparrow of the first part, and the trustees of the company of the other part, after reciting that the plaintiff was possessed of the premises in Charrington Street for the residue of a term of seventy-eight years, subject to certain covenants, and that the company had been duly formed, certified, allowed, confirmed and enrolled, and that the plaintiff was entitled to receive out of the funds of the company, by way of anticipation, the sum of 336*l.* in respect of shares held by him; it was witnessed that, in consideration of such sum, S. L. Sparrow assigned to the trustees the said messuage and premises upon trust from time to time, so long as S. L. Sparrow, his executors, administrators and assigns should duly make the several payments, and observe and perform the regulations prescribed in the articles of the company in respect of the shares, and also perform all the covenants therein contained, to permit him or them to hold the premises and receive the rents for his and their benefit, but if he or they should at any time thereafter fail to perform and keep all or any of the covenants, or neglect or refuse for three monthly meetings to pay, observe and perform all or any of the subscriptions, payments and regulations on his or their part, then upon trust at any time thereafter that the trustees for the time being of the company should appoint a person to collect the rents and profits; but if the same should be insufficient to satisfy the before-mentioned purposes, then to sell the premises upon special or other conditions, with power to buy in the same, and to rescind any contract, and, after payment of the expenses, to retain and reimburse themselves, as trustees for the company, all sums of money which should be due and which might afterwards become due and payable by S. L. Sparrow in respect of his shares in the company, by virtue of the rules or otherwise howsoever, it being thereby agreed that in case such sale should take place, all monies which could at any time afterwards have become due from him or them according to the subsisting rules of the company, should be considered as then actually due, and the same or so much thereof as might be lawfully demanded should be fully deducted and paid out of the money received by virtue of the power and trusts, and upon trust to pay the residue of the trust money to S. L. Sparrow, or as he should appoint. The deed then declared that the receipts of the trustees should be good discharges for all monies received by them. S. L. Sparrow then covenanted with the trustees of the company for the time being, that he would pay the subscriptions and interest payable on his shares according to the rules of the company on the days and in manner therein mentioned, and abide by and perform the rules thereof in respect of the shares. S. L. Sparrow further covenanted for the title, and also to insure the premises in such office as the trustees should appoint; and also to become tenant at will to the trustees at the rent of 30*l.* a year, payable

S. L. Sparrow, up to the time fixed for the termination of the company, paid all sums which became due from him in respect of his shares in the company; he then requested that the title-deeds might be delivered up to him, and he also required the trustees to indorse a receipt thereon, acknowledging that they had received all money secured by the mortgage. This they refused to do; and insisted that the borrowing members were liable to continue their payments until each investing member had received the sum of 120*l.*; that the mortgage, notwithstanding the expiration of the thirteen years, was a valid and available security for enforcing these payments.

S. L. Sparrow then filed this claim against William Farmer, James Staley, Frederick Packmain and Henry Underhill, the trustees of the company, stating that he was entitled to the equity of redemption of the premises originally mortgaged to secure the monthly payments on his shares; that he had paid all monies secured and intended to be secured by the mortgage, and had become owner and proprietor of the premises: he, therefore, prayed that the trustees might indorse on the mortgage a receipt that all the money had been paid, and might deliver up the title-deeds to him.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Roxburgh, for the plaintiff, insisted that the company had expired, and that, as all subscriptions and payments had been made, the plaintiff was entitled to have his title-deeds delivered up to him, and a discharge indorsed on his mortgage-deed, releasing him from all further liability on his shares in the company.—

Fleming v. Self, 3 De Gex, M. & G. 997; s. c. 24 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Chanc. 29.

Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Welford, for the trustees of the company, contended that there was a continuing liability in the borrowing members, who otherwise would obtain an advantage at the expense of the investing members; that the company would not terminate until the investing members had received their shares; and that the powers in the mortgage-deed and in the rules were still applicable to raise the continuing subscriptions of borrowing members.—

Mr. Palmer, in reply.

April 18.—THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.
—The plaintiff claims to have the title-deeds of his property delivered up to him, and to have a receipt indorsed upon his mortgage-deed by the trustees of the company, acknowledging that they have received all monies which it was intended to secure. The company resist this claim, and allege that the subscription of 10*s.* per month per share is payable by the members up to the termination of the company, which they also allege does not terminate with the expiration of the term of thirteen years, the funds of the company being insufficient to pay the 120*l.* per share to the unadvanced or investing members. The trustees, therefore, insist that they are entitled to retain the mortgage-deed executed by the plaintiff as a security for the subscriptions which still remain payable. The latter part of rule 21. can scarcely have any other meaning than that which the plaintiff seeks to put upon it. The answer of the defendants is, that the rules of the company specify that the advanced member is to pay the subscriptions as long as the company endures, and that its duration may be greater or less, but that it is to continue until it shall be in a position to pay to the unadvanced members 120*l.* per share. It has been argued upon the whole scope of the rules, particularly upon the 2nd, 32nd and 33rd, that it was apparent that a perfect equality was to be maintained among the members, that it was the fundamental principle to be worked out, and that the company was to terminate only when the advanced members had been paid 120*l.* per share. It was also argued that the rules constituted a partnership, the duration of which was to continue until the object of the society was completely worked out, and that it applied to withdrawing members, who were to receive back their subscriptions, with the addition of a per-centage, according to the scale in Table 2. attached to the rules. It must be considered that the thirteen years were merely named as the probable duration of the company, but this was open to extension or diminution, which was to be regulated by the success with which the operations of the company were conducted. This, however, by no means disposed of the question as to what was the contract which the plaintiff entered into with the trustees of the company? The express words of rule 21. cannot be lost sight of. The contract has been entirely performed by the plaintiff; and it is impossible to say that the defendants are not to perform it on the ground that it is inconsistent, not with the express language, but with the assumed spirit of the rules. It was argued that if two rules were in conflict, you must look to their general scope to ascertain which of them was to prevail, and that effect must be given to the rule most in accordance with the scope and general object of the rules. I assent to the argument, but it does not apply. It was necessary to limit the duration of the company; unless it were so, no power of redemption could be reserved to any members of the company; for this purpose, and to give members the option of an earlier redemption, the duration of the company was fixed at thirteen years. Rule 21. was framed with this object; it does not determine the duration of the company, but it does determine the terms of the contract entered into between advanced members and the company, and the conditions upon which a mortgagee is to be allowed to redeem his property, and this Court must act upon it in favour both of the mortgagee and the company. In a case of Farmer v. Smith (1) the trustees of the company brought an action, in the Court of Exchequer, against an advanced member, upon a covenant contained in his mortgage-deed for the payment of subscriptions subsequent to the expiration of the thirteen years, the anticipated termination of the company, and it was held, that the company did not terminate at the expiration of the term of thirteen years, and that every member must continue to pay the subscriptions until the termination of the company, viz., until the funds are sufficient to pay the sum of 120*l.* per share to each of the unadvanced members. But the mortgagor, on complying with rule 21, is entitled to have his title-deeds handed over to him, with a receipt indorsed thereon, acknowledging satisfaction. Assuming, therefore, that the plaintiff may be required to pay his subscription for a further period, I still think that he is entitled to the benefit of the contract he has entered into, and I must make a decree in terms according with rule 21, but without prejudice to any action which the defendants may be advised to bring against the plaintiff in respect of subscriptions claimed to be due subsequent to the 12th of September 1858, the period when the thirteen years expired. The claim must, therefore, be allowed, with costs.

Rule 1. "The first subscription shall be due in September 1845; and all future subscriptions shall be paid at the respective places and times named in Rule 2, or at such other places and times as the board shall from time to time appoint, until the object of this company be fully accomplished."

2. "The object of this company is, by the payments of its shareholders, to form a fund, from which money may be advanced, to enable them to purchase freehold or leasehold property, and for this purpose every shareholder shall be entitled to receive out of the funds of this company, the sums mentioned in Table I. for every share he may subscribe for, and so on in proportion for any fractional part of a share.

"The subscriptions shall be 10*s.* per month per share.

"Every shareholder shall, at the first subscription meeting, commence paying his or her subscription money, or sum of 10*s.*, for each and every share he or she may hold, and shall afterwards continue paying the said subscription money, of 10*s.* per share per month, with all fines that may be due from him or her, at every succeeding monthly meeting, or at latest before the third Monday or Thursday in every month, until the objects of the company shall be fully accomplished: such payments to be made to the treasurer, directors, manager or secretary, at the office of the company, between the hours of seven and nine o'clock in the evening, or at such other times and places as may from time to time be appointed for that purpose. Every shareholder neglecting to pay his or her subscriptions shall, after the third Monday or Thursday in every month, be fined for each share as follows: 6d. for the first month, 6d. for the second month, 1s. for the third month, 1s. for the fourth month, 2s. for the fifth month, and 2s. for the sixth and subsequent months. Any shareholder (not having executed a mortgage to the company as hereinafter mentioned) continuing to neglect the payment of his or her monthly subscriptions until the fines incurred thereby shall equal all the monies actually paid by him or her, exclusive of the entrance fees, shall thereupon cease to be a shareholder, and forfeit all his or her interest therein.

"Shareholders paying subscriptions in advance, shall be allowed a discount on such payments after the rate of 4 per cent. per annum."

6. "Any shareholder who shall be desirous of withdrawing from this company any share or shares on which he or she has not received an advance, shall be allowed to do so on giving one month's notice in writing or his or her intention to the board for the time being, at any monthly meeting of the company, and shall receive on each share the sums mentioned in Table II.

"If more than one shareholder shall give notice to withdraw at one time, they shall be paid in rotation, according to the priority of notice; but widows and children of deceased members shall always have priority.

"In case of the withdrawal of shares, all fines incurred previously to any such application shall be deducted from the amount which the shareholder shall be entitled to receive."

21. "If any shareholder having received an advance on any share or shares, and secured the repayment thereof upon his or her premises, shall sell such premises, it shall be lawful for the purchaser to take the same, chargeable with the debt due to the company; and the purchaser shall thenceforth become answerable to the company for the payment of the subscriptions and other charges as the same shall become payable; and the trustees shall, at the request and cost of such shareholder, release him or her from all future liability, in respect to such share or shares, if they see no objection.

"If any shareholder shall be desirous of having his or her property discharged from such debt, it shall be lawful for the holder of such share or shares, or so much thereof as shall be then unpaid, to transfer the same to some other premises of adequate value, either belonging to himself or herself, or to any other party willing to take the transfer of the shares so advanced, and give security for the same, to be approved of by the Board, on the report of the Survey Committee or the surveyor of the company. And upon having such share or shares, or so much as shall be then due in respect thereof, secured on other premises, the trustees for the time being shall, at the cost of the shareholder, release and convey the premises for which other premises shall be substituted, and make such indorsement as hereafter mentioned; and, in the first-mentioned event, shall also (but at the cost of such member) release him or her, if they see no objection, from all future liabilities in respect of the monies hereafter payable upon the shares purchased from the said company, and secured upon the premises sold as before mentioned. And under this rule the trustees shall be empowered (by direction of the Board), at any period of the company, to release any portion of the property so mortgaged, on being satisfied, in manner before mentioned, that the remaining portion of the property is sufficient security to this company.

"If any shareholder in this company, who shall have received his or her share or shares, or any of them, shall be desirous of paying and satisfying the security or securities which shall have been given for the same, he shall be at liberty to do so, by paying to the directors the subscriptions that would have become due on the shares advanced on such property, up to the end of the thirteenth year of this company, and shall be allowed on such payments discount at 4 per cent. per annum. And on payment thereof, together with all fines due in respect of such shares, the Board shall direct the trustees to deliver all deeds and other documents in their custody, relating to the security, to the shareholder; and, at his or her cost, to indorse a receipt or acknowledgment on such mortgage, according to the 6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 32. s. 6."

32. "When it shall appear by the books of the company that there is sufficient to pay each unadvanced share 120l., then all arrears of subscriptions, fines, and other payments, shall become due and shall be payable immediately, and the trustees shall enforce the payment as before expressed in these rules."

33. "When the sum of 120l. for each unadvanced share, with all other expenses and liabilities of the company, shall be fully realized, the accounts shall be finally audited, printed, and sent to each shareholder, and the company terminate; and the trustees, with the advice of the solicitors of this company, shall deliver up to each shareholder, or his or her legal representatives, the title-deeds and other documents which shall have been deposited with them by such shareholder, as a security to this company, and shall and will, at his or her request or expense, indorse on his or her mortgage a receipt for all the monies intended to be secured thereby, pursuant to the 6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 32. s. 9. And that then three-fourths in number of the shareholders present at any meeting specially convened, by giving seven days' notice to each member, shall have full power to declare this company at an end, and all the accounts thereof be finally closed, and such resolution shall be effectual at law, and in equity, as a release from all the shareholders."

Three tables were attached to the rules. They were headed—Table 1. as "Shewing the amount shareholders are entitled to receive on each share they may hold, for building or purchasing property." Table 2. as "Shewing the amount shareholders are entitled to receive on each share if they withdraw from the company." In this table it was calculated that the shareholder, at the end of the thirteenth year, having paid in 78l., might draw out 120l. Table 3. as "Shewing the discount to be allowed on payments made in advance." The Appendix contained the following form of receipt, to be altered as occasion might require. This was to be indorsed upon mortgages:—"We, the undersigned, being the trustees for the time being of the within-mentioned company, do hereby acknowledge to have received of and from the within-named _____, his heirs, executors, administrators or assigns, all monies intended to be secured by the within-written deed. As witness," &c.

ODDIE v. BROWN.

Will—Construction—Remoteness—Uncertainty—Thellusson Act.

A testator, by his will, directed his trustees to accumulate the income of his residuary personal estate, "until the principal and accumulations should amount to the sum of 3,000l., or thereabouts," and then to pay the income of the fund to A, B, C, D, E, F. and G. during their lives and the life of the survivor; and after the death of the survivor to pay the principal sum unto and equally among the issue of the said A, B, C, D, E, F. and G. who should be then living. At the end of twenty-one years from the death of the testator (the period allowed by the Thellusson Act) the residue and the amount of accumulations of the income thereof, fell far short of the sum of 3,000l.:—Held, per Stuart, V.C., that the whole fund thus produced belonged to those who were next-of-kin of the testator at the time of his death: but, upon appeal, it was held, that the gift was not void for remoteness; but that the income of the fund, between the termination of twenty-one years from the testator's death and the time when the fund became divisible, belonged to the next-of-kin; Lord Justice Knight Bruce, however, dissenting from each construction of the will.

John Oddie, by his will, dated in September 1821, after directing that all his just debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, should be paid out of personal estate in the manner therein mentioned; and after bequeathing specific and pecuniary legacies, gave all the rest, residue and remainder of his personal estate and effects whatsoever which he should die possessed of, or be in any manner entitled to, unto trustees, their heirs, executors and administrators, upon trust to convert the same, or such part thereof as should not be in ready money or placed out at interest, into ready money (except as in the will mentioned), and to pay and discharge all his just debts, &c.; and after payment thereof to place out the same at interest on good securities, and lay out the interest thereof at 4l. per cent. per annum, for the use of Christopher Oddie Tomlinson for his life; and after his death to pay the sum of 40l. unto and equally amongst all his children which should be then living, and the lawful issue of such of them as should happen to be then dead, such issue to take no more than his, her or their parent's share thereof respectively; and also upon trust to pay and apply so much of the residue of his personal estate, and so much of the yearly interest thereof, as they, his said trustees, should think proper and necessary for the maintenance and bringing up of Nancy Howson, daughter of Richard Howson, deceased, and granddaughter of Anne or Nancy Tomlinson; and as to all the rest, residue and remainder of his personal estate and effects, not before disposed of, upon trust that they, his said trustees, or the survivor of them, his executors, administrators or assigns, should put and place out the same at interest, upon Government, real, or some other good and sufficient security or securities, or in some banker's or bankers' hands, and suffer the interest arising from the same to accumulate until the principal, together with the accumulation of interest thereon, should amount to the principal sum of 3,000l., or thereabouts; and when and so soon as the said principal sum and interest should amount to the said sum of 3,000l., or thereabouts, then upon trust to put and place out the same at interest, upon such security or securities as aforesaid, and pay and apply the yearly interest, dividends and profits thereof from time to time, as the same should become due, unto and equally between or amongst Christopher Oddie Tomlinson, John Howson, Robert Howson, and Nancy Howson, children of the said Richard Howson, deceased, and grandchildren of the said Anne or Nancy

Tomlinson, and Jane Wilson, William Oddie, and Joseph Oddie the younger, children of his nephew, John Tatham Oddie, in equal shares and proportions, during their several and respective natural lives, and the life of the survivor of them; and in case any of them should happen to die leaving lawful issue, the said testator willed and directed that such issue should be entitled to the same share of and in the said interest, dividends and profits of his said personal estate and effects which his, her or their parents would, if living, have been entitled unto; and from and immediately after the decease of the survivor of them, the said Christopher Oddie Tomlinson, John Howson, Robert Howson, Nancy Howson, Jane Wilson, William Oddie, and Joseph Oddie the younger, then upon trust to pay and apply the said principal sum of 3,000*l.*, or thereabouts, so placed out as aforesaid, and convey and assure his close of land called Fitzdale, &c. therein-after devised to his said trustees, unto and equally amongst the lawful issue of the said Christopher Oddie Tomlinson, John Howson, Robert Howson, Nancy Howson, Jane Wilson, William Oddie, and Joseph Oddie the younger, which should be then living, their executors, administrators and assigns for ever, share and share alike, as tenants in common; but in case any of them should be then dead leaving lawful issue living, it was his will and mind, and he thereby ordered and directed that such issue should be entitled unto and take the part or share, parts or shares, of and in the said trust-money which the parent or parents of such issue would, if living, have been entitled unto, and not more or otherwise, anything in his said will contained to the contrary notwithstanding.

The testator died in the year 1822.

In March 1851 the present suit was instituted for the administration of the testator's estate.

In December 1857 the chief clerk, by his certificate, made pursuant to certain orders made and inquiries directed in the suit, certified (inter alia) that, after taking the accounts, the residuary personal estate and the accumulations thereon were found not to have amounted to nearly 3,000*l.* within twenty-one years from the testator's death.

Upon the cause coming on to be heard for further directions, it was contended, on behalf of the residuary legatees and their issue, that, as the accumulations exceeded the limits prescribed by the act, 39 & 40 Geo. 3. c. 98, such accumulations were void only for the excess, and that the residuary legatees named in the will were entitled to receive the income arising from the residue of the personal estate, and from the accumulations of the income thereof from the end of twenty-one years from the testator's death, up to the death of the survivor of such residuary legatees; and that after the death of such survivor the aggregate fund arising from the residue, and the accumulations of income thereof for twenty-one years, would be divisible amongst the issue.

On behalf of the next-of-kin at the testator's death or their representatives, it was contended, first, that the whole gift was void for uncertainty of subject-matter by reason of the use of the words "or thereabouts;" and, secondly, that, if that were not so held, the gift was void for remoteness, independently of the Thellusson Act, inasmuch as the sum of 3,000*l.*, or thereabouts, was not raised by means of the accumulation, within the period allowed by the rule against perpetuities. Mr. Elmsley, Mr. Bacon, Mr. Malins, Mr. C. Barber, Mr. Birkbeck, Mr. Sidney Smith, Mr. Prendergast and Mr. Freeling appeared for the different parties.

STUART, V.C. said, the testator had directed that when and so soon as the accumulation of his residuary property should amount to 3,000*l.*, or thereabouts, then the income arising from the sum so accumulated should be paid to certain tenants for life, and after the death of the survivor of such tenants for life that the said sum should be distributed. That was a gift of a sum of 3,000*l.*, or thereabouts, as to which there were to be no tenants for life, and no distribution until that amount should have come into existence. It was a well-known rule of law, that a gift to be valid must vest within a life or lives in being and twenty-one years. If by any means it could possibly happen that the gift might not vest within that period, the gift would fail of operation entirely. Now, it was clear that, in the present case, 3,000*l.*, or thereabouts, the subject-matter of the gift, might not come into existence before the expiration of that period. In fact, it had not then come into existence. It followed, therefore, that the gift must fail. If the subject-matter of the gift might not come into existence until the termination of a period too remote, it could not be said that, because the objects of the gift were found and were in existence, therefore the gift was good. The Thellusson Act had nothing to do with the question: it was simply a case of remoteness. There must, therefore, be a declaration that the property belonged to those who were next-of-kin of the testator at his death.

From this decision those who would have been entitled if the gift were not void for remoteness appealed; and the appeal was, in the first instance, argued before the Lords Justices, who desired that the question might be re-argued before the full Court.

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Birkbeck appeared for the appellants.

Mr. S. Smith, for other parties in the same interest.

Mr. Elmsley, Mr. Chapman Barber and Mr. Freeling, for the next-of-kin.

Mr. Malins and Mr. Prendergast, for the executors.

Mr. Bacon was heard in reply.

May 12.—The LORD CHANCELLOR, after stating the case, said—The Vice Chancellor was of opinion that this bequest was void for remoteness, and, consequently, that the next-of-kin were entitled; and the present appeal was brought by the parties who claim in case the gift was valid. The object of construction, in cases like the present, was to ascertain the intention of the testator. In the present case it was not easy to determine what the real intention of the testator was; and, therefore, the only safe guide in construing his will was to take the language employed by him in its primary and obvious sense. Did he then, by the words which he used, indicate his intention to give the residue to the persons named, with a subsidiary direction to accumulate, or was the gift of the residue dependent on the previous accumulations? The latter appeared to be the correct conclusion. It was to be observed that the testator gave the residue, not to the persons proposed to be benefited, but to trustees; and not to the trustees in trust for the persons named in the first instance, but upon trust to invest until the principal and accumulations amounted to 3,000*l.*, or thereabouts. So far, there was no gift to any one, except the trustees; but the will proceeded—when and so soon as the principal sum and interest should amount to 3,000*l.* or thereabouts, then upon trust to pay the same as in the will mentioned. It was said that the words “when and so soon” were flexible words, and always bent to the intention of the testator. Perhaps it would be more correct to say that their construction depended upon whether they ought to be regarded as annexed to the substance of the gift, or to the period of payment. In the present case, these words were not merely contained in the direction to pay and apply, but they introduced the gift itself, and, therefore, must be taken as of the substance of the gift, unless any indication of the contrary could be gathered from the context. The distinction between this case and Saunders v. Vautier appeared to be that, in that case, there was an immediate gift of the fund, which was separated from the estate and vested in trustees to accumulate, until the testator’s great-nephew attained twenty-five. Here, there was no fund to which the gift could apply, until created by the accumulation directed. When the accumulated sum should amount to 3,000*l.* or thereabouts, then, and not till then, the interest was to be applied. What, then, was the effect of the direction to accumulate? It was said that the gift was void for uncertainty, on account of the words “or thereabouts” being used each time that the sum of 3,000*l.* was mentioned. His Lordship was not satisfied, however, that these superadded words introduced such uncertainty as to make the gift void. He thought they were inserted merely to meet the difficulty which there would be in accumulating exactly a particular sum, so that the words were introduced to render any surplus liable to the same trusts. Curtis v. Lukin was cited on this point, but in that case the word “nearly,” there used, did not create the uncertainty. Assuming, however, that the gift in the present case was not uncertain, was it void for remoteness? The testator died in 1822, and thirty-seven years after his death the fund amounted to 1,600*l.* only. If the question were independent of the Thellus-son Act, the trust for accumulation would have been throughout within the prescribed limits, as the testator had not postponed the enjoyment of the principal sum beyond the period within which it was required by law that it should vest. For it appeared to his Lordship that the testator had manifested an intention that, upon the death of the survivor of the persons who were to have the interest of the accumulated fund, those who would be entitled to the fund itself were to have it amongst them, whatever might be its amount, and, therefore, the accumulation could not have been carried on beyond a life or lives in being. But the Thellusson Act did not allow the accumulation of property beyond the life of the grantor or settlor, or twenty-one years after his death, and provided, that where any accumulation should be directed otherwise, the income of the property directed to be accumulated should, so long as the same should be directed to be accumulated contrary to the act, go to the persons who would have been entitled thereto if the accumulation had not been directed. It was argued, by Mr. Emsley, that the act could not apply to the form of the gift contained in this will, upon the ground that the accumulation was not to be measured by the number of years. Perhaps the best answer was the case of Elborne v. Goode, in which the accumulation was to take place until the decease of the survivor of certain annuitants, and also Bourne v. Buckton. In each case the statute applied and stopped the accumulation at twenty-one years. The accumulated fund, however, here could not be divided until the death of the survivor of the seven tenants for life; and these persons could not then have the benefit intended, because the fund had not reached the amount which was a preliminary condition to their becoming entitled. The interest of the fund between the period of twenty-one years from the death of the testator and the time when the fund becomes divisible, would clearly belong then to the next-of-kin. There would, therefore, be a declaration that the trust for accumulation was good to the extent of twenty-one years from the death of the testator; and that from that period the income belonged to the next-of-kin until the death of the survivor of the lega-tees, and then that the amount of the accumulation for twenty-one years after the death of the testator, would be divisible among the issue of the seven first-named persons then living.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE said he respectfully dissented from the view of the Vice Chancellor, and also of the Lord Chancellor and Lord Justice Turner. As to the phrase "3,000*l.*, or thereabouts," the expression was in each of the two instances in which it was used, too loose, vague and uncertain to be acted upon. His Lordship took the testator's meaning to have been a sum of 3,000*l.*, or some amount near that sum, more or less, and that the will ought not to be construed more favourably for accumulation than if a blank had been left in it for the extent and amount of accumulation of which it speaks. The question was, did the testator mean the amount to be essential? did he mean the gifts to be dependent on the accumulation to that extent? In his Lordship's judgment he did not. While the direction to accumulate failed, the trusts of the property, which the testator had directed to be accumulated, took effect, notwithstanding that failure, and the tenancies for life took effect as if, without a word on the subject of accumulation, the clear residue had been given to trustees to pay and apply the yearly interest, &c., to the persons named; consequently, if he were right, there never had been, there was not, and possibly there would not be, any intestacy either as to capital or income. In saying this it was assumed that the testator was survived by the seven tenants for life. He considered by the expression "put and place out," &c., the testator meant his residuary personal estate; and that the phrase "3,000*l.*, or thereabouts," where it occurred the third time, meant neither more nor less than "my residuary personal estate." If this view were correct, there were two questions which might arise: one, what, until the death of the surviving tenant for life was to become of the share of the income of any of the tenants for life who had already died, or should die without leaving issue, or a child?—and the other, what if, at the death of the surviving tenant for life, there should be a failure of issue, or of children and grandchildren of each of the seven tenants for life, was then to become of the capital of the residuary personal estate?

LORD JUSTICE TURNER said that the case presented three points: first, whether the will at all disposed of the residue of the testator's estate and the accumulations, in the event which had happened, of their not amounting to 3,000*l.* within the period of accumulation allowed by law; secondly, whether, assuming the residue to be disposed of by the will, although it did not, with the accumulations, amount to 3,000*l.*, the direction to accumulate was void, upon the ground of the uncertainty arising from the words "or thereabouts"; thirdly, assuming the dispositions made by the will not to be invalid on either of these two grounds, were they invalid on the ground of remoteness? As to the first point, where, as in this case, funds were given to trustees to be held by them upon trust, directions must, of course, be given to them as to the time and manner in which they were to deal with the funds. Words imposing conditions or contingency might be used for a wholly different purpose, merely to convey directions to the trustees. The Court, therefore, looked to the intention of the gift, rather than to the words. Love v. L'Estrange (1) and Saunders v. Vautier might be referred to, as bearing out this view. It could not be doubted in this case that the testator meant the residue to go to the persons he had named. The words, therefore, relied on by the next of kin as importing contingency, might be regarded merely as a direction to the trustees, not as operating to prevent the vesting. Their argument on the first point, therefore, failed. On the second point, his Lordship considered that the words "or thereabouts" were not sufficient to make the gift void for uncertainty. If it were necessary to put a precise meaning on the words, the nature of the trust enabled one to do so. Thirdly, the gift was not void for remoteness. The Vice Chancellor considered that it was void because the sum named might not be accumulated until after the period allowed by law: but in arriving at this conclusion, he proceeded on the footing that nothing vested until 3,000*l.* was accumulated. As his Lordship construed this will, the residue and accumulations, whatever the amount might be, would vest at the death of the survivor of the tenants for life: and there was no suspension, therefore, of the vesting beyond the period allowed by law. The true question was, whether a direction to accumulate until a certain sum was produced was void at law, independently of the act? No case went that length; and his Lordship saw no principle on which to make such a decision. The mischief which the rule as to remoteness was intended to prevent was, that property should not be rendered inalienable by the suspension of vesting: where the property vested, this injury did not arise. Tregonwell v. Sydenham had an important bearing on this point. It was upon the invalid disposition of the fund to be accumulated, and not upon the invalidity of the trusts for accumulation that that decision proceeded. Bateman v. Hotchkiss was also in favour of the validity of the gift here. Curtis v. Lukin had no application to this case; for, as to remoteness, the declaration proceeded on the ground that none of the trustees could be said to take vested interests in any ascertained shares of the fund to be accumulated. The conclusion, therefore, at which he arrived was, that independently of the Theellusson Act, the dispositions of this will were valid; and then the consequence was this: the act stopped the accumulation at the end of twenty-one years from the testator's death; and the income of the then accumulated fund went to the next-of-kin, until the fund would, if the accumulation had proceeded, have amounted to 3,000*l.* or thereabouts; or until the death of the remaining tenant for life, if it should turn out that it should not have amounted to that sum before the happening of that event. The right course, therefore, would be to pay the income which had accumulated since the expiration of twenty-one years to the next-of-kin; and order the future income to be paid to them until the death of the surviving tenant for life, or until further order. What ought to be considered as being "3,000*l.*, or thereabouts," it was not necessary to say at present. The costs of the cause would be apportioned as in Eyre v. Marsden (2).

Mortgage — Receiver — Attornment — Pleading — Disclaimer.

A receiver of an estate was appointed by a mortgagor and mortgagee. They both joined in the appointment, and gave him power of distress and entry, and the mortgagor attorned as tenant to the receiver at a rent of 3,500*l.* The deed recited all the facts relating to the mortgage, and provided that nothing in the deed should abridge the rights of the mortgagee. The mortgagor afterwards became bankrupt, and the receiver distrained for 3,500*l.* Upon this being claimed by the mortgagee, by a party under a bill of sale and by the assignees of the mortgagor, it was held, (reversing the decision of the Court below,) that the validity of the distress depended upon the existence of a tenancy to the receiver; that such a tenancy was created, pursuant to the intention of all parties, by the attornment of the mortgagor to him, with the consent of the mortgagee, and that the express power of distress was not a power in gross, but annexed to the tenancy; and that the distress was valid, entitling the mortgagee to the produce of it.

Three parties claimed a fund, and a suit was instituted by one of them against the other two: one of the co-defendants disclaimed, but contended, that the Court upon deciding against the plaintiff could not go on to declare the rights of his co-defendant. — Held, (affirming the decision of the Master of the Rolls,) that the disclaiming defendant ought to have brought his case before the Court, and that as he had disclaimed, the Court would decide the question between the two other claimants as if they were the only litigating parties.

This was an appeal, by the plaintiff, from the decision of the Master of the Rolls, reported ante, p. 274. Under a deed dated the 12th of October 1855, the plaintiff claimed the benefit of a distress for 3,500*l.*, which was made on the 28th of April 1857, on the goods of Col. Waugh, he having become bankrupt on the 15th of April 1857. The money produced by the sale under this distress was by consent paid into a bank to abide the decision of the Court. The bankrupt Waugh was the owner of Branksea Island and Castle, at Poole, in the county of Dorset. The plaintiff was the mortgagee of this property: it had previously been mortgaged to other persons, but the plaintiff paid off the prior mortgages; and on the 12th of October 1855, all the mortgages, amounting to 30,000*l.*, were vested in him. On the same day the deed was executed which gave rise to the question in the present case. It was made between Waugh of the first part; Jolly, the plaintiff, of the second part; Aplin, of the third part; and Faulkner and Bonner (trustees), of the fourth part. After reciting the mortgage for 30,000*l.* to the plaintiff, and the covenant for payment of the mortgage-money, on the 12th of April then next, and in default for payment of 5*l.* per cent. interest by half-yearly payments; and that it had been agreed, that for securing the regular and punctual payment of the interest of the said sum of 30,000*l.*, and also for providing a fund for the better securing the gradual repayment of the principal sum, Aplin should be appointed receiver of the rents and profits of the hereditaments and premises comprised in the mortgage securities; and reciting that the said hereditaments were then in the possession and occupation of Waugh, and that it was agreed that he should attorn as tenant in respect of the same to Aplin, at the yearly rent of 3,500*l.*, part of which (1,500*l.*) was intended to be by way of securing the punctual payment of the interest on the said mortgage debt, and 2,000*l.*, the remaining part thereof, was intended to be applied in forming a fund for the ultimate discharge of the principal sum of 30,000*l.*; Waugh and Jolly appointed Aplin to be their receiver, agent and attorney, to ask, demand and receive of and from all the present and future tenants and occupiers of the said hereditaments, all the yearly and other rents, &c.

then due, and thereafter to become due, for or in respect of the same premises, and in default of payment thereof to use and exercise all such remedies by entry, distress, or otherwise, and generally to do all such other acts as should be requisite or expedient for the receiving and recovery of the rents, &c. The deed then further witnessed, that in pursuance of the agreement, Waugh attorned in respect of such parts of the hereditaments as were then held and occupied by him, at the yearly rent of 3,500*l.*, clear of all deductions, by half-yearly payments. And it was thereby agreed and declared, that 1,500*l.* should be considered as the rent payable in respect of such parts of the hereditaments as were specified in the 2nd schedule thereto, and that the sum of 2,000*l.* should be considered as the rent payable in respect of the other parts of the hereditaments. Then there was a proviso, for entry in default of payment of the principal sum of 30,000*l.* and interest thereon, by which Jolly, the mortgagee, was to enter, and upon his entry the tenancy created by the aforesaid attornment should absolutely cease. There was afterwards a proviso that if the annual rent should be punctually paid, then it should be reduced to 2,000*l.*, but without prejudice to the right of Jolly to require payment of the full rent of 3,500*l.* at any subsequent time when default should be made; and a proviso that it should not be lawful for Aplin, or any future receiver to be appointed, to act in the execution of his office of receiver, unless default should be made in payment of the annual rent or sum of 3,500*l.*, or some part thereof, but no such tenant or occupier should be bound to take notice of this proviso. It was then provided, that nothing therein contained should lessen the rights of Jolly under the indentures of mortgage, or prevent him from realizing the mortgage security either by foreclosure, sale or otherwise. On the 2nd of November 1855, Waugh executed a covering security on the estate, which was subject to the plaintiff's mortgage, to the London and Eastern Banking Corporation, under which 244,000*l.* ultimately became due. On the 14th of March 1857, Waugh gave a bill of sale to the same bank, of furniture and effects on the Branksea estate. On the 15th of April 1857,

Waugh was declared bankrupt, and on the 28th of April, Aplin levied by distress £500^l. for a year's rent, up to the 12th of April. This sum was paid, as before mentioned, to a joint account, to abide the decision of this suit. The Master of the Rolls held, that the attornment to the receiver did not create the relation of landlord and tenant, the receiver having no reversion in him; and that, the truth appearing in the recitals of the deed, the mortgagor's assignees were not estopped from denying the tenancy. His Honour also considered that the power of distress was a mere licence to enter and seize the mortgagor's goods, and was, after his bankruptcy, inoperative against his assignees.

Mr. R. Palmer, Mr. Bevir and Mr. Quain, for the plaintiff, the appellant, contended that the distress was valid, as the relation of landlord and tenant had, under the circumstances, been created. The case was similar to that of a demise by a receiver appointed by the Court of Chancery, where the receiver had no reversion, but still had power to distrain—

A mortgagor in possession could distrain as the bailiff of the mortgagee—Trent v. Hunt (1). This might be considered strictly as a case of licence, and the mortgagor or those representing him could not object that there was no estate—

Jolly, having the legal estate, allowed of a demise to Waugh by Aplin, and therefore Waugh was the tenant of Jolly, Aplin being his agent or bailiff. This was similar

Mr. Selwyn, Mr. Giffard and Mr. J. Brown, for the assignees of Col. Waugh, contended that no tenancy had been created by the deed of October 1855. The rights of landlord and tenant existed only in that relation, or possibly in some cases of the Crown's rights, and also where there was a rent-charge—

Here Col. Waugh had no estate on which the deed could operate; he had parted with the entire legal estate to Jolly, and that prevented his being able to grant a rent-charge—Shep. Touchst. 243. This deed was not in the form of a demise, and it was not the case of an attornment proper—Cornish v. Searell (3). The deed could only be said to operate by way of contract on the one side and of licence on the other. Where a receiver was appointed by the Court of Chancery, the relation of landlord and tenant was not created. The receiver was no more than the agent of the party who applied for his appointment—Thomas v. Brigstocke (4). The case of Dancer v. Hastings was not reconcileable with the other cases.

Mr. Follett and Mr. Tyndale, for the parties representing the London and Eastern Banking Company.

Mr. Dickinson, for Aplin.

Mr. Palmer, in reply, contended that it was the intention of the parties to the deed that a tenancy should be created; the recitals and the use of the words "tenant," "rent," &c., were sufficient to shew that this was so. If this had been a mere contract, it would have been simply so provided. He referred to Bac. Abr. tit. 'Lease,' K, 816.

May 26.—The LORD CHANCELLOR, after fully stating the provisions of the deed of the 12th of October 1855, said—The first point to be ascertained is, what were the intention and object of the parties to be collected from the language of the deed? It is quite evident that their object was to secure the punctual payment of the interest on the mortgage, and to provide for the gradual reduction of the principal sum. This they intended to accomplish by means of a tenancy which was to be created between Col. Waugh and Aplin. That this was their intention appears clearly from the recital that it had been agreed that Col. Waugh should attorn as tenant to Aplin, by the clause of attornment itself, by which Waugh attorned, and became tenant from year to year to Aplin, and by the proviso for re-entry, by which it was provided that upon the plaintiff entering upon the premises whereof Waugh attorned tenant, the tenancy created by this attornment should absolutely cease and determine. There being, therefore, no doubt as to what the parties meant to do, it is next to be considered whether there is any legal objection to the means they adopted for carrying their intention into effect. For this purpose it will be necessary to bear in mind the nature of the relation which exists between a mortgagor and a mortgagee at law. A mortgagor who remains in possession after the execution of the mortgage, and continues to enjoy the profits of the land, is not considered as a tenant from year to year to the mortgagee, nor even as a tenant at will. He receives the profits for his own use, and not as agent or bailiff of the mortgagee; and when he has once received them he is absolutely entitled to keep them as his own. This is stated by Mr. Baron Alderson in the case of Trent v. Hunt. But he may at any time be treated as a trespasser by the mortgagee, who may maintain ejectment against him without any previous notice or demand of possession. Such being the precarious dependence of the mortgagor upon the will of the mortgagee, it is competent to them to enter into an agreement by which the mortgagor's possession may be rendered more secure by the creation of a tenancy. This is sometimes effected by a stipulation in the mortgage-deed itself. Thus, in West v. Fritch, a mortgage-deed, which was executed by the mortgagor only, contained a clause by which, for the more effectual recovery of the interest, the mortgagor attorned and became tenant to the mortgagee, at a yearly rent of 40*l.*, payable half-yearly, so long as the principal sum remained secured. The mortgagor, having remained in possession, and made several of these half-yearly payments, the Court of Exchequer held, that the subsequent occupation connected with the covenant constituted the relation of landlord and tenant, so that the mortgagee could distrain. So in Doe d. Garrod v. Olley it was agreed that the mortgagor, during his occupation of the mortgaged premises, should pay the mortgagee the yearly rent or sum of 50*l.* half-yearly, and that it should be lawful for the mortgagee to use such remedies of distress and sale for the recovery of rent as landlords have on common demises, provided the reservation of such rent should not prejudice the mortgagee's right to enter and evict the mortgagor at any time after default made in payment of the money secured, or any part thereof. The Court of Queen's Bench seems to have been of opinion that there was a tenancy created with which the power of distress was connected; but they decided the case upon the proviso for entry and eviction by the mortgagee, which they held not to be waived by the proceedings for the recovery of the rent by distress. This case was recognized and acted upon in Doe d. Snell v. Tom, where a mortgagor attorned as tenant to a mortgagee, and there was also a power of entry in default of payment; and the same law was also laid down by the Court of Exchequer in the case of Pinhorn v. Souster (5). Of course it can make no difference whether agreements of this description between mortgagor and mortgagee are contained in the mortgage-deed itself, or in a separate deed; and, therefore, if Col. Waugh had, in the deed of the 12th of October 1855, attorned as tenant to the plaintiff instead of Aplin, there could have been no doubt that the relation of landlord and tenant would have been established between them. But it is contended that the attornment to Aplin had no operation,—not by agreement, because he had no interest in the land to which it could apply, nor by estoppel, because the deed sets forth the rights and interests of all parties, and shews, therefore, that he had no reversion in the premises to which the power of distress would be incident. It appears to me, however, that the truth of the case appearing by the deed is a reason why the agreement between the parties should be carried into effect, either by giving effect to the intention of the parties in the manner they have prescribed, or by way of estoppel to prevent their denying the acts they have authorized to be done. If the attornment to the mortgagee would be good to create a tenancy in the mortgagor, which seems to be provided for by the 11 Geo. 2. c. 19, why should not an attornment to a third person, with the consent of the mortgagee, operate to create a tenancy or to estop all parties from denying that such tenancy exists? The statement in the deed of the character in which Aplin was to be clothed in order to carry into effect the object of the parties, and the proof it affords of his having no previous title in the land, appears to me to furnish no sufficient objection to the validity of the distress in question. In Cornish v. Searell an instrument, by which a party became a tenant to the plaintiffs described as two of the sequestrators in the writ of sequestration issued in the suit in Chancery, to hold the same for such time and on such conditions as may be subsequently agreed upon, was held to amount to an agreement for a tenancy; and in Dancer v. Hastings a demise by a receiver appointed by the Court of Chancery was determined to be a good lease to entitle the lessor to distrain and to estop the lessee from pleading non tenuit. The Master of the Rolls, however, distinguished the case of Dancer v. Hastings from the present by observing, that in that case the person distrained upon had accepted a lease from the receiver of the Court of Chancery simpliciter, and the Court of Common Pleas held that he could not afterwards say that the receiver had not demised the land to him; but his Honour added, "Here Col. Waugh has attorned to the receiver, but he has done so under the deed, which sets forth and explains the rights and interests of all parties, and by so doing it shews that the relation of landlord and tenant did not actually subsist between Col. Waugh and Mr. Aplin." And, again, advertng to the difference between the deed in Dancer v. Hastings and the deed creating a right to distrain in the present case, his Honour says, "The deed in that case must be inferred from the case itself to have been a simple demise from one person as owner to another person as tenant. The deed is not set out, but I infer that must have been so from the terms of the case. But here the recitals and covenants contained in the deed shew that the real owner at law was the plaintiff, and in equity Col. Waugh's right was subject to the mortgage vested in the plaintiff." His Honour's attention seems to have been directed solely to a report of the case of Dancer v. Hastings in 4 Bingham. Had the contemporaneous report of it in 12 Moore been brought to his notice he would have found that the lease was not merely, as he might naturally have been led to infer from the statement in Bingham, a simple demise from one person as owner to another as tenant, but it set out the title of the lessor as the receiver appointed by the Court of Chancery, and made the rent payable to the lessor or any future receiver or receivers, shewing thereby most clearly that the lessor had no interest in the land. What effect this corrected view of the character of the lease in Dancer v. Hastings might have had upon his Honour's judgment, it is impossible for me to imagine, but if that case is good law (and I am not aware that it has ever been questioned) it does seem to be a strong authority in favour of the establishment of the tenancy in this case, notwithstanding that the deed sets forth and explains the rights and interests of all parties. Of course, if a tenancy were created, the right to distrain would follow as an incident to it. But it is said there can be no power to distrain, because Aplin had no reversion to which it could belong, and cases were cited, such as Preece v. Corrie (6) and — v. Cooper (7), to shew that where the lessor parts with his whole interest, upon non-payment of rent he cannot distrain because there is no reversion. There may possibly, however, be a difference between these cases and the present, where a person attorns or acknowledges himself to be tenant to another, as in this latter case it may be considered that the law, which estops him from denying the tenancy, may also prevent him disputing that a reversion exists in his land. But it is unnecessary to press this distinction, if it exists in the present case. In the cases cited upon this point there was no express right to distrain reserved or created. This appears to have been so in Preece v. Corrie. In — v. Cooper it was stated that in the clause of assignment there was no power of distress, and in Pascoe v. Pascoe (8), although the whole of the original lessee's title and interest in the premises were transferred, yet no doubt was suggested that the power of distress might have been given; the only question being whether the reference to the arbitrator gave him authority to confer that power. In the deed in question in this case the remedy by distress is expressly conferred upon Aplin; and therefore even if the creation of the tenancy did not admit of the scintilla of a reversion, yet there seems to be nothing to prevent the power of distress being exercised where it is given in express terms, although there may be no reversion in the person to whom another attorns as tenant. It may be right to take some notice of other arguments which were brought forward. It was suggested that if the deed were not sufficient to create a tenancy, it might amount to a grant of a rent-charge. This, however, cannot be, because Col. Waugh had no estate in him out of which such a right could arise. It is only necessary, in support of this view, to refer to what was said by Mr. Justice Patteson in Doe d. Garrod v. Olley and the case of Freeman v. Edwards. It was also contended that if no tenancy were created between Col. Waugh and Mr. Aplin, yet at least one was established between Waugh and the plaintiff, and it was compared to the case of a demise by a cestui que trust, of which the trustee was at liberty to claim the benefit and treat the cestui que trust as his agent, as in the case of Vallance v. Savage, and I observe the Master of the Rolls says, "The deed shews that the relation of landlord and tenant existed, if at all, between the plaintiff and Col. Waugh; but if no tenancy exists between Waugh and Aplin, I cannot see how any can be established between him and the plaintiff." In Vallance v. Savage the trustee was no party to the lease. Here it was the intention of all parties that a tenancy should be created between Waugh and Aplin. If this failed of effect for any reason, how can a different tenancy be presumed which is not only not in accordance with, but directly contrary to, such intention? I am, therefore, of opinion that the validity of the distress depends entirely upon the existence of the tenancy to Aplin, that this is created in pursuance of the intention of all the parties by the attornment of Col. Waugh as tenant to him, with the consent of the plaintiff, and that the express power of distress is not what might be termed a power in gross, but one annexed to the tenancy, and that the distress made is valid, and entitles the plaintiff to the produce of it. It was stated on the part of the defendant that, the interest on the mortgage having been paid down to the 12th of October 1856, the distress for a year's rent was far too much, as there could only be half a year's due; but the effect of the payment of interest was merely to reduce the rent from 3,500*l.* to 2,000*l.*, so long as the interest was duly and punctually paid, and is not to be taken as actually payment of rent. There may, therefore, have been a year's rent due from the preceding 12th of April down to the time of the distress, although the half-year ending on the 12th of October 1856 is only at the rate of 2,000*l.*, on account of the punctual payment of interest for that period, and for the subsequent half-year at the full rent of 3,500*l.* This would make the year's rent due under the deed 2,750*l.*, instead of 3,500*l.*, the amount distrained for. This sum I think the plaintiff is entitled to out of the proceeds of the distress. The decree, therefore, of the Master of the Rolls must be varied so far as it declares that the official assignee and the creditors' assignee of Col. Waugh are entitled to the sum of 3,500*l.* and interest which has accrued upon it, and directs the payment of that sum and interest to them, and also as to the order to pay to the official assignee and the creditors' assignee so much of their costs as have been occasioned by the plaintiff's claim to that sum of 3,500*l.* and interest; and it must be declared that the plaintiff is entitled to the sum of 2,750*l.* out of the 3,500*l.* standing in the joint names of the defendants Coleman, Bell and Aplin, in the London and Westminster Bank, and all interest which has accrued or which shall accrue due upon the same.

There was a second appeal by the persons representing the London and Eastern Banking Company against the decision of the Master of the Rolls, on the ground that he had erroneously decided that the assignees were entitled to the sum in dispute, and that his Honour ought simply to have dismissed the bill.

Mr. Follett (with whom was Mr. Tyndale) contended that the disclaimer put in by these defendants had only reference to the plaintiff's claim, and not to that of the co-defendants. If, therefore, the Court should decide against the plaintiff in such a case, the bill should be simply dismissed, leaving it for the co-defendants to raise between themselves the questions affecting their several interests—

NEW SERIES, XXVIII.—CHANC.

The decree now to be pronounced should not go beyond a declaration, as to the right of the plaintiff to that portion of the fund representing his interest—Mitford, 318.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (without hearing counsel for the assignees).—It appears to me, in this case, that the application is not well founded. There is no doubt that the rights of co-defendants cannot be decided upon a bill filed, except in cases where either it is necessary to decide those rights in order to determine the right of the plaintiff himself, or where those rights are established by such clear and satisfactory evidence, that the Court is convinced that no further evidence can be produced by the defendants in any subsequent proceedings, so that the case is entirely ripe for decision between the co-defendants as well as for deciding the right of the plaintiff in the suit. Now, in this case, it was virtually a suit which was instituted for the purpose of deciding the right of the plaintiff to a sum of 3,500*l.*, which was part of the proceeds of a distress which had been put in by him on the goods of Col. Waugh, who had become bankrupt. The assignees claim to be entitled to that 3,500*l.*, and the London and Eastern Bank also claim under a bill of sale which had been given by Col. Waugh to them for a very large sum of money which was due from him to them. It was arranged that this sum of 3,500*l.* should be paid into the London and Westminster Bank in the names of certain parties who were to represent the persons who claimed to have an interest in his money; Mr. Coleman representing the London and Eastern Bank, Mr. Bell the assignees of the bankrupt, and Mr. Aplin the party who made the distress, in fact Mr. Jolly, the plaintiff. Under these circumstances the bill was filed, and the claim which was made by the bill, and the rights of the parties stated in it were these:—The plaintiff, under the terms of the indenture of the 12th of October 1856, claimed to be entitled to receive the sum of 3,500*l.*, and the interest which has accrued due thereon, in part payment of the monies due to him upon his mortgage. The official manager of the banking corporation and the defendants Bell, Hughes, Jay and Pearce disputed the plaintiff's right to the money, and the official manager claimed to be entitled to receive the same under the alleged bill of sale, the other defendants claiming to be entitled to receive the same as assignees of Waugh as part of his estate, on the ground that the alleged bill of sale was an act of bankruptcy on the part of Waugh, and that the goods were in his order and disposition at the time of his bankruptcy. I consider, therefore, that the suit was really instituted for the purpose of determining who was the person who was really entitled to the proceeds of this distress to the extent of the sum of 3,500*l.*, and the suit had no ulterior object. Well, under these circumstances the defendants, who were the representatives of the London and Eastern Banking Company, put in their answer. By that answer they, as it appears to me, most distinctly and clearly disclaimed all right and interest in the subject-matter of the suit, because it is impossible to read the paragraph of their answer to which reference has been made without coming to that conclusion. They say, "We deny it to be true that we, the defendants, or either of us, dispute, or have ever disputed, the plaintiff's right to the said sum of money in question in this suit," admitting that the right to the 3,500*l.* was the real question in dispute. They might have stopped there, and if they had chosen to frame their answer merely with an admission of the plaintiff's rights to the money, or a statement that they did not dispute his right, there might have been some ground for the arguments which have been addressed to me on the part of the defendants, who represent the London and Eastern Banking Company. But they go on and say, "Or that we claim, or have ever claimed to be entitled to receive the same under the said bill of sale, or otherwise, and we disclaim all right, interest and claim to the said sum of money, and we claim to be dismissed this suit with costs." Now, what is the meaning of that? Does that, or does it not, amount to a disclaimer? Mr. Follett has said, that the ordinary form of a disclaimer, where it is an answer and disclaimer, is to give a particular heading, "the answer of A. B. and his disclaimer;" but I put the question to him, whether, supposing an answer and disclaimer were put in without that heading, which he says is necessary, and there had been in the body of the answer a distinct and positive disclaimer, that would be insufficient upon the ground of the want of what he calls the proper heading. As I understand the answer he gave me, he was compelled to admit that a disclaimer in those terms, although not pointed to by the heading in the answer, would be perfectly sufficient. Well then, this, in my opinion, is a disclaimer of the most positive and distinct kind. It was admitted, by Mr. Follett, that this paragraph of the answer might have been framed in this way: "We do not dispute the plaintiff's right to the sum of money, nor do we claim to receive the same under the bill of sale, except in the event of its being decided that the plaintiff is not entitled to the fund." The defendant might have put in an answer of that kind; he has not chosen to do so, and he has in the most distinct terms stated, that he has no interest, that he disclaims all right, interest and claim to the said sum of money, which cannot be confined to a disclaimer, so far as the plaintiff's interests are concerned, but is the most general and unqualified disclaimer of any right whatever in that sum of money, which is the subject-matter of the suit. Then, what was the Judge to do under these circumstances? It is quite true that upon the notice which has been given it was not competent to the defendants, the assignees, to have read the answer of Mr. Follett's clients against them, but the matter was before the Judge, the answer is brought to his notice by the plaintiff, and he finds that the defendant, a party who has been made a defendant in the cause, who was supposed to assert a right to the sum of money which is the only subject-matter of dispute, positively disclaims any right to that sum of money. Then, it is said, that he was not dismissed as he ought to have been at once by the Court upon that disclaimer, but he stood before the Court, and that, therefore, it was the duty of the Master of the Rolls to have taken care of his interest, so far that he should have made a decree which would have left it open to him to discuss and dispute his right as between himself and the assignees of the bankrupt; but I apprehend that, although he was not technically dismissed from the suit, he was virtually no longer a party to it, he had renounced all his right to claim any interest whatever in that which was the subject of discussion, and which was to be decided by the Court; and therefore it appears to me that the Master of the Rolls had no other course to pursue than to decide the matter as it then stood between the only parties who were the litigant parties as between themselves. When Mr. Follett's client withdrew in the manner which seems almost to be admitted he has done, he having put himself out of the suit as far as he could, at all events out of any interest in the subject-matter of the suit, the only litigant parties who remained were the plaintiff on the one hand, and the assignees of the bankrupt on the other. It appears to me, under those circumstances, that the suit was just in the same position as it would have stood if originally the only parties to it had been these parties, the plaintiff on the one side and the assignees of the bankrupt on the other, and that the Master of the Rolls ought only to have regarded the rights and interest of those parties as between themselves. He had nothing to do with any claim or any right which might possibly have existed on the part of the other defendant to dispute the question with the assignees of the bankrupt; therefore, it appears to me, when his Honour decided the question at once as between the plaintiff and the assignees, that the assignees were entitled to this sum of 3,500*l.*—the only question then remaining to be decided before him being, which of those two parties was to be entitled—I think his Honour made the only decree that it was possible for him to make. Under these circumstances the defendant, having unfortunately taken a course by which it is said upon the form of the decree as it now stands, or as it must be varied, that he will be precluded from any right to assert that he is entitled to the surplus of the sum of 3,500*l.*, the 750*l.*, I am afraid all I can say upon it is, that he having chosen to disclaim in the distinct manner which he has done, I ought not, under the circumstances, to interfere in any way to assist him to open that question as between him and the assignees. Under these circumstances, I think that this appeal must be dismissed with costs. With regard to the claim to costs on the part of Mr. Coleman, I think, inasmuch as but for that claim of the London and Eastern Banking Corporation, Mr. Coleman would never have been one of the stakeholders; that when they themselves disclaimed any right or interest in this money, they shewed that they never ought to have intervened at all; that Mr. Coleman ought not to have been made a party; that it is their act and they must take the consequences of it, by which he has been appointed as one of the parties to represent them. Mr. Coleman must get his costs from them if he can, but he certainly ought not to have them out of the estate. So far as the decree is concerned, I shall make a declaration that the assignees of the bankrupt are entitled to the 750*l.*

ROYOU v. PAUL.

Specific Performance—Notice to rescind Contract—Return of Deposit.

A purchaser raised certain valid objections to his vendor's title, which the vendor refused to satisfy. The vendor gave notice, that if the purchaser refused to complete within five days, he should re-sell and charge the purchaser with the expenses. The purchaser thereupon gave the vendor notice, that he should bring an action for the deposit, if the requisitions were not complied with within a week. The action was commenced, and the vendor some time subsequently agreed to satisfy the requisitions at the purchaser's expense. Upon the purchaser's refusal, a bill was filed by the vendor for specific performance. The Court held, that the notice by the vendor of an intention to re-sell, was equivalent to a declaration that he would not seek specific performance of the contract, and that the purchaser's action to rescind was effectual, and the bill was dismissed, with costs.

Power of the Court to order the return of the deposit where the vendor's bill is dismissed, he having given an undertaking.

This cause was heard on motion for a decree. The bill was filed for the purpose of enforcing specific performance by the defendant of two contracts entered into by him with the plaintiff at a sale by public auction, which took place on the 18th of September 1856, by one of which contracts the defendant agreed to become the purchaser of a freehold messuage and premises, being No. 3, Royal Place, New Road, Peckham; and by the other, of two leasehold messuages and premises, described as Nos. 1, and 2, Royal Place, aforesaid.

The conditions of sale provided, that the respective purchases should be completed on or before the 11th of October 1856, and for payment of interest in case of non-completion on that day, without prejudice to the vendor's right to rescind the contract, and that compensation should be allowed for any error or misdescription in the particulars of sale. The plaintiff delivered abstracts of title to the freehold and leasehold premises to the defendant's solicitor on the 26th of September 1856; and on the 3rd of October following the defendant's solicitor delivered requisitions on both the titles, in which he required compensation on behalf of the defendant, on the ground that, with respect to the leasehold premises, there was a further rent of 18s. reserved for insurance, in addition to the rent stated in the particulars of sale; he also insisted that a prior mortgage having been made by way of under-lease, the concurrence of Kellaway, the mortgagor, was necessary in the assignment to the defendant; and he further required the plaintiff to point out with respect to the freehold lot where the deeds not in the defendant's possession could be produced. The vendor's solicitors sent their answers to the purchaser's requisitions on the 8th of October, denying the purchaser's right to an assignment from Kellaway, and generally refusing to comply with the purchaser's requisitions. After some correspondence upon the subject, the plaintiff's solicitors wrote, on the 5th of November, to inform the defendant's solicitor, that unless the defendant proceeded to complete the purchase within five days they should re-sell the premises, and hold him liable for the deficiency; and by a letter, dated the 6th of November 1856, the defendant's solicitor informed the plaintiff's solicitors that unless the deeds required were produced within a week, and the other requisitions complied with, the defendant would commence an action to recover the deposits. The plaintiff's solicitors still refusing to comply with the defendant's requisitions, on the 17th of November 1856 the defendant commenced an action against the plaintiff for the recovery of his deposits. The plaintiff's solicitors, in February 1857, sent in further answers to the requisitions, offering to comply with them at the purchaser's expense, but the purchaser declined to accept these answers. On the 28th of March 1857 the plaintiff filed his bill for specific performance of both contracts; and in this suit he obtained an injunction to restrain the defendant from proceeding with his action, on the plaintiff submitting to abide by any order the Court might make respecting the deposits, or the costs of the action.

Mr. Baily and Mr. Bovill, for the plaintiff.

Mr. Glasse and Mr. W. D. Lewis, for the defendant, contended that the purchaser's requisitions, being valid ones, and the vendor having distinctly refused to comply with them, the purchaser was entitled by a short notice to declare the contracts at an end after the time fixed for completion. The following authorities were cited:—

Crosse v. the Duke of Beaufort, 5 De Gex & Sm. 7.

Nott v. Piccard, 25 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Chanc. 618.

KINDERSLEY, V.C. said, that he did not think the plaintiff was entitled to a decree. The contracts ought to be considered as separate contracts, for it was possible that a decree might be made compelling specific performance of one contract, and dismissing the bill as to the other. At the same time, he thought it was right to make them the subject of one suit. He would consider the case first as to the leasehold. The requisitions were delivered on the 3rd of October, and with regard to the dif-

ence in the amount of rent reserved, it appeared that the purchaser had admitted this to be a matter for compensation. But the second requisition on the leasehold title, as to the reversion in Kellaway, the mortgagor, was clearly a proper and substantial requisition, for, by the conditions of sale, the vendor had agreed to sell the whole term in the lease to the purchaser. In his answer, however, the vendor completely rejected the requisition. This was not a proper answer, and yet this rejection of the requisition ran through the whole of the communications. On the 20th of October there was a further requisition on the point, and the reply was in the same terms as before. On the 23rd of October the purchaser's solicitor again insisted, by letter, on the reversion being got in; and on the 24th of October he received an answer, in substance resisting the requisition. It might be remarked that the time allowed by the vendor to the purchaser to waive his requisition, by the letters of the 24th of October and the 5th of November, in the latter of which the vendor threatened to re-sell, was a very short period. What became of the question, as to the production of the deeds of the leasehold property, did not appear. Upon the whole, he considered the letter by the purchaser's solicitor, of the 6th of November, giving the vendor notice of his intention to commence an action, was a sufficient notice to consider the contracts rescinded. It had been argued that, there being two contracts, the notice required that something should be done as to each, or that both would be rescinded; but it was evident that the vendor had throughout treated the contracts as though they were one contract: the notice was really meant to be a distributive notice, and would so have been understood. However, by a letter sent two days afterwards, the vendor still adheres to his refusal. The defendant then commenced his action. It would be observed, that only one action was commenced, but no attempt was then made to file a bill. On the 26th of February further answers to the requisitions were sent in. The parties were at arm's length on the 6th, or at latest on the 14th of November, and three months and a half afterwards the vendor says, "Kellaway's representatives will join;" but adds, "that the expense must be borne by the purchaser." The question was, whether the purchaser's notice as to the leaseholds was too short. He thought that it was not. If time was required in order to answer the requisition, then the purchaser should give a reasonable time, and that would depend upon the circumstances. In such case, a week would be too short, but where the vendor was saying, "I'm not bound to do it, I won't do it," there no time was required; it was then a matter of indifference. The Vice Chancellor therefore considered the notice good as to rescinding the contract. Even if afterwards there had been acquiescence on the part of the purchaser, it would have made no difference. Secondly, as to the contract respecting the freeholds; there had been an inquiry for the deeds, and it was ascertained that the person in whose custody the deeds were supposed to be could not be found. Notwithstanding this, however, the vendor's solicitor, in his letter of the 5th of November, threatened to re-sell; and he afterwards alleged that the requisition was not made in time; so that, in effect, no answer was given to the requisition as to the deeds. If the vendor had said that he required time to find the deeds, then clearly a notice of a week would not have been sufficient; but it was not necessary that a longer notice should be given, when the parties were at arm's length. The vendor, from the time of writing his letter of the 5th of November, seems to have said, "I don't mean to ask you for specific performance." Under these circumstances, His Honour considered that the bill ought to be dismissed, with costs. As to the deposits and costs at law, and the undertaking, the Vice Chancellor said that, if the action should not go on, the Court ought to dispose of the deposits and costs; and, after conferring with the registrar, said that having regard to the undertaking, notwithstanding the dismissal of the bill, he could order the return of the deposits by the plaintiff, but that he would leave the defendant to decide whether he would go on with the action or not, for the costs. The defendant agreed to receive the deposits.

APPEAL. } MORTIMORE v. MORTIMORE.
July 2.

Trustee — Investment — Railway Mortgage.

A testator directed his trustees to invest in the funds, or on Government securities, "or upon the security by way of mortgage of any freehold, copyhold or leasehold hereditaments in England or Wales":—Held, that this did not authorize the investment upon the security of railway mortgages made in conformity with the 8 Vict. c. 16. s. 38, or in Great Northern Railway Debenture Stock.

William Mortimore, by his will, dated the 14th of September 1858, after various devises and bequests, gave all his residuary real and personal estate to trustees upon trust to realize the same, and to stand possessed of the monies arising therefrom, upon trust thereout to pay his debts and funeral and testamentary expenses, and out of the residue of the said monies to "lay out and invest the sum of 20,000*l.* sterling in their or his names or name, in some or one of the public stocks or funds of Great Britain, or at interest upon Government securities, or upon the security by way of mortgage of any freehold, copyhold or leasehold hereditaments in England or Wales, or of a life interest in any property, real or personal, coupled with a policy of assurance on the life or lives for which such interest is holden, with power from time to time, at discretion, to vary the same stocks, funds or securities." The trusts of this fund were then declared to be for the testator's widow for life or until her re-marriage, and afterwards as therein mentioned. The trusts for investment of other portions of the residue were declared by reference to those relating to the 20,000*l.* The testator died on the 14th of October 1858, without having altered that part of the will which is hereinbefore stated. This special case was brought before the Court to obtain an opinion, first, whether the investment of the monies to arise from the sale and conversion of the residuary real and personal estate of the said testator, or of any part of such monies, upon the security of railway mortgages made in conformity with the provisions in that behalf contained in the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, was an investment sanctioned by the trusts of the will; and, secondly, whether the investment of such monies, or any part thereof, in the purchase of Great Northern Railway Debenture Stock, created pursuant to the provisions in that behalf contained in the "Great Northern Railway Company's Increase of Capital Act, 1853," was an investment sanctioned by the trusts of the will.

As to the first question, the 38th section of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845," (8 Vict. c. 16.) enacted as follows:—"If the company be authorized by the special act to borrow money on mortgage or bond, it shall be lawful for them, subject to the restrictions contained in the special act, to borrow on mortgage or bond such sums of money as shall from time to time, by an order of a general meeting of the company, be authorized to be borrowed, not exceeding in the whole the sum prescribed by the special act, and for securing the repayment of the money so borrowed, with interest, to mortgage the undertaking and the future calls on the shareholders, or to give bonds in manner hereinafter mentioned." The interpretation clause in the same act provided, that "the expression 'the undertaking' shall mean the undertaking or works, of whatever nature, which shall by the special act be authorized to be executed."

With regard to the second question the 19th section of the Great Northern Railway Company's Increase of Capital Act, 1853, provided that it should be lawful for the company, from time to time, with the consent of three-fifths the votes of the shareholders present in person, or by proxy, at any general meeting of the company, convened with due notice of that object, to resolve that any portion of the borrowed capital of the company then subsisting on the security of outstanding mortgages or bonds, or any debenture or other security for which, or for the interest whereof the company were lawfully liable, not exceeding an amount to be defined in and by such resolution, might be converted into stock of the company of like amount, either by agreement with the holders of such mortgages or bonds, or other security respectively, before the same respectively became due, or by paying off the same respectively when due, and issuing stock of a corresponding amount, instead of re-borrowing the sums so paid off, and also with the like consent from time to time to resolve that the whole or any part to be defined in and by such resolution, of the monies which the company should have authority to raise by borrowing under the powers of any of their acts, and which should not then have been raised, should or might be raised by the creation and issue of stock of a corresponding amount, instead of borrowing the same; and also, with the like consent, to attach to the stock so authorized to be created and issued for any of the purposes aforesaid, a fixed and perpetual irredeemable yearly dividend or interest, at any rate not exceeding the rate of 4*l.* for every 100*l.* thereof, payable in equal half-yearly portions; and it should thereupon be lawful for the directors of the company to carry into effect such resolution or resolutions by the creation and issue of so much stock as might from time to time be necessary for that purpose, having such fixed rate of interest or dividend as aforesaid; and the stock so created and issued should be a charge upon the tolls and undertaking and lands, tenements and hereditaments of the company, but should be distributable, transmissible and transferable as, and in other respects have the incidents of, personal estate, and the said interest or dividend should for ever have priority of payment over all other dividends or any other stock or shares of the company, whether ordinary or preference or guaranteed, and the stock when so created should be termed "Great Northern Railway Debenture Stock."

Mr. Eddis appeared for the trustees, and submitted the questions to the Court, the trustees being willing to act in the matter according to the direction of the Court. He referred to Mant v. Leith (1).

(1) 15 Beav. 524; a. c. 21 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Chanc. 719.

Mr. Palmer and Mr. Shee, for the persons beneficially interested in the fund, contended that the nature of the security, either under the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, or the 19th section of the Great Northern Railway Act of 1853, was such as to come within the fair scope and object of the will. The security of the undertaking was a real security. They referred to—

Robinson v. Robinson, 1 De Gex, M. & G. 247; a. c. 21 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Chanc. 111.

Doe v. St. Helen's and Runcorn Gap Railway Company, 2 Q.B. Rep. 364; a. c. 11 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 6.

[LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE inquired whether the recent decisions on the Mortmain Act had any bearing on the subject.]

Mr. Palmer said that they had, and that they were rather in favour of the view he had submitted to the Court.

The LORD CHANCELLOR was of opinion that neither of the securities proposed was an investment sanctioned by the trusts of this will. Those securities might come within the operation of the Mortmain Act, and, in some sense, they were real securities, but they did not come within the meaning of the testator's words. The testator pointed out a security by way of mortgage in the common and usual sense of the words, whereby a certain and clear remedy would be given for the recovery of the money. In the security now proposed the remedy was uncertain; and there was no certainty that any funds would be forthcoming if a receiver of the tolls were to be appointed. All that was decided in Robinson v. Robinson was, that the trustees in that case were not guilty of a breach of trust in continuing in their actual state of investment part of the assets which consisted of turnpike bonds. That was, however, no authority to shew that what it was proposed to invest this money upon was a security "by way of mortgage of freehold, copyhold or leasehold hereditaments in England or Wales," within the meaning of the trusts of this will.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE also thought that the questions must be answered in the negative, guarding himself, however, to this extent, that if the trustees had found among the testator's property railway mortgages or debenture stock of this description, and had not realized, then it might be that the Court would not have thought the trustees guilty of error so clear and manifest as to consider them guilty of a breach of trust. But the case was different when the Court was asked to change securities into those now proposed to be taken; and his Lordship was of opinion that both questions must be answered in the negative. The contention having been raised with a view to the increase of the income of the tenant for life, she should pay the costs.

July 2, 9.

COLLARD v. ROE.

Vendor and Purchaser—Concurrence of Dower Trustee—Practice—Appeal for Costs.

A suit was instituted by a vendor for the specific performance of a contract to purchase an estate which, by deed, dated in 1841, was limited to the use of the vendor for life without impeachment of waste; and after the determination of that estate by any means in his lifetime, to the use of a trustee and his heirs during the life of the vendor, in trust nevertheless for the vendor and his assigns; and after the determination of the estate so limited to the trustee and his heirs, to the only use and behoof of the vendor, his heirs and assigns for ever. One of the Vice Chancellors held, upon objection taken by the defendant, that he was entitled to a conveyance of any interest which might have become vested by forfeiture or otherwise in the dower trustee, but no costs of suit were given to either party up to the hearing. The defendant appealed on account of the decree not giving him costs, and of his having to pay interest from a certain date on his purchase-money. The appeal was dismissed, with costs.

Semble—that the rule as to there being no appeal on the subject of costs alone is practically not now in force.

This was an appeal, by the defendant, from the decision of Stuart, V.C. (reported 27 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Chanc. 295), upon two grounds:—first, that interest had been erroneously directed to be paid by the defendant upon his purchase-money from a certain day; and, secondly, because, although the Vice Chancellor allowed the validity of the defendant's objection as to the dower trustee, he had given him no costs.

The bill prayed that the defendant might be decreed specifically to perform a contract which he had entered into to purchase certain freehold estates from the plaintiff.

At the date of the contract, the estates in question stood limited by an indenture, dated in December 1841, to the use of the plaintiff and his assigns for and during the term of his natural life, without impeachment of waste; and after the determination of that estate, by any means in his lifetime, to the use of G. J. Pitman and his heirs during the life of the plaintiff, in trust, nevertheless, for the plaintiff and his assigns; and, after the determination of the estate so limited in use to the said G. J. Pitman and his heirs during the life of the plaintiff, to the only proper use and behoof of the plaintiff, his heirs and assigns for ever, to the intent that the then present or any future wife of the plaintiff should not be entitled to dower out of the same hereditaments.

The purchaser refused to complete the purchase unless the dower trustee, G. J. Pitman, who was in Australia, whither he had gone to reside prior to the date of the contract, concurred in executing the deed of conveyance; and the bill was filed to enforce specific performance without such concurrence. The Vice Chancellor considered the defendant's objection was frivolous and vexatious, but that in strict practice he was bound to yield to it. The decree was accordingly made; no costs up to the hearing to be given on either side.

Mr. Craig and Mr. Southgate, in support of the appeal, contended that their view of the practice had been held by the Vice Chancellor to be correct, and that therefore their costs ought to have been given to them. If it were objected, that this was substantially an appeal for costs alone, the case of Norton v. Cooper (1) was sufficient authority for the course which had been taken.

[LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE said, that he understood that the rule as to there being no appeal on the subject of costs alone was practically not in force.]

Mr. Craig and Mr. Southgate argued, at some length, the question of the necessity for the dower trustee's concurrence, it being contended that the whole subject of the suit was open upon their appeal.

Mr. Malins and Mr. Kerlake, for the plaintiff, were not called upon.

The LORD CHANCELLOR was sorry to find the money of suitors squandered in such litigation, and the time of the Court wasted by such a frivolous and vexatious objection, which the defendant was fighting out as if the fate of the empire depended upon it. The Vice Chancellor had come to a right conclusion, that neither party should pay costs; and this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER concurred.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE agreed that the defendant's objection was frivolous and vexatious; but his voice would have been for giving the costs of the suit against the appellant.

Feb. 11. } VERITY v. WILD.

Solicitor — Lien for Costs — Fund in Court.

A solicitor has no lien for his costs upon a fund in court, which is the subject of the suit, as against other parties than his client; but he has a right to prevent his client from receiving any sum recovered by his exertions until his costs are paid. Such right, however, cannot preclude a fair compromise between the parties.

This was a petition presented by Mr.

(1) 5 De Gex, M. & G. 728.

NEW SERIES, XXVIII.—CHANC.

Downs, who had been the plaintiff's former solicitor in the suit, praying for an order that no decree for disposing of a sum of 800*l.*, which had been ordered to be brought into court, should be made, without the petitioner's costs being provided for; or that no such order should be made without previous notice to the petitioner.

The bill was filed, by the plaintiff, Mr. Verity, on the 23rd of May 1858, to enforce the execution of the trusts of a creditors' deed, under which he had assigned his property to the defendant Wild and others, upon trust for the benefit of his creditors, with a resulting trust in favour of himself.

The bill alleged various breaches of trust; and in June 1858 a motion was made on behalf of the plaintiff for a receiver and injunction; and an order was made upon the motion that a receiver should be appointed, and that a sum of 800*l.* in the hands of the trustees should be brought into court; and also that a sum of 35*l.* should be paid to the plaintiff as costs in respect of certain affidavits which had been improperly filed on behalf of the defendants. The petitioner had been solicitor for the plaintiff up to the time of the motion for a receiver, but had then been changed by the plaintiff; and his costs were still due and owing. A compromise was subsequently come to, whereby, after providing for the costs of the trustees, the surplus was to be paid to the creditors.

The petition now impeached this compromise as fraudulent and collusive against the petitioner; and it alleged that the plaintiff and the defendants had agreed not to bring the money into court, and were arranging the terms of the compromise without making any provision for the petitioner's costs.

Mr. Drewry, in support of the petition, contended that Mr. Downs had a lien upon the fund which was ordered to be brought into court in respect of his costs, and that any compromise which did not provide for his costs was a fraud upon him. He cited Pelly v. Wathen (1).

Mr. Ward appeared for the plaintiff.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—This is a petition, praying that no order may be made for the disposition among the parties to the suit, or any of them, of a sum of money ordered to be brought into court without providing for the petitioner's costs; or that no such order should be made in respect of the fund without previous notice to the petitioner. It appears to me that this petition is founded in error. The facts are very simple; and the suit might have been a very proper one, although it might not have entirely succeeded. On the application for a receiver, it seems that the defendants themselves suggested that the 600*l.* in their hands should be brought into court; and as the plaintiff did not object, an order to that effect was made. During these proceedings Mr. Downs was acting as the plaintiff's solicitor, and there is no suggestion that he was not rightly performing his duty. It appears that the parties to the suit are now proposing to come to an arrangement, under which the fund is to be appropriated in payment of the trustees' costs, and, as far as it goes, in satisfying the creditors. This arrangement is said by the petitioner to be fraudulent and collusive as against him; but I can see no ground for that contention. There is no doubt in the case as to how the law stands at the present time, whatever questions might formerly have been raised. A solicitor has no lien on the fund, which is the subject of the suit, as against other persons; but he has a right that whatever he can recover for his client shall not be paid to him until his costs are satisfied. That, however, is not a lien upon the particular fund in court; but the petitioner prays that prior to the rights of all parties this general fund shall not be dealt with until the solicitor's costs are paid. That is a misapprehension of the law. If any part of the fund is payable to Mr. Verity personally, or to him in respect of costs, then the petitioner has a right to say that it shall not go into his pocket until the costs are paid to the solicitor, by whose labour it was procured for his client; but it is not consistent with any principle that the right of a solicitor should preclude any honest and fair arrangement between the parties. If such is the effect the sooner the right is abolished the better. It appears that the sum of 35*l.* has been actually ordered to be paid to the plaintiff by way of costs; and to this extent, I think, the petitioner's application is justified, and, so far, he may have an order, but only to prevent that particular sum from being dealt with, because that sum ought to have been applied in payment of the solicitor's costs. I think also that no order should be made in the suit, by way of compromise or otherwise, for the payment of any sum to Mr. Verity, without notice being given to the petitioner. The petitioner must pay the trustees and the other creditors the costs of this application, as he can have no equity against them; but the plaintiff must pay his own costs. The order was made accordingly.

A summons to vary the chief clerk's certificate is a sufficient application within the 51st Order of the 16th of October 1852, and therefore, where such summons was obtained within eight days from the filing of the certificate, although not returnable within the eight days, it was held to be in time.

In this case the chief clerk's certificate had been signed by the Judge on the 24th of July and filed on the 28th. The plaintiff, on the 3rd of August, took out a summons to vary the certificate returnable on the 6th, on which day it was ordered to stand over until the hearing on further consideration.

Mr. Willcock and Mr. H. Stevens, for the defendant, now objected that the eight days within which the application must, according to the 51st Order of the 16th of October 1852 be made, had expired before application made, and, therefore, the certificate had become absolute. They pointed out the difference between the wording of the 49th Order, which allows four clear days for obtaining a summons to take the opinion of the Judge on the certificate signed by the chief clerk, and that of the 51st Order, which allows eight clear days within which an application may be made by summons to vary a certificate signed by the Judge, and contended that the application must be considered to be made when the summons is returnable, and not when it is obtained. They cited Howell v. Kightley (1).

Mr. W. M. James, amicus Curiae, referred to Barlow v. Osborne (2).

Mr. Roll and Mr. J. W. De Longueville Giffard, for the plaintiff, were not called upon.

WOOD, V.C. considered that the words of the 51st Order were satisfied by an application for a summons being made before the expiration of eight days, and that the summons having been obtained within that time, although not returnable until afterwards, was sufficient to suspend the confirmation of the certificate until the summons was disposed of.

Costs—Issue devisavit vel non.

The costs of an issue devisavit vel non are in the discretion of the Court; and, therefore, where an heir-at-law obtained an issue to try the validity of the will (which, as to personality, had been established in the ecclesiastical court,) the Court, after the verdict had been returned against the heir-at-law, directed each party to pay his own costs.

This case came before this Court, by arrangement, in order to dispose of the costs of an issue devisavit vel non, in which the verdict had been given against the heiress-at-law. The case is reported in 27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 725. The will had been previously established as to personality in the ecclesiastical court.

Mr. Malins, Mr. Hislop Clarke and Mr. Needham, for the plaintiff, insisted that the will having been previously established as to personality in the ecclesiastical court, the heiress-at-law ought to have rested satisfied, and not insisted on a trial as to the real estate, and that, having failed in her opposition to the will, she ought to pay the costs. Her conduct had been vexatious. The following cases were cited:—

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—When this Court directed an issue we must have thought, and I believe we did, that the proceedings at law might, by possibility, terminate in the effectual displacement of the will of the testator, as to his real estate, otherwise we should not have directed an issue. As Mrs. Handley was a party to the proceedings in the ecclesiastical court, and before the Privy Council, merely in respect of the personal estate of Thomas Eldridge, and not as his heiress-at-law, she was not bound by those proceedings, as Lord Justice Turner had observed, in disposing of the application for the issue. That she was at all affected by those proceedings, was owing to the accident that she was also interested in the personal estate. If the persons interested in the real and personal estate had been different, the other proceedings would have amounted to nothing; and he agreed that they were equally ineffectual where the person interested in the real and personal estate was one and the same person. It was impossible, however, not to see that this lady had asked for the issue with notice of the circumstances which rendered her success improbable. The ceremonies required by law for the due execution of a will were now the same as to real estate as they were with respect to personal estate, and in the circumstances in which the will had been established as to the personal estate, she incurred considerable risk in asking for the issue. In that state of things, I do not think it is a case for allowing to the heiress-at-law the costs of the issue. But although I think that she ought not to have her costs, her liability to pay the costs of the defendant is a different thing. For in addition to her not being bound by the proceedings which took place with reference to the personal estate, considering the strange and suspicious circumstances in which the will had been obtained, considering the objectionable nature of the devisee's conduct, and the uncertainty of the testator's intellect, independently of his habits of drunkenness, it is impossible to say that this lady was wholly unreasonable in thinking she might be able at law to displace the will as to the real estate, and I am not at all surprised that she should have adopted the course of trying to do so. I do not therefore think that, although she has set up insanity and fraud, there is such a case against her as that she should be made to pay the costs of the issue. The case that she set up was completely balanced by the indescribable nature of the circumstances under which the will was made, and I think that each party should be left to bear their own costs of the issue.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER said that it was a question in the discretion of the Court, whether the heir-at-law should have, or pay, the costs of an issue; or whether he should receive no costs. If his conduct were vexatious or improper, he might be made to pay all the costs. But in estimating the question of vexatious conduct, great regard must be paid to the nature of the contest. If the Court had to deal with a document which was open to grave suspicion,—and beyond all doubt the document in this case was open to great and grave suspicion,—an opportunity should be given of sifting the evidence with respect to it; and there were opportunities of sifting evidence at law which did not exist in the ecclesiastical courts. Then there had been new evidence given both by the heiressat-law and the devisee; and as it was a very reasonable case for sifting the evidence, it was not to be said that this lady ought to be saddled with the costs of the proceedings at law. On the other hand, the will had been established, and the heiress must be considered as having asked for the issue for her own satisfaction, and as she failed, she was not entitled to be paid her costs.

Practice—Receiver's Accounts—Fees.

In the case of a receiver who was managing a business under the direction of the Court, a special order was made that, instead of the further fee payable under the Order of the 30th of January 1857, in respect of his gross receipts, the fee should be payable in respect of the net profits; and a sum previously paid in respect of gross receipts was directed to be allowed in the payment of subsequent fees.

Mr. Schomberg in this case applied that the fees payable in the Judge's chambers on passing the receiver's accounts might be payable in respect of the net proceeds instead of the gross receipts. The Order of the 30th of January 1857, which was identical in this respect with that of the 23rd of October 1852, provided that the following fees should be paid:—"For every certificate or report, 1*l.*; for every certificate upon the passing of a receiver's or consignee's account, a further fee in respect of each 100*l.* received of 10*s.*" In the present case a business was being carried on, the gross receipts being very large, but the outlay also considerable. In similar cases the Court had taken such facts into consideration, and reduced the scale of fees—Wells v. Wales (1).

Mr. J. H. Taylor, for the Suitors' Fee Fund, submitted that these fees had been established upon their present scale as a remuneration for the time occupied in investigating the accounts.

The LORD CHANCELLOR directed that the fees should be payable on the net profits.

Mr. Schomberg then asked that 145*l.*, which had already been paid in respect of the fees on gross receipts might be repaid.

Their LORDSHIPS, however, directed that this sum should be allowed to the receiver in respect of subsequent fees (2).

Devise—Occupation—Cross-Remainders—Implication.

A testator desired that his two sons might have the use and occupation of certain lands, they paying a stated rent, and that, in default of payment, or if they converted the arable land into tillage, they should no longer have possession thereof:—Held, affirming the decision of the Master of the Rolls, that the personal use and occupation was not necessary, and that they might underlet the property.

A testator gave his residuary real and personal estate to trustees, upon trust, as to one-fifth, for each of the testator's five children for life, and after his or her decease for his or her children which he or she should leave at his or her decease; but provided, that if any child should die without leaving any child at his or her death, such share was to go to the testator's other children for their lives and the issue of any then dead, as before directed; and after the death of his five children in trust for their children equally, per capita. One of the testator's children died, leaving a son, who died before the last of the testator's children:—Held, affirming the decision of the Master of the Rolls, that the persons claiming through the son had no interest in the rents and income during the lives of the surviving children of the testator; that that one-fifth was undisposed of, and that cross-remainders were not, in the event which had happened, to be implied.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Master of the Rolls, on the 6th of December 1854, reported 24 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 203, and 19 Beav. 70, 77.

Thomas Squire, by his will, dated the 23rd of November 1803, gave to his wife Mary all his real and personal estate during her life, if she should so long continue his widow, she committing no waste; and after her decease he gave to his brother Jacob Squire and Robert Marsh, their heirs, executors and administrators, all his real and personal estate, upon trust to pay the interest, dividends, rents and proceeds, &c. The testator then gave one-fifth of such interest, &c., to each of his children, Jacob, Thomas, Lawrence, Sarah and Ann, in the same terms, and the share given to Sarah, upon which one of the questions now arose, was as follows:—

“And as to the interest, rents and proceeds of one other full, equal, undivided fifth part and share of my said real and personal estate, in trust for my daughter Sarah, the wife of John Hogben, and her assigns, for and during the term of her natural life, and from and after her decease then upon trust to pay the same interest, dividends, rents and proceeds unto all and every the child and children, both male and female, of my said daughter Sarah which she shall leave at the time of her decease, equally to be divided between them, share and share alike.”

The testator then proceeded—“Provided always, that in case either or any of my said children shall happen to die without leaving any child or children at the time of his, her or their respective deaths, then I declare that the said trustees shall stand and be seized of such part and share of my said real and personal estate of such of my said child or children so dying without issue as aforesaid, to the use and behoof of all and every other of my said children during the term of his, her or their natural lives, and the issue of either of them that shall be then dead, in manner as I have before directed, equally to be divided between them; and from and immediately after the decease of my said five children, and when they shall be all dead, then I give, devise and bequeath all my real and personal estate and effects unto my said trustees, upon trust to pay the interest, dividends, rents and proceeds thereof unto all and every the sons and daughters of my said five children lawfully begotten, in equal shares and proportions, share and share alike, and to their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, for ever, without any regard to the proportion or number of children which any one of my said children may have, it being my will that all my said grandchildren shall share equally alike."

The testator further in his will said—"Provided also, and it is my will and intention and express desire, that after the decease of my wife, my two sons Jacob and Lawrence shall, if it is their desire, have the joint use and occupation, or they may divide the same as they can agree, of all my marsh lands at Newchurch and Bonnington, now in my own occupation, during their joint natural lives, and that also the survivor of them shall have the whole thereof during his natural life; and in case my said son Thomas shall survive and outlive my said sons Jacob and Lawrence, then he shall have the use and occupation of the same lands during his natural life; and if either of my said sons Jacob or Lawrence shall decline such use and occupation, then the other shall have the whole use and occupation thereof, they, my said sons, paying and allowing rent for the same, by half-yearly payments, whilst they may be respectively in such use and occupation, at and after the rate of 1*l.* per acre per annum, and also paying all manner of taxes and assessments for the same, and the sum of 8*s.* per acre per annum for wall scots, and waterings for the same lands; but in case the same shall exceed the sum of 8*s.* per acre per annum, the surplus of such scots and waterings as aforesaid shall be paid by my trustees out of my said estate, and I direct my trustees to keep all the fences in good and tenantable repair and condition; and in case my said sons, who from time to time shall be in possession of my said lands, shall fail or make default in payment of the said rent for three months after the same shall become due, or shall plough, break up or convert into tillage or arable land any of the said lands, then it is my will and desire that such son or sons shall no longer have possession of my said lands or any part thereof, and shall quit the same on the 11th day of October then next following such breach in payment of the said rent, after one month's notice and making default therein, or ploughing, breaking up or converting such land into tillage or arable land, and such son or sons from and after the said 11th day of October shall not any longer use or occupy the said lands. And in order to enable my said sons Jacob and Lawrence to take and use the said lands, I direct that an appraisement and valuation shall be made to them or him who shall wish to use the said lands, of all my stock of cattle, sheep and lambs that I may have at the time of my decease, by four indifferent persons, one to be chosen by each of my said sons, and the other two by my said brother Jacob and Robert Marsh, and for the amount of a moiety of such valuation each of my said sons Jacob and Lawrence shall enter into a separate bond and give such other security as in their power to my trustees for securing the repayment of each of their said moieties of such valuation, together with interest for the same at the rate of 4*l.* per cent. per annum, which interest is to be considered as part of my estate and to be half-yearly paid and applied as before directed."

The testator died on the 19th of February 1810.

Upon the death of his widow, on the 29th of September 1817, the testator's two sons Jacob and Lawrence Squire entered upon the marsh lands and made a partition of them, and each continued in the use and occupation of his share for eleven years. The lands far exceeded in value the rent of 1*l.* per acre and the other outgoings. At Michaelmas 1829, Lawrence Squire let his portion of the lands to divers persons, and on the decease of his brother Jacob Squire, on the 2nd of June 1849, he in like manner let the whole of the testator's marsh lands, which were of gavelkind tenure.

The testator's daughter Sarah Hogben died on the 23rd of April 1829, leaving Squire Hogben her only child surviving, and he died on the 7th of August 1852, without issue, having by his will, dated the 27th of July 1852, devised all his estate to his wife (since deceased) for life, with remainder to the defendants Jacob Squire, John Squire and eight other persons, and their heirs, executors and administrators, as tenants in common.

Two questions were raised upon the will of Thomas Squire: the first question was whether the use and occupation of the marsh lands was given to the testator's sons upon the condition of their personally occupying them; and this the Master of the Rolls decided in the negative. The second question was, whether, upon the decease of Squire Hogben, the income arising from the one-fifth of the testator's estate passed to his devisees until the decease of the surviving child of the testator Thomas Squire, or whether it became divisible amongst the other children of the testator, or whether it had descended and was divisible amongst his three sons, who were his heirs in gavelkind. The Master of the Rolls held, that the persons claiming through the daughter's son had no interest in the rent and income during the lives of the surviving children of the testator; that cross-remainders between the testator's children could not be implied, and that the interest in the one-fifth share during the lives of the surviving children of the testator, was undisposed of by the will.

Mr. Selwyn and Mr. Swanston, jun. appeared in support of the appeal.

Mr. Lloyd and Mr. W. D. Lewis, for some of the defendants; and

Clache's case, Dyer, 330, b.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the appeal was upon two questions, quite distinct and independent of each other. The first question was, whether a condition was annexed to the gift of the marsh lands, that the two sons should personally occupy the lands. If a clear and undoubted intention could be collected from the will, the Court would be bound to give it effect. But if the testator had left it doubtful, it would be impossible to put a construction upon the will by which an intention might be attributed to the testator contrary to his meaning. In this clause there was clearly given to Jacob and Lawrence an equitable interest for their lives. This must be cut down or qualified by some condition to prevent its having its proper effect. Was there anything then in the clause so clearly stated as to shew that the sons were not to have these lands unless they personally occupied them? It was said that it was impossible to put a construction upon the clause unless the sons were personally to occupy the lands. The words "use and occupation" occurred more than once in the will—[His Lordship referred to other parts of the will as to the occupation of a house.]—These lands were to be subject to rent and taxes. It might be that the sons might not like to burden themselves with this, and therefore the testator gave them an option, not given to them with regard to the house. Then he said that, "if either of his said sons Jacob and Lawrence should decline such use and occupation, then the other should have the whole." What was meant by declining the use and occupation? But whatever was meant, he made no provision for both declining. Upon the view of "decline," in the sense of "renounce," suppose both accepted and entered, and one of them, after a year, let his part or went away: that was not a declining, and no provision was made for this event. Then, there was no absolute gift over, except in case of Thomas surviving his two brothers, so that here the testator seemed to contemplate that after his two sons had not declined, they would continue to have the use and occupation during their lives, and then it was to go over to Thomas, in the event of his surviving. Again, the testator had been considering events which might occur, in which it would be desirable to terminate the interest given to his sons. If the rent were unpaid by the sons, &c., then they were no longer to continue in possession. The testator was, therefore, contemplating events in which the interest of the sons was to cease; but he did not mention the event of their ceasing personally to occupy the lands. And why, then, was the Court to say that the intention was so clear as to involve a forfeiture of the son's interest upon their ceasing to occupy? Although there appeared to be an argument in favour of the necessity for a personal occupation, derived from the provisions as to appraisal; yet those provisions were capable of a double interpretation. It appeared that the sons were to have the benefit of the stock during the continuance of their interest, viz., during their lives. On the whole, then, on the first question, the decision of the Master of the Rolls was correct.

As to the other question, it arose upon a clause in the will relating to the share of Sarah Hogben, who died, leaving her only son Squire Hogben. Squire Hogben was dead, and the period had not arrived for distribution. It was contended that Squire Hogben took an estate pour autre vie, that was, until the period of distribution. His Lordship quite agreed with the view of the Master of the Rolls. The children of the testator's children were to come in the place of their parents. Cross-remainders were directed as applied to the children dying without leaving children. Were then cross-remainders to be implied in the event which had happened. Implication was to be derived from the expressions used; the Court was not to imagine, suppose or conjecture. If the words involved something necessarily implied in the expression, the Court must carry into effect the intention. The clause here said—"In case either or any of my said children shall happen to die without leaving any child or children at the time of his, her or their respective deaths, then I declare that the trustees, &c. shall stand and be seized of such part and share of my said real and personal estate of such of my said child or children so dying without issue as aforesaid, to the use and behoof of all and every other of my said children during the term of his, her or their natural lives and the issue of either of them as shall be then dead, in manner as I have before directed, equally to be divided between them." These limitations were expressly confined to the case of children dying without leaving a child or children living at the time of their respective deaths. Mrs. Hogben died leaving a son, which son had since died. It was said that these cross-remainders should apply in the case which the testator had not provided for, as it was his intention to extend the benefit to the children's children. If the testator had had in mind the possibility of the event which had occurred, he might very probably have provided as it was now contended he had. His Lordship could not, however, speculate on probabilities. He must take the expressions as he found them, and if the testator had omitted anything he could not supply the omission. The view of the Master of the Rolls was not impeached by Vanderplank v. King. In this case there was but one class to which the question could apply. The children were to come in the place of the parent, and the children formed one class. Where the testator had said "In one event I direct cross-remainders between my children," was it open to the Court to say, "I will suggest another event, in which cross-remainders should be directed, and I will enlarge your expression so as to apply it to that other"?

Appeal dismissed, with costs.

KINDERSLEY, V.C. }
 Jan. 18; } LAMBARDE v. PEACH.
 March 8.

Devise—Shifting Clause.

A testator devised his real estates to his only daughter for life; remainder to her husband for life; remainder to their second son for life, and afterwards to his first and other sons in tail; remainder to his daughter's eldest son for life; remainder to trustees to preserve contingent remainders; remainder to his second and other younger sons in tail; remainder to the plaintiff (his eldest granddaughter) for life; remainder to trustees to preserve; remainder to her sons and daughters in tail. The will contained a shifting clause, that in case any tenant for life or in tail should become entitled to the Turton estates, then in possession of the husband of the testator's daughter, the limitations in favour of such person should cease, as if he or she were dead, and the estates so limited were to go to the person next entitled in remainder, it being the testator's intention that both estates should not vest in the same person. In the events that happened, the eldest son of the testator's daughter became entitled to the Turton estates, and he was the person next entitled to the devised estates, in case the shifting clause did not take effect. He had only one son:—Held, that the effect of the shifting clause was to divest him of the devised estates; that the Court would effectuate the testator's intention, that the property should go to the unborn sons of the tenant for life whose estate had so ceased; that the trustees to preserve took the estate, as the persons next in remainder, to support contingent remainders; and that the intermediate rents accruing between the time when the estate of the tenant for life ceased, and the birth of a son entitled under the limitations, belonged to the residuary devisees or heir-at-law.

This suit was instituted for the purpose of carrying into effect the trusts of the will of Robert Bell Livesey, dated the 19th of May 1830, whereby he gave and devised his manor of Kildale, in the county of York, with the advowson and manor-house, messuages, farms, lands, tenements and hereditaments in possession, reversion, remainder or expectancy, unto the Rev. James Cleaver and the Rev. John Cleaver, their executors, administrators or assigns, for the term of 1,000 years, upon certain trusts therein mentioned, and subject thereto, to the use of his wife, Jane Livesey, and her assigns, during her life, without impeachment of waste; with remainder to the use of his daughter, Marianne, the wife of Edmund Turton, during her life, for her separate use and benefit; with remainder to the use of her husband, the said Edmund Turton (in case he should survive her), and his assigns, during his life; with remainder to the use of Robert Conssett Turton, second son of the said Edmund Turton and Marianne Turton, and his assigns, during his life, without impeachment of waste; with remainder to trustees, to support the contingent uses thereafter limited; with remainder to the use of the first and all and every other the son or sons of the said Robert Conssett Turton, severally, successively and in remainder, one after another, according to their respective seniorities, in tail male; with remainder to the use of the third, fourth, and all and any other the younger son and sons then or thereafter to be born of the said Edmund and Marianne Turton, severally and successively, and in remainder, one after another, according to their respective seniorities, in tail male, with remainder to the use of Edmund Henry Turton, eldest son of the said Edmund and Marianne Turton, and his assigns, during his life, without impeachment of waste, with remainder to trustees, upon trust to support the contingent remainders thereafter limited, with remainder to the second, third, fourth, and all and every other the younger son and sons of the said Edmund Henry Turton, severally, successively and in remainder, one after another, according to their respective seniorities, in tail male, with remainder to the use of the first and all and every other the son and sons of the said Marianne Turton, by any future husband, severally, successively, and in remainder, one after another, according to their respective seniorities, in tail male, with remainder to the use of Marianne Terese Lambarde (then Marianne Terese Turton), eldest daughter of the said Edmund and Marianne Turton and her assigns during her life, without impeachment of waste, with remainder to trustees to preserve, with remainder to the use of the first and all and every other the son and sons of the said Marianne Terese Turton, severally, successively, and in remainder, one after another, according to their respective seniorities, in tail male, with remainder to the use of the second and all and every other the daughter and daughters, then or thereafter to be born, of the said Edmund Turton and Marianne Turton, severally, successively, and in remainder one after another, according to their respective seniorities, in tail male, with remainder to the use of the first and all and every other the daughter and daughters of the said Marianne Turton, by any such future husband, severally, successively and in remainder, one after another, according to their respective seniorities, in tail male, with remainder to the use of the first and all and every other the daughters of the testator's grandsons and granddaughters in tail general successively, in every respect the same as was therein declared as to the issue male, mutatis mutandis, it being his intention that after failure of male issue of his grandsons and granddaughters, the said settled hereditaments should revert to the female issue of his second and every other grandson and granddaughter in tail, in the same manner as was therein declared as to the male issue, with remainder to the use of his (the testator's) nephew John Bell, for life, with a subsequent limitation to the second, third and other sons of John Bell, in tail male, with remainder to the use of James Cleaver and his heirs, in tail general, with the ultimate remainder to the use of the testator's own right heirs for ever; and the testator thereby declared, that in case the said Robert Consett Turton, or the heirs of his body, or any other tenant for life, or in tail, should become seised of the settled family estates of the said Edmund Turton, then and from thenceforth the limitations thereby made in his or her or their favour should from time to time, on his, her or their so becoming seised, cease and determine, and be absolutely void, as if he, she or they were dead, and the said thereby devised hereditaments and real estate, with the appurtenances, should go over to the person next entitled in remainder, under and by virtue of his said will, it being his express wish and intention that both the said estates should not vest in the same person, except as otherwise thereinbefore provided for.

The bill stated the facts, and prayed that the trusts of the will might be carried into execution, and that it might be declared that on the death of Edmund Turton, Edmund Henry Turton having become seised of the family estates of his father, the limitations in the will in his favour became void, as if he were dead, and that the plaintiff, Marianne Terese Lambarde, became entitled, as tenant for life next in remainder, to the estates devised by the will.

Sir R. Bethell, Mr. Glasse and Mr. Welford appeared for the plaintiff.

The Solicitor General and Mr. Hobhouse, for Edmund Henry Turton.

The arguments in the case are fully stated in the judgment of the Vice Chancellor.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—On the 19th of May 1830 Robert Bell Livesey made his will. At that time, and at his death, he had living his wife (Jane Livesey), one child (Marianne, the wife of Edmund Turton), and three grandchildren (the children of Mr. and Mrs. Turton), viz., Edmund Henry Turton (the eldest son), Robert Consett Turton (the second son), and Marianne Terese Turton, afterwards Mrs. Lambarde (the daughter), and a nephew (John Bell). The testator was owner of the Kildale estate, in Yorkshire. Edmund Turton was in possession of the Turton estate. John Bell was in possession of the Bell estate. It was arranged that I should assume as facts that Edmund Turton was tenant for life of the Turton estate, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail; and that John Bell was tenant for life of the Bell estate, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail. The testator died on the 15th of November 1831, and thereupon Jane Livesey, his widow, entered into possession of the Kildale estate. She died on the 17th of October 1846, when Marianne Turton, the testator's daughter, entered into possession of the Kildale estate. She died in May 1858. Edmund Turton, the husband of the testator's daughter, had died in March 1857. On the death of Marianne Turton, the person who would have been according to the limitations in the will entitled to the possession of the Kildale estate, if he had been alive, was Robert Consett Turton, the second son of Mr. and Mrs. Turton, but he had died an infant, without issue, on the 17th of November 1831, two days after the death of the testator. Next to him in the order of the limitations in the will, as there were no other younger sons of Mr. and Mrs. Turton, was the defendant, E. H. Turton, who, according to the limitations in the will, was next tenant for life; he entered into possession wrongfully, as the plaintiff insists, inasmuch as on the death of his father, Edmund Turton, in March 1857, he had become seised of the Turton estate, and that therefore the event had happened which was provided for by the shifting clause, upon the happening of which the limitation made by the will in his favour was to cease, determine and be absolutely void, and the devised estate was to go over to the person next entitled in remainder under the will. The defendant E. H. Turton insists that the shifting clause does not apply to him. The first question, therefore, is, whether the shifting clause is to be held to apply to E. H. Turton.—[His Honour having read the clause said]—Now it is perfectly clear that, according to the plain meaning of this language, E. H. Turton is one of the persons coming within the description "any other tenant for life or in tail." He is a tenant for life under the limitations contained in the will, and is, therefore, clearly within the express words of the shifting clause. What is desired on the part of E. H. Turton is, that the Court should, in effect, introduce into the will an exception in his favour, exempting him from the operation of the clause. If this is to be done, it must be by reason of something to be collected from the will leading irresistibly to the conclusion that the testator could not possibly have meant him to be included among the persons to whom the clause was to apply. The following are the grounds on which the defendant contends that the testator did not intend the clause to apply to him. It is said that, if the shifting clause is held to apply to E. H. Turton, he never could, by possibility, take any benefit from the devised estate, for he would come into possession of the Turton estate on his father's death; and under the limitations of the will he could not come into possession of the devised estate until after the death of the survivor of his father and mother; so that he could never be in possession of the devised estate for a single moment without having also become seised of the Turton estate; therefore, the instant he became entitled in possession to the devised estate under the limitations, the shifting clause (if it applies to him) would cause it to pass away from him. The result of this would be, that he could not exercise the powers of jointuring, and charging portions for younger children, which were given to all the tenants for life. Now, it is perfectly true that such would be the result of holding that the shifting clause applies to E. H. Turton; but it does not appear to me that this is a sufficient reason for holding that the testator meant to exempt him from the operation of the clause, which, in express terms, applies to him. In truth, the argument resolves itself into this: As the effect of the shifting clause, when applied to E. H. Turton, is that he never can enjoy the devised estate for a single day, why did the testator include him in the limitations at all? If there were no other answer to this question than that such was the testator's caprice, I apprehend it would be sufficient. But I think it was not unnatural that the testator should include him in the limitations, although he would not derive any benefit therefrom. The testator meant that the devised estate should devolve on the second and other younger sons of E. H. Turton, in tail male; those limitations would, at least until E. H. Turton should have a second son born, be contingent remainders, which would require an estate of freehold to support them; and, accordingly, the testator has limited an estate for life to E. H. Turton, with a limitation, in case of the determination of that estate by any means in his lifetime, to trustees during his life, in trust to preserve the contingent remainders; and thus the contingent remainders to the second and every other younger son of E. H. Turton are effectually supported and preserved. It is true that this might have been done by limiting an estate to the trustees during the life of E. H. Turton without limiting any estate to him at all, but the testator has chosen to produce the same effect by limiting an estate for life to E. H. Turton, with a limitation to the trustees, and although the life estate to E. H. Turton is barren of enjoyment, the mode of limitation presents a more uniform appearance with the other instances in which the testator has in this will limited an estate to trustees to preserve contingent remainders than if he had altogether omitted E. H. Turton. And as to the argument that, if the shifting clause be applied to E. H. Turton he could never exercise the power of jointuring and charging portions, the answer is, that the proviso in the will which follows next after these powers is of itself sufficient to preclude him from exercising them.

It is secondly argued that, according to the express terms of the shifting clause, the limitation made by the will in favour of any tenant for life becoming seised of the Turton estate is to cease and determine; and it is insisted that if the shifting clause is held to apply to E. H. Turton, he would not have any estate or interest in the devised estate which could cease and determine, for then the devised estate would never come to him. This argument is founded on a fallacy. It rests on the assumption that the devised estate would never come to E. H. Turton at all. This is a false assumption. The devised estate would come to him, and did come to him, although it would not remain with him. He took a vested life estate in remainder, by virtue of the limitations, but as soon as he became seised of the Turton estate, the shifting clause came into operation, and caused his life estate to cease and determine.

The third argument is, that the testator has in the limitation of the estate postponed E. H. Turton, "though the eldest son," and his male issue, to all the younger sons of Mr. and Mrs. Turton, and their male issue, which he did because he anticipated E. H. Turton would become seised of the Turton estate. The testator, therefore, having for that reason excluded him from his natural and proper place in the series of limitations, and introduced him into a lower place, has shewn that he did not intend that the same reason should operate to his total exclusion, but that he intended it to operate only to the extent of his being postponed to the younger sons and their issue. If this argument affords a sufficient reason for exempting E. H. Turton from the operation of the shifting clause, it affords an equally sufficient reason for exempting therefrom his second and other younger sons and their issue male, for they are equally excluded from their natural and proper place in the series of limitations, and are introduced in a lower place. And yet no one, I suppose, would contend that the testator intended that the second or any other younger son of E. H. Turton might hold both of the estates together.

The fourth argument is this: the eldest son of E. H. Turton is altogether passed over and omitted from the limitations of the devised estate, and the testator intended to exclude him from all interest in the devised estate, because he anticipated that he would eventually come into possession of the Turton estate. The reason would have induced the testator altogether to pass over and omit E. H. Turton from the limitations if he had intended the shifting clause to apply to him; for E. H. Turton was even more certain of becoming seised of the Turton estate than his eldest son. This argument is very much of the same character as the first, for it resolves itself into this, why did the testator include E. H. Turton at all in the series of limitation? I do not think it necessary to repeat the answer.

In the fifth place, it is argued that if E. H. Turton had now an eldest and second son, the devised estate would, according to the plaintiff's contention, go to the second son, although the eldest son would not come into possession of the Turton estate till after the father's death, so that during the father's life his second son would be in possession of the devised estate, while the eldest son would be unprovided for until the father's death, and it is contended that this is a very improbable intention to attribute to the testator. I confess it does not appear to me so very improbable that such should be the testator's intention, although the effect would no doubt be that during the father's life the second son would be better off than the first. At all events, any such improbability cannot, in my opinion, prevail against the clear and express words used by the testator.

The last argument to be noticed is this: the testator, at the end of the shifting clause, declares it to be his wish and intention that both the estates should not vest in the same person, except as was otherwise thereinbefore provided for. And it is contended that there is not any case provided for by the previous limitations in which the two estates may vest in the same person other than the case of E. H. Turton. Therefore, it was not the wish and intention of the testator that both the estates should not vest in E. H. Turton. This argument appears to me to be founded on a false assumption. There is a case provided for by the previous limitations in which the two estates might vest in the same person, namely, the case of E. Turton, the father of E. H. Turton. He was already in possession of the Turton estate, and the shifting clause cannot apply to him, because the words are "shall become seised of the settled family estates of the said E. Turton." It is true that by the codicil the life estate devised to E. Turton is revoked, but the words "except as is otherwise hereinbefore provided for" have reference to the terms of the will as it stood before the codicil was made, and not to those of the codicil. Now, I am far from thinking that the answers I have suggested to the arguments on behalf of E. H. Turton are such as to deprive them of all weight. Notwithstanding any answer that may be given to them, these arguments, at least some of them, still retain much of their force. But what is the extent of this force? Do they go to shew that there is anything in the limitations of the devised estate so contradictory or repugnant or inconsistent with the shifting clause, if applied to E. H. Turton, as to lead irresistibly to the conclusion, that the testator could not intend the shifting clause to apply to him? Far from it. Giving to those arguments their utmost weight and effect, they result in this conclusion: that it is somewhat strange that the testator, intending the shifting clause to apply to E. H. Turton, should have framed the limitations precisely as he has done, and that consistently with that intention, it might have been expected that he would have shaped the limitations in a more skilful and workmanlike manner. This seems to me the utmost extent of the force belonging to those arguments, and this is wholly insufficient to prevail against the plain language of the shifting clause, by which it is made applicable to every tenant for life or in tail who shall become seised of the Turton estate, without any exception in favour of E. H. Turton. The will, no doubt, contains in several places indications that its framer was not a very careful or experienced conveyancer, but the clumsiness of the draftsman is not to be used as a reason for getting rid of the clearly expressed intention of the testator. I am of opinion that the shifting clause must be held to apply to E. H. Turton.

I now come to the second and most material question in the cause, which is this. On the death of Mr. Turton in March 1857, E. H. Turton became seised of the Turton estate; the event then happened, upon which by the operation of the shifting clause the limitation of the devised estate in favour of E. H. Turton ceased and determined. At that time his mother, Mrs. Turton, was tenant for life in possession of the devised estate. She died in May 1858. And the question is, who upon her death became entitled to the devised estate? Upon reading the testator's will two things, at least, are clearly seen to have been intended by the testator. The one is, that the devised estates should go to the second or other younger sons of E. H. Turton in tail male, after their father's death, and before it should go to Mrs. Lambarde and her first and other sons in tail. About this intention there can be no shadow of doubt. The words are clear: "And from and immediately after the death of the said E. H. Turton, to the use of the second son of E. H. Turton lawfully begotten, and the heir male of the body of such second son lawfully issuing, and for default of such issue then to the use of the third, fourth and all and every other the younger son and sons of the said E. H. Turton;" and then follows a remainder to the use of the first and third sons of Mrs. Turton by any future husband in tail male, and not until after these limitations comes the limitation to the use of Mrs. Lambarde for life. The testator clearly intended that the devised estate should not go to Mrs. Lambarde until after failure of the second and other younger sons of E. H. Turton and their issue male. And as the limitations to the use of the second and other sons of E. H. Turton are contingent remainders, the testator has carefully guarded them from destruction by limiting an estate to trustees and their heirs during the life of E. H. Turton, upon the express trust to support and preserve those contingent remainders from being defeated or destroyed, and for that purpose to make entries and bring actions as occasion may require. The existence, then, and the continuance of the estate of the trustees to preserve contingent remainders was a prominent and important design of the testator, in order to effectuate his intention to give the estate to the second and other sons of E. H. Turton in tail male. The other thing clearly intended by the testator was, that, except in the case of E. H. Turton, the devised estate and the Turton estate should never vest in the same person; and to effectuate that intention he has introduced the shifting clause. Now, it is a plain rule that any particular passage in a will is to be so construed as to give effect to the testator's clear intention collected from the whole will, so that if two distinct intentions are clearly collected from the will, any particular passage ought to be so construed as, if possible, to carry into effect both these intentions. If, indeed, the case should arise in which it is impossible to effect both intentions, of course, one must be sacrificed to the other; but that is never to be done until every endeavour has been used to find such a construction as shall effectuate both. Let me apply this to the case now under consideration. E. H. Turton having, on his father's death, become seised of the Turton estate, by the express terms of the shifting clause his life estate has ceased and determined. To whom, then, is the estate to go? What says the shifting clause? Its language is this:—"And the said hereby devised manors, advowson, messuages, lands, tenements and real estate, with the appurtenances, shall go over to the person next entitled in remainder under and by virtue of this my will." What construction is to be put on this language? Who is "the person next entitled in remainder under and by virtue of the will"? Mrs. Lambarde insists, as all the prior tenants for life are dead, and as R. C. Turton died without issue, and as there never was any other younger son of Mr. and Mrs. Turton, and as there is no second son of E. H. Turton, and as there never was any son of Mrs. Turton by a second marriage, she, Mrs. Lambarde, is the person to whom, according to the true construction of the clause, the estate is to go over, as being next entitled in remainder under and by virtue of the will. Let us consider what will be the effect of adopting this construction with reference to both the intentions, which I have pointed out as being manifest on the face of the will. It does not, indeed, at all conflict with the one intention, that the devised estate and the Turton estate shall not vest in the same person. But it entirely defeats the other clear intention of the testator, viz., that the estate shall go to the second and other younger sons of E. H. Turton. If Mrs. Lambarde is now the legal tenant for life in possession, as she insists that she is, the estate limited to the trustees during the life of E. H. Turton in trust to preserve the contingent remainders is gone, and the contingent remainders to the second and other younger sons of E. H. Turton are destroyed, and thus the clear and manifest intention of the testator in this respect is utterly defeated. Now, of course, if this is the necessary construction of the clause it cannot be helped, and the consequences must follow. But is this the necessary construction? Is the language of the clause incapable of any other construction, by the adoption of which the whole intention of the testator may be preserved? It must be observed, that the words "next entitled in remainder" mean next after the person whose estate and interest is to cease and determine. And it must be further observed, that it has long been settled that the estate to trustees to preserve contingent remainders is a good vested remainder. When, therefore, the estate for life limited to E. H. Turton ceased and determined by reason of his having become seised of the Turton estate, who was in the most strict and accurate sense the person entitled in remainder next to him? Without doubt James Serjeantson, the survivor of the two trustees, to whom the estate was limited during the life of E. H. Turton in trust to preserve the contingent remainders. And by thus construing the clause, both the intentions of the testator before referred to are preserved: his intention that the devised estate and the Turton estate should not vest in the same person is preserved, and so also is his other equally clear intention, that the devised estate should go to the second son of E. H. Turton (if he should ever have one) in tail male. Here, then, we have two constructions of the passage offered to us: the one, that which is contended for by Mrs. Lambarde, which would defeat one of the two intentions of the testator, and the other, that which would preserve them both. And, according to principle, the Court ought to adopt the latter. Upon a review of the authorities, to which I shall presently refer, I think it may be laid down as a general rule that where, as in the present case, an estate for life is by will limited to one, with a limitation to trustees during his life, in trust to preserve contingent remainders, followed by a limitation to any of his unborn sons in tail, and there is a shifting clause similar to that in the present case, by virtue of which the estate and interest of such tenant for life is made to cease and determine by the acquisition of another property, or by succeeding to a title, or in any other similar event, and the estate is to go over to the person next entitled in remainder, the expression "the person next entitled in remainder" shall, in order to effectuate the testator's intention, be held to mean the trustees to preserve contingent remainders, if there be any contingent remainders to be preserved; although in a case in which there are no contingent remainders to be preserved the construction may be different. In this case there are contingent remainders to be preserved, viz., the remainders limited to the second and other sons of E. H. Turton in tail male; and, therefore, I must hold, as the event has happened upon which the life estate of E. H. Turton has ceased and determined, the devised estate has become vested in J. Serjeantson, the surviving trustee, to preserve contingent remainders. But a question still remains, who, under these circumstances, is entitled to the beneficial enjoyment of the rents and profits? Not the trustee to preserve contingent remainders: he is clearly a mere trustee, and was never intended to have any beneficial enjoyment. Not Mrs. Lambarde, or any other person entitled after the expiration or failure of those contingent remainders which the trustee's estate is to support; there is no present trust declared of them. Is then E. H. Turton, the quondam tenant for life, entitled to the rents and profits? I apprehend certainly not. True it is that in declaring the limitations of the devised estate the testator has declared that the trustees to preserve contingent remainders shall hold in trust to permit E. H. Turton during his life to receive and take the rents, issues and profits of the devised estate for his own use and benefit. But by the shifting clause which follows the testator has declared that in the event which has happened of E. H. Turton becoming seised of the Turton estate, the limitation by the will made in his favour shall cease and determine and be absolutely void as if he were dead, and has moreover expressly declared his intention to be that both the estates should not vest in the same person. Therefore, to hold that E. H. Turton is entitled to the rents and profits of the estate now vested in the trustee to preserve contin-gent remainders would be to decide in direct contravention of the plainly declared intention of the testator; it would be merely changing his previous legal estate for life into an equitable estate for his life. The result is, that the beneficial interest in the rents and profits of the devised estate since the death of Mrs. Turton, in May 1858, is undisposed of by the will, and consequently devolves by descent on the testator's heir-at-law; and it will be found when I come to examine the authorities that they are in accordance with this conclusion. The heir-at-law of the testator at his death was his daughter, Mrs. Turton. Whether she made a will which would have the effect of disposing of this interest does not appear; if not, her eldest son and heir, E. H. Turton, is now entitled to the beneficial interest. But, be it observed, if entitled, he is entitled, not under the will, but by descent. At all events, it is sufficient for the purposes of this suit that I declare my opinion to be that Mrs. Lambarde is not entitled to these rents and profits.

I now proceed to examine the authorities on the subject. In Doe v. Heneage, before Lord Kenyon and Buller, J. and Grose, J., the question arose on the will of Thomas Heneage. His Honour stated the facts of the case, and said the question was, whether upon George Fieschi Heneage becoming seised in possession of the uncle's estate, the devised estate did or did not go to the trustees to preserve contingent remainders. If it did not, then the contingent remainders to the first and other sons of G. F. Heneage in tail male were defeated, and the estate devolved on G. F. Heneage in fee, as the testator's heir, and the plaintiff took nothing under the will. If the estate did go to the trustees to preserve, then the contingent remainders to the first and other sons of G. F. Heneage were preserved, and the defendant and the plaintiff became on their births successive tenants in tail male in remainder; and upon the defendant becoming on his father's death seised in possession of the uncle's estate, the shifting clause operated to cause his estate tail under his grandfather's will to cease, and the devised estate thereupon went over to the plaintiff as being the next in remainder. The Court of Queen's Bench decided, that on G. F.

Heneage, the tenant for life, becoming seised in possession of the uncle's estate, the devised estate passed under the shifting clause to the trustees to preserve contingent remainders, and so the contingent remainders to his first and other sons were preserved.

This is a strong case, because, in order to arrive at this conclusion, it was necessary to get over these words in the shifting clause, "And in such case my will and meaning is, that the next in remainder, according to the uses of this my will, shall succeed to, and have and enjoy my estate hereby devised, as if my said son, G. F. Heneage, or any such son or sons of his was or were respectively dead." These were certainly difficult words to get over, because if G. F. Heneage had been actually dead, there would of course have been an end of the estate to the trustees to preserve contingent remainders, which was only to endure during the life of G. F. Heneage. But the Court did get over these words in favour of the clear intention of the testator, that the devised estate should go to the first and other sons of G. F. Heneage. The Court seems to have considered that the first and other sons of G. F. Heneage were those who substantially possessed the testator's regard as next in remainder to G. F. Heneage, though they were unborn, and that the estate to the trustees was, in his view, a mere instrument for preserving the remainders limited to them, and as it were an appendage to those remainders. If G. F. Heneage had actually died, the next in remainder would have been his first son, if he had one; and in directing the estate to go to the next in remainder, as if G. F. Heneage were dead, the testator intended that it was to go to his first son, if he should have one at his death; and that intention could only be accomplished by holding that the estate should go to the trustees to preserve the contingent remainders to the first and other sons; and so the Court held. Besides the words I have mentioned as difficult to get over, there were in that case other words in the clause which also presented some difficulty, though not so great. The language of the shifting clause was, "The next in remainder shall succeed to, and have and enjoy my said estates." The word "enjoy" seemed to point to some person or persons who should take the estate beneficially, and not to mere trustees to preserve contingent remainders. Yet the Court got over that difficulty, in order to effectuate the testator's intention, that if ever G. F. Heneage should have a son, the estate should go to that son in tail. It is considered that some doubt was thrown upon the decision in Doe v. Heneage, by a passing observation of Lord Ellenborough in Carr v. Lord Errol. Unfortunately, that case being decided upon a case sent out of Chancery, we have, according to the then practice, only the certificate, without any reasons, and therefore it is impossible to know whether the Court did, upon full deliberation, still retain any doubt upon the decision in Doe v. Heneage, which I shall presently consider. Upon examining Carr v. Lord Errol, it will be seen that the shifting clause was altogether different from that in Doe v. Heneage, and that the decisions and the cases are perfectly consistent with each other; and though Doe v. Heneage has been cited in a great number of subsequent cases, I am not aware it has ever been formally disapproved of. But whether Lord Kenyon and the other Judges who decided Doe v. Heneage were or were not justified in getting over the difficult words which occurred in the shifting clause in that case, no such difficulty is presented by the case now before me. The shifting clause, in both cases, consists of two distinct branches: the one directing, upon the happening of a certain event, the ceasing of the estate or interest limited to a party, and the other directing that the estate shall go over to the next in remainder. In Doe v. Heneage the latter branch of the clause was in these terms: "And in such case my will and meaning is, that the next in remainder, according to the uses of this my will, shall succeed to, and have and enjoy my said estate hereby devised, as if my son George F. Heneage was dead." So that, to this latter branch of the clause, directing that the estate should go over to the next in remainder, there was added a direction, that it should go to the next in remainder as if G. F. Heneage was dead; and it was this last-mentioned direction that presented the difficulty, because if G. F. Heneage was dead, the estate of the trustees to preserve contingent remainders, which was only to endure during his life, would have been determined. In the case now before me this last-mentioned direction does not occur. For though it is true the words "as if he were dead" do occur in the shifting clause, they occur not in connexion with the latter branch of the clause, which directs that the estate shall go to the next in remainder, but in connexion with the former branch, which directs the ceasing of the estate limited to the party becoming entitled to the other property.

The terms of the shifting clause in the case before me are, "then and from thenceforth the limitations hereby made in his favour shall cease, determine and be absolutely void, as if he were dead, and the said hereby devised lands shall go over to the person next entitled in remainder," without adding "as if he were dead." So that the direction is, that his estate is to cease as if he were dead; but not that the lands shall go over to the next in remainder as if he were dead. This appears to me to be a substantial and important distinction. What then is the meaning and operation of the words "as if he were dead," when added to the branch of the clause which directs the ceasing of his estate? Simply to express in strong and unmistakeable terms the testator's intention that the estate of the tenant for life is to cease absolutely and entirely, and to all intents and purposes. If he were dead, of course his estate would cease absolutely and entirely, and to all intents and purposes; and therefore the testator, intending that the estate should cease absolutely and entirely, and to all intents and purposes, illustrates his intention by saying, that it shall cease as if the party were dead, although not actually dead. But these words, "as if he were dead," having thus performed their function in the former branch of the clause, which directs the ceasing of the estate, what ground is there for carrying them on to the latter branch of the clause, which directs that the lands shall go over to the person next entitled in remainder? Why are we to construe this latter branch as if the testator had said, that the land shall go over to the person next entitled in remainder, as if the party were dead, when in truth he has said no such thing? To do so appears to me to be nothing less than a gratuitous importation into a will of a direction which the testator has not inserted, and which, so far from being required in order to effectuate any general intention of the testator, does in fact defeat it. So that even if the decision in Doe v. Heneage be open to reasonable doubt, the ground for such doubt does not exist in the case now under consideration. And even if Doe v. Heneage had been actually overruled, which it never has been, it would not cease to be deserving of notice, as shewing how strong is the disposition of a Court of justice to get over difficulties, in order to give effect to the testator's intention that the estate should go to the unborn son of the party whose estate is to cease and determine. The only expression in the shifting clause, in the present case, which presents any difficulty, is the word "person" in the singular number: the words being, "shall go over to the person next entitled in remainder," from which it may be argued, that the testator could not have intended by that word "person," in the singular, to express the two trustees to preserve the contingent remainders; but I do not feel any hesitation in getting over that difficulty in favour of the clear intention.

I now come to the case of Carr v. Lord Errol. This is a clear case in which there was no need to keep up the estate to the trustees to preserve contingent remainders, because the testator himself directed that on the happening of the event upon which the shifting clause was to come into operation, the contingent remainders as well as the life estate were to cease, and therefore there were no longer any contingent remainders to be preserved.—[His Honour stated the facts of the case and proceeded]—Here the shifting clause is very different from that in Doe v. Heneage, as well as from that in the case now before me, for, by the very terms of the shifting clause itself, upon W. Hay, the tenant for life, becoming Earl of Errol, not only his life estate, but the estate and use limited in remainder to his sons in tail was directed to cease and determine, that is, the contingent remainders which the estate to the trustees was intended to support, were at an end, and therefore no longer needed in order to effectuate the testator's intention. Therefore, the Court decided that Lady Charlotte Carr was the person next in remainder. The decision in Carr v. Lord Errol does not in the least conflict with that in Doe v. Heneage. The next case is Stanley v. Stanley, before Sir William Grant.—[His Honour stated the facts of the case.]—It was there held, first, that Thomas Massey took a vested estate for life, after an estate in the trustees for so many years as his minority might last; secondly, that the question on the shifting clause must be decided in the same manner as if, instead of a direction to the trustees to convey to the uses mentioned, the devise had been directed to those uses; and, thirdly, that the trustees in making the conveyance directed, had no power to mould or to alter the limitations. Now, in June 1800, Thomas Massey had become possessed of the Puddington estate, and so the event had happened upon which his estate for life ceased and determined. At that time he had no son born, so the limitations to his first and other sons in tail male were then contingent remainders which required the existence of the estate in the trustees to support them. T. Massey attained the age of twenty-one in 1804, up to which time there was no doubt the devisees in trust were to receive the rents and to lay them out in the purchase of other estates. He had no son born until November 1806, so that nearly three years elapsed between the time when his life estate under the will ceased, and the birth of his first son. The first question then was, who, upon the cesser of the life estate of T. Massey, became entitled to the devised lands as the person next in remainder? It was contended, by John, the next brother and the next tenant for life under the limitations, that he was entitled. Now, it is important to observe that John in that case stood precisely in the same position as Mrs. Lambard does in the present case. And what said Sir W. Grant to the claim of John:—"The next question is, who became entitled as the person next in remainder under the limitations? By that description must be meant the person next in remainder after the person upon whom the Puddington estate devolved. It is not easy to conceive how John could say he sustained that character and answered that description, there being a previous limitation or, which is the same thing, a direction for such limitation to trustees to preserve contingent remainders, and remainders to the first and other sons of T. Massey. It was, however, contended that, as the next person in remainder was to become entitled to the possession, he must be a person capable of possession, and therefore a son of Thomas could not answer that description. The answer to the objection is, that the trustees to preserve contingent remainders were the next, and they were capable of possession, and under the protection of their estate the contingent remainders to the first and other sons of Thomas were also to be considered as subsisting remainders, to prevent John's answering the description of next in remainder." That passage is a complete answer to the claim of Mrs. Lambarde; and it will be observed that the reason here given by Sir W. Grant for coming to that conclusion was, that, under the protection of the estate of the trustees to preserve contingent remainders, the contingent remainders to the unborn first and other sons of Thomas were to be considered as subsisting remainders, so as to prevent John's answering the description of next in remainder. So in the present case, under the protection of the estate of the trustees to preserve the contingent remainders, the contingent remainders to the second unborn and every other younger son of E. H. Turton are to be considered as subsisting remainders, so as to prevent Mrs. Lambarde answering the description of next in remainder. The following observations of Sir W. Grant bear very strongly upon this case, and the learned Judge held that the trustees to preserve contingent remainders took the devised estate as next in remainder until the birth of a son of Thomas, and that such son became entitled on his birth as tenant in tail. The second question was, who was entitled to the rents between the time when Thomas attained twenty-one and the birth of his son? and Sir W. Grant held, that they were undisposed of by the will and belonged to the testator's heir-at-law.

The next case to be noticed is Morris v. Langham. The two reports of this case, though relating to a litigation between the same parties, do, in fact, relate to two totally different instruments, containing different shifting clauses, and are to all intents and purposes two distinct and separate cases.—[His Honour stated the cases.]—The question under the will came before the Vice-Chancellor of England, who decided the point as to the devised copyhold, and also partially decided as to the appointed freehold, holding that a certain interest in those freeholds was undisposed of by the will, and that therefore the right to that interest must be governed by the deed; and he sent a case for the opinion of the Court of Exchequer on the deed, which case was, of course, framed upon the supposition that the power of appointment had not been exercised. So that, in the report in Meeson & Welsby, we have the decision of the Court of Exchequer upon the deed, and in the report in Simons we have the decision of the Vice-Chancellor upon the will. I will consider first the case in the Exchequer on the deed.—[His Honour stated the facts of the case, and said]—On the 12th of May 1812 James Langham became entitled in possession to the family estates of his father, Sir James Langham; and the questions for the opinion of the Court were, first, whether, upon the death of Francis Tuttle, in January 1824, Herbert Langham, the second son of Sir James Langham, took any and what estate in the lands comprised in the deed; and, secondly, whether Langham Christie took any and what estate therein. In one respect the shifting clause resembles that in Carr v. Lord Errol, viz., that on the event happening of James Langham becoming entitled to the possession of the family estates of Sir James Langham, not only was the use and estate limited to him to cease and determine, but also the uses and estates limited to his issue male, i. e., to his first and other sons. So that there no longer remained any contingent remainders which required to be preserved by the estate limited to the trustees to preserve contingent remainders, and the estate was to go over in the same manner as if he were actually dead without issue male, and therefore, as in Carr v. Lord Errol, it was decided that the estate went not to the trustees to preserve contingent remainders, because there were no contingent remainders to preserve, but to Langham Christie, the person who would have been next entitled if James Langham had actually died without issue male.

It now remains to consider the case of Morrice v. Langham, in Simons, which was the case upon the will of Francis Tutte, dated the 24th of June 1820.—[His Honour stated the facts of that case.]—The testator died on the 13th of January 1824. On the 14th of April 1833 James Hay Langham became entitled in possession to the settled estates of Sir James Langham. J. H. Langham had then no son born. Edward Ayshford Landford was the heir of Herbert Hay, and he contended that as the life estate of J. H. Langham had ceased and determined, and there was no son of J. H. Langham to take the estate, he was entitled to the estate as the person next in remainder under the limitations. That contention was precisely the same as that which is now raised by Mrs. Lambard, for she contends that, as the life estate of E. H. Turton has ceased and determined, and there is no second son of E. H. Turton to take the estate, she is the person next in remainder under the limitations. The Court decided against the claim of the heir of H. Hay. With reference to that claim, the Vice Chancellor says, at page 279, "It appears to me that it is quite impossible to argue the case on behalf of the heir of H. Hay without running into a manifest inconsistency, and without, in effect, contradicting the principle of Hopkins v. Hopkins, and other cases of that kind, which are unquestionable. It appears to me that the real effect of Stanley v. Stanley, Doe v. Heneage and Carr v. Lord Errol is this, that the Courts are bound to construe the words of cesser, as nearly as they possibly can, in their simple and ordinary sense; and my opinion is, that there is no mode whatever of construing the words of cesser in the will of Mr. Tutte which can have the effect of giving any interest to the right heirs of H. Hay." The Vice Chancellor does not here expressly refer to the estate limited to the trustees during the life of the tenant for life in trust to preserve contingent remainders, because the whole legal fee being in the devisees in trust, that estate, according to Hopkins v. Hopkins, was of itself sufficient to support all the contingent remainders, even if there had not been an estate limited to trustees during the life of the tenant for life in trust to preserve contingent remainders. The Court having decided against the claim of the heir of H. Hay, the next question was, who was entitled to the rents and profits from the time when J. H. Langham became possessed of the settled estates of Sir J. Langham until he should have a son to take the estate? J. H. Langham could not have them because his estate and interest had ceased and determined by the express direction of the testator. The specific disposition of them having failed, the rents of the freeholds were held to go as in default of appointment, and to belong to the person who might be entitled under the deed of 1804, which created the power, and for that reason the Vice Chancellor directed the case to be sent to the Court of Exchequer upon the question under that deed. As to the rents of the copyholds, which were not included in the deed, and, therefore, not appointed but devised, it was held, that they belonged to the residuary devisee. On appeal to the House of Lords (1) the decree was affirmed as to the copyholds, but it was reversed as to the freeholds, not on the merits, but merely on the ground that it was an attempt to decide a question between co-defendants.

These authorities appear to me to be sufficient to establish these propositions:—First, that in cases of this nature the Court will endeavour to effectuate the testator's intention that the estate should go to the unborn sons of the tenant for life whose estate has ceased and determined, as well as his intention that the two estates should not vest in the same person. Secondly, that for this end the Court will struggle with and, if possible, get over particular expressions which seem to stand in the way of that intention. Thirdly, that if there be contingent remainders to the unborn sons of a tenant for life, whose life estate has ceased and determined, which require to be supported by the estate limited to trustees to preserve contingent remainders, those trustees shall, if possible, be held to take the estate as the persons next in remainder, for the purpose of supporting the contingent remainders next in remainder, and not the person to whom the estate is limited after the expiration or failure of the estates limited to the unborn sons of the tenant for life. Fourthly, that the intermediate rents accruing between the time when the estate of the tenant for life ceased and the birth of his son entitled under the limitations, shall belong to the residuary devisee, if there be a residuary devise, and if not, then to the testator's heir-at-law. Mrs. Lambard's bill must, therefore, be dismissed.

Fixtures — Machinery — Mortgages — Rights against Creditors — Costs.

A leasee of steel and iron works assigned, by way of mortgage, the land, with the appurtenances, and also the machinery specified in the schedule, "and all engines, machinery, fixtures and things which might thereafter be fixed and fastened in or upon the said premises, whether in addition to or substitution of the several fixtures, machinery, articles and things specified in the schedule":—Held, that these words referred not merely to additions to existing machinery, but also to any new machinery fixed or fastened to the mill.

The construction of the words "fixed and fastened," as applied to machines, their adjuncts and removable parts.

The Albion Iron and Steel Works were established, by William Henry Brown, upon a piece of land at Neepsend, in the parish of Sheffield, which had been demised to him from the 25th of March 1856, for a term of 800 years, subject to various rents and covenants.

By a deed, dated the 23rd of September 1856, W. H. Brown assigned the works, the rolling-mill and the piece or parcel of land, with the appurtenances, and also all that steam-engine set up and fixed for working the rolling-mill and the boilers, wheels, shafts, machinery, gearing, apparatus, trains of rolls, shears, fixtures and things of, in and connected with the rolling-mill, as specified in the schedule thereunder written, and all engines, machinery, fixtures and things which might thereafter be fixed and fastened in or upon the same premises, whether in addition to or substitution of the several fixtures, machinery, articles and things specified in the said schedule, to Benjamin Vickers, Elias Lowe and Edward Vickers, to hold the land and such of the machinery and fixtures as were of the nature of realty, for the residue of the term of 800 years, subject to the rents and covenants reserved by the lease, and to hold such of the machinery and fixtures as were of the nature of personalty absolutely, as a security for the repayment, on the 23rd of March 1857, of the sum of 2,500*l.* with interest at 5*l.* per cent. The deed contained a power of sale on default; and also a power of entry, and a power of entry and distress; and W. H. Brown attorned tenant from year to year to the mortgagees.

The following schedule was attached to the deed:—Four steam boilers and steam pipes and valves, complete; sixty-horse power steam-engine, complete; driving-wheel and shaft, fly-wheel and shaft, two speed-wheels and shaft, long underground shaft, four speed-wheels at end of ditto, long train of rolls for file steel, consisting of a bed-plate and its foundation, ten standards or housings, one pair of pinions and four pairs of rolls, with spindles and coupling boxes to each pair; train of rolls for rounds, &c., consisting of bed-plates and foundations, ten standards or housings, three pinions, three high set of rolls, pair of two-feet rolls and two pairs of twelve-inch rolls with spindles and coupling boxes, complete; turning lathe, pair of shears, forty tons or upwards of cast-metal floor plates, nine large metal pillars and girders for roof of rolling-mill.

The plaintiffs, with a view to a loan, procured a new inventory and valuation to be made of the fixtures and fittings of the mill, but, on the 18th of February 1857, W. H. Brown again assigned the same premises by the same description and with the same schedule, to the plaintiffs, by way of mortgage, to secure the repayment of 500*l.* and interest.

On the 27th of October 1858, Messrs. Vickers & Lowe transferred their mortgage security of the 23rd of September 1856 to the plaintiffs.

On the 31st of August 1857 Mr. Brown assigned all the fixtures, articles and things, in the rolling-mill to Messrs. R. Brown & H. Cooper, for the benefit of his creditors, subject to the mortgages.

Various alterations were made both in the rolling-mill and in the machinery, &c., by additions, between the dates of the first and second mortgages, as well as after the date of the second mortgage.

The trustees under the deed of composition, claimed a great part of the machinery, &c. in the mill, and in particular nearly the whole of what had been substituted or added after the date of the mortgages; they consisted of a furnace, with plates at the mouth, a steam hammer and anvil, four pairs of rod rolls, one pair of cutters, two pairs of pinions, two straightening-plates, forty tons of additional metal flooring plates, a boiler, engine, and turning lathe, used for cutting the surface or the grooves in the rolls.

It was alleged that these were fixtures, and that some of them were comprised in a valuation made at the date of the second mortgage, and that such of them were intended to have been added to the schedule to that deed, but that they were by mistake omitted.

The bill then prayed that the plaintiffs might be declared entitled to the machinery, &c. in the rolling-mill, and that the schedule might be rectified.

Williams v. Evans, 23 Beav. 239.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The words, "all engines, machinery, fixtures and things which may be hereafter fixed and fastened in or upon the said premises," &c., in the mortgage-deed, refer to any new machinery fastened and fixed to the mill, and not merely to additions to existing machinery; and, though there is obscurity about the clauses in the deed on this subject, still whatever was substituted for anything which was loose at the date of the mortgage, and which was essential for the management and carrying on of the mill as a rolling-mill, would pass under those words. But it is not necessary to go into that question, as from the evidence it apparently does not arise. The words "fixed and fastened" may for the purpose of every question raised in this case, be considered as governing the meaning of the whole sentence; consequently, the Court has nothing to do but to regard the evidence in respect to each particular article in dispute, with a view to see whether, in the legal sense of the words, they are fixed on the premises, using the word "fixed" in the same way as it was in Mather v. Fraser. Now, so looking at it, I will consider the articles in the order they have been brought to the attention of the Court. The donkey engine has been given up. There is then the engine for the turning-lathe and the steam-hammer. I class them together, since it is admitted in the evidence that they stand on the same principle. The way they are fixed is this: some ashlar stone is laid on the ground on a sound foundation made for it at the same depth in the ground, and this ashlar stone is laid, with mortar, in the ordinary way; the steam-hammer, or at least the firm part of the machine, is screwed down on to the stone by screws; it is consequently fixed into the ground, and is a fixture. The ashlar stone is clearly built or fixed into the ground upon which this machine is fastened. It may, no doubt, be removed, and so may a steam-engine from any species of mill, if it is thought fit, if means are taken. Yet if it is built into the premises, it is treated as fastened to the ground. This steam-hammer must be considered as fastened to the freehold, and accordingly it comes within the clause of the deed. The anvil, though not fixed upon the ground, is adjacent to the machine, and essential to it. Therefore, so far as the engine for the turning-lathe and the steam-hammer and the anvil are concerned, they must go to the mortgagees under the terms of the deed. Then there is the boiler: that also is fastened to the freehold. It is impossible to treat it in any other point of view. Here, exactly in the same way, an excavation is made to obtain a firm foundation; then the masonry is built up to receive the boiler; the boiler is then placed into it on supports in the brickwork on which it rests; then two or three tiers of additional brickwork are added on the top to fasten it, and it is fixed there completely. It is impossible to say that the boiler is not built into or attached to the freehold, otherwise nothing is attached to the freehold. You must take away the brickwork in order to get it out; you are obliged to do the same with a copper or an oven, which is fixed into the ground. It must be held to be affixed to the ground. I had more doubt about the furnace; but the evidence satisfies me, that the furnace is also affixed to the freehold. It appears to stand thus:—In the first place, a foundation is built of common brick, which, as in other cases, goes down a certain depth into the ground, making a foundation. The furnace itself is constructed of fire-bricks fastened together with fire-clay in a peculiar mode, so as to form the greatest protection against fire which they are capable of acquiring, and it is cased with iron plates fastened together with iron rods which are driven through in various directions. If it were merely resting on the brickwork, there would have been considerable doubt whether it was or was not a fixture; but the evidence is, that the fire-bricks which form the bottom of the furnace touch upon the common bricks which form the foundation, and that it does not merely rest there; that the method is to unite the two with mortar. It is true, the furnace is made of bricks of a different species, probably of a more costly description, with a set of iron-plates attached to them, and for that reason they do not dovetail one brick into another, as in another part, and there is a different and complete layer of bricks on the top of the common bricks. In addition to that, two of the iron plates which are near the mouth of the furnace go down into the ground some little distance, close by the side of the brickwork, which is covered with earth, and it is fixed there by mortar, at the same time, to this common brick pedestal which supports it; it must, therefore, also be considered as a fixture in the same way. As to the cutters, they do not appear to be fixed on the bed. There is apparently a bed-plate, which is not fastened at all into the ground. The usual mode of putting down bed-plates is to make a solid foundation for them, sometimes of ashlar, sometimes mixed with wood, and then to rest the bed-plate on that; but the bed-plate is not fixed to it in any way whatever. There is not such a thing as a screw. They may clearly be moved, though no doubt a very considerable degree of power is required to move them, as they are very heavy; but they are merely resting on that foundation. Then comes the bed-plate which has been introduced into the mill subsequently to the mortgage-deed with the cutters, and the cutters do not appear to be in any way fastened to the freehold. The bed-plate is not fastened to the freehold, and even if it were, I doubt whether a cutter, merely wedged in with pieces of wood, which may be easily removed at pleasure, is different from those things which come within the case of Hutchinson v. Kay. The same observation applies to the straightening-plates, though there is a small portion of them which penetrates into the ground for a few inches; but that is merely accidental; it is not for the purpose of using the straightening-plate: it is made in that form for the purpose of preventing irregularities in its construction when cast. Accordingly, the straightening-plates when laid down do not appear to be fixtures, or fastened or fixed into the ground, and they must be treated as things which might be taken away. The evidence would seem to say that neither the straightening-plates nor the bed-plates for the cutters (although they form a part of the floor of the mill) could be used as the common metal-plate flooring of the mill. Then I come to the metal flooring of the mill, part of which, it appears, was put down between the date of the two mortgage-deeds, and part subsequently to the second deed. It appears to be quite loose, and therefore not a fixture. The question does not turn upon whether it is essential to the working of the mill, because, if half the mill is covered the rolling-mill can still be carried on effectually; although, no doubt, the mill would be more perfect, and it would be more convenient if the whole of the floor had been covered with these metal-plates. Then the question arises as to that part which was put down between the date of the two mortgage-deeds, whether this Court can reform the second deed by inserting the metal flooring, because, as I understand, the schedule of the second deed does not include the metal flooring. I cannot, however, alter the deed upon the valuation made when the plaintiffs took their mortgage. The parties who advanced this money, no doubt, intended to include in the deed everything which was included in the valuation. The metal flooring was, without doubt, there; but I cannot therefore include it in the deed in the absence of proof that it was omitted by a common mistake of both parties. There is nothing to shew that Mr. Brown made any mistake on the subject. The plaintiffs ought to have taken care that the schedule was so framed as to include it. Therefore, I think this part of the metal flooring must fall within the same category as the metal flooring put down subsequently to the date of both deeds, and must be treated as not passing under the mortgage to the plaintiffs. That will dispose of all the questions. The costs, however, will remain to be disposed of; and with respect to them there is some difficulty, as the plaintiffs, to a great extent, are right,—more right than the defendants. But I will consider before deciding.

Feb. 21.—THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.
—I must follow the rule, which is to make the costs follow the event where the claim succeeds. In that case it carries costs with it. The consequence is, that the costs of the suit, so far as they have been occasioned by the plaintiffs claiming the bed-plate and cutter, the straightening-plates and the metal flooring, or by the claim to have the second mortgage-deed rectified, must be paid by the plaintiffs, and the defendants must pay the rest of the costs of the suit.

SCOTT v. MILLER.

Attorney and Solicitor—6 & 7 Vict. c. 73. s. 32.—Barratry—Answer—Sufficiency—Privilege of Witness.

An agreement between A, a certificated conveyancer, and B, an attorney, that in case A. should introduce to B. any matters of professional business for which B. would have a claim for costs, B. would allow and pay to A. certain sums of money by way of commission, is not such a permitting by the attorney of his name to be made use of upon the account or for the profit of an unqualified person, as was intended to be provided against by the 32nd section of the Attorneys and Solicitors Act (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73.), nor would such an agreement subject the parties to the penalties for common barratry; and, therefore, where a defendant, an attorney, by his answer declined to answer interrogatories founded on a statement of such an agreement, on the ground that if the facts alleged in the bill were true, he was liable to be struck off the roll, and was liable to other pains and penalties under the statutes and laws in force concerning common barratry and maintenance, it was held, that the answer was insufficient.

A witness claiming to be privileged from answering, on the ground that he is not bound to criminate himself, must at all events swear that he is advised or believes that his answer will have that effect; and it is not sufficient to say that his answer would or might criminate him or tend to criminate him.

The bill, in this case, stated that in or previously to the year 1854, the plaintiff, who was a certificated conveyancer, entered into a verbal agreement with the defendant, who was an attorney and solicitor, that in case he, the plaintiff, should introduce to the defendant any matters of professional business for which the defendant could have a claim for costs, the defendant would allow and pay unto the plaintiff sums of money, by way of commission in respect of such matters of professional business, equal in amount to one moiety or half-part of the net gains and profits to be realised by the defendant from all such matters of professional business after deducting and retaining the amount of all monies expended and disbursed by the defendant on account of the said matters of professional business; and, also, that in case the plaintiff should employ the defendant as his attorney or solicitor to transact any matters of professional business for him, the defendant should not claim or charge against the plaintiff any costs or sums of money whatever in respect of the last-mentioned matters of professional business beyond the amount of the sums of money which the defendant might have expended or disbursed in relation to the last-mentioned matters of business.

The bill further stated, that the terms of this agreement were entered into and accepted by the defendant, and that it was acted upon, and in pursuance and consideration thereof various matters of professional business were from time to time introduced and recommended by the plaintiff to the defendant, and various matters of professional business, especially the bringing and prosecuting and defending of actions at law, were from time to time transacted by the defendant for clients introduced and recommended by the plaintiff; and that the defendant had from time to time received the amounts of his bills of costs relating to such matters of professional business, and became justly and truly indebted to the plaintiff in various sums of money in respect of the commission agreed to be allowed and paid to him by the defendant; that the defendant from time to time made to the plaintiff divers small payments on account of such commission, and had also transacted matters of professional business on behalf of the plaintiff personally, for which he was entitled to charge against the plaintiff the amount of his costs out of pocket, but that, after deducting all such payments and costs, a large balance was still due from the defendant to the plaintiff under the agreement.

By the sixth paragraph of the bill it was stated that neither the plaintiff nor the defendant at any time, directly or indirectly, did, or agreed to do, or join in doing any act whatever which could be construed to be an infringement of the provisions of the statute in force with regard to attornies and solicitors, inasmuch as the plaintiff never, directly or indirectly, interfered in any of the matters of professional business which he introduced to the defendant, nor had he at any time any right or claim whatever to receive any portion of the gains and profits realized and received by the defendant, nor did he at any time in any manner, directly or indirectly, act as, or represent himself to be the clerk or assistant of the defendant; nor did he ever use or obtain the permission of the defendant to use his name in any matter of professional business whatever; nor did he ever act as or hold himself out to be the agent of the defendant in any matter whatever; nor did the plaintiff at any time receive any sum of money whatever for or on account of the defendant in relation to the matters of professional business introduced by the plaintiff, except the sums of money which were paid to the plaintiff by the defendant as before mentioned.

The bill then prayed for a declaration that the agreement was valid and binding on the defendant, and for a decree for specific performance, and an account of what was due in respect of commission.

The defendant, by his answer, submitted that if the facts in the bill stated with reference to and arising out of the alleged agreement were according to the truth, the defendant was, under the provisions of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, liable to be struck off the roll, and for ever after disabled from practising as an attorney and solicitor, and was liable to other pains and penalties under the statutes and laws in force concerning common barratry and maintenance, and he, therefore, declined to answer the interrogatories founded upon the statement of the agreement.

To this answer the plaintiff excepted.

Mr. Willcock was not called upon to reply.

WOOD, V.C.—It appears to me that the agreement as averred is not one which would subject the defendant to the penalties he speaks of in his answer. The bill avers that the plaintiff is a certificated conveyancer, and a person, therefore, who might legitimately have opportunities of recommending clients to the defendant upon points of law which did not fall within his own province; and the agreement is averred to be, that in respect of all business introduced by him to the defendant, the defendant would allow and pay to him half the net profits; and the sixth paragraph of the bill contains a distinct averment that the plaintiff never directly or indirectly interfered in any of the matters of professional business which he introduced to the defendant, nor used his name, nor held himself out to be his agent; and that he did not at any time receive any sum of money whatever for or on account of the defendant in relation to the matters of professional business introduced by the plaintiff, except the sums of money which were paid to the plaintiff by the defendant. It clearly appears to me, therefore, that no penalty has been incurred under the statute.

The 2nd section of the act enacts that, "from and after the passing of this act no person shall act as an attorney or solicitor, or as such attorney or solicitor sue out any writ or process, or commence, carry on, solicit or defend any action, suit or other proceeding in the name of any other person or his own name . . . in any court of civil or criminal jurisdiction, . . . or act as an attorney or solicitor in any cause, matter or suit, civil or criminal, to be heard, tried or determined, before any Justice of assize, &c., unless such person shall have been previously to the passing of this act admitted and enrolled and otherwise duly qualified to act as an attorney or solicitor under or by virtue of the laws now in force, or unless such person shall after the passing of this act be admitted and enrolled, &c. pursuant to the directions and regulations of this act, and unless such person shall continue to be so duly qualified and on the roll at the time of his acting in the capacity of an attorney or solicitor as aforesaid." And the 32nd section enacts that, "if any attorney or solicitor shall wilfully and knowingly act as agent in any action or suit in any court of law or equity, or matter in bankruptcy, for any person not duly qualified to act as an attorney or solicitor as aforesaid, or permit or suffer his name to be anyways made use of in any such action, suit or matter upon the account or for the profit of any unqualified person, or send any process to such unqualified person, or do any other act thereby to enable such unqualified person to appear, act or practise in any respect as an attorney or solicitor in any suit at law or in equity, knowing such person not to be duly qualified as aforesaid, . . . then and in such case every such attorney or solicitor so offending shall and may be struck off the roll and for ever after disabled from practising as an attorney or solicitor."

Now, no doubt the earlier part of that section, down to the words "upon the account or for the profit of any unqualified person," standing alone, would reach a very large class of cases which the act was never intended to reach; such cases, for instance, as where a son carries on his father's business for the benefit of the family, or where a retiring solicitor stipulates with his successor that he shall be allowed an annuity in proportion to the profits. But it is quite clear that the statute was never intended to reach such cases as those; and this appears when you come to the subsequent words, "or do any other act thereby to enable such unqualified person to act as an attorney or solicitor." This, therefore, was the mischief intended to be guarded against by the act; but according to the averments in the bill, this is expressly negatived by the sixth paragraph, to which I have already adverted, for the plaintiff says, he never interfered in any matters of professional business which he introduced to the defendant; that having introduced it, he had nothing more to do with the business, except that he was to receive half the profits; and, if this statement is correct, it follows from Candler v. Candler that whatever may be the propriety of such an agreement, it would not bring the defendant within the penalties of the act.

Then, Mr. Bird says, that the alleged agreement, if proved, might subject the defendant to the penalties against barratry or maintenance; common barratry being defined to be the offence of frequently exciting and stirring up suits and quarrels between Her Majesty's subjects, either at law or otherwise (1); and maintenance being an officious intermeddling in a suit that no way belongs to one, by maintaining or assisting either party, with money or otherwise, to prosecute or defend it (2). This argument might have been of some force, if the plaintiff had been a person wholly unconnected with legal business, and had entered into such an agreement; but the plaintiff here is a certificated conveyancer, and in the course of his practice many cases might come before him involving business of a litigious nature, with which, as a conveyancer, he would have nothing to do. It is clear, that by merely introducing such business to the defendant and there leaving it, he would not be guilty of common barratry. I shall not now decide whether such an agreement as this can be enforced; but I can easily imagine a case in which it would not be against public policy, as where a solicitor is engaged in one kind of legal business, and is offered another with which he is not conversant, he is unwilling to undertake it himself, and he, therefore, hands it over on the terms of half profits to some other solicitor, who understands it. There would certainly be nothing against the policy of the law in that.

There was another point in Mr. Bird's argument which struck me more forcibly, and that was as to the tendency of the defendant's answer to establish a case which would subject him to penalties. The agreement, no doubt, is merely for the introduction of business; but if it can be shewn that in any case, after the plaintiff has introduced business, he has interfered with it, then the case would clearly be within the statute; but I do not think that argument can have any weight as the answer is at present framed, because I have held, that if the alleged facts are according to truth the defendant is not liable under the statute. There is nothing to shew that anything is here asked of the defendant that will subject him to penalties, or tend to do so. Upon the question of the propriety of such agreements as this, and the policy of encouraging them, I am unwilling to express any opinion before the hearing of the cause; the defendant does not rest his objection upon any want of equity, and the exceptions must be allowed. The question of costs will stand over till the hearing.

May 30.—The cause now came on upon exceptions to the further answer of the defendant, which was in the following terms:—

"I submit that I am not bound to discover or set forth, and I refuse to discover or set forth the matters which, by my former answer, I have refused to set forth, because the discovery of such matters would might shew, or tend to shew, that, under the provisions of the act of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, I am liable to be struck off the roll and for ever after disabled from practising as an attorney or solicitor."

Mr. Willcock and Mr. Bilton, for the plaintiff, contended that the answer was still insufficient, and that the matter stood in precisely the same position as before.

Mr. Bird, for the defendant, contended that the answer was sufficient, and that the defendant was not bound to go so far as to say that if he answered he would subject himself to penalties.

In addition to the cases cited on the former occasion, the following were referred to:—

Jackson and Wood, 1 B. & C. 270. 5 Ibid. 108; s.c. Price. 265;

Wood, V.C.—It is clear to me that the defendant is merely fencing with the question, and the exceptions must be allowed. Where a witness claims privilege on the ground that his answer will subject him to penalties, he must swear to his belief that his answer will so subject him. In that case before Knight Bruce, V.C., the defendants swore that they were advised, and did jointly and severally believe that the discovery of all, or any, of the matters or particulars by them declined to be answered would tend to subject them to penalties. On the former occasion I held that the answer was insufficient, because, upon a statement of what appeared to be a perfectly innocent agreement, the defendant submitted that it was illegal, which I held it was not. Then the question occurred, whether the agreement, though perfectly innocent on the face of the bill, might not come so near the words of the law that the introduction of a single word not appearing upon the bill would bring within the statute. But the defendant does not say he is advised or believes that his answer will have the effect of criminating himself. The further answer carries the matter no further than the former one. He does nothing more than again submit, in effect, that his answer would tend to subject him to penalties. I must, at least, have the security of his oath that he believes it will do so. In Fisher v. Ronalds, the rule was laid down, by Maule, J., as follows: he said,—"I apprehend the Court is bound by the witness's answer if he says on oath that he believes the question will tend to criminate him." Here, however, the witness says no such thing, and there is nothing in the bill to shew that the agreement is not perfectly innocent. The exceptions must be allowed, with costs.

KINDERSLEY, V.C. { In re THE NATIONAL
Feb. 19. PATENT STEAM FUEL COMPANY, ex parte
WORTH.

Company—Winding-up—Contributory—Misrepresentation of Directors.

The directors of a company, with the sanction of a general meeting of the shareholders, issued certain preference shares, at 6l. per cent. interest, which they had no power to do under their deed of settlement. Some of these shares were taken by one of the directors, who sold a part to W, representing them to be preference shares. W. signed the deed of settlement:—Held, that there was no fraud or misrepresentation on the part of the company which would exempt W. from the liability incurred as a shareholder, and that W.'s name must be placed on the list of contributories.

This case came on upon an adjourned summons from chambers.

The directors of the National Patent Steam Fuel Company having, with the sanction of a general meeting of the shareholders in the company, declared that certain shares in respect of which the shareholders had not signed the deed of settlement should be forfeited, it was further resolved, at a special meeting of shareholders, held on the 27th of April 1854, that the re-issue of the forfeited shares should be at the rate of 6l. per cent. preference interest per annum, and the directors were authorized to issue such shares as preference shares.

In November 1854 Mr. Fry, who was a director and shareholder in the company, took a transfer of 300 of these shares, and on the 10th of July 1855 100 of the shares so taken by Mr. Fry were transferred by him to Miss Worth, upon a representation that they were preference shares and would be entitled to 6l. per cent. of the profits in priority over the other shares in the company. This transfer was recognized and confirmed at a subsequent meeting of the shareholders, and Miss Worth executed the deed of settlement of the company in respect of such shares, and also a document by which she acknowledged herself to be a shareholder.

The company was dissolved in 1856, and a winding-up order was obtained.

It appeared that there was no power given by the deed of settlement of the company to the directors to issue preference shares.

The question was now argued whether Miss Worth was liable to be placed on the list of contributories in respect of the 100 shares which had been transferred to her.

Mr. Glasse and Mr. Baggallay, for the official manager, contended that Miss Worth ought to be placed on the list of contributories, as she had signed the deed of settlement and thereby incurred all the liabilities of a shareholder, and her liability as between her and the other shareholders was not taken away by the fact, that the company had no power to issue the shares as preference shares. This was not a case of misrepresentation made to a person for the sake of inducing her to take shares, as in Brockwell's case (1). The directors might have been in error in issuing these shares as preference shares, but there was no misrepresentation made to her upon the subject.

Mr. Amphlett and Mr. Southgate, for Miss Worth, relied upon the principle laid down in Brockwell's case, and submitted that the fact of the shares being issued as preference shares without any power on the part of the directors to do so, was a misrepresentation on the faith of which Miss Worth had been induced to take the shares and sign the deed of settlement. This misrepresentation having been made at a general meeting of the shareholders, was made to the public, and to Miss Worth as one of the public, and thus her liability was taken away and the contract could not be enforced against her. They cited

The National Exchange Company v. Drew, 2 Macq. 103.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—Whether the directors had power to issue these preference shares or not, but assuming that they had not, it must be taken that the directors, in recommending such issue, and the general meeting in adopting such recommendation, believed that they had the power. If they had looked into the deed, they would have seen that they had no such power, and the transaction might have been upset at the time by any shareholder. But suppose they could issue preference shares, there could be no guarantee of 6l. per cent. interest, inasmuch as it was to come out of the profits, if there should be any. The intention was, that this interest should be paid in priority over the other shares, and that was why they were called “preference shares.” They did not, however, differ from any other shares by reason of their having this preference, even supposing the company had power to issue them, and the holder was no less liable as a contributory in the event of the company being wound up than any ordinary shareholder, and there would be the same administration of the equities between them. Miss Worth signed the deed of settlement for 100 shares, and also signed a paper acknowledging herself a shareholder, and as between herself and the other shareholders she has no right to say she is not bound as a contributory. The question is, whether she can say that there has been such misrepresentation made to her by the company, that as between herself and the company, she is not to be placed on the list. On this point, reference has been made to Brockwell's case. Now, that there may be no misapprehension as to the ground on which I acted in deciding that case, I may say that that decision was to the effect, that if a company consisting of a number of shareholders, or a partnership consisting of only two or three, enter into a contract with another person, and the whole body represent to that person something which is false, on the faith of which representation that person enters into the contract, upon the commonest principles of justice and equity, the contract cannot be enforced against the person who has been led into it by misrepresentation. Whether it is a single individual making the representation or several persons appears to me to make no difference whatever, and, therefore, the principle I went upon was this:—If there has been a dealing between the company and the person sought to be affected by it, and if the company, as a company, have made a false representation to that person, on the faith of which he contracted, the company cannot enforce it against that person; and the only question on which difficulty can arise would be whether the false representation made to the individual is to be treated as a representation made by the company. That is a fair question, and a great number of cases may be cited where a director or the secretary of a company or the vendor of shares has made misrepresentations; and then the answer has always been, that it is the representation, not of the company, but of an individual, and the company cannot be affected by it; but it was laid down in The National Exchange Company v. Drew (I do not say that the point was actually decided, but the opinion of some of the most eminent Judges of the present day was expressed) that where there is a body like this, consisting of a great number of shareholders, and the directors make a report to the body at large in performance of their duty, then if such report contain a representation of the affairs of the company which is false, and if that is made to a public and general meeting of the shareholders of the company, and is adopted by the company as the report of the directors to that general meeting, although there be no order to publish it, either by the directors or the body at large, yet from the very nature of the case it must be regarded as the representation of the company. It is not like the case of partnership between two or three persons, and one being instructed to report on its affairs, reports to his partners; for here was the managing body of a company reporting to the members at a general meeting; and of course the transactions that there take place will transpire and be made public. Therefore, it appeared to me, upon the authority of those learned

Judges, that that report, made in performance of a duty, to a general meeting, which in fact represented the whole company, amounted to such a misrepresentation, that where a person on the faith of the misrepresentation dealt with the company, and not with an individual shareholder of the company, but took the shares direct from the company, the misrepresentation vitiated the transaction. That was the principle upon which I decided Brockwell's case. There was in effect an appeal from that decision in Nicoll's case, and some difference of opinion was expressed upon it; but I think that the balance of opinion is in favour of the view I then took, and to which I still adhere. In the first place, it was a dealing between Brockwell and the company; it was not a dealing between Brockwell and another person; and, secondly, it was upon the faith of a representation of the company to the public, and to Brockwell as one of the public, which turned out to be false, and was an intentional misrepresentation.

In the present case there is nothing approximating to these circumstances. Miss Worth has not been dealing with the company at all. She was not induced to take the shares by any misrepresentation made to her by the company, or made by the company to the public, and which she had a right to take advantage of as one of the public. It was arranged between the directors and the shareholders at a meeting held by them, that certain shares should have a preference, and they believed they had a right to give that preference. Mr. Fry was the person who first took 300 of the shares, and afterwards represented to her, what he believed to be true, that she would be entitled to a preference of 6l. per cent. out of the profits. But that was no fraudulent representation on the part of the company.

It appears to me, therefore, that there is nothing which can lead to the conclusion, that Miss Worth is not liable as a contributory upon the shares taken by her. She took them, no doubt, under the impression that she would have a preference in the division of profits, but that does not prevent her liability in respect of these shares. If she could shew a case of misrepresentation on the part of Mr. Fry, she might perhaps have a remedy against him, but she is not on that account discharged from being a contributory of the company. Her name must, therefore, be placed on the list of contributories.

Trustees—Real Estate—Direction to sell—Breach of Trust.

A testator devised a public-house to A. and B, as trustees, upon trust, as soon as convenient after his death, to sell the same, invest the proceeds, and pay the income to C. for life, and divide the capital, after the death of C, as therein mentioned. The testator died in 1834. In 1836 the property was advertised for sale, and, soon after, an offer was made of 900l. for it. The trustees having been advised that the property was worth 1,000l. did not accept of this offer. Shortly afterwards the property became depreciated in value from the scheme of a railway. A. died in 1842. C, the tenant for life, died in 1842. B. died in 1856. The property was unsold. In a suit instituted in 1856 for the administration of the testator's estate,—Held, that the property must be sold, and that the estates of A. and B. should be held liable for the difference between the purchase-money and the rents from 1842, and 900l. and interest at 4l. per cent. from 1842.

James Fry, by his will dated the 26th of March 1834, after making certain specific devises for his children and grand-children, devised his messuage called Langford Inn to John Fry and James Cooper, and their heirs in these terms: "upon trust, as soon as convenient after my decease to sell and dispose of the same either by auction or private contract, and for the most money that can be reasonably obtained for the same." The testator gave the residue of his personal estate to his trustees upon trust to convert the same, and place out the monies arising therefrom, and the purchase-money of Langford Inn on security, and to pay the interest to his wife for her life, and, after her death, to divide these securities among his four children.

The testator died on the 27th of March

COURTS OF CHANCERY:

1834, and his will was proved by his trustees, James Cooper and John Fry, who were also named the executors.

James Cooper died in 1842. John Fry died in February 1856, and left Thomas Fry and Joseph Fry his executors, who proved his will.

The testator's widow died in 1842. The general estate of the testator James Fry being (at the death of John Fry) insufficient for the payment of his debts, this suit was instituted, in August 1856 by Messrs. Thomas and Joseph Fry, against the children and grandchildren of James Fry for the administration of his real and personal estate. Langford Inn had not then been sold.

The defendants, by their answer, sought to charge the plaintiffs, as representatives of John Fry, and the representatives of Cooper in respect of the default of John Fry and Cooper in not having sold the Langford Inn.

The only evidence as to Langford Inn was contained in the affidavit of Mr. Bennett, who had been solicitor to the trust from the death of the testator. It was to the effect that the testator, at his death, was entitled to a freehold public-house called Langford Inn, situate on the high road between Bristol and Exeter, and, there being a great traffic along this road, it was a flourishing concern. The property shortly before the testator's death had been put in good repair, and was let for 80*l.* a year. It had been mortgaged by the testator for 1,000*l.*

In April 1836 the property was advertised for sale in all the leading local papers, the trustees not having been able before to effect a sale by private contract. On the 25th of April 1836 a Mr. Bradford wrote to Mr. Bennett making an offer of 900*l.* for the property. Mr. Bennett advised two of Mr. Fry's sons not to take less than 1,000*l.*, and it was arranged that they should see Mr. Bradford. Mr. Bennett did not recollect anything further respecting Bradford's offer.

On the 27th of April 1836 Mr. Bennett offered to sell the property to a solicitor, who had written respecting it, for 1,000*l.* and was generally known in the neighbourhood as being the best property for sale, it

Shortly after the property had been advertised for sale it suffered a great and unexpected deterioration in value from the scheme for the formation of the Bristol and Exeter Railway. This railway was opened in 1843.

It did not appear in the proceedings, but it was stated in court, at the hearing, that the Bristol and Exeter Railway Act was passed on the 19th of May 1836. The property was again advertised for sale in 1845, but no offer was ever made for a purchase of it, that was considered eligible, and it was still unsold. The present rent was 30*l.*, and the estimated value about 400*l.*

Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Shee, for the representatives of John Fry; and Mr. B. L. Chapman, for the representatives of Cooper, cited Buxton v. Buxton

(1).—Lord Cottenham there lays down the rule, without any qualification as to the nature of the property at the time of sale, that, in the direction to convert with all convenient speed, an executor was entitled to proceed to an immediate sale, and bound to exercise a discretion, and was not bound to proceed to an immediate sale, and points out the inconvenience that would happen if the rule was otherwise. Lord Cottenham also stated, "that there was no case in which an executor had been called upon to bear a loss which he might have avoided by exercising a reasonable discretion the conclusion was, that the executor was not bound to do so. In this case, as far as appears by the evidence, there was every reason to suppose that, at the time of Bradford's offer of 900*l.* the property was worth more than 900*l.*. In the exercise of their discretion they declined the offer. The circumstances that an offer was made of 900*l.* is a sort of proof that the property was worth more than 900*l.*, as purchasers generally offer less in the first instance than they are prepared ultimately to give. This discretion, then, according to Buxton v. Buxton, was properly exercised. No other offers were stated, and it is to be presumed that none were made that could, in their discretion, be properly accepted. The circumstance that the property has been depreciated by the railway ought not to have any bearing on the question."

on the question. The probability of a railway being made and its effects on the high road traffic were not known in 1836 in the same way as they are now. At any rate, the sellers and the purchasers were in the same situation as far as this is concerned. Neither could foresee the event, and, when it happened, both would know its effects. Besides this, there is in evidence only a bare statement of an offer. It is impossible to say what would have become of the offer, if it had been accepted. In addition to this, the estates of the trustees are now for the first time charged with a neglect, or an indiscretion of the trustees which took place about 1836, and both trustees are dead. Had this charge been brought earlier a satisfactory explanation might have been given, which is not now accessible to their representatives—Taylor v. Tabrum (2).

Mr. Freeking, for the defendants, cited Dessynges v. Robinson (3), but was not further called upon.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—No time is mentioned within which the executors must sell the Langford Inn; the words of the will being “as soon as convenient after my decease to sell the same.” The testator died on the 27th of March 1834. One trustee passed the whole of his life without selling, and died in 1842; and the other did nothing to carry the trust into effect for upwards of twenty years. How long is such a state of things to be allowed to go on? If property of a fluctuating nature happens to be at a low price in the market at the time it ought to be sold, executors may reasonably abstain from selling; but that is not so with respect to real estate. The surviving trustee lived fourteen years and a half after the decease of his co-trustee, without taking any step to sell the estate, and it still remains unsold. There is really no excuse for this. It remains, therefore, to say what loss has been sustained by the refusal of an actual offer to purchase the estate in 1836. The proof is, that the estate might then have been sold. If any inquiry were directed the trustees could not be charged with less, and they might be charged more, and, if it was supposed that the proposed railway would depreciate the value, that was a reason why the trustees ought to have sold. In Taylor v. Tabrum the trustees had refused an offer, and had afterwards sold the estate for less, and they were charged with the loss. All, therefore, that I can do is to direct the estate to be sold, and declare that the trustees must be charged with the difference between the purchase-money, and the rents received from 1842, and the sum of 900*l.* and interest at 4*l.* per cent. from the same date.

Executor, Liability of, for Testator's Breach of Covenant to insure.

A testator who was, at his death, lessee of a house under a lease, in which he had covenanted to keep the house insured, appointed A, his son, his executor. The testator had effected a policy of insurance. The policy expired on the 25th of March. The testator died on the 27th of March. The house was burnt down on the 26th of May. A. proved the will on the 17th of June. Evidence was given that, between the death of the testator and the 26th of May, A. had received money of some of the customers of the testator who had been a tradesman:—Held, that A. was not liable in respect of the breach of the covenant.

James Fry, the testator in the last case, was also at his death the lessee of a house held under a lease, which contained a covenant by him to insure the property for 300*l.*

The policy of insurance expired on the 25th of March 1834. The testator died on the 27th of March 1834, two days after. The house was burnt down on the 26th of May 1834. The executors, Cooper and Fry, proved the will on the 17th of June 1834.

The defendants sought to make John Fry's estate liable in respect of this breach of covenant by the testator, on the ground that John Fry had accepted the trust and acted in the executorship before the fire took place, and that it was his duty, immediately after such acceptance, to have insured the house.

The only evidence on this point was as follows:—

For the defendants.—One Rowe stated that the testator was a tallow-chandler at Wrington, and that he, Rowe, was in the employment of the testator, and that it was his (Rowe's) business to carry about the goods in a cart. After the funeral he went his rounds as usual, by the direction and under the instructions of John Fry, who took the money and accounted with the customers.

J. S. Fry, one of the children of the testator, stated that he heard his mother, after the testator's death and before the fire, tell John Fry that the fire insurance was due, and ask him, as he went by the agent's office, to pay it.

For the plaintiffs.—Mr. James stated that he was the agent of the Fire Office at Wrington, and that it was not the custom of the office to issue notices that policies had expired or were on the point of expiring.

Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Shee, for the plaintiffs, stated the above case, and contended that John Fry's estate was not liable.

Mr. Freeling, for the defendants, contended that, under the circumstances stated in Rowe's affidavit, John Fry's liabilities in respect of the lease had been incurred before the fire—Garner v. Moore (1).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—It would be a strong measure to charge the executor with neglect in not having kept up the policy of insurance. There is no evidence that it really was on foot at the death of the testator; he was bound by the covenant in his lease to effect it, and to renew it before it expired. The accident took place before the executors proved the will; they were at liberty to take that duty upon themselves at any time. It was impossible, therefore, to say that they were bound to perform the covenant, or that they must be charged with the loss.

Company—Bequest of Shares—Liability to Calls—Executors—Indemnity on Transfer.

A testatrix, who held unpaid-up shares in a banking company, bequeathed them specifically by a codicil to her will. She subsequently received notice of a series of calls on days named. This was accompanied by a notice that the first call must be paid on a specified day, and a form of receipt was inclosed. The testatrix paid the first call, but died before the days named for the other calls. Similar notices were sent to her executors fourteen days before each of the other days named for payment:—Held, that the notification of the series of calls did not create a charge on the estate of the testatrix within the meaning of the company's deed of settlement, or prevent a transfer of her shares; that the liability was created by the subsequent notice to pay, and that the legatees must take the shares cum onere, and that they must reimburse the executors such calls as had been paid by the executors after the death of the testatrix, with interest at 4l. per cent.

The practice of a company must affect the decision of a Court in questions relating to calls and the forfeiture of shares.

Executors who transfer shares in a company under a decree of the Court will be indemnified from future liability, when they have brought before the Court all the facts of the case.

Two questions were raised in this suit, the one, whether calls made on some new shares of the Union Bank of Australia, the property of Arabella Lewis, and by her specifically bequeathed, were payable by the specific legatees of the shares, or were payable out of her general personal estate. The other question was, whether the executors and trustees, and the estate of the testatrix, on the transfer of the shares to the specific legatees under the order of the Court, were indemnified and discharged from all future liabilities in respect of such shares, or whether a sufficient fund ought not to be appropriated and set apart, to answer all such future liabilities as might arise. The facts are sufficiently stated in the judgment.

Mr. Toller, in reply.

March 18.—THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.
—The Union Bank of Australia was incorporated by deed, dated the 28th of October 1837. The capital consisted of 20,000 shares of 25*l.* each. Of these the testatrix, at her death, possessed 629 shares, all of which were paid up in full. On the 8th of June 1841 the directors resolved to double their capital, and for this purpose to create 20,000 new shares of 25*l.* each. This was done by a resolution passed at a general meeting which was held for that purpose. From extracts of the minute of the special board of the 8th of June 1841, it appears that they came to a resolution to this effect:—"The question having been discussed of the propriety of bringing forward a motion at the approaching general meeting to extend the capital of the bank to 1,000,000*l.*, resolved, that the general meeting to be held on the 11th instant be made special for that purpose, and that advertisements be accordingly inserted in the morning papers." This course was recommended by a report read to the general meeting on the 11th of June 1841. The course ultimately adopted was this:—"The directors allotted one new share to every holder of four old shares, and the testatrix consequently became possessed of 159 new shares. The first instalment on these shares was 2*l.* 10*s.*, which was payable on the allotment of the shares, and was paid by the testatrix. On the 9th of May 1856 the testatrix made her will, by which she appointed the plaintiff, Arabella Addams, her residuary legatee. On the 12th of March 1857 she added a codicil to her will, which was in these words:—"Of my shares in the Union Bank of Australia, on which as yet only the first instalment of 2*l.* 10*s.* per share is paid, I bequeath as follows:—To Elixa, wife of Col. Kingston Phibbs, forty shares for her separate use; to Harriette Pyper, widow, thirty other of the said part paid shares for her use; to Caroline, daughter of the Rev. John Colborne, forty other of the said part paid shares, for her use; and to Sarah, wife of Henry Doblin, forty other of the said part paid shares, for her separate use." And she ratified her will in every respect.

On the 24th of December 1857 the directors "resolved, that, in consideration of the increased business of the branches, and of the colonies opened during the present year, it is the opinion of the board, that the remaining capital of the bank, 180,000*l.*, being 22*l.* 10*s.* per share on 8,000 shares of the third issue, be called up; that the time and mode of doing this be notified to the proprietors in the report to be submitted at the next special general meeting."

The following resolution was adopted by the directors on the 8th of January 1858:—"That it is expedient to call up the unpaid capital of 22*l.* 10*s.* per share on the shares of the third issue in the proportions and at the dates following, viz., 7*l.* 10*s.* on the 1st of February next, 5*l.* on the 1st of April next, 5*l.* on the 1st of July next, and 5*l.* on the 1st of October next."

On the 11th of January 1858 the directors made their report to the extraordinary general meeting of the proprietors of the bank, which was held for that purpose, and after stating various circumstances and suggesting the result, the Report continued as follows:—"Under these circumstances, and having regard to the general expansion of the bank business, the directors have resolved, that it is expedient to call up the unpaid capital of the shares of the third issue; they have, therefore, fixed the following periods and amounts for the calls on these shares, viz., 7*l.* 10*s.* per share on the 1st of February next, 5*l.* on the 1st of April next, 5*l.* on the 1st of July next, and 5*l.* on the 1st of October next." The general meeting of the 11th of January 1858, passed a resolution in these words:—"It was resolved unanimously, that the Report now read be approved and adopted, and printed as usual for the information of the proprietors." The following resolution was read from the chair:—"That the periods and instalments fixed by the directors for calling up the unpaid capital on the third series of shares be hereby authorized and approved." Before putting the question, the chairman read the following statement:—"With regard to dividends on these instalments, the same course will be followed by the directors as in the case of the second series of shares, viz., the two instalments payable in February and April will receive a half-year's dividend at Christmas next, and the two other instalments, payable in July and October, will receive a half-year's dividend at Midsummer 1859." The resolution was carried unanimously.

There was also a resolution that the periods for the payment of the instalments should be authorized and approved. No further resolution was passed at this general meeting, but on the 16th of January 1858 a printed circular was issued to the shareholders, which was in these words:—"I have to notify to you that by a resolution passed at the extraordinary general meeting of the proprietors of this bank, held at this office on the 11th instant, and in accordance with the course pursued on the issue of the second series of shares as there stated the directors, you are required to pay 12*l.* 10*s.* on your 159 shares of the sum say, 7*l.* 10*s.* on the 1st of February, 5*l.* on the 1st of April next, in regard to which payments these shares will be entitled to rank proportionally with the other paid-up capital in the dividend profit declared for the half-year ending 31st of December next; and, further, you are required to pay within the half-year commencing the 1st of July next, namely, 5*l.* on the said 1st of July, and 5*l.* on the 1st of October, after which payments the shares will become entitled to rank in common with the full paid-up capital in the dividend of profit declared for the half-year ending the 30th of June 1859. The shares will be liable to forfeiture if several instalments are not paid on days appointed." On the same 16th of January the following circular also addressed to the shareholders:—"I inform you that the second instalment of the inclosed circular, 7*l.* 10*s.* (seven pounds ten shillings) share on — shares of the third series held by you in this bank must on or before the 1st of February next, to Messrs. Glyn, Mills & Co., bankers, Lombard Street, who will give you their receipt as at foot." And at the foot of this circular was the following form of receipt:—"Received, on account of the Directors of the Union Bank of Australia, the sum of — pounds — shillings, being an instalment of 7*l.* 10*s.* per share on — shares of the third series, called pursuant to the resolution of the general meeting of proprietors, held on January 11th, 1858, for Messrs. Glyn & Co." In pursuance of this notice, the testatrix, on the 28th of January 1858, paid the first call of 7*l.* 10*s.* on her 159 shares. On the 17th of February following the testatrix died.

On the 16th of March following a circular was sent to the shareholders of the new shares, and, amongst others, to the executors of the testatrix, which was in exactly the same terms, except that it did not say "in the terms of the inclosed circular," but simply, "I beg to inform you that the second instalment of 5*l.* per share on the — shares of the third series is to be paid on or before the 1st of April next, to Messrs. Glyn, Mills & Co., bankers, Lombard Street, who will give you their receipt as at foot."

The executors of the testatrix paid the second instalment out of her general estate. The same course was adopted with respect to the third and fourth instalments. Fourteen days before the instalment became due, namely, on the 16th of June 1858, a similar circular was sent, and on the 16th of September 1858, a similar circular was sent for the payment on the 1st of October.

The question is, whether these last three instalments, which were paid by the executors, ought to be repaid by the legatees of the shares respectively, or whether they are properly payable out of the general personal estate. Having regard to the cases, and particularly to Armstrong v. Bernet, I think that this question must depend simply on the question of fact, whether the calls were actually made before or after the death of the testatrix. If the testatrix had died before the Report of the directors made at the meeting of the 11th of January 1858, the subsequent calls would, consistently with the rule I have laid down, have fallen on the legatee who accepted the legacy; but the question here is, whether what occurred prior to the death of the testatrix amounted to a call of the three instalments which were paid subsequently to her death. This requires a somewhat critical examination of the facts relating to those calls. It is certain, that on the 11th of January 1858, the Report to the meeting recommended that the shares should be paid in full; that there then remained 22*l.* 10*s.* to be paid up, and that the Report recommended that this amount should be paid by the four calls on four separate days, and that on the 16th of January a circular was sent to the shareholders specially intimating the fact to them. It is contended, by the legatees, that this constituted a valid and effectual call for the payment of each of the four instalments. On the other hand, it is contended, by the residuary legatee, that this is not a call for the payment of the instalments, but simply notice that the calls would be made; and this is insisted upon principally in consequence of the subsequent notice given to the shareholders to pay the instalments, and which it is argued is confirmed by the construction put on the deed of settlement by the company itself with relation to its practice in regard to these shares. On the whole, and after some hesitation, I have come to the conclusion, that the resolution of the 11th of January, and the circular of the 16th of January, constituted merely a notice that the subsequent calls would be made, although I am of opinion that the paper which accompanied the circular of the 16th of January, and of even date, was a call for the first instalment. It may, perhaps, be asked why, if this was a call of the first instalment, it was not a call of the second, third and fourth instalments, as the same words are used; but I think that the answer is to be found in the subsequent notice for the payment of the call, that was sent regularly a fortnight before each payment was required, and which notice accompanied the circular given on the 16th of January. In order most carefully to consider which of the applications ought to be designated as a call, I have been referred to the mode in which the company itself regarded it, because this is obvious, that the company itself is paramount as to what constitutes a call; and according to the practice of the company, the second notice, that is to say, the notice given a fortnight before the actual payment, was the real call, and not the former. I find it is provided by clause 59. of the company's deed, "That no proprietor holding any share or shares upon which any call duly made by the board of directors shall not have been paid, shall be entitled to sell or dispose of such share or shares, or receive any dividend or bonus thereon, or to vote at any meeting of the proprietors of the said company, or exercise any other right or receive any advantage whatsoever in respect of such share or shares until such call shall have been fully paid, together with all interest thereon; and that if any proprietor shall sell or dispose of such share or shares contrary to this provision, such sale shall be void, and the share or shares so attempted to be sold or disposed of, shall be liable to be declared by the board of directors forfeited to the company."

It is in evidence, that after the first notice, and up to the time when at all events the final notice was given, the shares were permitted to be transferred in the books of the company. There is no evidence whether any transfer was permitted during the fortnight which elapsed after the final notice of the call; and on that subject it is not extremely important. The result upon the whole case is, that the calls in respect of which the final notice was given after the death of the testatrix must be paid by the legatees, and not out of the general residuary estate of the testatrix; and they must pay interest upon the amount at 4l. per cent. from the respective times of payment.

Mr. Toller.—There appear to be no debts on the testatrix's estate.

Mr. Selwyn.—The question of debts has not been adverted to; but if I recollect right, the opinion of the Court is, that although these are the shares of a company with entirely unlimited liability, still, as all the facts have been brought fully to the notice of the Court, the executors are held indemnified from all future liability in respect of them. This is very great—Waller v. Barrett

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—opinion that the executors must be perfectly harmless and secure from liability; to obtain indemnity it is of the executors to bring all before the Court, otherwise, if they pressed anything wilfully, no indemnity could be awarded to them.

1858. } DE WINTON v. THE July 29, 30. } &C. OF BRECKENRIDGE

Corporation—Tolls—Receiver appointed.

A corporation, by act of parliament authorized to raise money by debentures, the tolls, rents and stallages of the markets. The interest upon these debentures was allowed to fall into arrear:—The Court could grant a receiver of the tolls, rents and stallages, but that it had no jurisdiction to interfere with the corporation in the letting or management of the stalls, &c. in the markets.

This was a motion for the appointment of a receiver of the rents and profits of the estates of the mayor, &c. of Brecknockshire, of the tolls, rents and stallages, and monies payable under and by the 1 Vict. c. xii.; and further that the receiver might be authorized to manage from time to time let the corporation and also the stalls, shops, standing shambles, benches and other concerns of the several markets, and generally to exercise the powers of the act, or that they might be exercised under the direction of the Court.

It was also asked that the receiver should be allowed a salary for his care and upon his giving security to account for what he should receive.

The Court, on the 8th of July, made an order in the terms of the notice of motion, but two other notices were afterwards filed by leave of the Court, the one by the corporation, and the other by

Parry, the former asking that the order for a receiver of the tolls and stallages might be discharged, and the latter that the order for a receiver of the rents, tolls and stallages might be discharged, and that the rights and interests of W. Parry might be protected.

By the 1 Vict. c. xii. the corporation of Brecon were empowered to rebuild and enlarge the markets, and for that purpose they were empowered to purchase and take lands, and also to issue debentures for securing the repayment of money advanced by parties for the purposes of the act. They were also directed to sell so much of the lands purchased and taken by virtue of the act as were not required for the purposes of the markets.

The markets were completed and the market-house was opened to the public on the 4th of April 1840.

The plaintiff was a holder of five debentures of 100*l.* each, and he filed the bill in this suit complaining that since the 1st of January 1851 no interest had been paid upon any debentures, except those collaterally secured by a mortgage to Sarah Judith Payne of the market-house, and other lands which had been taken by the corporation, and which had not been sold as directed by the act, and that interest even on those debentures had been paid only to the 4th of September 1855.

The bill alleged that an income of 210*l.* was secured to the corporation by the Market Act, and that they had no interest in the efficient management of either the old or new estates; that they had been mismanaged and neglected; that parts of the property were let below their value despite of advantageous offers; that they had lost some of the estates by omitting to collect the rents for twenty years; that they had not applied the purchase-money of parts of the lands sold in reduction of the debt, and that they had expended money in the repair of other parts which they had neglected to sell. It charged them also with neglecting to enforce payment of the rents, tolls and stallages, and with dealing with the property contrary to the 1 Vict. c. xii. and the Municipal Corporation Act (1). It also charged

The bill then prayed for a sale of the property remaining unsold, and for an account of the income arising from the estates and from the markets. It also prayed for the appointment of a receiver, not only of the corporate estates, but also of the rents, tolls and stallages, and of all money payable under the 1 Vict. c. xii., and that he might have full power to let the estate, &c. and to exercise the powers of the act.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Hardy now moved for the appointment of a receiver.—They cited Ames v. the Trustees of the Birkenhead Docks, 20 Beav. 332; s. c. 24 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 540.

Fripp v. the Chard Railway Company, 11 Hare, 241; s. c. 22 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 1084.

Mr. Follett and Mr. C. Barber, for the corporation.—The Court cannot appoint a receiver of the market tolls, &c. or authorize the receiver to exercise the powers of the act. It would be a direct contravention of the act, and subject the corporation to proceedings at the instance of the Attorney General. The Market Act does not authorize any appointment of a receiver.

Mr. Osborne Morgan, for W. Parry, a judgment creditor of the corporation, who had advanced 750*l.* upon an agreement that he should have a transfer of Vaughan's mortgage.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—You are entitled to have a receiver appointed. It is not necessary that the act of parliament should give a power to appoint a receiver to enable this Court to make the appointment, but when an act of parliament authorizes a mortgage to be made it necessarily authorizes that the mortgagee shall have, as incidental to his character of mortgagee, all proper and appropriate remedies which belong to that peculiar character as against the mortgagor, and there is, especially in the case of tolls, whatever they may be, the power of appointing a receiver. I cannot regard the argument that the corporation must be considered as the first incumbancers on this fund, and, therefore, entitled to take possession of this property. They are, in fact, the mortgagors; they certainly mortgaged the property subject to a varying and uncertain rent-charge in their favour, but subject to that they are the mortgagors, and they can be regarded in no other light than a person who, as the owner of property subject to a quit-rent, which was payable to himself, had mortgaged the property subject to that quit-rent, in which case the mortgagee would still be entitled to the possession of the property, always keeping down and paying the quit-rent; this, however, must be considered in settling the form of the order when applying the tolls. In this case the security is subject to the payment in priority of the sum mentioned in the 1 Vict. c. xii. s. 34. If it had said that the payment shall amount to 210*l.* a year, it would have been simple and plain, and the receiver would have nothing to do but to pay that out of his receipts, but it is "to pay such a sum as, with the rents, tolls and dues which shall be received by the corporation from any property belonging to them, other than the tolls, rents and stallages authorized to be taken by the act, shall amount to 210*l.* a year." The consequence is, that it may involve an account every time it is to be paid, and the only mode in which that can be got over is, by giving a general liberty to apply in case of difficulty. The order, however, appointing a receiver should contain a statement that the receiver should be at liberty, out of the first tolls, rents and stallages received by him, to pay to the corporation such a sum of money as, together with the tolls, rents and dues received by them from the property, shall make up the 210*l.* per annum. As, however, the act of parliament has authorized the mortgage of these tolls, and the interest has been allowed to fall into arrear, the Court will appoint a receiver of the tolls, but it will not at the same time give the receiver such a management of the affairs of the corporation as is incidental to that, so as to make them, as has been argued, liable to proceedings by the Attorney General, either by mandamus or the like. If it would produce any such effect the corporation must let the tolls, but the receiver must receive them and pay to the corporation what, upon the affidavit of the borough treasurer, shall with the rents of their other property appear necessary to make up the sum of 210*l.*

 27, 31. } &c. OF BRECON.

Statute—Conflicting Enactments—Borrowing Powers, with a Declaration of Equality among Lenders—Power to Mortgage—Double Security—Priority.

The Brecon Market Act empowered the corporation to purchase lands for enlarging the borough market, &c., and it directed them, within seven years after the passing of the act, to sell so much of the lands as were not required, the proceeds to be applied for the purposes of the act. They were also empowered to borrow money on debentures, and one holder was to have no priority over another. Power was also given to borrow money on mortgage, or by sale of the corporate property. The corporation was directed to apply all money received under the act, and the rents of the estates, and the tolls, &c. of the market, after paying various charges, in payment of the money borrowed. The act also contained a clause restraining the corporation, without the consent of the Lords of the Treasury, from taking, appropriating, using, selling, demising, mortgaging or alienating for the purposes of the act any messuages which they could not have taken, &c. before the act passed. Upon a bill, by a debenture holder,—Held, that a mortgage of lands made to a debenture holder, as a further security for money advanced on debentures, could not be supported; that such mortgage gave no priority or preference to the mortgagee; and that the lands comprised in the mortgage (being part of those purchased under the act) must be sold, and the money applied in discharge of the debts as directed by the act.

This suit was instituted, by Henry De Winton, who held five debentures of 100*l.* each, issued under the Brecon Market Act, 1 Vict. c. xii., against the Mayor, Aldermen and Burgesses of Brecon, and Sarah Judith Payne, and, except as to her, it

Prayed, on behalf of himself and all the unsatisfied debenture holders, or assignees and creditors, under the Market Act, that the "Queen's Head" and other lands purchased and taken by the corporation under the Market Act, and never used for the purposes thereof, might be sold, and the proceeds applied under the direction of the Court. It also prayed for accounts of the property and estates of the corporation at the time of passing the act and at the present time, and an account of all sales and purchases under the act, and of all monies received from such sales by the corporation, together with an account of the rents of the corporate property received since the act passed, and a like account of all tolls, rents, stallage and all other monies from time to time received by the corporation under the act, and of the application thereof. It further prayed for a receiver, and that he might be authorized to let the estates and exercise the powers of the act; and that all rents and profits, and the tolls and stallage might be applied in accordance with the provisions of the act.

The Brecon Market Act, 1 Vict. c. xii. (local and personal) was passed in 1838. It empowered the mayor, &c. of the borough to purchase and take such messuages, lands and hereditaments within the borough as they might think necessary for the purposes of the act; it also authorized them to contract with the owners and occupiers of any other messuages, buildings, lands or hereditaments within the borough, and to take down, alter and use the same as well as any other lands purchased by or belonging to the mayor, &c. for the purposes of the act. It then empowered them to erect a market-house and make a market-place, with all necessary stalls, standings and other conveniences for the accommodation of the public, and to preserve, regulate, maintain and use the same. Section 29, after reciting that the mayor, &c., by means of the purchases, might happen to be seized of more land than would be necessary for the purpose of the act, enacted that it should be lawful for the mayor, &c., and they were required within seven years after the passing of the act to sell any such land; provided they first offered to re-sell the land to the person from whom the same was purchased in case he should then be the owner of the adjoining land, and in case he should have died or should decline to re-purchase, then that the offer should be made to the owner of any adjoining land, and they were to convey the same to the purchasers; and the money produced by such sales was to be applied to the purposes of the act.

Section 30. empowered the mayor, &c., from time to time to borrow and take up at interest such sum or sums of money as the mayor, &c. should think necessary for providing, erecting, altering, repairing and improving the new market-house or market-place upon the credit of the tolls, rents and stallage to be levied and collected by virtue of the second schedule to the act annexed, and by writing under their common seal to assign all or any part of the rents and stallage to be received by the mayor, &c., by virtue of the second schedule to the act annexed, to such person as should lend or advance any money thereon, or to his trustee, as a security for any sum of money so to be advanced, with lawful interest for the same, and the charges and expenses of such assignment, to be made in manner and form thereafter mentioned, should be from time to time defrayed by the mayor, &c. out of the money so borrowed, and every such assignment should be by deed duly stamped, in which the consideration should be fairly stated, and might be in the words or to the effect next thereafter stated; and all persons to whom such assignment should be made or who should be entitled to the money thereby secured should be, in proportion to the sums thereby respectively mentioned, creditors on the said tolls, rents and stallage (as the case might be), equally one with another, without any preference in respect of the priority of advancing such money on the dates of any such assignments; and every such security should be good, valid and effectual in the law, and should entitle the person to whom the same should be made, his executors, administrators or assigns, to the payment of the money thereby secured, and to all profit and advantage thereon, according to the true intent and meaning of the act.

Section 31. enacted that it should be lawful for the persons entitled to any of the securities for the money to be borrowed on interest as aforesaid, and their respective executors, administrators or assigns, as the case might be, at any time, by writing under their respective hands and seals, duly stamped, in which the consideration should be truly stated, to transfer such securities to any person whomsoever, and every such transfer might be in the words or to the effect next thereafter stated.

Section 34. enacted, that the mayor, &c. should, and they were thereby directed to apply the money to arise or to be received by virtue of the act, and subject as therein mentioned, the tolls, rents and stallage thereby authorized to be taken in manner following, viz., in the first place in paying and defraying the costs, charges and expenses of applying for and incident to the obtaining and passing of the act, together with interest thereon from the time of advancing and disbursing the same; then in paying the costs, charges and expenses incident to and attending the forming, erecting, fitting up and making commodious for the public, the said market-places and conveniences connected therewith; in the next place, in retaining and setting apart such sum or sums of money as, with the rents, tolls and dues which should be received by the mayor, &c., from any property belonging to them other than the tolls, rents and stallage authorized to be taken by the act, should be equal in amount to or necessary to make up the annual sum of 210*l*. (the amount of the net annual income of the mayor, &c.), from the whole tolls of the borough and other property of or belonging to them, of which sum of 210*l*. a competent part should be applied by the mayor, &c. towards defraying the interest of any incumbrance then affecting their said property, and the remainder should be by them applied to such purposes and in such manner as they were by law then authorized and empowered to apply their net annual income; and afterwards their said surplus tolls, rents and stallage should be applied in paying the interest of all monies which should be borrowed under and by virtue and for the purposes of this act, and subject to the said costs, charges, expenses and payments aforesaid, the residue of the same surplus tolls, rents and stallage, should be divided into two equal moieties, one of which should be paid unto and among the persons entitled to any of the securities for the money to be borrowed on mortgage as aforesaid, and their respective executors, administrators and assigns, as the case might be, in proportion to the respective sums advanced by him, her or them, without any preference by reason of the priority of date of any such mortgage or any other account whatsoever, and the other moiety of the said residue of the surplus tolls, rents and stallage should be retained by the mayor, &c., towards enabling them to pay off, in manner thereafter mentioned, the money borrowed on mortgage, and after payment thereof the whole of the surplus tolls, rents and stallage should be by them applied to such purposes of public benefit within the borough as to them should seem meet.

Section 37. enacted, that within one month after Michaelmas-day in each and every year the mayor, &c. should, and they were thereby required to make a just and true statement or account of all sums of money by them received and expended in the execution of the act; and should also in such statement or account particularly specify the several items and articles for which each particular sum had been received, disbursed and paid.

Section 44. enacted, that it should be lawful for the mayor, &c., and their successors, and they were thereby authorized and empowered to let any or either of the stalls, shops, standing-places, shambles, benches and other conveniences in the several market-places, to any person who might be willing or desirous of taking the same for any term not exceeding three years: provided always, that the tolls and rents so to be taken should not in any case exceed the sums mentioned in the second schedule to the act.

Section 83. enacted, that nothing in the act should enable the mayor, &c. of the borough of Brecon to take, appropriate, use, sell, demise, mortgage or alienate for the purposes of the said act, without the approbation of the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, or any three of them, any messuages, lands or hereditaments which they could not have taken, appropriated, used, sold, demised, mortgaged or alienated, without such approbation, before the passing of the said act, anything therein to the contrary notwithstanding.

Before the Market Act, the estates of the corporation consisted of, first, the manor of the borough of Brecon, with the chief rents, amounting to 23*l.* per annum, and the profits of courts leet; secondly, a shire or town-hall, since used as the town-hall and corn-market, with cellar and warehouses attached, and let separately; thirdly, a town gaol, the site of which is now sold; fourthly, several houses and lands, mostly let on long leases, at rents amounting to 38*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.* per annum, or thereabouts, and others occupied by the corporation; fifthly, the tolls of fairs and drift-toll, payable on all goods of persons, not natives, passing through the borough; sixthly, the tolls of markets held under the town-hall and in the streets.

This property, when the act passed, was computed to produce 210*l.* per annum. It was, however, subject to a mortgage, dated the 17th of July 1835, which had been granted by the old corporation to Philip Vaughan, to secure the repayment of 750*l.* and interest; and this, by an indenture, dated the 4th of March 1840, became vested in the defendant, Sarah Judith Payne.

The corporation, under the Market Act, purchased some premises, called the "Queen's Head," and other lands, at divers sums, amounting to 3,630*l.*; and they used a portion for the new market. They also sold a portion of such lands, by which they realized a sum of 2,180*l.*; but they still retained a portion of the purchased hereditaments, though they were not required for the market.

The market-house was erected, and opened for public use on the 4th of April 1840.

By an indenture, dated the same day, after reciting that Sarah Judith Payne had agreed to lend a sum of 1,500*l.* to the mayor, &c. of Brecon, upon having the same secured by a mortgage of the tolls, rents and stallage, and also by a mortgage of the freehold property, of which the corporation were seised under the act, and reciting that the mayor, &c. had that day duly executed and given to Sarah Judith Payne three several debentures for 500*l.*, upon the credit of the tolls, rents and stallage; it was witnessed that the corporation granted and conveyed the "Queen's Head," and all those several pieces of ground upon which the new market-house or market-place, called the Brecon New Market, was then erecting, together with the several erections, buildings and appendages then or thereafter to be built thereon in connexion with the new market, to hold the same to Sarah Judith Payne, her heirs and assigns, for further securing to her the 1,500*l.* and interest, which was also secured by the three debentures for 500*l.* each, upon the tolls, rents and stallage. The deed also provided that in case default should be made in payment of the 1,500*l.* and interest at the time mentioned, it should be lawful for Sarah Judith Payne, without any further consent of the corporation, as soon, or at any time thereafter as might be convenient, to sell the debentures; and in case they should not produce the whole 1,500*l.* and interest, then in like manner to sell the said messuages, hereditaments and premises thereby granted to her, and to apply the money received thereby in discharge of the said mortgage debt.

The mortgage comprised land on the surface of which a part of the new market was then building and afterwards stood, and also land on which some warehouses or cellars, with arched roofs, let by the corporation at fixed rents, not being then or ever used as a market, or ever opened to the public, and having an entirely separate approach, on the roof of which the remainder of the new market was built and held, and also comprised other premises totally distinct from the market, viz. the the "Queen's Head" or market-tavern, with the yards, stables, &c. and other premises, and which had never been used as a market. No interest had been paid upon any debentures from the 1st of January 1851, except on those collaterally secured by the mortgage to Sarah Judith Payne; and the interest upon those had been paid only to the 4th of September 1855.

It was then alleged that the corporation had no interest in the efficient management, either of the new or old corporate property, as they were empowered to take from the tolls, rents and stallage sufficient, with the income of the general corporate property, to make up the corporate income of 210*l.*, to which they were entitled before the passing of the act. It was also alleged that the corporation had mismanaged and neglected both classes of property; and it charged that they let parts of the old corporate property at rents below the value, and that they refused advantageous offers, and that they had lost some property by omitting to obtain any payment of rent or acknowledgment of title for twenty years or more; that they allowed the chief rents of the manor of the borough to remain unpaid, so that some had been lost; that they had sold divers parts of the corporate property, and had not applied the purchase-money in reduction of the debt due thereon; that they had expended money on repairs of the "Queen's Head," &c.; that they had neglected to enforce tolls, rents and stallage to a considerable amount, and particularly from persons trafficking by means of hand-baskets, and from persons selling corn in public or other houses, not being shops; that the corporation, since the passing of the act, had not only sold portions of the corporate property, but they had also made the mortgage to Sarah Judith Payne as a security for the 1,500*l.*, without the consent of the Lords of the Treasury; that the accounts directed to be made out annually by the corporation had been made out at irregular periods, the last of which was from the 1st of June 1852 to the 30th of June 1856; and from that it appeared that the corporation had paid the interest on the old mortgage for 750*l.*, and the rents of premises held by them, viz. the borough lock-up and fire-engine shed, and of three houses previously sold by them without the concurrence of the mortgagee, amounting to 18*l.* 8*s.* per annum, and had also allowed him to receive the corn and market-tolls, with the tolls of fairs and drift-tolls; and that the treasurer had paid both the mortgage debts of Sarah Judith Payne, the costs of repairs ordered by the corporation, and the costs of maintaining the market and of the collection of the tolls; that the corporation declined to let the tolls separately, or to take any toll from dealers by hand-baskets and on the sale of corn.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Hardy, for the plaintiff, insisted that the surplus estate ought to be sold, and that the proceeds and rents, together with the tolls, rents and stallages, ought to be applied in paying pari passu the debenture-holders, and that S. J. Payne, in consequence of the mortgage she had obtained, had no right to any priority or preference—Lord Crewe v. Eddleston (1).

Mr. Follett and Mr. Barber, for the corporation.—The Court had no jurisdiction to interfere with the corporation in the management of the estates.

Mr. Eddis, for Edward Seymour and others, executors of S. J. Payne, who had died since the institution of the suit, claimed the benefit of the contract made with the corporation.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The question I have to consider is, whether the mortgage to S. J. Payne is valid against the plaintiff; and upon the construction of the act of parliament, I think it is not. When an act of parliament contains two sets of provisions, one being specific, with precise directions to do particular things, and the other being general, prohibiting certain acts, which in their general sense will include the particular acts in the statute, the general clause does not control the specific enactment. For instance, if there is an authority in an act of parliament to a corporation to sell a particular piece of land, and there is then a general clause at the end that nothing in this act contained shall authorize the corporation to sell any land, that would not control the particular enactment, but the particular enactment would take effect notwithstanding it was not clearly expressed and distinct, and the insertion of the exception in the general clause would be supplied. If the Court finds a positive inconsistency and repugnancy, it may be difficult to deal with it, but, so far as it can, it must give effect to the whole of the act of parliament. In this act there is authority to buy lands for the purposes of the act; and if among them there are lands which are not required for the purposes of the act, then the act requires and commands the corporation to sell those particular lands at a specified time. The act then authorises the corporation to sell, convey and dispose of any lands for the purposes of the act; it authorises the corporation to borrow money on mortgage of the property of the corporation generally, and for that purpose to convey, sell and dispose of any of the property relating to the corporation. That general clause must be read concurrently with the other part of the act, that is to say, that, having directed particular lands belonging to the corporation to be sold in a particular manner, this general clause must be construed to apply to the rest of the land of the corporation. The effect of this would be in substance to overrule 7 Will. 4. & 1 Vict. c. 78. s. 97. (the Municipal Corporation Act). By section 83. the provisions of the Municipal Corporation Act, with respect to the impediments and fetters put upon the alienation of land, are repeated over and over again for the purposes of this act, and it is directed that they shall have no power to alienate any land, except with the sanction of the Lords of the Treasury. That applies, not to 7 Will. 4. & 1 Vict. c. 78. s. 97, but to that which is included in 1 Vict. c. xii. s. 32, and that the sanction of the Lords of the Treasury must be taken to ascertain that it is for the purposes of the act they require to sell. On this, it is argued, that under this section, there is power to mortgage any land for the purposes of the act, and that therefore, if they are empowered to mortgage land for the purposes of the act, it will extend to the surplus lands, and that the clause relating to the sale of the surplus lands will only apply to so much as shall remain after they have been mortgaged for the purposes of the act. But the 1 Vict. c. xii. s. 32. directs that land shall be sold, and the purchase-money applied for the purposes of the act, and, consequently, the section must be expressly and distinctly so applied, and nothing can appear more inconsistent with 1 Vict. c. xii. s. 29, or more calculated to overrule it, than that this should be the construction when it is said, "Before they shall sell and dispose of any such land or ground they shall first offer to re-sell," &c. This section does not give a permission, but a direction for the purposes of the act to sell this land in a particular way. Can the corporation mortgage that land to a stranger, and tell the stranger, You shall sell the land in any manner you please? The whole thing is put an end to. Suppose the corporation wanted expressly to get rid of this; suppose they wanted the proprietor of the adjoining land, who had sold his land, not to have it again, and they did not want it to be offered to him, they might mortgage it to a stranger with a power to sell it to anybody he pleased, and thereby defeat the object of the act of parliament. It is impossible that such can be the construction of these two clauses taken together. Nothing appears to be more consistent than this, that, with respect to the particular land which you have bought, and which site you do not want for the purposes of the act, you shall sell it in a particular manner, and the other land you may mortgage, alienate or sell as you think fit for the purposes of the act; provided always, that nothing in this act shall enable you to put this power into operation, except with the sanction of the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, who are to be the guardians and are to ascertain that you do bona fide sell it for the purposes of the act. That makes the whole clear and consistent. I do not see how it can be said that for the purposes of this act this is to be taken as a separate and distinct transaction. Under the 1 Vict. c. xii. s. 30. the object is to place all debenture holders on the same footing. The plaintiff advances money upon the security of these tolls for the purposes of the act, the defendant, S. J. Payne, also advances money, but in order to defeat this clause and get a priority, she contracts with the corporation that she is to have a mortgage upon other property of the corporation, in order to give her a priority or control over it, and in order that she may dispose of this first, which will evidently give her a manifest advantage, because, after the sum of 210*l.* is paid to the corporation, all the debenture holders would share. She is a debenture holder, and by taking this additional security, she does not acquire priority; on both these grounds, therefore it is impossible to say, as against the plaintiff, that this is a mortgage which will give priority over the plaintiff in this suit. A very different case may arise. In this case, however, S. J. Payne has not obtained any priority against the plaintiff, and the other debenture holders, on behalf of whom the bill is filed, but it leaves the covenant of the corporation with S. J. Payne quite untouched.

By 1 Vict. c. xii. s. 29. the corporation are required to sell within seven years after the passing of the act; they have not done so, and it is difficult to say they are not compellable to sell, and that any person interested under the act may not enforce that sale, certainly it is not given to them to deal with merely at their discretion. If it is insisted on, the plaintiff is entitled to have a sale, but I doubt much whether it would be for his benefit, and yet with an express and positive declaration of the statute that the sale shall be made, I am apprehensive whether I am entitled, even with the consent of the parties, to say that the Court will not enforce the statute according to the clause, which is compulsory on the corporation. I should, however, like to be referred to a case in which a similar matter has been dealt with; the disposition of the Court would be to act in a way most productive to all parties. I must continue the receiver of the tolls and stallages of the market-place; but the corporation, at the close of every year, will have to give a detailed account of their receipts, for the purposes of the act, including such sums as they would have received but for the incumbrances created by themselves. It will not be long; still it must be sufficiently detailed to shew distinctly the nature and extent of the receipts from each different source: it must shew those distinctly and clearly. When that is once done, the receiver is to act upon it as if it could not be disputed, and he is to pay over, out of any money in his hands, to the corporation such a sum of money as, with the balance in the hands of the corporation, will amount to the sum of 210*l*. When that is done the debenture holders to whom this account is rendered may, if they think fit, under this suit, make an application in chambers, and require the accounts to be taken on disputed items, but not so as to require it to be brought into court; and so from time to time it can be disposed of, and the balance to be carried over to the next year settled in the ordinary way, so that it will be rectified by the receiver's account in the next year. The receiver is not to be at liberty to dispute that, but he is to pay over the balance; or rather, if there is any, he is to apply it in payment of what is due to the debenture holders.

Jan. 31.—THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.
—I have difficulty and doubt respecting the position of the corporation. It is singular; but upon the whole, I cannot let them have their costs added to the 210*l*. in the first instance, before all the other parties; the corporation must take them out of the 210*l*., but after the payment of the others they may have their costs out of the estate; that will amount to the same thing. I treat the corporation as one having a charge upon it of 210*l*., which they are entitled to; they have power to mortgage their property, tolls and stallages, and the like, subject to that rent-charge, and therefore, after the rent-charge is satisfied, the first to be paid are the mortgagees. The mortgagees, therefore, are now entitled to add their costs to the mortgage securities.

M.R. } THE MAYOR, ETC. OF BRE-
March 4, 5, 9. } CON v. SEYMOUR.

Municipal Corporations—Mortgage previous to 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 76.—7 Will. 4. & 1 Vict. c. 78.—Tacking—Subsequent Mortgage—Charge—Judgment.

The defendants were the holders of two mortgages, made by the corporation of Brecon, upon their land. One was made before the Municipal Corporation Act, and the other subsequently. This latter mortgage comprised in addition lands acquired under the Market House Act. The defendants brought an action to obtain payment of the money due on both mortgages. The corporation then paid into court the sum due on the mortgage made before the Municipal Corporation Act. The defendants, plaintiffs in the action, took this money out of court and proceeded with the action upon the second mortgage, and obtained a judgment. The defendants refused to reconvey the lands or deliver up the title-deeds in the first mortgage; and upon a bill by the corporation,—Held, that the first mortgage was satisfied before any judgment was obtained, and that no right to tack had arisen, and that the defendants must reconvey the lands and deliver up the title-deeds to the corporation.

The bill in this suit was filed, by the Mayor, Aldermen and Burgesses of the borough of Brecon, who, before the passing of the 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 76. (the Municipal Corporation Act), were called the Bailiff, Aldermen and Burgesses of the borough of Brecon, against Edward William Seymour, Philip George, Edward Lewis and William Parry, to obtain a reconveyance of several messuages and lands comprised in certain indentures of lease and release, dated the 3rd and 4th of March 1840, free from all incumbrance made by Sarah Judith Payne, the plaintiffs offering to pay so much of the costs of an action as had been incurred in relation to the principal money and interest secured thereby. It also prayed that the first three defendants might be restrained from further proceedings at law, or from disposing of the lands or parting with the title-deeds thereof.

By an indenture of feoffment, dated the 17th of July 1835, in consideration of 750*l.*, the plaintiffs, after reciting that they were seised in fee of divers messuages and lands, and also of three several markets to be holden every week in the borough, and also of several fairs to be held yearly for ever within the borough, and of divers tolls and stallage, piecage, and other profits and emoluments arising therefrom, granted and enfeoffed the same with their appurtenances to Philip Vaughan, his heirs and assigns, subject to redemption on payment of the principal money, with interest thereon. The deed also contained a power of sale in case of non-payment of the principal and interest. The property mortgaged was also described in a schedule attached to the deed. This mortgage was afterwards transferred to William Dyke.

By indentures, dated the 3rd and 4th of March 1840, in consideration of the 750*l.* W. Dyke, with the consent of the corporation, conveyed the messuages and lands, and also the tolls, &c. of the markets and fairs, to Sarah Judith Payne, her heirs and assigns, subject to the then existing equity of redemption, as well as to the power of sale contained in the mortgage to P. Vaughan.

In 1836 the 1 Vict. c. xii. was passed to empower the corporation of Brecon to rebuild the market, and it enabled them for that purpose, not only to use the then lands of the corporation, but also to take, contract for, and purchase other lands; it also empowered them to raise money by debentures for the purposes of the act.

By an indenture, dated the 4th of March 1840, and made between the corporation of the first part, S. J. Payne of the second part, Thomas Lawrence of the third part, and E. Williams of the fourth part, the corporation conveyed divers freehold lands in Brecon, acquired under the Market Act since the mortgage of the 17th of July 1835, to S. J. Payne, her heirs and assigns, to secure a sum of 1,500*l.* and interest. This deed contained a covenant by the corporation for payment of the principal money and interest.

On the 30th of October 1857 S. J. Payne brought an action in the Court of Exchequer against the corporation to recover not only the sum of 750*l.* and interest secured on Vaughan's mortgage, but also the 1,500*l.* and interest secured by the market-house mortgage.

On the 30th of November 1857 S. J. Payne declared in the said action. It contained, first, a count on the covenant in the market-house mortgage, and, secondly, the usual indebitatus counts and a count on an account stated. In the particulars of demand delivered therewith she claimed under the indebitatus counts to recover the 750*l.* for money lent and paid for the use of the corporation on or about the 4th of March 1840, with 43*l.* 5*s.* for interest, which she claimed to recover on account stated.

The corporation having been advised that they had no defence to the action so far as related to the 750*l.* and interest, applied to William Parry, who advanced a sum of 796*l.* 15*s.* upon an agreement that its repayment should be secured upon hereditaments comprised in Vaughan's mortgage. On the 23rd of December 1857 the corporation put in two pleas to the first count of the declaration, and as to the second and subsequent counts, for a third plea they brought the 796*l.* 15*s.* into court, and averred that the same was enough to satisfy the claim of the plaintiff in respect of the matters so pleaded to.

This sum S. J. Payne took out of court. The action, however, was proceeded with upon the claim under the covenant contained in the market-house mortgage—Payne v. the Mayor, &c. of Brecon (1). S. J. Payne, by her will, dated the 12th of April 1841, devised all trust estates vested in her to Messrs. Seymour, George and Lewis, whom she appointed her executors.

The testatrix died on the 15th of February 1858.

The plaintiffs tendered 9*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.* to the executors in respect of the costs of the action, and requested them to reconvey the premises comprised in Vaughan's mortgage, and W. Parry claimed to have the same conveyed to him as a security corporation; at the same time he brought an action against the corporation and obtained a judgment, which he registered in the Common Pleas and issued the goods by virtue of which he extended the mortgage and chattels and the lands and tenements of the corporation. The plaintiffs alleged that the claim of S. J. Payne in respect of Vaughan's mortgage was satisfied, and that the defendants were bound to reconvey the hereditaments to the corporation or as they should direct. They also charged that they were trustees for the inhabitants of the borough, and that the market-house mortgage, if valid, could not be tacked so as to make Vaughan's mortgage a security for the repayment of the money secured by the market-house mortgage. It was also charged that the market-house mortgage was made without the consent of the Lords of the Treasury, and that it was not authorized by the Market Act, 1 Vict. c. xii.; that it did not enable the corporation to mortgage or alienate any of the corporate estates which, without such approbation, could not previously have been mortgaged or alienated.

Mr. Follett and Mr. Barber, for the plaintiffs.—The market-house mortgage was not a proper security for the 1,500*l.* The Lords of the Treasury had never consented to the security. It could not be tacked to Vaughan's mortgage. The judgment which the executors had obtained for the 1,500*l.* did not affect the corporate lands. The corporation, as trustees for the inhabitants, were entitled to have the lands comprised in Vaughan's mortgage reconveyed to them.—

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Eddis, for the executors of Sarah J. Payne.—The corporation are not restrained from mortgaging the income arising from the corporate property, as distinct from the property itself, and that power extends to all proper producing income. The Municipal Corporation Act makes no distinction. The market-house mortgage was not void; it might still be made available with the co-

sent of the Lords of the Treasury. This, of itself, was proof that the deed was good. The corporation, therefore, could not ask in this court that the deed should be treated as nothing, or that the deeds relating to Vaughan's mortgage should be given up; especially when they have to repay the money with which the market-house was built. The corporation in this case were possessed of property, which they had previous to the passing of the 1 Vict. c. xii., and property which they had obtained since. As to the latter, there was nothing in the act to fetter their dealing with it; so far, therefore, the concurrence of the Lords of the Treasury was not required. In this case a debt was due to S. J. Payne, and a judgment for it had been obtained; as this was not in iudicio, it bound the lands of the corporation. Neither could the act be extended by construction.—

Mr. Follett, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The plaintiffs are entitled to a decree; it follows from the decision in De Winton v. the Mayor of Brecon (2). The bill is filed for a reconveyance of land mortgaged, and to recover the deeds upon payment of the mortgage. The defendants insist that they are entitled to retain them, in consequence of their having another incumbrance upon the land of the mortgagees. It appeared that a mortgage was made in 1835, and that it was not affected by the Municipal Corporation Act. A sum of 750*l.* was advanced by Mr. Vaughan; it was secured upon property of the corporation. This mortgage was assigned, first to Mr. Dyke, and then to Sarah Judith Payne, and its validity is not disputed. In 1840 Vaughan's mortgage was transferred to her from Mr. Dyke; on the same day a second mortgage was made to Mrs. Payne; it was a separate mortgage for 1,500*l.*, not a mortgage for 2,250*l.* I do not go into any question respecting the rights of debenture or bondholders under the Market Act. A question then arose, whether the second mortgage created any charge on the land. I held that the second mortgage was not a valid mortgage; that it was prohibited by the Municipal Corporation Act, 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 76. s. 94; and that the corporation was prohibited from raising any money upon their property; and that the 1 Vict. c. xii. s. 83. confirmed and established that prohibition with respect to this property. A distinction has been drawn between a mortgage of capital and a mortgage of income; it is, however, too fine to be acted on. In substance it is the same. The section, therefore, which prevents the mortgage of land equally applies to prevent a mortgage of the 210*l.* per annum.

In October 1857 Sarah Judith Payne brought an action against the corporation. The amount claimed upon the first mortgage was paid into court; that was taken out by Mrs. Payne in satisfaction of the causes of action in respect of the third plea, that is, in respect of the whole declaration, except what is claimed upon the covenant contained in the deed of the market-house mortgage. The matter came on upon the motion for a new trial, before the Court of Exchequer, which held, that the covenant is perfectly good; although it holds, apparently, that the mortgage-deed is not a good mortgage, it holds that the covenant is collateral to, and not dependent upon it, and consequently can be sued upon separately; that it does not fall within the mortgage, and is not invalid. Therefore, it finds for the plaintiff upon the first count, upon which these two pleas are pleaded. In that state of things the question arises, as all that was due upon the first mortgage has been received, whether the defendant has any right to resist what would be the usual equity of a mortgagor, viz. to have a reconveyance of the land mortgaged, and also a delivery of the title-deeds upon payment of what is due on the mortgage. This is resisted, in the first place, upon the ground that there is a right to tack. It is not put exactly in that form, but as a right to tack it is clear that no equity can exist; you might, no doubt, tack a judgment to a mortgage, but the mortgage was paid off, and did not exist in equity before the judgment was recovered, and consequently no judgment which was subsequently recovered could be tacked to the mortgage. In fact, as soon as the money was taken out of court, or if it had been a tender of the total amount that was due it would have been the same—but as soon as the money is taken out of court, which is admitted to be the total amount due on the first mortgage, then the equity of the mortgagor arose, and he was entitled at once to have both the reconveyance of the land and the title-deeds delivered up to him. And without considering that the plaintiffs were a corporation, I regard it as if, by the effect of the statute, there was no mortgage of the market-house, but merely a deed of covenant; and though Vaughan's mortgage was good, it had been paid off. Then, as between individuals, it is impossible to hold that one individual mortgagee could resist the right of the mortgagor to have the reconveyance of his land and the delivery up of his title-deeds, after the mortgage-money, interest and costs had been paid, upon the ground that there was a covenant by the mortgagor to the mortgagee with respect to a separate and collateral matter upon which the mortgagee was bringing an action, or had brought an action which might ripen into a judgment, and which judgment might ultimately produce a lien upon the land.

The principal argument, which is founded upon the construction of the 1 Vict. c. xii., is covered by the decision in De Winton v. the Mayor of Brecon. I read sections 32. and 29. of the Market House Act together. I said they must be made consistent, and when I read section 83. it is impossible to say that, under the words "take, appropriate and use," some different and distinct meaning is applicable, and that by reason of that this mortgage must be limited to property then acquired and not affect subsequent property, or that the intervention of the Lords of the Treasury would be necessary for every trifling matter under the act, such as the selection of the site, and various other matters to be done. But the way I read it is this: there is the Municipal Corporation Act which forbids corporations alienating their property in the largest and most general sense. Then the 1 Vict. c. xii. s. 83. uses the largest and most extensive words that can be, saying that nothing contained in this act shall authorize them to do what they could not have done without it, and, consequently, except where the specific and precise provisions and enactments are contained authorizing the peculiar things to be done, it leaves them exactly as they were before, and, consequently, the prohibition of alienation extends not merely to existing lands, but to future and any property which they may acquire hereafter; and if any person should think fit to make a gift of an estate or land to the corporation by deed properly enrolled under the Mortmain Act, the corporation would be just as much prevented from alienating that land as if it had belonged to the corporation prior to the passing of the Municipal Corporation Act, or prior to the passing of the Market House Act. I should so look at it between two private individuals; but it is stronger as it affects the case of the corporation, than if this question arose as against an individual. It is true that a judgment would ripen into a lien and charge upon the land, but it is a question whether that would have the effect as against a corporation. The question may have to be determined between these very persons, what will be the effect of the judgment recovered against the corporation? and whether a distinction can be made between a judgment in iudicio, and a judgment confessed and not resisted? Certainly, if a corporation has borrowed money, and has no defence to the action, it is difficult to see how they can be in a better situation by resisting the action and putting the creditor to the useless expense of obtaining the judgment, instead of making no defence in the action and allowing the judgment to go by default. If a judgment can go by default, or if a judgment can be confessed at once when the money is raised, it is clearly another form by which a corporation can alienate their property to any extent, because if the gment can be enforced against the corporation it is merely doing it in that form instead of by a mortgage by deed; but it is not necessary to go into that, because if there were a matter between two private individuals, I am of opinion that treating, as I am bound to treat, the market-house mortgage as simply a nullity, as nothing more than a deed of covenant, and there being only one mortgage, and that one mortgage paid off, the equity of the mortgagor to have the deeds and the reconveyance arises immediately, notwithstanding the subsequent deed of covenant. The plaintiffs, therefore, are entitled to a decree. In Deaton v. the Mayor of Brecon, I made a reservation with respect to any case where personal equity may arise, but a personal equity cannot arise against a corporation. The members of the corporation themselves may have induced persons to lend money to the corporation, and by so doing they may have become personally liable to particular persons who lent the money, but the words "personal equity" do not apply to a corporation in its corporate character, and it is impossible that the corporation itself should be bound in its corporate character, on the ground of having obtained money by the wrong of a personal equity; that would qualify or disentitle the corporation to the use of a defence which might not bemissible in the mouth of a private individual. The plaintiffs, therefore, are entitled to a decree for reconveyance of the deeds, and for the delivery up of the title-deeds, and the defendants must pay the costs.

 17, 18, 21. } HOARE v. DRESSER.

Shipping Documents—Legal and Equitable Rights.

N, a timber-dealer in Sweden, had transactions with D, a factor in London, who sold timber on his account on a del credere commission. D had sold for him three cargoes of timber. N, on the 29th of September 1853, wrote to D a letter, in which he expressed a hope to be able in a few days to send the shipping documents of all the cargoes. Two only of those cargoes arrived. On the 6th of October 1853, N. wrote to D. inclosing invoices of timber shipped on board three vessels, and made out an account in which N. appeared to be a creditor for 1,312*l.*, and he drew a bill to that amount on D. On the same day N. wrote to H. & Co., stating the value of the cargoes, and asking for three acceptances to the amount of 1,300*l.* He inclosed his letter to D, and the bill and the shipping documents, with directions to H. & Co. to deliver these last to D, on condition that D. accepted the bill for 1,312*l.*, acknowledged the correctness of the account current, and admitted that the cargoes agreed for had been forwarded. These conditions were communicated by H. & Co. to D, who called the whole affair a regular swindle. D, after some hesitation, accepted the bill, but he obtained possession of the shipping documents by a statement that he wanted them to compare with the invoices, and would return them if from any cause he did not accept the bill. On this H. & Co. accepted N's three bills for 1,300*l.* D. did accept the bill for 1,312*l.*, but refused to return the shipping documents, and utterly disregarded the other conditions on which they were to be delivered to him:—Held, that though he might have a prior equitable claim to these shipping documents, he had not properly insisted on it, and that he had thereby misled H. & Co., who had a legal right to recover them from him.

This was an appeal against a decree of the Lords Justices, by which a previous decree of Vice Chancellor Kindersley had been varied.

The facts were, shortly, these:—Norbom, a timber-dealer in Sweden, employed Dresser to sell timber for him in different parts of England on a del credere commission. In December 1852 and March 1853, Dresser, under Norbom's directions, sold three cargoes of timber for him, to be delivered at Bristol, at Gloucester, and at London respectively. Before the timber reached England Norbom had drawn and Dresser had accepted a bill for the price. This bill was paid. Only two cargoes were sent, one to London, the other to Bristol.

On the 29th of September 1853 Norbom wrote to Dresser, "As an advance on the freight to these captains, I have been compelled to request Mr. Frestadius, of Stockholm, to draw upon you for my account, 200*l.* at ninety days' date, which I request you to honour to my debit. In a few days I hope to send in the shipping documents of all the four cargoes." There were other dealings between the parties, and Dresser claimed a large balance on the general account.

On the 6th of October 1853, Norbom wrote a letter to Dresser, inclosing invoices of deals and timber shipped on board three vessels, the Verene, the Christiane, and the Solide, to the alleged amount of 2,013*l.*, from which there were two deductions, amounting to 700*l.*, leaving a balance of 1,312*l.*, for which Norbom drew on Dresser in favour of Hoare & Co. On the same 6th of October 1853 Norbom wrote to Hoare & Co., introducing himself through a Mr. Frestadius, and inclosing his letter to Dresser, and the draft for 1,312*l.*, which he requested them to cash, and also the shipping documents, and gave these directions:—"After having obtained his acceptance, his acknowledgment of the correctness of the inclosed account current, and his written approval that I have delivered all the sold and purchased wood cargoes; then deliver to him the annexed three bills of lading of the shipped timber per Christiane, Verene and Solide, together with the inclosed two charter-parties. Should, against expectation, Dresser refuse acceptance, and not deliver the required certificate that all the agreed and sold cargoes have been delivered, then I request you to protest against them, and sell in the best possible way, and for my account, these extremely good cargoes." In truth, the cargo to Gloucester had never been delivered. These letters, with the bills of lading of the Verene, and the Christiane, and the Solide, were all forwarded to Hoare & Co. by Kleman, an agent of theirs in Sweden, and were received by them on the 24th of October 1853, and were at once taken by one of their clerks to the office of Dresser. This clerk, and Dresser, and Dresser's clerk differed in the accounts which they gave of this interview. Hoare's clerk said that he translated such parts of Norbom's letter as related to the conditions on which the shipping documents were to be given up to Dresser, who appeared unwilling to give his acceptance of the draft upon such terms. Dresser said, "I expressly stated that the proceeding was a strange one, as the cargoes were already mine, and that I had made advances to Norbom in respect of them"; that Norbom was his debtor. Dresser's clerk added, that the proceeding on the part of Norbom was "a regular swindle"; to which Hoare's "clerk made answer, that he knew nothing of the transactions, and only had to hand over the shipping documents." Dresser refused at that time to accept the bill for 1,312*l.*, and Hoare's clerk went away, leaving the letter, account current and bill with him. Dresser went to consult his attorney, who advised him to accept the bill, and to proceed against Norbom by foreign attachment in the Lord Mayor's Court. Dresser thereupon wrote to Hoare & Co., "We shall feel much obliged by your lending us the bills of lading, charters, &c., specifications for the cargoes shipped by Norbom, and we will return them, if from any cause we do not accept the bill of 1,312*l.* We cannot examine the invoices without the above documents." These documents were delivered to Dresser's clerk, who gave a receipt for them, and on the same day Hoare & Co. wrote a letter to Dresser, formally describing the documents which had been lent to him, and also the conditions on which he was to keep them, namely:—"On receiving your acceptance to the before-mentioned draft, your acknowledgment of the correctness of the account current, and your admission that Mr. Norbom has delivered all cargoes sold and contracted for through you, except that per Ingeborg Anna, which vessel was at Hernosand loading when Mr. Norbom wrote. As we have received instructions from Mr. Norbom to cover insurances on these cargoes, should you refuse to comply with these conditions, we shall feel obliged by receiving your decision in this matter at as early a moment as possible."

On the morning of the 25th the bill for 1,312*l.* had not been accepted by Dresser; but on the afternoon of that day it was sent accepted to the office of Hoare & Co., but none of the other conditions were complied with, and before sending it a suit had been instituted in the Lord Mayor's Court, to attach the goods of Norbom in the hands of Hoare & Co. An attachment was immediately afterwards served upon them

Hoare & Co. also, on the 25th, wrote to Dresser requiring compliance with the conditions, or demanding back the shipping documents, and offering to exchange against them the bill for 1,312*l*.

On the 24th of October Hoare & Co. had promised to accept three bills (980*l*., 220*l*. and 100*l*.) on Norbom's account. They accepted the first on the morning of the 25th of October, and the other two on the 1st and 4th of November.

On the 9th of November 1853 they brought an action against Dresser to recover the bills of lading, &c., and on the 19th of December Dresser filed a bill praying for an account, and for an injunction to restrain Hoare & Co. from proceeding with their action, and from parting with the bill for 1,312*l*., or otherwise dealing with it.

On the 28th of December an injunction was granted.

On the 19th of January the bill for 1,312*l*. became due, and was paid by Dresser.

The cause came to a hearing in July 1856, when Vice Chancellor Kindersley directed a general account, ordered Dresser to pay the costs to Hoare & Co., and continued the injunction.

Dresser appealed to the Lords Justices, who varied the decree, and declared that Dresser was entitled to relief against Hoare & Co., unless he should be found to be indebted to Norbom a balance of 1,312*l*. or more; that the award of costs to Hoare & Co. should be omitted from the decree, and that accounts should be taken between Dresser and Hoare, with liberty for Hoare & Co. to attend the taking of the same.—(See this case fully reported in the court below, 26 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Chanc. 51.)

Sir R. Bethell and Mr. Druce, for the appellants, contended that the cargoes of the Verene, Christiane and Solide, and the bills of lading thereof, were consigned to them in pursuance of an agreement entered into on their behalf, by their agent in Sweden, with Norbom, without any notice of any claim existing on the part of Dresser, and for the specific purposes mentioned in Norbom's letter of instructions of the 6th of October 1853, and that, except as therein expressed, the cargoes were not appropriated to the purposes of any contract made with Dresser. That Dresser obtained from them the bills of lading, &c. by fraud, and was not therefore entitled to claim them, and that his refusal to restore them was also fraudulent. That he had no defence at law against the action brought to recover these shipping documents, which had thus been fraudulently obtained and retained, and that he had no equity to restrain legal proceedings against him, but that the appellants were entitled to the proceeds of the cargoes, to indemnify them against the liability they had incurred by accepting the three bills for 980*l*., 220*l*. and 100*l*. They cited Wait v. Baker (1).

The Solicitor General, Mr. Lee and Mr. F. S. Williams, for the respondent, contended that Dresser, by contract between him and Norbom, for valuable consideration given to the latter, acquired a right to the possession of the cargoes of the three vessels and to their bills of lading, and to sell the cargoes and apply the proceeds in payment of what might be found due to him from Norbom, and that the appellants had notice of his rights, and were bound by such notice, and could not maintain any claim against him in respect of the liability they had incurred for Norbom, or in respect of the bill for 1,312*l*. 1*s.* 9*d.*, except subject to his rights and interests in these cargoes. They argued that Wait v. Baker did not apply; and to shew that where a contract of this kind had been made it was treated as giving an equitable lien over the property, and equity could enforce its performance, they cited—

Smith (2), to shew that the want of caution and wariness which the appellants might have exhibited in this case, was not sufficient to affect them with notice.

March 21.—The LORD CHANCELLOR, after stating the facts of the case, said, the first question was, whether there was an appropriation of the cargoes of the Verene and the Christiane by Norbom to Dresser. At law that question would have been answered decisively by the case of Wait v. Baker. But, in equity, the question was not whether the property passed, but whether there was not such a contract as to give to Dresser, under the circumstances, an equitable right to the property. It seemed to him that though, at first, no timber had been specifically appropriated as the cargoes to be sent to Dresser, yet, when the Verene and the Christiane were loaded for the purpose of satisfying the contracts into which Dresser had entered for Norbom, for the supply of the exact quantities shipped for Bristol and London, Dresser had an equitable title to the property in that timber, and could enforce it against any one claiming through Norbom. Then did Hoare & Co. merely claim through him as his agents, or did they acquire any rights independently of him, in this transaction? Up to October 1853 they were strangers to both parties. In one of the letters of the attornies for Hoare & Co., there was the expression that they were "acting in the matter merely as the agents of Norbom," but that was only true so far as the obtaining the acceptance for 1,312*l.* on the conditions stated in Norbom's letter was concerned. In other respects their interest was independent. They were asked to accept bills to the amount of 1,300*l.*, and the bills of lading and the other documents were sent to them that they might have in their hands a security against such acceptances. Did they incur any such liabilities before they had notice of Dresser's rights as against Norbom? In the interview which took place between their clerk and Dresser there could be little doubt that Dresser learned the conditions on which alone the bills of lading were to be delivered up to him, and that acting on advice he resorted to a contrivance to obtain them without performing these conditions. Whether at the moment he wrote his letter asking for these documents for a particular purpose, he had received the letter which informed him of the conditions on which alone they were to be delivered up was perhaps doubtful, but he knew it from conversation, and this latter question was, therefore, immaterial. It was admitted, on the letter posted on the 24th of October, that Hoare & Co. had become liable on the bills for 1,300*l.* Dresser had obtained the shipping documents by a stratagem, and made no objection to the conditions on which alone he was to hold them until Hoare & Co. had accepted the bills for 1,300*l.* When, therefore, on the following day they had the bill for 1,312*l.* 1*s.* 9*d.* returned to them without observation, they had a right to retain that bill to secure themselves against the liabilities which they had incurred. It was unnecessary to follow the proceedings further; the rights of the parties were determined on the evening of the 24th of October. At that time Hoare & Co. must be taken to have been in possession of the bills of lading which Dresser had improperly obtained from them: they had no notice at that time that Dresser had a better title than they, and they were entitled to retain the bill he had accepted as against the shipping documents which he had improperly obtained. The decision of Vice Chancellor Kindersley must, therefore, be restored, and the cause must be remitted, with a declaration that the appeal to the Lords Justices ought to have been dismissed, with costs.

LORD CRANWORTH entirely agreed.—The principle which governed a case like the present was the same at law as in equity: there must be at law an appropriation in the contract in order to enable the law to enforce it. So in equity there must be an engagement to appropriate either a whole cargo, or a part of a cargo out of a whole cargo, in either of which cases equity would interfere to decree what was in truth specific performance. But neither at law nor in equity could it be said, that because the person who made the contract had property within a particular jurisdiction, therefore that property could be made available for the specific performance of it. But that general question did not arise here. If Dresser had taken the proper steps before Hoare & Co. incurred any liability, he would have had an equitable right upon the timber as against Norbom. But that was not done, and the subsequent transactions (which his Lordship very fully described) shewed that Dresser had not done what he might to avail himself of the rights which he did possess, but had done that which allowed others to acquire rights against him. Hoare & Co. had no notice of Dresser's rights which could be binding on them, and they were entitled to indemnity against the liabilities which they had been allowed by the conduct of Dresser to incur.

LORD WENSLEYDALE concurred.—In the first place the legal title to these cargoes was vested by the delivery of the bills of lading to Hoare & Co.'s agent. When the factor under such circumstances came under a liability in respect of these bills of lading, and without notice of Dresser's equitable title his own title would prevail. At that time, however, they had not come under any liability, but on the morning of the 24th of October, when the bills of lading had actually come into their possession, they accepted the bills drawn on them in respect of this timber, and then they had acquired a title of their own. Then had there been any previous equitable assignment to Dresser, and had Hoare & Co. notice of it? It could hardly be said that there was any equitable assignment to Dresser before the 29th of September. An equitable assignment must be an undertaking to deliver a particular chattel, not to deliver any chattel; and, therefore, the case of Wellesley v. Wellesley did not apply for the purpose for which it had been quoted. But, upon the 29th of September, there was a positive engagement that the two cargoes of the Verene and the Christiane should be transmitted to Dresser, and though Dresser refused to accept the particular bill that was drawn upon them, this engagement was an appropriation of those two cargoes to him, and an equitable lien was thereby constituted. Then came the question whether, this lien existing, there had been such a notice of it as any mercantile man would act upon. It seemed to him that there had not. Merely saying, as Dresser did, that he had a claim, and characterizing Norbom's conduct as a "regular swindle," was not sufficient. There should have been a claim of right and a declaration of an intention to enforce it. On the whole, he thought that, although there was in this case an equitable claim on the part of Dresser, he did not give proper notice of it as of a claim on which he meant to insist. Hoare & Co. were entitled either to have back the goods or to retain the bill.

LORD KINGSDOWN must, of course, entertain great distrust of his opinion, when he found it was opposed to those of the Lords Justices; but, after full consideration of the case, he thought that the view taken of it by Vice Chancellor Kindersley was the correct one. It might be assumed that, before the evening of the 24th of October, Dresser could have established an equitable title to the cargoes, but it by no means followed that he would do so, and his statement to Hoare & Co., that he had such title, was no notice that he should insist upon it, and what passed subsequently must be taken to have authorized them to believe that he would not.—[His Lordship went through all the circumstances of the interview, and the correspondence subsequent to it.]—It was in Dresser's option whether he would return the papers or accept the bill, and he adopted the latter alternative. It was said that if he had returned the papers and refused to accept the bill, he might still have established his title against Hoare & Co. by means of a suit in Chancery. It was unnecessary to consider that question, for that was not the course he adopted, and Hoare & Co., under the circumstances which really took place, were entitled to stand in the same position as if the acceptance had been given at the time that they received the conditional promise to accept. If Dresser had lost advantages to which he would in a different state of things have been entitled, it was the result of the conduct he had pursued, and he was not entitled to relief against those whom his conduct had misled.

Orders reversed, and cause remitted with a declaration.

 March 24, 25. } SLINGSBY v. GRAINGER.

Legacy—"The Funds"—Bank Stock.

A, who was possessed of property, both in consols and in Bank stock, made a will, by which she gave to her brother (who received the income from all her property, and acted as her banker,) "everything I may be possessed of at my decease for his own life, and should he marry and have children of his own, to those children after: but should he die a bachelor, I leave the whole of my fortune now standing in the funds to Emma Slingsby, my god-daughter." The brother died a bachelor:—Held, that under this will the Bank stock did not pass to Emma Slingsby.

Catherine Fox, spinster, deceased, by her will, dated the 21st of February 1837, appointed her brother Edward Buckley Fox, her executor, and after giving certain small legacies, the will went on thus:—"To my dear brother Edward I leave everything I may be possessed of at my decease for his life, and should he marry and have children of his own, to those children after: but should he die a bachelor, at his death I leave the whole of my fortune now standing in the funds to Emma Slingsby, my god-daughter. Plate, linen, furniture, books, &c., &c., I leave to my brother Edward for ever; and after my funeral expenses are paid, and the legacies out of the money he has of mine in his hands, the remainder to be his for ever, and no question what the sum may be." The testatrix died on the 7th of July 1838. Her brother took possession of the property. The testatrix possessed considerable sums in consols and new and reduced annuities, and also a sum of 5,833*l.* Bank stock. Her brother had been in the habit of receiving her dividends for her, and she drew on him as on a banker for money. On the death of the brother, which occurred on the 25th of December 1854, the respondents became his executors and personal representatives; and a question arose between them and the appellant, whether the "Bank stock" belonging to the testatrix formed part of what was bequeathed to the appellant, or fell into the residue and became part of the estate of Mr. Fox. In May 1855, the respondents filed a bill, praying that it might be declared that the Bank stock was not included in the bequest to the appellant; and the appellant having put in her answer, the cause came on before Vice Chancellor Stuart, when His Honour was pleased to declare, that it did not form part of the bequest contained in the will of the testatrix. The appellant appealed to the Lords Justices, who, on the 10th of June 1856, affirmed the order of the Vice Chancellor (1). This was an appeal against the order and the affirmance.

Sir R. Bethell and Mr. Wickens, for the appellant, contended that, according to the true construction of the testatrix's will, the appellant on the death of the testatrix's brother became entitled under that will to the Bank stock as well as the other funds thereby bequeathed. They referred to the public newspapers, which contained Bank stock under the heading of "English Funds," and they cited—

Mr. Malins and Mr. Osborne, for the respondents, contended that the words "now standing in the funds," were words restrictive of the generality of the terms "the whole of my fortune," and must be held to mean Government stock alone; and that this was all the more clear, as the testatrix was possessed at the time of her death of stock which did properly answer the description given in her will. Sir R. Bethell replied.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—This is one of those cases of construction of a will as to which, depending as it does on the intention of a testator, to be gathered from the language employed, different minds may be easily led to different conclusions. At present, however, there has been an entire uniformity of opinion among those who have been called on to determine the meaning of the very few words in the present will which require to be construed. Three learned Judges have already pronounced their judgments upon the subject, and two at least of my noble and learned friends are prepared to express their unhesitating agreement with them. Under these circumstances, any doubt I may entertain of the propriety of the construction which has been adopted, is of little importance, and can have no influence on the final decision. Cases have been cited to shew that the term "the funds" has a fixed technical meaning, which prevents its extending to Bank stock, unless there is a clear indication of intention that it should be included; and there is a concurrence of opinion of so many learned persons, that no such intention is to be discovered in this will that it is impossible for me to rest with any confidence upon any different view which I may have formed. I feel, therefore, that it would not be becoming in me to press any doubt upon your Lordships' attention, but that I ought to yield to the judgment of my noble and learned friends that the decree should be affirmed.

LORD CRAWFORTH was of opinion, that the decree must be affirmed. The expression "the funds" must be taken to mean the same as "the Government funds," or "the public funds." Any other interpretation would let in every possible kind of property. Now, suppose, "public funds," or "Government funds," had been used, would those words have included Bank stock? They would not. Those words applied only to the funds appropriated by parliament to the payment of the public debt. But then it was said, that was not the way in which the expression was used popularly, and that popularly Bank stock would be included in the meaning of those words. The public newspapers had been referred to, which, under the market prices of the day of the "English funds," included Bank stock. That argument went too far, for it would have included Indian stock and Exchequer bills. Was there then anything in the context of the will to shew that the words "my fortune now standing in the public funds" were to have any other than their natural meaning? It was said that there was, because under the will everything, Bank stock included, would have gone to the brother and his children, if he had married and had had children; and, therefore, in like manner everything went to the god-daughter upon his death without children. But the testatrix had not used the same words in the two cases; and, therefore, that argument did not apply. She could not, therefore, have had the same intention in both cases. Then it was said, that the case came within the rule falsa demonstratio non nocet. But the words here were too closely connected together for that argument to arise; they were found in the gift itself, and not in any mere description which followed it. The case of Goodtitle v. Southern (2) did not apply, for there the land was properly described, though in some added words there was a mistake, for the whole of it was not in the occupation of A. C. Of course, such a mistake could not vitiate an otherwise valid gift. In this case, the gift was, "the whole of my fortune now standing in the funds," and the whole of her fortune did not stand in the funds. That which did not would not pass by these words.

LORD WENSLEYDALE concurred. He had often had occasion, particularly in the case of Grey v. Pearson (3) and Abbott v. Middleton (4), to call their Lordships' attention to the paramount importance of adhering to the rule of construction, that words must, where there was no obvious absurdity or repugnancy in the instrument, have their natural meaning assigned to them. The words "the funds" had, in common parlance, but one meaning, namely, the funds provided by parliament for the payment of the annuities granted by the government, and forming part of the National Debt. The 8 & 9 Will. 3. c. 20. might be referred to as shewing how that word had first been used. Nothing, therefore, but government securities would pass under such words, unless the context or the state of things to which the will related called on the House to put a different construction on these words. Now, Bank stock was nothing but a perpetual share of the general profits of a corporation. It was contended, that the testatrix must have meant the appellant, in the event of her brother Edward dying without children, to take all that the children would have taken under the previous bequest to him; and, therefore, that the words "the whole of my fortune now standing in the funds," must be considered as equivalent to the whole of her fortune which she had previously left to her brother. If they might speculate on what the testatrix possibly intended to say, they might possibly be right in conjecturing that she meant the whole of her fortune (with the exception of the small legacies mentioned in the will) to be enjoyed by the appellant in the event of the death of her brother a bachelor. But she had not said so. She had left him the whole, while she had left the appellant the whole "now standing in the funds." There was a clear distinction between the two things, and in his opinion these added words could not be treated as a falsa demonstratio. There were no words which were properly descriptive of the Bank stock, as to which the testatrix, in the event that had happened, had died intestate, and he was clearly of opinion that the decree of the Court below must be affirmed.

LORD KINGSDOWN had arrived at the same conclusion with much hesitation, and with some doubt whether they were not depriving the appellant of a benefit which the testatrix intended to confer upon her. It had been clearly settled, that Bank stock would not pass under the words "public funds," unless there was something in the context of the will which gave to the words a more extended description than could strictly be attached to them. However, the Vice Chancellor and the Lords Justices, with every disposition to adopt a different construction, had held that there was nothing in the context to shew such an intention, and that that construction was inadmissible. Two of the noble and learned Lords were strongly of the same opinion; and, in his opinion, to advise the reversal of a judgment, it was not sufficient to doubt whether it was right; they must feel a reasonable assurance that it was wrong. He did not in this case feel such assurance, and therefore concurred, though unwillingly, in the opinion that the appeal should be dismissed; but he thought, without costs.

Lunacy Regulation Act of 1853, ss. 137, 138.—Appointment of New Trustees—Form of Order.

A power for the appointment of new trustees contained in a settlement became vested in a person who had been found lunatic by inquisition. The committee of the person and estate petitioned, under the above-named act (16 & 17 Vict. c. 70.) for leave to exercise the power for him, and the same was ordered.

Form of order.

This was a petition presented by Mr Isatt Bowmer, the wife and committee of the person and estate of George Bowmer, a lunatic, and was presented under the provisions of the Lunacy Regulation Act of 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 70.). The facts were, that by settlement, dated the 26th of June 1848, made between G. Bowmer, of the one part, and two trustees of the other part, after assigning and conveying to the trustees a sum of 1,000*l.* due to G. Bowmer, and certain hereditaments upon which the same was then lent by way of mortgage, trusts were declared for G. Bowmer for life, and after his death for the petitioner Isatt Bowmer, his wife, and after her death upon trusts for the children of the marriage. The settlement reserved to G. Bowmer during his life a power to appoint a new trustee or new trustees as occasion might require, and it gave a like power after his decease to the surviving or continuing trustees or trustees of the settlement.

Early in the year 1857 G. Bowmer was found lunatic by inquisition, and his wife Isatt Bowmer was appointed sole committee both of his person and estate. The mortgage-debt had been paid off by the mortgagor, and the money deposited at a banker's, and both of the trustees having died, and there being no trustee existing, Mrs. Bowmer presented the present petition, praying that she, as the committee of the lunatic, might be at liberty to appoint two persons (A. S. and S. R.) named in the petition as trustees of the settlement of 1848 (there being evidence of their fitness), in the place of the two trustees who had died, and that the right to sue for and recover the sum of 1,000*l.* might be vested in the new trustees so to be appointed. Evidence was given of the willingness of the new trustees to act.

The clauses of the Lunacy Regulation Act, 1853, applicable to the case were as follows:—Sect. 137. "Where a power is vested in a lunatic in the character of trustee or guardian, or the consent of a lunatic to the exercise of a power is necessary in the like character, or as a check upon the undue exercise of the power, and it appears to the Lord Chancellor, intrusted as aforesaid, to be fit and expedient that the power should be exercised or the consent given (as the case may be), the committee of the estate, in the name and on behalf of the lunatic, under an order of the Lord Chancellor, intrusted as aforesaid, made upon the application of any person interested in the exercise of the power, may exercise the power or give the consent, as the case may be, in such manner as the order shall direct."

Sect. 138. "Where under this act the committee of the estate, under order of the Lord Chancellor, intrusted as aforesaid, exercises, in the name and on behalf of the lunatic, a power of appointing new trustees vested in the lunatic, the person or persons who shall, after and in consequence of the exercise of the power, be the trustee or trustees, shall have all the same rights and powers as he or they would have had if the order had also been made by the Court of Chancery, under the Trustee Act 1850, or any act amending the same, or if he or they had been appointed by decree of that Court in a suit duly instituted; and the Lord Chancellor, intrusted as aforesaid, may in any such case, where it seems to him to be for the lunatic's benefit, and also expedient, make any and every such order respecting the land or stock, or choses in action subject to the trust as might have been made in the same case under the provisions of the Trustee Act, 1850, or any act amending the same, on the appointment thereunder of a new trustee or new trustees."

Mr. Bury, in support of the petition, said, that this was the first order which he believed had been applied for under the above sections of the act.

THEIR LORDSHIPS made the order, which was in the following form:—"We do order that the said Isatt Bowmer, as the committee of the estate of the said G. Bowmer, exercise the power of appointing new trustees, vested in the said G. Bowmer, by the said indenture of the 26th of June, 1848, by appointing the said A. S. and S. R. trustees of the same indenture, and that it be referred to the Master in Lunacy to settle and approve of a proper deed for the appointment of the said trustees, and that the said deed when so settled and approved of, be executed by the said committee, in the name and on behalf of the said G. Bowmer. And we do order that the right to sue for, recover and receive the sum of 1,000*l.* deposited in the bank of &c., to the credit of &c., be vested in the said A. S. and S. R. on their appointment as such trustees as aforesaid, and be, when received by them, held, subject to the payment of the costs hereby directed to be taxed, upon the trusts of the said indenture of settlement. Direction for taxation of the costs of the application and payment thereof out of the trust monies."

GRESLEY v. MOUSLEY.

Solicitor and Client—Transaction between—Sale at Undervalue—Delay in seeking Relief—Acquiescence—Devise of a Right.

A sale of real estate by a client to his solicitor at an undervalue, the client being in embarrassed circumstances, and not having independent professional advice in the transaction, cannot be allowed to stand, although upwards of twenty years have elapsed.

A solicitor, who purchases from his client, must take care that the transaction is perfectly fair, and also that evidence of that fairness is preserved, the onus of proof being upon him; and he cannot be heard to complain that the means of proving his fairness is lost by lapse of time.

A right to sue is a devisable interest.

This was an appeal from a decision of Vice Chancellor Stuart, reported 27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 779. The facts are set forth in the former report (and are fully detailed in the judgment of his Lordship), though it does not appear that a material point urged on the appeal was noticed in the court below, namely, that at the time of the execution of the deed of conveyance from the late Sir Roger Gresley to the late Mr. William Eaton Mousley, the principal part of the estates were in mortgage for a sum of 7,000*l.* The facts may be thus shortly recapitulated. By deed, dated in February 1837, Sir Roger Gresley conveyed in fee to his solicitor, Mr. W. Eaton Mousley, certain manors and lands, and the minerals under them, for 6,940*l.* The transaction was conducted by the town agent of Mr. Mousley. Eight months after the sale Sir Roger Gresley died, having devised all his property to trustees upon trust for sale, and subject thereto to convey upon trust for his wife for life, and then to the use of children in tail, and on failure of issue to the use of William Nigel Gresley for life, with remainder to the use of his first and other sons successively in tail, with remainders over. The testator left no issue, and W. N. Gresley died in 1847, leaving Sir Thomas Gresley

(the plaintiff), his eldest son, who attained twenty-one years of age in January 1852. Sir Roger Gresley employed Mr. Mousley as his confidential solicitor until his death, and that gentleman continued to act for the trustees of Sir Roger's will in an administration suit instituted against them. Mr. Mousley died in 1853, having devised his estates to his two sons, who were made defendants in this suit. The only evidence of the 6,940*l.* having been paid was the receipt indorsed on the deed, and signed by Sir Roger Gresley. The Vice Chancellor, upon a bill filed, in 1855, by Sir Thomas Gresley, to set aside the transaction, in which the devisees of the will of Mr. Mousley, as well as the widow of Sir Roger (who had subsequently married) and her second husband were defendants, made a decree in favour of the plaintiff, declared the deed of conveyance void, both as against the plaintiff and as against the widow of Sir Roger and her second husband, and declined to direct an inquiry whether the purchase-money for the conveyance had or not been actually paid, directing the 6,940*l.* to be repaid, with interest, to the devisees of the will of the solicitor. The plaintiff appealed.

Mr. Rolt, Mr. Malins and Mr. George Lake Russell were for the plaintiff.

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Osborne, for Mr. and Lady Sophia des Vœux (formerly widow of Sir Roger Gresley).

Sir Richard Bethell, Mr. Amphlett and Mr. Charles Hall, for the devisees of the will of Mr. W. E. Mousley, divided their arguments into three parts: namely, that Sir Roger Gresley had no devisable interest in the estates in mortgage, and, therefore, as to them, that the plaintiff had no right to sue; secondly, that by lapse of time the plaintiff had lost all right of suit, so far as he ever had any; and, thirdly, that the decree exceeded the requirements of the case, and ought to be varied. They urged that the question of most importance was, whether Sir Roger Gresley had a devisable interest in the mortgaged estate at the time of making his will; and whether it passed by the words he had used, namely, "all my manors and freehold hereditaments which, as owner, or in execution of any powers, I am competent to dispose of by will." They maintained that the right to sue for those lands did not pass under the will, for that it could only be granted by instrument inter vivos as a right of entry. To support such a grant a party must be seized de facto at the time. Suppose Sir Roger Gresley had for a consideration granted a right to file a bill to set aside the mortgage deed, would the grantee be able to file such a bill? Assuredly not, for the grant would be absolutely void, and that view of the matter concluded the point. The laws against maintenance and champerty also were conclusive. The old law on the question was fully and ably laid down in the argument of Mr. Preston, in the case of Goodright v. Forrester (1); and the Court decided that a right of entry was not devisable. Upon this point they cited also—

Uppington v. Bullen, 2 Dru. & W. 184.

Case v. Holford, 3 Ves. 650.

There were two other points of considerable importance, namely, lapse of time and acquiescence; and a third, adequacy of price. It was contended that, at this distance of time, lapse of time was an absolute bar to such a bill, filed on the relation of solicitor and client; and, moreover, the operation of time was such, that the onus of justifying the transaction was not on the defendant; and the plaintiff could only succeed by establishing such a case as would give a title to relief if the relation of solicitor and client did not exist—

The fact of the value of property having increased by reason of circumstances taking place in the neighbourhood, as in this case the making of a railway near the property, would not avail to induce the Court to say that the price was inadequate at the time, but would operate the other way.—

April 29. — LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—The main question in contest in this case is, whether the plaintiff is entitled to set aside a sale by the late Sir Roger Gresley, a landed proprietor in Derbyshire, of a portion of his estates there to Mr. William Eaton Mousley. Sir Roger Gresley must be taken to have been legally seized in fee of part of the estates, and to have been owner of the equity of redemption of the rest, subject to some mortgage or mortgages on which money was at that time due. Early in 1837 the sale was completed, so far at least as the execution of the conveyance in proper form, regular and according to law. Perhaps the purchase-money was also then paid in money, or satisfied by way of set-off, or in account. The deed is in these terms—[His Lordship read the deed]—and the receipt for the consideration-money, 6,940*l.*, is indorsed, and that and an accompanying document are attested by Mr. Hamilton and Mr. J. W. Mousley. The accompanying document was one whereby Sir Roger Gresley, who had not the legal estate in part of the property, covenanted for himself, his heirs or assigns, within four months, to procure a conveyance of the legal estate of the estates held in mortgage freed from the mortgage debts, to the uses of the deed of even date. No proof has been given of any written or verbal agreement for this purchase. I agree, however, that the bill contains a sufficient allegation of a written contract. The purchaser was let into possession of the estates. In October 1837, Sir Roger Gresley made his will, which contained a devise so framed as to include his right to the property if it had remained in his possession, to his wife for life, for her separate use, with remainder to Sir Nigel Gresley for life, with remainder in tail to the plaintiff, who attained his majority in 1852. Sir Roger Gresley died in 1837, Sir N. Gresley in 1847. The bill to set aside the sale was originally filed in April 1855, and amended in 1856, at which time, or previously, all the defendants had appeared. Time, therefore, in itself, is no bar to the relief prayed; but the late period of the suit, coupled with the fact of the death of the original parties, and of a material witness, may probably detract from the effect of the evidence, and introduce a certain amount of doubt. The allegations upon which the plaintiff relies are, that the sale was effected at an undervalue; that it was made by a client to his solicitor, and that it was made at a time when the client was in embarrassed circumstances. I consider that all these allegations are proved, subject to this, that Sir Roger Gresley was far from being actually insolvent, his property being more than sufficient to pay his debts; subject also to this further remark, that from a long period before 1830 Mr. Mousley had been Sir Roger Gresley's solicitor. It is clearly proved, that for more than seven years he had been his confidential adviser, and it is not proved, or to be inferred from the evidence, that Sir Roger Gresley had any other adviser or assistance. Mr. Hamilton, one of the witnesses to the deed of conveyance, was the London agent of Mr. Mousley; the other witness was his son. Undervalue to a material extent is also in my opinion proved, whether subsequent events are or are not taken into account. It is also clear, that Sir Roger Gresley, though solvent, owed at the time large sums of money, and was much harassed by his debts. The questions, therefore, for decision are, first, whether the title of Sir Roger Gresley was a devisable interest; secondly, whether there is any case of confirmation against Sir Roger Gresley or the plaintiff; and thirdly, whether, in the circumstances referred to, there ought to be a presumption in favour of Mr. Mousley's representation of the facts in dispute. All these questions I am of opinion ought to be answered in the plaintiff's favour. With respect to the first point, I think it is concluded by the authority of the cases before Lord St. Leonards. If those cases are binding upon this Court, there is no more question; if not, still I am of opinion that those cases are correct. As to the second point, I am of opinion that there is no reasonable ground for saying that Sir Roger Gresley or the plaintiff have confirmed the transaction. The plaintiff was not born before 1831; Sir Roger Gresley died in 1837, and Mr. Mousley continued his solicitor and confidential adviser until that event, and for some years afterwards of the executors and trustees of his will, and of his widow. Whether the widow confirmed or acquiesced in the transaction I do not say, nor have I the means of saying. With respect to the third point, it is not proved that any important book, or paper or document has been destroyed, mutilated, defaced, lost or mislaid—subject to this observation, that certain documents or books of Sir Roger Gresley have been destroyed by Mr. Mousley, and possessed by him; I do not mean any other than a perfectly innocent destruction, and fair possession. But the evidence does not shew that any material testimony has been lost, or that Sir Roger Gresley, Mr. Mousley or Mr. Hamilton, if alive, could have given any evidence materially altering the case. Nor is there the least probability that if the proceedings had been commenced before 1838, and each of these gentlemen had been before the Court, the evidence on the part of the appellants would have been materially added to, or on the other side materially contradicted, explained away or displaced. It is, however, right to say, that very probably the mortgage of 1837 might have been satisfactorily explained, and the payment or satisfaction of the purchase-money plainly proved or disproved. The intimate relation, however, of solicitor and client, the client's temporary difficulty and the undervalue seem to me proved to demonstration. It should be remarked, too, that Mr. Mousley, in 1837—the year of the purchase, when also Sir Roger Gresley made his will, and died—was aware of the contents of the will, and that he did not die until 1853. He must have been conscious that if the transaction were impeached, the burden of supporting it would be upon him. I cannot consider it likely that Mr. Mousley would be careless of preserving any evidence favourable to the support of the transaction, and my present impression is against assuming that the purchase-money (stated in the draft to be 7,000*l.*) was paid or satisfied. In this and a few other respects there must be an alteration in the decree, especially inasmuch as it is more in favour of Lady Sophia Des Vœux than justice at present requires, though eventually it may turn out to be correct.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER said, that this was an appeal from a decree of Vice Chancellor Stuart, setting aside a sale by Sir Roger Gresley to Mr. Mousley. There were three points to be considered: first, whether the plaintiff had any title to sue under the will of Sir Roger Gresley; secondly, whether the purchase was originally impeachable, and, if so, whether it was now impeachable through lapse of time; thirdly, whether the decree had gone further than it ought to have done; and, if so, what variation should be made in it. As to the first point, the will of Sir R. Gresley was made after the execution of the conveyance; and it was therefore argued that the testator had no estate, and there was no devisable interest, but only a right of suit analogous to a right of entry at common law. This view was, however, supported by no authority. It was, indeed, admitted that Uppington v. Bullen and Stump v. Gaby were opposed to it; but the authority of those decisions was called in question. His Lordship would hesitate to depart from authorities which were of equal weight with the decisions of this Court, even if he entertained a strong doubt of their correctness; but on a careful consideration he did not dissent from them. He was of opinion that the analogy contended for between such an equitable right as the present and a right of entry at common law did not exist. At law there was only a right to institute proceedings for the purpose of recovering the seisin. But such an equity as this existed independently of the institution of proceedings. The decree proceeded, not upon a new right, but upon a pre-existing right. It was attempted to support the argument by reference to the rule as to the revocation of a devise by a will, though the will might turn out to be void. But in that case there would be an intention shewn not to devise the property; here there was no intention not to devise. He was therefore of opinion that there was no ground for the first objection. As to the second point, there had been lately so many cases of dealings between solicitor and client before this Court, that his Lordship had been led to doubt whether an impression did not prevail that the Court had relaxed its rules on this subject. He thought it right to state, for the information of those who ventured on such transactions, that this was by no means the case. There would be a strict observance of the rules which the obligations arising out of the relation enforce upon the parties, and strict evidence would be required that these rules had been complied with. The full consideration which this subject had received on former occasions rendered it unnecessary to detail these rules. It was only needful to refer to the argument respecting the length of time. The doctrine of the Court was well laid down by Lord Camden in Smith v. Clay (2). He said, "A Court of equity, which is never active in relief against conscience or public convenience, has always refused its aid to stale demands, where the party has slept upon his rights, and acquiesced for a length of time. Nothing can call forth this Court into activity but conscience, good faith, and reasonable diligence; where these are wanting the Court is passive and does nothing. Laches and neglect are always discountenanced, and therefore from the beginning of this jurisdiction there was always a limitation to suits in this court." And again, "Expediit reipublice ut sit finis litium" is a maxim that has prevailed in this court in all times without the help of any act of parliament. His Lordship had referred to this case, because an attempt had been made in argument to limit the time within which this Court would give relief to a stated period; for he thought that, independently of the statutory limitation, either express or by analogy, there was no such point of time, but each case was governed by its peculiar circumstances.

(2) 3 Bro. C.C. 639, n.

What were the facts of the present case to which these principles were to be applied?—[His Lordship examined the evidence as to undervalue, and as to the knowledge which Mr. Mousley had of the value of the coal-mines under the estate.]—With all these facts it was impossible to doubt that 6,940*l.* was not the fair value of the property. But supposing this were open to doubt, what was the duty of Mr. Mousley? Was it not to obtain the best advice, and to have inquired of the owners of neighbouring lands what they would have given for the property, and to have given Sir Roger Gresley the information so obtained? But there was no evidence of any such advice, inquiries or information. The appellants relied on Sir Roger Gresley's knowledge of the value of the estate, and on the failure of previous attempts to sell it. But the question was, what advice Mr. Mousley was bound to give to his client, whatever his client's knowledge of the value might have been. Nor did his Lordship attach any weight to the argument derived from the subsequent improvement of the access to the estate, or to the existence of faults in the seams of coal, which, at all events, did not apply to the whole of the estates. The chief point in favour of the appellants was, the difficulty arising from the lapse of time, and of ascertaining the true character of the transaction after the death of Sir Roger Gresley and Mr. Mousley. But Sir Roger Gresley's papers passed into Mr. Mousley's hands, and he was the solicitor of the trustees, and if these papers furnished material evidence they must have been preserved. The papers now existing only proved the continued embarrassment of Sir Roger Gresley. It must also be remembered, that if inquiries had been made, as they ought to have been made, some of the persons applied to might have been called as witnesses. A still more important consideration was, that Mr. Mousley must have known that the onus of supporting the transactions was on him, and that it was for him to preserve the necessary evidence. Solicitors who engage in such transactions as this must take care, not only that the transaction is fair, but that they can prove it to be so. On the whole, he felt no doubt that this sale was bad in its inception.

Whether, if Sir Roger Gresley had lived for a considerable time afterwards, it might have been supported in consequence of his acquiescence, his Lordship gave no opinion, as it might prejudice the question between the other parties. But, as between the plaintiff and Mr. Mousley, the time was far too short (the relations of solicitor and client having continued the whole of it) to produce such an effect, and nothing had occurred since to vary their rights. As to the third point, namely, the form of the decree: the sale had been set aside by the Vice Chancellor altogether as against Sir Roger Gresley and Lady Sophia Des Vœux. But there might be circumstances affecting one defendant which might not affect others; and it was not proper to decide the case altogether without inquiry. The decree must therefore be varied in this particular. His Lordship had said nothing about the payment of the purchase-money; but he agreed that there must be an inquiry as to that also. The following would be the minutes of the decree:—Declare that the sale, and the indentures of the 17th and 18th of February 1837, were void in equity as against Sir Roger Gresley and the present plaintiff; that notwithstanding those deeds the plaintiff was entitled to be tenant in tail in remainder of the estates, subject to the life interest of Lady Sophia Des Vœux, and subject to any sales or leases which may have been made of any part of the estates; an inquiry whether the sum of 6,940*l.*, or any part thereof, was paid or satisfied; an inquiry what sums were due and owing over and above the sum of 7,000*l.* secured by the mortgage in the pleadings mentioned; an inquiry what sales and leases had been made by Mr. Mousley and the defendants; an inquiry as to the amount of sums of money received by Mr. Mousley and the defendants in respect of such sales, and from the rents of the estates. The decree to be made without prejudice to the rights of the parties as to what had been received from the sales, and from the rents of the estates; and without prejudice to the life interest of any of the defendants.

Trustees' Relief Act—Costs.

A trustee paid money into court under the Trustees' Relief Acts (1) without making inquiries for the parties entitled to the fund:—Held, that he must pay the costs which the cestuis que trust, who were officers in the Austrian service, had been put to in obtaining payment of the money out of court.

Sir John Knight, by his will, dated the 12th of September 1830, gave the residue of his real and personal estate to his daughter Emily, otherwise Amelia, Walker, and appointed her sole executrix, with power, by any writing under her hand, to appoint two other persons to be executors, to whom probate should be granted.

The testator died on the 16th of June 1831, and a suit was instituted, disputing the validity of his will; this was compromised: and, under an agreement, dated the 12th of May 1832, a deed of arrangement between the parties, dated the 21st of November 1832, was executed, whereby it was declared that George William Henry Knight (since deceased) and John Edward Paddon, who had been appointed, by writing under the hand of the said Emily, otherwise Amelia, Walker, executors of the testator's will, should hold the testator's property, of which they should become possessed, upon trust, after payment of the testator's debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and the legacies given by his will, and certain other sums therein specified, to pay out of the surplus 4,000*l.* to the said Emily, otherwise Amelia, Walker, and to divide the remainder into equal one-sixth shares, and to pay five sixth parts unto the five several persons therein named, and to pay and apply the remaining one-sixth part and the accumulations thereof to and for the benefit of the children of Hood Knight, deceased, who should live to attain twenty-one, in equal shares. Hood Knight had left three children, Louisa Ann Knight (who died in 1836, an infant) and (John Keppel Knight and Charles George Knight), who afterwards attained twenty-one.

NEW SERIES, XXVIII.—CHANC.

On the 14th of May 1832 probate of the testator's will was granted to G. W. H. Knight (since deceased) and J. E. Paddon.

An advertisement was inserted in the daily papers early in 1858, to the effect that an application had been made to the Bank of England to direct the re-transfer from the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt of the sum of 344*l.* 6*s.*, 3*d.* per cent. reduced annuities, theretofore standing in the names of G. W. H. Knight and J. E. Paddon, such sum having been transferred to the said Commissioners in consequence of the dividends thereon not having been received since April 1834, and notice was given that at the expiration of three months the stock would be transferred and the dividends thereon paid to J. E. Paddon, the survivor, unless some other claimant should make out his claim thereto.

On the 31st of March 1858 Messrs. Loftus & Young, the solicitors of Mr. Paddon, wrote to Madame De Lewenan, the mother of the petitioners, as follows:

"Madame,—Mr. Reneau, of Charrington Street, has referred us to you for the address of the three children of your former husband, Captain Hood Knight, to whom his father, many years since, acted as next friend in a Chancery suit, wherein they were declared to be entitled to a sum of money, which they received. It has been lately ascertained that they are entitled to a further sum, and the object of our present inquiry is to learn their address, that we may communicate with them."

On the 2nd of April Madame De Lewenan wrote to Messrs. Loftus & Young, requesting them to inform her what was the amount of the sum remaining in Chancery for her sons, and what form was required to obtain it.

No notice was taken of this letter, and in June Mr. Murray, the solicitor of Madame De Lewenan, wrote to Messrs. Loftus & Young on the subject, but the only information obtained was that Mr. Paddon was trustee of the fund in question, and that on receipt of the money he would pay it into court under the Trustees' Relief Act, and that the parties entitled would have to apply to the Court.

In September Mr. Murray wrote to J. E. Paddon, stating that Madame De Lewenan had called his attention to the advertisement which had appeared in the papers relating to the re-transfer of a sum of 344*l.* 6*s.*, 3*l.* per cent. reduced annuities, belonging to Captain H. Knight's estate, of which he appeared to be surviving trustee, and that the same was divisible among Madame De Lewenan's family, and requesting to hear from him on the subject. Mr. Paddon referred Mr. Murray to Messrs. Loftus & Young, but they declined to give any further information than that when the money was paid into court he would have the opportunity of seeing J. E. Paddon's affidavit.

On the 13th of October Mr. Murray again wrote to J. E. Paddon, requesting further information, but he received no reply.

J. E. Paddon, in December 1858, transferred into court the 344*l.* 6*s.*, 3*l.* per cent. reduced annuities, together with a sum of 206*l.* 0*s.* 3*d.*, like annuities, which represented accrued dividends thereon, and by his affidavit he stated that J. K. Knight and C. G. Knight were in the Austrian military service, and that he had applied to their mother for their address, but had been unable to obtain it, and that he was not aware where either of them resided.

On the 7th of January 1859 Mr. Murray was served with notice that J. E. Paddon had paid the funds in question into court under the Trustees' Relief Acts; and from the affidavit accompanying the payment the petitioners first became aware of the source from which the fund arose, and of the deed of the 12th of May 1832 having been executed.

Mr. Murray then wrote to J. E. Paddon, inquiring why payment had not been previously made to the petitioners, and in reply was informed by Mr. Paddon's solicitor that the original investment had been forgotten, and that Mr. Paddon was unable to ascertain whether Capt. H. Knight's children were in existence or not.

J. K. Knight and C. G. Knight, who were both in the Austrian service, and resident in the Austrian dominions, then assigned the funds to Mr. Murray, and appointed him their attorney to receive what might be due to them from the funds arising from the testator's estate.

This petition was then presented. It stated that under two orders of this Court, dated respectively the 12th of November 1841 and the 9th of February 1844, made in a suit of Knight v. Knight, instituted by J. K. Knight and C. G. Knight and Louisa Ann Knight, deceased, against G. W. H. Knight and J. E. Paddon, for payment of a legacy for 1,500*l.*, bequeathed by the will of Sir J. Knight to the children of H. Knight, the shares of the petitioners in the invested proceeds of the legacy were paid out of court to the petitioners, and that the executor was consequently aware that the petitioners had attained twenty-one, and that the execution of the deed of trust of the 12th of May 1832 was never communicated to them or their solicitors. It then alleged that the payment of this fund into court was uncalled for and vexatious; and it prayed for a transfer of the funds to the petitioners, and also that J. E. Paddon might pay the costs of and incident to the application.

Mr. Selwyn and Mr. Murray, in support of the petition, insisted that a trustee was bound to make inquiries respecting his cestuis que trust before paying money into court. The act was not passed to enable them to denude themselves of trusts they had undertaken to perform. Mr. Paddon ought, therefore, to pay the costs of the petition which he had rendered necessary.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Freeling, for the trustee.—The act was passed to relieve trustees from the responsibility of administering trust funds where they desired to be so relieved. Mr. Paddon knew nothing of the family; he had accordingly complied with the provisions of the act, and he ought not to be made liable for the costs of this application—In re Jones (2).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—If the trustee is to have his costs, there is no case in which he ought not, unless it be when the trustee acts fraudulently or maliciously with the view to injure his cestuis que trust. It is impossible to conceive a clearer case. Mr. Paddon had accepted the trusts relating to a sum of money for the benefit of the children of Capt. H. Knight. He was a party to the suit in which it was ascertained by the Master's report that there were only three children, and that one of them had died in 1836. Not only is it found by the Master's report, but the fact is proved to the satisfaction of the Court, and the Court makes an order upon it for the payment of the money to the children in a cause to which Mr. Paddon is a party and in which he has access to all the papers. The trustee cannot claim any advantage from the lapse of time, while on the other hand he must not be prejudiced by it. He had the means of ascertaining who the children were and that the money was payable to them at twenty-one; and as the money was transferred into his name in 1832, he must have known that in 1858, if the children were then alive, they had attained twenty-one, and consequently that they were entitled to the payment of the fund. The question is, what is the duty of the trustee? Is it not his duty to perform his trusts? Is it not his duty to inquire whether the persons entitled to the fund are alive? and, upon proper evidence that they are living and that they have appointed a person to receive the money, to pay it over to the person so appointed? Lowson v. Copeland (3) and other authorities have established that the executor is not entitled to put his cestuis que trust to the expense of filing a bill for the purpose of establishing their claim to a fund when their right is perfectly clear and it is simply a question of evidence whether the person entitled is still alive. So far as I can ascertain from the affidavits, the trustee was well aware of the finding of the report at the time he paid the money into court. It is true that the parties entitled are serving in the Austrian army. That would entitle him to require evidence as to their existence and identity, but when he was applied to by a person professing to act on behalf of the persons entitled, he was not entitled to require, and the Court does not require the solicitor to shew his authority if he professes to act on behalf of the party and offers proper evidence that he was authorized to receive the money. That was all the trustee was entitled to. That is how the matter would stand if a bill had been filed by the cestuis que trust. Does it stand differently under the Trustees' Relief Act? If so, it is new to me. No doubt this act was passed for the relief of trustees, to enable them to pay the money into court and discharge themselves of the trust. At the same time, they are not without sufficient cause to put their cestuis que trust to the expense of paying the money into court. It was not in the contemplation of the legislature to sanction such a course, when there is no doubt as to the trusts; the trustee cannot say to his cestuis que trust, I will pay the money into court, and you must apply to get it out. If he is desirous to get rid of the trusts, he must appoint a new trustee. If the trusts are exhausted, and nothing remains but to pay the trust monies, he may require evidence as to the parties entitled, but he is not entitled to resort to the Court without first making those inquiries, otherwise it would be a source of great oppression. I had a case before me of this description. Some parties filed a bill against trustees for the payment of trust monies. The answer of the trustees was, that they intended to pay the money into court, and they did so. I made an order upon the trustees to pay the amount admitted by their answer to be in their hands. I said, it was not necessary for you to pay the money into court, and you must bear the costs both of paying it in and of getting it out again. I afforded them every facility in getting it out, but it was at their own expense. A trustee cannot say, I do not choose to require any evidence, and although all the parties entitled are ascertained I choose to pay the money into court. I admit that there is a distinction between this and the case of Woodburn's Trusts, because in that case the trustees acted vexatiously; here the trustees did not, but only incautiously, and it is said that he acted upon the advice of counsel. But

Doyle v. Blake (4) establishes that if trustees act upon the advice of counsel, and the Court is of opinion that what they do is contrary to law, they must nevertheless take the consequences, and the fact of their having taken counsel's advice does not exonerate them. It is also said that no objection was offered by the cestuis que trust to the course pursued by the trustee. But what is the case? A trustee has a sum of money in his hands; he knows who are the persons entitled to it, and all he has to do is to obtain a proper discharge. Instead of taking this course, he pays the money into court. If a bill had been filed, the Court could not in such circumstances have allowed the trustee his costs; and I cannot see anything in the acts of parliament to place the trustee in a different position because the cestuis que trust have to proceed by petition. The money, therefore, must be paid to Mr. Murray, the petitioner, and the trustee must pay the costs of paying into court and also of this application.

March 4. { AMERICAN COMPANY, ex
 parte LUND.

Winding-up—Contributory—Transferor of Shares.

A holder of 100 shares in a company, transferable by delivery, knowing that the company was in difficulties, and was likely to be wound up, handed his shares to a workman in his employ for 2s. 6d. the lot. Five days afterwards a resolution was passed to obtain an order to wind up the company:—Held, that the transfer could not be supported to the prejudice of other shareholders; and that the vendor, and not the purchaser, must be placed on the list of contributories.

The Mexican and South American Company was established in 1837 as a scrip company; they issued scrip certificates or shares, which were to pass from hand to hand by delivery.

On the 27th of November 1857 an order was made to wind up the company.

It appeared that William Lund held 100 paid-up shares in the company. On the 6th of November 1857 he attended a meeting of the company, when a most unsatisfactory statement was made of its affairs. The state and prospects of the company were then discussed, but nothing effectual was done, as sufficient shareholders were not present to constitute a meeting. A minute of the proceedings was entered in the minute-book, to the effect that it was considered expedient to call a meeting of the shareholders, and that measures should be taken for winding up the company.

Mr. Lund attended this meeting, and in consequence of what passed he determined to disconnect himself from the company, sell his shares and submit to lose his paid-up capital, to save himself from being pressed to make further advances on the shares he held. He accordingly on the next day offered to sell the whole of his shares to William Edward Hopkins for 2s. 6d. He at the same time explained to him the state of the company, and stated his belief that the supposed balance of 65,000*l.* in favour of the company was a fallacy, and would turn out to be nothing, though, possibly, some small amount might ultimately be received on account of the shares; but that, at any rate, no loss could arise as they were fully paid-up shares. W. E. Hopkins accepted the offer, and at the same time paid to Mr. Lund the 2s. 6d., and received the certificates. Mr. Lund stated that at the time he did not believe that there would be any ultimate loss, or that he was legally liable to be called on to contribute in respect of the shares to the debts of the company; but that he sold the shares to avoid being pressed by the directors (to some of whom he was personally known) to share their loss, as well as to avoid the annoyance and unpleasant position of having to refuse such request. W. E. Hopkins stated that he was a mechanic, and the foreman of Mr. Lund; that he received 30s. a week, and had four rooms in Mr. Lund's premises to live in; and that he had a few pounds of his own, but very little; that he considered the purchase he made was for his own benefit, and that the shares were as much his as his coat; and that if any money were received in respect of the shares he should not have to hand it over to Mr. Lund; that he supposed there was no liability attaching to the shares, as they were fully paid up; and that he might make a few pounds of them.

Mr. Lund told the secretary of the company that he had sold his shares, but he attended a meeting of the company held on the 12th of November, having obtained permission to do so; but he took no part in the proceedings. At this meeting the expediency of winding up the company was resolved on.

The secretary of the company, in his affidavit, stated that Mr. Lund, when he informed him that he had sold his shares, also said that he was ready to pay up his quota as soon as it was demanded, as it would prejudice him as a tradesman to have his name made public in any proceedings for winding up the company.

The chief clerk placed the name of Mr. Lund on the list of contributories; and the case now came on before the Court upon an adjournment from chambers.

Mr. Selwyn and Mr. Hobhouse, for W. Lund.—The question is, whether Mr. Lund is liable upon the shares he held in the company. He was not an original member of the company. The respondents say that he is liable, because he transferred the shares at a time when he knew the company was in difficulties, and for the purpose of getting rid of his liability. It has, however, been held that a person may get rid of his shares at any time, even after it has been resolved to wind up the company, and that it absolved him from liability. Now these shares passed by delivery, and to hold them is to own them; such was the constitution of the company, and the Court must support that. Being, therefore, the holder of 100 shares, he had a right to hand them over to any person at any time without the consent of the managing body of the company, but up to that time he was no doubt liable to creditors. The case is analogous to that of an assignee of leaseholds. He may assign to an insolvent, or he may give an insolvent a bonus to take the lease off his hands, and still it has not been held to be a fraud, so to get rid of his legal liability; and Lords Cottenham and Langdale, in Rowley v. Adams (1), after referring to Onslow v. Corrie (2), made executors liable because they did not assign the lease to a man of straw.

[The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I entertain doubts whether, in such circumstances, the Court could make executors liable for a breach of trust. The case seems to me at variance with the fundamental principles of equity. It is a startling proposition. The law has always held that an assignee may get rid of a lease by assignment, but the lessee cannot get rid of his covenants; though an assignee can get rid of the consequential liability for the future, because he is liable only during the time he holds the lease.]

Mr. Selwyn.—Mr. Lund is an assignee of these shares; they have come into his hands, and he was desirous of getting rid of them. It has hitherto been understood that it is the existing company that is being wound up; but suppose all the shareholders should turn out insolvent, or the holder of any set of shares should be insolvent and not able to contribute to the debts of the company, might not proceedings be taken by creditors against former holders? It would be a second winding up. Such a case has not arisen, but why may it not? and why may not previous holders be made to contribute to so much of the debts as were incurred during the time they held the shares? As yet these questions have not arisen. The principle of the cases hitherto has been, that if a person can by relinquishment or transfer get rid of his shares, the Court will not take into consideration the liability to creditors upon a question whether he is or not to be put upon the list. Of course, in none of the cases could it be contended that, as between himself and the creditors, he is not liable up to the time of his relinquishment. Much, therefore, must depend upon whether this was a bona fide transfer of the shares. In this case, however, both parties knew their relative position, one as seller and the other as purchaser, and the smallness of the purchase-money is not an objection, as in some cases less than nothing has been paid for the shares. Mr. Lund's name, therefore, must be taken from the list of contributories.—

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. — This is not a bond fide sale of these shares. Upon Mr. Lund's own statement, I am satisfied he could not have sold them in the market; he, therefore, parted with them to a person who is entirely under his control, and as he himself states, for the purpose of getting rid of them. Ex parte Jessop puts the question upon the bona fides of the sale. It was there said, that the Court will watch strictly a transfer made under such circumstances, and if it appeared to be tainted with any unfairness, the Court will interfere; but if it was in all respects open and fair, it would not set it aside, especially when a shareholder had full right to transfer to whom he pleased. Observe what the case was: there Jessop was a shareholder of the company, and it was proposed to wind up the company, and then an arrangement was made for the purpose of resuscitating it, through an actuary of the name of Sheridan. Mr. Jessop disapproved of that arrangement, and thought that the company ought to be wound up, and then, as Lord Justice Turner observes, he had no option if the company were not to be wound up, except to get rid of his shares, or he would be involved in all the liabilities which might ensue in case the resuscitation of the company should fail; accordingly he was in this position: a majority of the directors would not concur with him as to winding up the company, and he had no remedy but to wind up the company himself or retire from his connexion with it by the transfer of his shares. Under these circumstances he transferred his shares to Mr. Sheridan, who was a bond fide purchaser, and a respectable person, or rather they were transferred to Mr. Spence, the nominee of Mr. Sheridan. That case is perfectly distinct from a case where, not only there was a proposition to wind up, but where that was actually carried out in the course of a little more than a fortnight. The meeting at which it was stated that it was expedient to wind up the company, was on the 6th of November, and the winding-up order was actually made on the 27th of the same month; in the mean time Mr. Lund sold his shares to a person to whom he is paying 30s. a week, who has been in his employ for twenty years, and he transfers them for the purpose of getting rid of his liabilities; that cannot be treated as a bond fide sale: it is quite distinct from selling to a person in the market who knows exactly what the state of the circumstances of the company is, and who knowing that agrees to take the shares; it is quite distinct also from a case where there was an arrangement entered into for winding up the company, which the shareholder disapproved of, and therefore sold his shares. I concur in the observations of Lord Justice Turner. The only question is, whether this is what the Court considers a bond fide getting rid of the shares by the holder of them; I do not think it is, and Mr. Lund must remain on the list of contributories.

Witness—Privilege—Dealing in Shares—Company.

A company, formed in 1837, and issuing scrip certificates transferable from party to party by delivery, is not an illegal company.

A scrip company was established previous to the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110. The transfer of the scrip certificates to new purchasers does not create new members or vary the company, or bring the holders within the provisions of the statute, or render parties dealing in the scrip certificates of the company liable to penalties:—Held, therefore, at the Rolls that a stockbroker, who had as a matter of business bought and sold shares in the company, is liable to answer questions respecting his dealings; which decision, on appeal, was affirmed.

The official manager, appointed under the order made on the 27th of November 1857 for winding up the Mexican and South American Company, summoned Mr. Aston, a stockbroker, as a witness for examination before the examiner, when the following questions were put to him:—

Q. What is your profession, business or employment?—A. I am a stockbroker.

Q. Have you ever bought any scrip certificates or shares in the company?—A. Never for myself; and as I am advised the company is illegal, and that I may render myself liable to criminal or penal proceedings, I decline further to answer the question.

Q. Have you ever purchased any scrip certificate for any other person?—A. I decline to answer, fearing the consequence as stated above, from the illegality of the company's proceedings throughout.

Q. Have you ever had any scrip certificates or shares in your possession?—A. I have no scrip certificates or shares in the company in my possession at this time.

Q. Have you had any of these scrip certificates or shares in your possession at any time since November 1857?—A. I decline to answer that question.

The examiner certified these facts, and it was now asked that the witness might attend the examiner at his own expense, and submit to be further examined, or otherwise that he might be committed.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Roxburgh, for the official manager.—The witness is not a shareholder: he cannot refuse to answer merely because his answers may implicate his friends. The Bubble Act, 6 Geo. 1. c. 18. s. 19, which inflicted a sort of mysterious punishment, is now repealed by the 6 Geo. 4. c. 91, and the whole is left to the common law, and at common law such a company is not illegal. The case of The King of the Two Sicilies v. Wilcoxon (1) shows that no witness can be allowed the discretion of refusing to give evidence in a court of justice, by merely suggesting, "I may be exposed to penalties if I do," unless he is able to connect that objection with some law, which from the nature of the case may by possibility affect him with regard to his evidence; and it is for him to shew the existence of such a law.

possibility tend to criminate him, or subject him to any pains and penalties. Were it not so, the answers to an innocent question would soon involve him in a mesh from which he would find escape difficult; for instance, Where were you on such a night? Answer, I decline to answer that, it may subject me to punishment. It has been held, therefore, that the witness is the best judge of his own liability. This was a partnership registered, but not completely registered, under the Joint-Stock Companies Act; they took upon themselves to act in a quasi corporate capacity, and they issued, not to shareholders merely, but really to the public, what are called scrip certificates; there is no deed, and the power of transfer by mere delivery is unlimited. Now to sell such shares, and represent that the holder of such shares would be entitled to the profits and liable to the debts of the company so long only as he held the shares, and that by transferring them to another he would be free from all previous liability, would be an illegal pretending—a cheat—which would come within the meaning of indictable offences; it would be a conspiring fraudulently to misrepresent. It would also be an indictable offence so to misrepresent the law as to induce the unwary to enter into such a company. The Bubble Act merely declared what the law was, and added penalties. The witness would also be liable to penalties, under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110. s. 2, for upon the sale of every share after the 1st of November 1844, a new member was introduced into the partnership, and thereby a new and illegal partnership was formed; it also restrains the receipt of all dividends and profits. The exemption from the operation of the act, by the company having existed before the act passed, fell with its becoming a new partnership: its name no longer protected it. The company, which assumed to issue shares as if it were legal, was an illegal company, and the broker by trafficking in such shares has made himself responsible.—

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—There are three grounds upon which it is argued that this witness is not bound to answer the questions put to him:—first, that the association is illegal at common law; secondly, that he would incur penalties under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110; and, thirdly, that he may have made representations contrary to law, which have induced persons to enter into engagements which may make him liable to criminal indictments. Is a witness to determine for himself whether he is liable to any penalty? There are, no doubt, a great number of cases in which the witness must be the only person to determine it; but when it is a question of law, and all parties are before the Court, it is then for the Court to decide; and that is the present case. Is then this an illegal association at common law, totally independent of any statute, it being argued that such a society cannot legally act as a corporation without the royal charter? I am disposed to assent to that proposition, but I cannot discover anything that amounts to acting, or assuming to act, as a corporation. What is meant by acting as a corporation is not easily defined; it would seem to be a society of persons who, under a common seal, shall be able to bind the corporation aggregate, and to do those things which are authorized by the powers conferred by royal charter. If the illegality be that they do without a charter what the power of a charter can alone give, it can only be illegal if they do those things which the charter gives power to do, which is nothing more than to sue and be sued under a particular name, to use a common seal, and matters of that description. In the present case there is nothing like it. In the comment made upon Duvergier v. Fellowes in Harrison v. Heathorne, it was admitted, on demurrer, that the company did act as a corporation, and, consequently, they were open to the objection. The case was affirmed in the House of Lords (2), on the ground of an illegality of the assignment, and not on the ground relied on in the Common Pleas. The present case is not affected by any statute; and I find no case in which it is said that a partnership of persons who agreed among themselves that their shares should be legally assignable, in perpetuum or indefinitely, is absolutely void and illegal at common law; I find no case which lays that down as a proposition, nor am I able to say why such an association should be void at common law. It does not offend against society; it does not injure any class of individuals; and, in the absence of authority, I shall not be the first to hold that such an association is void at common law. In Harrison v. Heathorne, however, such an association was not considered illegal. I am referred to Blundell v. Winsor; but the judgment there proceeded upon the ground, that it was nothing more than a fraudulent attempt by various persons to draw in others to subscribe to an association, under pretence that they could get rid of their liability, and so make a profit of their shares and dispose of them; but if that were established, it would, no doubt, be a fraudulent and void association.

If these facts were before the Court upon the demurrer, there was ground for supporting the judgment; but if it proceeded upon the ground of its being a void association, then it is at variance with Harrison v. Heathorne, the case I should be disposed to follow. As, therefore, the association is neither illegal nor void at the common law, the next question is, whether there was any penalty incurred under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110. That act contains a restriction with respect to the disposal of shares. Section 26. directs that with regard to subscribers, and any person entitled to any share in any joint-stock company, "the formation of which shall be commenced after the 1st of November 1844." The company, then, was commenced in 1837, under the style of the Mexican and South American Company; and it has professed to carry on its business ever since under that name. The words "the formation of which shall be commenced after the 1st of November 1844" were therefore used in their ordinary meaning, and they cannot be considered as having any technical meaning, from which it is to be inferred that whenever an alteration was made in the existing partnership, by a variation of the number or by a change of its members, subsequent to that date, it was to be treated as a new partnership, and come within the provision of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, rendering registration necessary, and without it to make any person contracting for shares liable to the penalty mentioned in section 26. I am of opinion that this is not the meaning of the words, and that when the section speaks of the "commencement of the formation of the company," distinguishing between "the formation of the company" and the "commencement of the formation of it," it was clearly intended to use words as stringent as possible to point out that which does not mean an accidental variation of the number of the members of the company, which is to create a new contract within the provisions of this act. Entertaining really no doubt on that point, I am of opinion that under the statute no penalties are incurred. The only remaining ground of refusal to answer is this: that a representation was held out by this company to the world at large that all persons may get rid of their liability by a transfer of their shares; which is wrong in point of law, because they do not get rid of their liability in respect of contracts entered into by the company during the time they were members of it, and that this being a false representation held out to the world, upon the faith of which persons may have acted, they may be indicted

(2) 1 Cl. & F. 39.

COURTS OF CHANCERY:

... false representation. I am of opinion that this does not amount to more than that it is a contract between the parties themselves; but I feel satisfied that if it was actually so stated, and a person ad fide made an accidental misrepresentation on a point of law, that would not entitle him to say that he would not answer any questions on the subject; though if he had made such a misrepresentation fraudulently, with an intention of deceiving somebody, he might be indicted. Certainly, according to our experience in this court, we make persons answer interrogatories to bills infinitely more stringent, without anybody thinking that they could raise any objection that it would render them liable to such a penalty. I confess that not only my strong feeling is that this is a correct view of the case, but I am bound to say that I am mainly influenced by the very serious consequences which would follow from holding the opposite view. If I decide on the objection raised, whether a witness is bound to answer a question that this is an illegal association, the result would be, that the ad fide transactions of a company existing for a period of twenty years would be all unravelled, and most serious consequences would ensue. This Court has itself distributed a large amount of money, under the winding-up order made in this case, and am of opinion that both at common law and upon the words of the act of parliament, and upon the cases, there is no justifiable ground on which this witness can refuse to answer the question. And I determine the question upon the act, without taking into consideration the fact of its being a penal statute, and therefore to be construed most strictly against making any person liable to penalties under it.

June 1.—From this decision Mr. Aston appealed, the same counsel appearing for the appellant and for the official manager respectively as were engaged in the court below.

Mr. Southgate was for the creditors' representative.

The Court did not call upon any of the counsel for the respondents.

Besides the cases cited at the Rolls, the appellant's counsel referred to—

Harvey v. Collett, 15 Sim. 332; 2. c. 15 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Chanc. 376.
Pasley v. Freeman, 2 Smith's Leading Cases, 55.
The Statute 7 Geo. 2. c. 8, the Stock Jobbing Act.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE considered that there was not the least pretence for this appeal motion. There might possibly have been some ground if the case had been affected by the 26th section of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, but clearly it was not so. This company was established in 1837, and the circumstance that since that time, and before and since the passing of that statute, shares had been transferred could not have the effect contended for of bringing the company, however constituted, within this section. The real question was, whether this gentleman, having given a reason for not answering, had given a reason which could be accepted for his not doing so. He says, "I have never bought any shares for myself, and as I am advised the company is illegal, and I may render myself liable to criminal proceedings or penalties, I decline to answer further." He was then asked, "Have you ever bought shares for other persons?" and he said, "I decline to answer on account of the company's illegal proceedings." But at the witness "being advised" that the company was illegal was nothing. If he had shewn that it was illegal, he might have advanced a step. But, independently of the fact that the order for winding up had been in existence for nearly two years, his Lordship had not heard a single particle of evidence that there was any illegality in the company. He desired to be understood as giving no opinion either way on the observation made by Mr. Justice Maule in Fisher v. Ronalds (3). That applies to

(3) Ubi supra. The passage in the report is this:—"It is the witness who is to exercise his discretion, not the Judge. The witness might be asked, 'Were you in London on such a day?' and though apparently a very simple question, he might have very good reason to object to answer it, knowing that, if he admitted that he was in London on that day, his admission might complete a chain of evidence against him which would lead to his conviction. It is impossible that the Judge can know anything about that. The privilege would be worthless if the witness were required to point out a case where the witness had given no reason; but here the witness had given as his reason, and his only reason, for not answering that which (if he might use the expression) was no reason at all. The motion must be refused, with costs.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER entirely agreed, and said that the witness, in refusing to answer, had gone further, and given a reason that professed to cover a question which it would not cover.

Mr. Southgate applied for the costs of the appearance of the creditors' representative.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—I think the creditors' representative has a right to appear in the proceedings. He ought to have his costs out of the estate.

Dec. 6. } SCOTT & COLBURN.

Company—Borrowing Powers—Directors—Bills of Exchange—Mortgage of Buildings.

The directors of a company, in contravention of their deed of settlement, drew bills of exchange to secure a debt incurred in building a music-hall, and at the same time mortgaged the building to secure the payment of the bills of exchange. In a suit by the mortgagee for foreclosure,—Held, that the mortgage was valid, that the legal estate was vested in the plaintiff, and that the company could not, in this foreclosure suit dispute the power of the directors to give such security for a past debt.

A company was formed for carrying on the Royal Surrey Gardens; it was provisionally registered under the Limited Liability Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 133.) in December 1855, and subsequently it was completely registered on the 13th of April 1856. On the 6th of September 1856 it was registered under the Joint-how his answer would tend to criminate him." And the Lord Chief Justice Jervis, in giving judgment in the same case said, "We must allow the witness to judge for himself, or he would be made to criminate himself entirely."

Stock Companies Act, 1856, 19 & 20 Vict. c. 47.

The deed of settlement empowered the directors to erect a hall on the company's premises, and for that purpose to enter into such contracts or arrangements with builders and others as they might think proper. The directors were forbidden to accept bills of exchange on behalf of the company; they were empowered to borrow 10,000*l.*, and also, with the sanction of a general meeting, a further sum of 10,000*l.*, and to raise such sums on the security of the company's property; and the lenders were not to be bound to inquire into the occasion for the loan, or the validity of the resolution authorizing it; and, except as aforesaid, it was declared that it should not be lawful for the company, or the directors on behalf of the company, otherwise than in the ordinary course of business, and for the current expenditure of the company, to contract any debt or debts whatsoever. And it was declared that, for the further security of the directors, all deeds under the common seal of the company should be binding on the company in any court of law or of equity; and that the company should not be at liberty to dispute any statement therein contained, or to allege in bar thereof any irregularity in the manner of obtaining them.

On the 23rd of February 1856, before the company was completely registered, James Coppock, the chairman, and two other provisional directors, were appointed a sub-committee to arrange a contract for building a music-hall.

On the 27th of the same month they entered into a contract with the plaintiffs to build the said music-hall, which provided that the plaintiffs should be paid the sum of 17,000*l.*, at the times and by the instalments following; that is to say, three-fourths of the amount of work done up to the 31st day of March 1856; three-fourths of the amount of work done up to the 30th day of April 1856; three-fourths of the amount of work done up to the 31st day of May 1856; three-fourths of the amount of work done up to the 30th day of June 1856, as soon after such periods as the same should be ascertained and certified; and on the 30th day of September 1856, such a further sum as, with the previous

s, would make up or amount to of 12,000*l.*, and the remaining with interest thereon at the rate of cent. per annum, on the 31st day of December 1857. At the foot of the said act was added the following memorandum, signed by James Coppock:—

And in consideration of the contract having commenced the work, James Coppock, of No. 40, Parliament Street, does and undertakes to pay to the contractors, John Alderson Scott and Edward Cornwall, the first portion of the 17,000*l.*, namely 12,000*l.*, at the times hereinbefore mentioned; the remaining sum of 5,000*l.* to be secured by a mortgage of the gardens, and by engagement under the common seal of the said company, as soon as the same can be affixed."

At a meeting of the directors, held on the 16th of April 1856, the following resolution was passed:—

"Resolved, that all the proceedings of the committee of management as entered in this book, and all contracts and agreements provisionally made to this date by them or by any sub-committee duly appointed, be ratified and confirmed, and be adopted and fulfilled, and become contracts and agreements of the Royal Surrey Gardens Company, Limited, and that the common seal of the company be affixed to these minutes in confirmation and ratification thereof." And the seal of the company was affixed thereto at a meeting held on the 24th of April 1856.

The plaintiffs completed their contract, and executed various extra works, and obtained the architect's certificate for 18,976*l.* 16*s.* 7*d.*, of which sum 12,000*l.* was paid in cash pursuant to the agreement, and a mortgage was prepared to secure 5,000*l.* of the balance upon the property of the company, pursuant to the arrangement entered into; and it was agreed that the payments of principal and interest should be further secured by bills of exchange, in addition to the security of the company's premises—the directors in the deed respecting the non-acceptance of bills of exchange on behalf of the company having escaped attention. Bills were accordingly accepted for the 5,000*l.* and interest. The mortgage recited that the plaintiffs had agreed to accept payment in this form, on having the payment of the bills secured as followed, and witnessed that, "for further securing the payment of the said principal and interest monies at maturity of the said bills of exchange given for the same as aforesaid," the company assigned the premises to the plaintiffs, subject to redemption, on payment of the said bills of exchange when they should become due.

The seal of the company was affixed to this deed on the 6th of November 1856.

The plaintiffs filed the bill in this suit, praying for a decree of foreclosure, the object being to determine the priority of several mortgages upon the property of the company, which was now in a course of liquidation.

The defendant Colburn, as holder of a second mortgage, given to cover advances made from time to time, contended that the plaintiffs' deed was void, because the directors had no power to accept bills of exchange, and also because the mortgage was not given for an advance of money, but in payment for work done under their contract. It was also contended that, independently of the mortgage-deed, the contract did not bind the company, and that what had passed did not amount to adoption.

Mr. Hemming (with whom was Mr. Palmer) appeared for the plaintiffs. Mr. Follett and Mr. H. F. Bristowe, the defendant Mr. Colburn. Mr. Barber, for the liquidators. Mr. Selwyn and Mr. J. H. Palmer, for the executors of James Coppock, deceased.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. — Two objections have been taken to the validity of the plaintiffs' mortgage. The first is, that it is a mortgage to secure the payment of certain bills of exchange, accepted by the directors, which was an act ultra vires. The deed recites the execution of works by the plaintiffs; that a sum exceeding 5,000*l.* was due from the company to the plaintiffs; and that bills of exchange were given for 5,000*l.* and interest; and then it witnesses that the mortgage is made for securing the said principal and interest monies, at the maturity of the bills of exchange. It is therefore in fact, a mortgage to secure the principal debt of 5,000*l.* and interest, and not the payment of the bills of exchange. It is true that the proviso for redemption is on payment of the bills of exchange as they became due; but that was because it had been arranged, as already recited, that the payment should be made in that way. If the bills were paid at maturity the proviso would be satisfied, and the only possible question on the form of the proviso would be, whether a subsequent payment of principal and interest would entitle the mortgagee to a reconveyance, about which there could be little doubt. This is a case for a liberal construction of the deed; for there is no doubt that money's worth was given by the plaintiffs to the company, and that for the very purpose of the company's existence; and that being so, and a technical objection being taken to the security, I am bound to look at it strictly to ascertain whether it applies. As to the second objection, I am disposed to agree that the equitable mortgage contained in the agreement did not bind the company, unless they were bound by estoppel by the recital on the deed; but it is not necessary to go into that. The legal estate clearly passed by the deed to the plaintiffs; it is under the seal of the company, and were I to assume that the deed was fraudulent and void, before advantage could be taken of it a suit must be instituted to set aside the deed; and, for the purposes of this suit, I am bound to assume the validity of this deed, which passes the legal estate. There will, therefore, be a declaration that this was a valid mortgage. It is very much for Mr. Colburn's interest to treat it as a good security; because any argument founded on the objection that it was given for a past debt by which the plaintiffs' security could be invalidated, would apply equally to the defendants' mortgage; their security was given for a past debt, and it does not seem material how the debt arose—but I do not enter into the question. There will be an account of what is due on the mortgage of the 6th of November 1856, and inquiries as to the subsequent incumbrances.

LORDS JUSTICES. } STEAM FUEL COM-
April 16, 18. } PANY.

Winding up—Contributory — Forfeiture of Shares—Allottee.

B. having applied for shares in a company, and having had 100 shares allotted to him, sold them without having signed the deed of settlement, or attended any meeting of the company. The directors, with the sanction of the shareholders, at a general meeting, declared all the shares to be forfeited where the shareholders had not signed the deed, but no power was given them under the deed to take this course:—Held, that B. was not discharged from his liability in respect of such shares, and his name was placed on the list of contributories. On appeal, this decision was affirmed, the directors having no power to declare a forfeiture.

This case came on upon an adjourned summons from chambers.

The National Steam Fuel Company was completely registered in September 1852. In October 1853 the directors of the company ordered a notice to be inserted in the newspapers, and to be sent to the shareholders, to the effect that those shareholders who had not signed the deed of settlement in respect of the shares held by them, were required to execute the same on or before the 21st of November next, or in default the shares would be absolutely forfeited. On the 29th of December following an annual general meeting of the company took place, when it was resolved that the question of the forfeiture of those shares for which the deed of the company had not yet been signed be considered and determined at a special meeting of the shareholders, to be held on the 27th of April 1854. The special meeting was held on that day, and it was then resolved, "that the whole of the shares for which the deed of settlement of the company shall not have been signed on or before the 31st of May instant, be thereafter absolutely forfeited." And the directors were authorized to re-issue the remaining forfeited shares of the company. On the 12th of July following the directors issued circular to the shareholders, stating that about 2,000 shares, on which 1l. per share had been paid, had been forfeited, in conformity with the resolutions passed at general and extraordinary meetings of the shareholders, and that to this extent the company had been benefited."

It appeared that there was no power given to the directors by the deed of settlement to forfeit the shares of original shareholders, but by the 67th section of that deed it was provided, that in case any transferee of shares should neglect to execute the deed within three calendar months after the transfer to him, his shares should be immediately and irredeemably forfeited to the use of the company. It was admitted that Mr. Barton had applied for shares in this company, and that 100 shares were allotted to him, and that he paid the deposit upon them, but that he had never signed the deed of settlement nor attended any meeting of the shareholders in the company. Mr. Barton re-sold the shares so allotted to him prior to the month of October 1853, in the market, but without giving notice of such sale to the company or effecting any transfer of them to the purchaser. The question now was, whether Mr. Barton was relieved from liability in respect of such shares by reason of their having been declared to be forfeited.

Mr. Glasse and Mr. Baggallay, for the official manager, contended that the directors had no power given them by the deed of settlement to declare the shares of original shareholders forfeited, nor had they any inherent right to declare such shares to be forfeited. They, consequently, acted ultra vires, and Mr. Barton had not been relieved of his liability in respect of the shares allotted to him. The fact of Mr. Barton not having signed the deed of settlement did not affect his liability. They cited—

Mr. Baily and Mr. Waley, for Mr. Barton, submitted that the directors, by their acts, had relieved him from his liability. He had never signed the deed, and had never, therefore, been an actual shareholder. He had only entered into a contract to become a shareholder by signing the deed of settlement. He had sold the shares allotted to him, and the purchaser from him would be recognized as the holder of those shares. This distinction had been laid down by Lord Cranworth in Beresford's case.

Goldsmid's case, 16 Beav. 262.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—This is a case in which Mr. Barton, by his acts, has become not an actual and complete shareholder, but has put himself under an obligation which might have been enforced upon him to become a shareholder. He became liable to be put upon the list, and liable to be compelled to execute the deed and make himself a complete shareholder. He did not execute the deed, and when called upon to do so, he either declined or neglected to execute it. The company was completely registered on the 21st of September 1852, and it was previously to that registration that Mr. Barton had put himself in this position; so that at the time when the company was completely registered, the directors might and were bound to compel him, and other persons who were in a similar position, to execute the deed and become shareholders. In October 1853 the directors came to a resolution tion intimating an intention that the shares of those who did not execute the deed should be forfeited. Now there is no power of forfeiture whatever in the deed of the company. There is not only no power of declaring the shares of persons who do not execute the deed forfeited, as in Beresford's case, but there is no power to compel the forfeiture of the shares of parties who would not pay calls or perform the other obligations imposed on them. There is only a clause, which it is admitted does not apply to the present case. That is the 67th clause, and that does not embrace the case of persons who were original shareholders. Under these circumstances, the directors thought fit in perfect bona fides to resolve, that the shares of those persons who did not execute the deed by a certain time should be forfeited, and a circular notice to that effect was issued. In the November following there was a resolution that there should be an advertisement inserted in the newspapers, and in December 1853 there was an annual meeting, at which it was resolved that the question of forfeiture of the shares should be considered at a special meeting in the month of April following. A resolution was then passed for the forfeiture of the shares of the persons who did not sign before the 31st of May following. At a meeting held in July a report was made by the directors to the shareholders, stating that they had declared forfeited the shares of those who had not executed the deed at the time fixed, and they recommended the re-issue of the forfeited shares. There appear to have been about 2,000 shares forfeited, and no doubt it was intended to include Mr. Barton's shares among them. In January 1855 there was an annual general meeting, at which there was a report, stating that there was a re-issue of the forfeited shares, but that about 1,300 remained unissued, and there was a resolution confirming the re-issue, and a list of the shareholders was sealed, which did not include Mr. Barton's name; and no doubt the intention of the directors and of Mr. Barton at that time was that his shares should be forfeited.

But then comes the question, can I say that directors have an inherent right of forfeiture? I apprehend they have not; unless there be in the deed a clause authorizing them to forfeit shares, the directors have no power by which they can do so.

The distinction has been taken, and very justly so, between this case and many others which have been referred to, namely, that Mr. Barton was not a shareholder properly constituted, but had only entered into a contract to become a shareholder; and there is certainly a distinction in that respect. The question then is, whether that varies the powers of the directors. I should be very glad to find an authority which would justify me in deciding in favour of Mr. Barton, but no such case has been produced. How, then, can I say that for the first time I will introduce this principle? If the intention had been that the directors should have the power to deal differently with those persons who had only agreed to become shareholders from those who were actual shareholders, that power would have been inserted in the deed. In Beresford's case there was expressly such a power introduced; but there is none here. It has been contended that an inference may be drawn from the language of Lord Cranworth in Beresford's case, that the distinction did exist in the mind of the Judge; and there is no doubt that the language does, to a certain extent, justify the contention; but the language does or does not justify the contention, according as you interpret the words, "it was competent for them," that is, the directors, "so to do." What does that mean? Did Lord Cranworth mean to lay down a general proposition that it was competent for all directors so to do? It would be too strong to say that these words must have that interpretation; and I think I ought to put this interpretation on them, taking what precedes and what follows, that it was competent to those directors, under the circumstances in which they were placed, and having regard to the deed, to do as they did. Now, in that case there was a special clause authorizing the directors to declare forfeited the shares of those persons who had not within a certain period executed the deed. But then that clause only applied to the persons named in a certain schedule, and it happened that there was no schedule; and the question was, whether that was such a matter of exigency as that they could not exercise their power of forfeiture because there was no schedule. I came to the conclusion when that case was before me in the Master's office, and the present Lord Justice Knight Bruce and the Lords Commissioners came to the conclusion that that made no distinction. There was that irregularity; but another question arose which does not arise here, whether the forfeiture, if it operated at all, operated as a complete discharge of the shareholder from all past and future liability. It appears to me that I cannot put such an interpretation upon that judgment of Lord Cranworth as to justify me in saying that he meant to decide as an abstract proposition that, with or without power in their deed, the directors have an inherent power to deal with persons in the position of shareholders in this way. And therefore I must decide (although reluctantly) that Mr. Barton has not been discharged from his liability. I cannot help feeling that if I were to deal with this question on the principle of general equity, there has been such a dealing between the parties that one could have no claim upon the other; but I think that the principle of general equity does not apply here, and therefore I can only say that Mr. Barton's name must be placed on the list of contributories.

The same counsel appeared as in the court below.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE considered that the most material consideration was that the declaration of forfeiture was without authority on the part of the directors and the company, and therefore insufficient; but if, on Mr. Barton's part, or on the part of the present holders of the scrip certificates for the shares allotted to him, there had been submission or accession to the forfeiture, that fact might have told in his favour. But the evidence did not shew or lead to the conclusion that there had been any such accession or submission. He was afraid that the consequence must be that the rights of Mr. Barton and of the present scripholders were preserved to them, and therefore also their liabilities, which liabilities must be held to fall on Mr. Barton. The case did appear a hard one, and one not perfectly clear, and for that reason the Court would relieve Mr. Barton from the costs of the appeal. The official manager, however, would have his costs out of the estate.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER added that his opinion also agreed with that of Vice Chancellor Kindersley. There was, of course, no doubt that Mr. Barton had, by taking the scrip, become liable as a contributory to the company; and it rested, therefore, with him to shew that he had been absolved from that liability. It had been said that a Court of equity would not have enforced the agreement to take shares; but his Lordship thought that he could not escape upon that ground. There were two separate principles to be considered: the one as to the ground upon which specific performance would be ordered by this Court; the second as to the power of directors of a company acting as trustees for the shareholders. These were distinct principles. It did not appear to him that the considerations which were applicable in the one case were applicable in the other; nor did he think that the fact of the contract being executory would extend the powers of the directors to forfeit shares. In truth, the real question was, whether the contract was one which the directors, being trustees for the body of shareholders, had power to enter into; that contract between the directors and Mr. Barton being that they would absolve him from all liability. His Lordship thought that the directors had no such power to absolve him unless there had been some assent to that agreement on the part of all persons interested, like that which was suggested in Morgan's case. He concurred with his learned Brother in relieving Mr. Barton from the costs of this appeal; but he did not do so from any doubt in his own mind of the principle which the case involved.

Will—Construction—Pre-emption.

*A testator, by his will, gave all his real and personal estate to be enjoyed by his widow for life, and after her death to be sold, and the proceeds to be divided among his ten children equally. The testator directed that one of his sons should have a right of pre-emption for 450*l.* of a particular parcel of garden land, part of the real estate. After the death of the testator, and before that of the widow, the parcel of garden land was purchased by a railway company under their compulsory powers; the compensation money paid therefor, when freed from incumbrance, being represented at the death of his widow by the sum of 882*l.* 18*s.* 2*d.* standing in court:—Held, by the Lords Justices (reversing the decision of one of the Vice Chancellors), that the testator's son to whom the right of pre-emption was given was entitled to the compensation money, subject to the deduction of the price fixed by the testator.*

James Cant, gardener, of Manningtree, by his will, dated in 1827, gave all his estate real and personal to his executors, upon trust to permit his widow to receive the rents and profits of his real estate, and the interest of his personal estate, and to have the use, but not the disposal, of his household furniture, stock-in-trade, and the profits of his business, which he directed his executors to carry on for her benefit, during the term of her natural life; and from and after her decease, upon trust, within four months after that event, to convert the whole of his said real and personal estate into money, and, after payment thereof of all expenses of carrying the trusts of his will into execution, to divide the same into ten equal parts, and when so divided he gave one-tenth part to each of his ten children (naming them). The will then contained a clause, by which it was provided that the executors of the will, previous to selling and disposing of the garden the testator had purchased of John Golding, and also the garden formerly Mr. Burton's, should offer both the said gardens to his (the testator's) son, Charles Cant, at the sum of 450*l.*; and if his said son Charles Cant should be desirous of purchasing the said gardens at the sum of 450*l.*, and should give to the said executors three calendar months' notice in writing, such three calendar months' notice to be computed from one calendar month next after the decease of the testator's said wife, of such his desire to purchase them, then the testator directed his said executors, upon payment of the purchase money at the expiration of such notice, to stand possessed of the said gardens upon trust to convey the same to his said son Charles Cant. And in the event of their not receiving such notice, or of the said purchase-money not being paid, or ready to be paid at the expiration of such notice, then that the said executors should stand possessed of the said gardens in trust, to be sold in manner thereinbefore directed. And further, that in the event of the testator's said son Charles Cant purchasing the said gardens, the tenth part or share so thereinbefore directed to be paid and given to his said son Charles Cant should be taken and considered as part of his purchase-money, and be allowed to him out of the said consideration-money, at the time of the execution of the conveyance to him.

Prior to the date of the will the testator had caused eight cottages to be erected on the garden-land, the right of pre-emption in which was given to his son Charles Cant.

The testator died in July 1828.

In 1853 the Eastern Union Railway Company, under their compulsory powers, took the two pieces of garden ground, and the eight cottages standing thereon, for which they paid into the bank 550*l.* for the cottages, and 700*l.* for the land, making 1,250*l.* Out of this, by an order of the Court, dated in June 1854, a mortgage of 430*l.* and interest, to which the purchased land was subject, was paid off, and the residue carried to the account of the trustees and executors of the testator's will. It was ordered also that the money should be invested, and the dividends paid to the testator's widow. The purchased premises were conveyed to the company by a deed, dated in December 1854.

The testator's widow died on the 27th of January 1859; and on the 5th of February 1859 Charles Cant gave notice to the surviving executor of the testator's will of his desire to purchase the gardens and hereditaments at the sum of 450*l.*, according to the proviso to that effect in the will; and that he claimed the whole of the purchase-money which had been paid into the bank therefor by the company, and which then stood invested, on his paying to the executor 450*l.*

Upon an application to the Court for payment to the parties beneficially entitled to the money, represented by 882*l.* 18*s.* 2*d.* consols, which had been paid into court and invested as above mentioned, the question arose whether the fund belonged or not to Charles Cant by virtue of the right of pre-emption of the premises, from the sale of which it had arisen, given to him by the testator's will.

Mr. Bacon, Mr. Shebbeare and Mr. H. F. Shebbeare, for the children of the testator other than Charles Cant, contended that Charles Cant, being a gardener, the intention of the testator was to give him the choice of enjoying the garden in specie upon payment of the specified sum, and not to give him any sum of money which might represent the value of the garden. The power of carrying this intention into effect having been rendered impossible by the sale to the company, there no longer existed any subject-matter upon which the right of pre-emption given to Charles Cant could be exercised.

Mr. De L. Giffard and Mr. F. C. Millar, for Charles Cant, contended that the right of pre-emption was not taken away by the sale of the gardens to the company. The money paid into court represented the land for every purpose of the will, and was subject to every trust and direction in the will, just as the gardens would have been had they not been sold.

Mr. Bacon, in reply.

STUART, V.C. said a clear and imperative trust for sale was created by the testator, the leading purpose of the will being to effect a conversion into money, to be distributed amongst all his children equally. Upon that trust the right of pre-emption was grafted, and the trust for sale having been extinguished by the compulsory sale to the company, it would seem that the right of pre-emption must fall with the trust upon which it was grafted. The right of pre-emption could not be regarded as an absolute devise of the gardens, on condition of paying 450*l.* Unless by actual purchase and conveyance to C. Cant of these gardens in specie in the manner and on the conditions prescribed by the will, there were no words which gave him a right to anything in respect of the gardens, except his share of the money to be produced by the conversion. The right of pre-emption having thus become extinguished, there must be an order for payment of the compensation-money, in equal tenth shares according to the provisions of the will.

From this order Mr. C. Cant appealed. The same counsel appeared as in the court below, and for the respondents in the appeal the case of The Earl of Radnor v. Shafto (1) was referred to.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—By a contract of purchase under the powers of a railway act, a sum of money was substituted for land, and became subject to all the rights which affected the land. The land was devised with other property, by the testator to his wife for life, and after her death all was to be sold, and the testator, in effect, said this, "As to a particular portion, namely, the land now in question, one of my sons shall have it if he chooses to be charged with 450*l.* as between himself and my estate." This right remains unaffected by the act, and the son is entitled to take the purchase-money, whether it is worth hundreds or hundreds of thousands, on paying the sum which the testator has specified in his will, just as he would have been entitled to the land itself, if it had not been taken by the railway company.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—The whole argument of the respondents rests on this, that the testator only intended to benefit his son Charles in the event of his continuing to be a gardener. The true test of this is whether, if he ceased to be a gardener in his father's lifetime, he would still have been entitled to the land. This question admits of no doubt; and the only consideration then is, whether, if the right remained at the death of the testator, the fact of a subsequent act of parliament passing can affect the rights of the parties? I am of opinion that it cannot. The order of the Court below must therefore be reversed. It must be ordered, that Charles Cant paying 450*l.* to the credit of the general estate of the testator, he is to be declared entitled to the 700*l.* paid into court by the company. The costs of all parties of the appeal to be borne out of the estate of the testator.

Administration of Estate—Costs.

In a suit for the administration of the testator's real and personal estate, it was decided that the debts ought to be paid out of his real in exoneration of his personal estate; and upon a question as to the payment of the costs,—Held, that they must be paid out of the personal estate.

This suit was instituted for the administration of the real and personal estate of William Harper, deceased, who, by his will, had directed a part of his real estate to be sold and divided; the remainder descended upon his heir-at-law.

By the decree, it was declared that the debts of the testator, and also his funeral and testamentary expenses, ought to be borne by his real, in exoneration of his personal estate.

Upon the suit being brought on for further directions, a question was raised, whether the costs ought to be paid out of the real or out of the personal estate, or proportionately by each.

Mr. Marten, for the plaintiff and other parties interested in the personal estate.—The plaintiff has found it expedient to institute the suit to obtain, first, a sale of the real estate directed to be divided; and secondly, for directions respecting the administration of both estates and the payment of debts. The costs, therefore, ought to be paid out of the descended real estate, or otherwise they ought to be apportioned between the descended real estate and the personal estate.—

LORDS JUSTICES. }
 April 29. } In re —, A LUNATIC.

Lunacy—Supersedeas—Costs.

A person had been duly found lunatic by inquisition, but before a committee of person or estate had been appointed, and before any report as to his estate had been made, he recovered his reason. A supersedeas of the commission was ordered. The Court has no jurisdiction to order the party who sued out the inquisition to be paid his costs out of the estate.

This was a petition presented by a gentleman who had served in the army, and having been afflicted with sunstroke, which deprived him of reason, had been found a lunatic. He had recovered, and now presented his petition praying a supersedeas.

Mr. Beck, in support of the petition, stated that the petitioner, whilst serving with his regiment in India, had, in consequence of a sunstroke, been afflicted with insanity, and having returned to this country recovered. In the autumn of last year, however, he relapsed, and in October experienced medical men declared him insane. His father, upon this, procured a commission to issue, and in November the son was duly found a lunatic. The usual reference was then made to the Master to make inquiries as to his estate, and to appoint committees, upon which the father carried in a claim to be appointed committee of both person and estate. This was opposed, and the Master proposed to appoint an independent person committee of the estate, and the lunatic's wife and a medical gentleman joint committees of his person. Before however this was effected, and before any property was taken possession of by the Crown, the lunatic in February 1859 completely recovered, and now presented a petition to supersede the commission. This application, the learned counsel added, was not opposed; and the only question on the present application was whether certain costs incurred by the father in promoting the commission should be allowed to him, or whether he must himself bear them. The estate of the lunatic amounted to about 1,200*l.* a year. Mr. Beck contended that where no possession of the lunatic's estate had been taken by the Crown, there was no jurisdiction in the Court to give costs, and referred to Ex parte Ferne (1), Sherwood v. Saunderson (2), and Ex parte Loveday (3), where Lord Cranworth had said that the Court thought the case a perfectly fit one to give costs if he had the jurisdiction to do so. He also cited Ex parte Glover (4).

[LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—In Mr. Phillips's excellent book on Lunacy, at p. 369, I find a reference to In re Pinks (5), which does not seem to be noticed in any other book on the subject.]

Mr. Eddis appeared for the father of the petitioner, and argued that as there was no denial that these costs had been properly incurred, for the insanity was not disputed, the father ought to be indemnified. If the son had applied for a traverse the Court would have been enabled to impose terms as to the costs. Proceedings were going on regularly in the Master's office when the lunatic recovered. The 152nd section of the Lunacy Regulation Act, 16 & 17 Vict. c. 70, empowered the Lord Chancellor, where liberty to traverse had been applied for, and it appeared expedient that the inquisition should be superseded on terms and conditions, to "order the inquisition to be superseded on such terms and conditions to be fulfilled by the lunatic, &c., and subject to such arrangement respecting the lunatic's estate as he may, under the circumstances of the case, think proper." Under the 152nd section the Lord Chancellor was empowered, notwithstanding traverse, to make orders for the management of person & estate. The cases referred to for the petitioner were all previous to this statute. In Re Pinks the lunatic was dead, and therefore the Court had no jurisdiction. In Sherwood v. Saunderson, there being no fund in the possession of the Crown under the lunacy, the Court had ordered payment of the costs of the proceedings.

out of a fund belonging to the lunatic in court in a cause.—The learned counsel also referred to the statute 6 Geo. 4. c. 53.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—As the case now before the Court is, as I understand it, simply upon the application of the son to supersede the commission, I am of opinion that the order for the superseas should go, but it must be without prejudice to any action which the father may be advised to bring against the son.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—I am afraid that the Court has, under circumstances like those of the present case, no jurisdiction to make any order for costs against the petitioner, who seeks to supersede the finding. It has been contended that this Court ought, before issuing the superseas, to make provision for payment of costs properly incurred; but here there is precisely that question to be tried, and therefore I agree with my learned Brother.

WOOD, V.C. }
May 30. } CAMPBELL v. BEAUFOY.

Plea—Duplicity—Will—Probate.

To a bill against an executor for payment of a legacy the defendant pleaded that the testator was at the time of making his will and of his death domiciled in France, and all the bequests of personal estate affected to be made by the said will were by the laws of that empire null and void:—Held, that the plea was not double, as it did not state two bars to the suit, but two averments leading up to one bar.

Although probate of a will is conclusive so far as relates to the appointment of executors, it is not conclusive as to the validity of the particular dispositions therein contained; and the above plea therefore was held not to be bad on that ground.

The bill in this case was filed, on behalf of an infant plaintiff, against the widow and executrix and the two daughters of Charles Beaufoy, the grandfather of the plaintiff, and it stated the will of the testator in the following terms:—

“I give and bequeath unto my dear wife Marie Rosalie Beaufoy all my household goods, furniture, linen, china, paintings and portraits in England and France for the term of her natural life, provided she so long continues my widow; and after her decease or next intermarriage I give and bequeath the same unto and equally between my two daughters Emma Ellen Victorine Beaufoy and Caroline Beaufoy, share and share alike, to be divided equally between them. Also I give and bequeath to my dear wife all my books for her life, and at her decease to be divided equally between my two daughters already named as above. I give and bequeath to my dear wife whatever monies I may have in England at the time of my decease. Should my daughters aforementioned die unmarried, then all the furniture, &c., everything without reserve to my grandson James Campbell. Also to the said James Campbell I now give and bequeath all my gold and silver buttons, dressing-cases, guns and pistols. I give and bequeath to my dear wife for her life the cottage purchased by me at Upton Gray, and at her decease to my aforementioned daughters, or, if they should die unmarried, then to my grandson James Campbell. . . . I give and bequeath to my grandson James Campbell the sum of 100*l.* sterling, one moiety to be paid before the expiration of twelve months after my decease, and the remaining 50*l.* sterling before the expiration of the second twelve months after my decease.” And the testator appointed his wife executrix of his will and the guardian of his two daughters.

The testator died in June 1858, and his will was proved, by the executrix, in the Court of Probate on the 17th of September 1858.

The bill prayed for payment of the legacy of 100*l.* bequeathed to the plaintiff, and for a declaration that, according to the true construction of the will, the plaintiff would, in the event of the death of both the daughters unmarried, and subject to the life estate of the widow, become absolutely entitled to all the household goods, &c. of the testator, and to all his books and monies in England at the time of his decease, and to the cottage at Upton Gray, and that an inventory might be made and accounts taken, &c.

The defendant Marie Rosalie Beaufoy pleaded to the whole bill, except so much as sought relief in respect of the cottage at Upton Gray, that the testator was, at the date of his will, and also at the time of his death, domiciled in the empire of France, and all the bequests of personal estate affected to be made by the said will were, by the laws of the said empire, null and void.

The plea was set down for argument.

Mr. Giffard and Mr. Bedwell, in support of the plea.—The fact of probate having been granted in this country does not preclude the Court from saying that this instrument, although a valid will so far as it appoints an executor, has no other operation if the law of England requires that the law of France should be applied in the distribution of the property—per Lord Eldon, in Thornton v. Curling (1).

Eldon (Thornton v. Curling) is precisely in point, and there is not a shadow of authority the other way. Allen v. M'Pherson, in which the validity of the probate was sought to be impeached, has clearly no application. When probate has been taken out it is conclusive against everybody that a will has been made, but it does not at all establish the validity of the dispositions contained in the will. Mr. Justice Williams, in his Treatise on Executors, says (p. 1367, 5th ed.)—"It appears that a different doctrine prevails with respect to the distribution of the personal estate of a deceased when in the hands of an executor or administrator from that which is established with respect to the grant of probate or administration by which he is empowered to possess himself of such estate, for with regard to the latter the situs of the property regulates the jurisdiction. Although the right to succession is to be regulated according to the law of the country where the deceased was domiciled, yet the administration of the estate must be in the country where possession of it is taken and held under lawful authority." Therefore, you must take out probate in the country where the property exists, and then comes the question how the property is to be distributed. The plea very properly admits the will, but avers that by the law of the country where the testator was domiciled every single disposition which he has made is null and void. The only question is whether the plea is sufficiently precise, since it might be that the bequests are void, because the instrument itself is void. That question, however, you cannot raise, because the probate is conclusive that it is a valid instrument quæ will, according to the law of the country where probate has been granted. The defendant's plea, therefore, must be taken as admitting that, according to the law of this country, it is perfectly valid and good for the purpose of making herself mistress of the property, though not for the purpose of shewing what is to be done with the property when obtained:

that is, that it is effectual for the appointment of executors, but invalid with respect to the particular dispositions.

Then, as to the plea being double. It does not state two bars to the suit, but two averments leading up to one bar. In order to get at a complete bar, you are obliged to aver two facts, neither of which taken singly would be sufficient. The facts are properly averred, and the plaintiff must take issue upon the plea, which will be allowed, but without costs.

{ In the matter of J. H. WELCHMAN AND ANNA MARGARETTA, HIS WIFE; and in the matter of THE TRUSTEES' RELIEF ACTS.

Baron and Feme—Wife's Property, and Settlement thereof.

*The whole of a fund in court belonging to a married woman was settled (under the circumstances) upon herself and children, in exclusion of the assignee, for value, of her husband; though she was in the receipt of a farther income for life of 26*l.* a year, and was living with her husband.*

Upon the death of her father, in June 1858, Anna Margareta, wife of John Henry Welchman, became entitled, under the trusts of an indenture dated in February 1806, to an absolute interest in possession in one-sixth part of two sums of 5,000*l.* 3*l.* per cent. reduced, and 1,984*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.* 3*l.* per cent. stock, standing in the names of trustees, upon the trusts of the indenture. The trustees, after paying off, by the direction of the husband and wife, a mortgage of 300*l.* and interest, which they had effected upon the trust funds, paid the balance of the proceeds of her share of the trust funds, amounting to 800*l.*, into court, under the provisions of the Trustees' Relief Acts. The fund was claimed, on the one hand, by the petition of J. H. Welchman and Anna Margareta his wife, and on the other, upon cross-petition, by William Parton, to whom J. H. Welchman and his wife had assigned it for valuable consideration, by an indenture dated in June 1854.

The question was, whether Anna Margareta Welchman's equity to a settlement out of the fund extended, under the circumstances, to the whole fund, or only to a part thereof.

The facts disclosed by the evidence were the following:—The marriage between J. H. Welchman and his wife took place in January 1847, and there was issue thereof one child only. No settlement or agreement for a settlement upon the wife had been made or entered into by the husband upon or since the marriage; and in November 1855 the husband was adjudicated a bankrupt. The husband had not since been engaged in any business or calling, and was wholly unable to aid in maintaining his wife and child, whose only means of support (exclusive of the trust fund, of which a settlement was now asked for) were derived partly from the lady's friends, and partly from the annual income of 26*l.* arising from the dividends of a sum of stock in which she was entitled to a life interest under the will of her father.

Mr. Bacon and Mr. H. C. Ward, for Mrs. Welchman, argued that, under the circumstances, considering the inability of the husband to aid in maintaining his wife, and the slender means possessed by her, Mrs. Welchman was entitled to have the whole fund settled upon her. The amount to be settled upon the wife was in the discretion of the Court, according to the particular circumstances of each case; and the fact of desertion of the wife by the husband was not necessary in order to induce the Court to settle the whole fund upon her.—

Mr. Shebbeare, for W. Parton, submitted that, unless the wife had been deserted by the husband, or was under some other special circumstances of destitution, the Court would not settle the whole fund upon her. Here there were no such circumstances; and the proper course would be, therefore, to act upon the general rule, that one half should be settled on the wife, and the other half be given to the assignee of the husband—Bagshaw v. Winter, 5 De Gex & Sm. 466. He cited also—

Mr. Roxburgh appeared for the trustees.

STUART, V.C. said he did not consider it essential to the claim of the wife to have the whole fund settled upon herself and her children, that she should have been deserted by her husband. The question to be considered was, whether her whole income, from whatever source derived, would afford a reasonable means of subsistence for herself and children. In the present case, the whole of such income, including that of the whole of the fund sought to be settled, appeared but a very slender provision for them. There must, therefore, be the usual settlement of the whole fund left, after payment thereof of the costs of all parties to the present application.

Stock—Unclaimed Dividends—Retransfer to Claimant—Statutes, 56 Geo. 3. c. 60. and 8 & 9 Vict. c. 62.

Retransfer of stock which had been transferred to the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, under the provisions of the statute 56 Geo. 3. c. 60, ordered upon a clear title to the legal interest, but a prima facie title only to the beneficial interest, being shewn to be in the petitioner.

In 1806, Mrs. Bouts, a widow, purchased the sum of 148*l.* stock, and placed it in the joint names of herself, her infant son Henry Bouts, and her brother. Mrs. Bouts died in 1821, and her brother in 1838. Since that time no dividends had been received, and the sum of stock had been transferred to the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt.

This was a petition, under statutes 56 Geo. 3. c. 60. and 8 & 9 Vict. c. 62, for the retransfer of the sum of stock to the son, and for payment to him of the arrears of dividends accrued due in respect thereof. The petition stated that it was believed that the purchase was made out of the residue of the estate of the deceased husband of Mrs. Bouts, of which she was administratrix; but there was no satisfactory evidence for what purpose the stock had been invested. The question was whether, in the absence of further evidence as to who was entitled to the beneficial interest in the stock, the Court could direct a retransfer to the son.

Mr. J. Pearson appeared to support the petition.

Mr. Wickens, for the Attorney General and the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt.

STUART, V.C. said, that in Ex parte Ram (1) an inquiry had been directed as to the beneficial title, the Court there holding that the course to be adopted was matter of discretion to be exercised in each particular case. In the present case everything appeared to be doubtful, except the legal title of the petitioner, who was satisfactorily shewn to be the survivor of the three persons in whose names the stock had stood. It appeared, however, reasonably probable that the son was also entitled to the beneficial interest in the funds. The order, therefore, would be that, on payment of the costs of the Attorney General and of the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, the stock be transferred and the dividends paid to the petitioner H. Bouts.

*Will—Construction—Precatory Trust—
 Failure of particular Trust—Residuary Bequest—"Other"—1 Vict. c. 26. s. 27.
 —Feme Covert.*

In order to raise a trust by precatory words in a will there must be a certain subject-matter and a certain object; but it is not necessary that the object should be so defined that it can be distinctly ascertained: if there is a definite object intended, that is a sufficient creation of a trust to exclude the legatee from taking beneficially.

*Thus, where a testatrix bequeathed to her husband absolutely a specific sum of 13,000*l.*, and requested that after reserving to his own absolute use and benefit 2,000*l., he would make such disposition of the remainder, as he might deem most desirable, to carry out her wishes, often expressed to him by word, and it appeared that she had never expressed any wishes on the subject, it was held, that there was a definite object intended; and though that object could not be ascertained, there was a sufficient creation of a trust to exclude the husband from taking the beneficial interest in the remainder of the fund, although the trust itself failed.

Under the 27th section of the Wills Act, a general bequest by a married woman will include property over which she has a power of appointment.

A bequest of "all and singular other my property and estate" will include not only everything not before mentioned in the will, but everything the previous disposition of which fails, unless it appears from the will that the property comprised in the previous disposition was intended to be excepted for all purposes from the residuary bequest, and not merely for the purpose of giving it to the particular legatee.

William Minshull, by his will, dated the 4th of July 1834, bequeathed to trustees a sum of 13,000*l.*, upon trust for investment; and after the decease and failure of issue of his daughter, Martha Louisa Minshull, upon such trusts, &c. as his said daughter should by will appoint; and in default of appointment for her next-of-kin, according to the statutes.

NEW SERIES, XXVIII.—CHANC.

The testator died in 1836; and Martha Louisa Minshull afterwards intermarried with the plaintiff, Thomas Tyringham Bernard. There never was any issue of the marriage, and Martha Louisa Bernard died in the lifetime of her husband, having first executed a will or testamentary appointment, whereby, after reciting the will of her late father, she proceeded to appoint as follows:—"I hereby appoint the said 13,000*l.*, and the said other trust property so vested in trustees by the will and codicils of my late father, to go as follows, that is to say, the whole to my husband, Thomas Tyringham Bernard, Esq. absolutely; but it is my request to him, that after reserving to his own absolute use and benefit the sum of 2,000*l.*, and applying all the interest, rents and dividends arising from the above settled property to his own sole use and benefit during the term of his natural life, he will make such disposition of the remainder by will, deed or settlement, as he may deem most desirable, to carry out my wishes often expressed to him by word. . . . And as to all and singular other my property and estate, real and personal, whatsoever and wheresoever situate, whether secured to me by marriage settlement or otherwise, I give, devise and bequeath the same absolutely to my said husband, T. T. Bernard, Esq.; and I appoint my said husband, T. T. Bernard, my sole executor of this my last will and testament."

The bill was filed, by T. T. Bernard, against the next-of-kin of his deceased wife, claiming to be entitled for his own absolute benefit (after giving credit for a sum of 2,000*l.* which he had already received) to the whole of the 13,000*l.* and other trust property; and it prayed for a declaration in accordance with this claim and consequential relief.

In an affidavit, filed by the plaintiff, the following passage occurred:—"The said Martha Louisa Bernard never during her life expressed to me, by word or otherwise, any intention or wish as to the disposition of the sum of 13,000*l.*, over which she had, by the will of her father, the said testator, W. Minshull, a power of appointment or disposition (less the sum of 2,000*l.*, which by her said will or testamentary appointment she gave to me for my absolute use and benefit), or of the other trust property over which she had a power of disposition under the said will of the said testator W. Minshull, and of which she disposed by her will, or of any part thereof respectively. She often, in conversations with me, referred to a disposal of her property, but never expressed herself definitely on the subject; and I believe from such conversations that at the date of her will, and also at the time of her decease, she had not made up her mind for whose benefit she would wish the said trust funds, or any part thereof, to be applied after my decease. It is, however, my opinion, judging from such conversations which I had with her during her last illness, that it was her wish, at the period of her decease, that her own relations, of different degrees, or some of them, should be the parties benefited (exclusively of my children, whose mother was her second cousin). This conclusion I have drawn from the tenor of her observations to me respecting her own kindred; but she was averse to giving, and never gave to me, any specific plan to guide me, nor did she ever name any specific object, or any specific objects, in whose favour she wished to bestow any benefit, nor did she ever name any specific sum or sums as the amount she desired any object, or class of objects, to receive. She apparently had not confidence in her own judgment on the subject, and often spoke of future circumstances which might occur to affect the condition of her kindred; and, under the circumstances aforesaid, there is no person or object, nor class of persons or objects, in whose favour I could, by deed, will or settlement, dispose of the said trust funds, or any part thereof, after my decease, in pursuance of any wish or desire ever expressed to me by my said wife, the said Martha Louisa Bernard."

Mr. Dart (with Mr. Roll), for the plaintiff, contended that he was entitled to the whole of the 13,000*l.* In the first place there was no trust; for in order to create a trust the words must be so used that upon the whole they ought to be construed as imperative, the subject of the recommendation or wish must be certain, and the objects or persons intended to have the benefit must also be certain—Knight v.

Besides, the 27th section of the Wills Act does not apply, for by the 8th section no will made by any married woman is valid except such a will as might have been made by a married woman before the passing of the act; and before the passing of the act a gift of residue would not have operated as an appointment. They cited also Griffiths v. Gale (2).

Mr. Dart, in reply.

May 11.—Wood, V.C.—In this case I reserved my judgment more on account of the numerous authorities which were cited than on account of any difficulty I felt in determining the points that were argued. The question arises simply upon a testamentary appointment made by Mrs. Bernard under a general power of appointment contained in her father's will.—[His Honour read the will of the testatrix and proceeded]—Now, the first question that arose upon this will was, whether or not the husband, who is the plaintiff in this suit, took the whole 13,000*l.* absolutely and discharged from any trust, regard being had to the words which follow the absolute gift, and which words are not in the form of a trust, but only of a request that, "after reserving for his own absolute use and benefit the sum of 2,000*l.*, and applying all the interest, &c. arising from the above settled property to his own sole use and benefit during his life, he will make such disposition of the remainder by will, deed or settlement as he may deem most desirable to carry out my wishes often expressed to him by word." The plaintiff argued upon that part of the case that, he having denied that the testatrix ever expressed to him any definite intention or wish as to the disposition of the money, the Court could not hold that any intention to create a trust existed; but upon that part of the argument I did not hear the defence, considering that, whether a valid trust was created or not, there was, at all events, an intention to create one.

It was then contended that there was no trust created by this instrument, inasmuch as formal words expressive of a trust have not been used; and in order to create a trust where formal words have not been used, but only words expressive of a hope or request, there must, according to the authorities, be both a certain object and a certain subject of the bequest. With reference to that, I prefer using the words of other Judges to my own, and I find the matter very well considered in the judgment of Lord Cranworth in Williams v. Williams. At the conclusion of the argument he says, "The real question in all these cases always is, whether the wish, or desire, or recommendation that is expressed by the testator is meant to govern the conduct of the party to whom it is addressed; or whether it is merely an indication of that which he thinks would be a reasonable exercise of the discretion of the party; leaving it, however, to the party to exercise his own discretion. That is the real question." Those words appear to me accurately to express the rule of the Court. I apprehend that in laying down the rule that, in order to create a trust by precatory words, there must be a certain subject-matter and a certain object, it was not intended to lay it down that it must appear with certainty who were the objects intended to be benefited; because if by the precatory words the legatee were requested to apply the property "for the benefit of ———," or "for the benefit of the person named" in a certain paper, and no such paper is found, that is not the species of uncertainty which is referred to in the rule. But I apprehend that what is meant by the rule is this, that you are to ascertain whether the precatory words amount merely to a recommendation, leaving a discretion to be exercised by the legatee, or whether they constitute a definite direction to him; and if from the uncertainty of the amount and the want of any explicit direction as to the objects to be benefited, you infer that the words are used not for the express purpose of creating a trust, but simply as indicating a reliance upon the discretion of the legatee, and a wish to leave it to his discretion whether he will adopt the suggestions of the testator or no, the Court will not in such a case hold that any trust has been created.

On a subsequent day, Lord Cranworth made the following remarks:—"It has been said that the points to be inquired into are, first, whether the subject-matter to which the precatory words apply is clear; and, secondly, whether the favoured objects are distinctly ascertained: and when these two requisites concur, that is, when there is no doubt as to the property to which or the persons to whom the precatory words refer, there it would seem to have been sometimes assumed, that such words are as obligatory as words creating an express trust. I confess that this reasoning has never carried conviction to my mind. I doubt if there can exist any formula for bringing to a direct test the question whether words of request, or hope, or recommendation are or are not to be construed as obligatory. It may be very safe in general to say that when there is uncertainty as to the subject-matter, or as to the objects in whose favour the request, or hope, or recommendation is expressed, there precatory words cannot have been intended to be absolutely binding; but the converse of the proposition is by no means equally true. The subject-matter of the bequest and the objects of the testator's bounty may be perfectly ascertained, and yet the context may shew that words of hope, or request, or recommendation were not intended to interfere with the absolute discretion of the legatee." In other words, as affording a general rule for the guidance of the Court in the absence of particular expressions; but in the construction of every will the whole document must be carefully weighed and considered.

Here it appears to me that I am really concluded by the authority of Briggs v. Penny, for that was a case far less strong than the present for holding that a trust was created, because in that case there was an absolute gift with only these words superadded, "well knowing that she will make a good use and dispose of it in a manner in accordance with my views and wishes." "Well knowing," it may be said, is somewhat stronger than the word "request," as leading somewhat nearer to the implication of a trust; but, on the other hand, "that she will make a good use and dispose of it," were words extremely apt for shewing that the legatee was to have the disposal of it absolutely, according to her own will, instead of the will of the testatrix. I ought to observe that there was in that case a gift to Sarah Penny of 3,000*l.*, and a likesum of 3,000*l.* in addition for the trouble she would have in acting as executrix; but the grounds on which Lord Truro placed his judgment are the following, and I must say I think they apply much more strongly here. He says (3 Mac. & G. 555), "With reference to the third condition, it has been contended that the object is not certain, and it has been stated, and with truth, that vagueness in the object is regarded as evidence that no trust was intended to be created; and it has been, in effect, argued, and, indeed, with very great plausibility, that the words which are superadded to the bequest are merely expressive of the testatrix's full conviction from her reliance on the character of Miss Penny, that she would make as good use of what was given her as of her own property, and would, in fact, dispose of it in such a way as would further those objects which, as the intimate friend of the testatrix, she well knew that the testatrix was desirous of promoting. Specious, however, as this construction undoubtedly is, I am of opinion that it is not the true construction of these words. It is assuming the whole question to say that 'views and wishes' are too vague to import a trust. The fact, that the testatrix 'well knew' or believed that Miss Penny would dispose of the property in a manner in accordance with the testatrix's views and wishes, of necessity implies that the testatrix assumed that such views and wishes were already, or would thereafter either in writing or verbally be made known." That is a strong way of putting it, no doubt, but it shews what is meant by the Court in speaking of the certainty of the object; that is to say, the question is not whether or not the object is so defined that it can be distinctly ascertained, but whether it has been purposely left undefined in order to give the donee the power of selection, in which case it would, of course, be very strong evidence to shew that what was expressed by way of wish was not intended by way of trust; but where there is a definite object intended, although you may not be able to ascertain what that object is, there a clear trust is created.

In this case, it is quite clear that the testatrix never intended her husband to have the beneficial enjoyment of the property. The expression used in the appointment of the 13,000*l.* is "to my husband Thomas Bernard absolutely," and not "for his own absolute use and benefit," which occurs with reference to the 2,000*l.* She shews most distinctly what she intends him to have for his own use, and then she proceeds to a request as to the residue, giving him merely a discretion, whether he will dispose of it by will, deed or settlement, "as he may deem most desirable to carry out my wishes often expressed to him by word." It is true the husband says, she never did express by word or otherwise any intention or wish as to the disposition of this property, but however mistaken she may have been in that respect, it is clear that she had some wishes impossible now to be ascertained, which it was her intention should be carried into effect; and it appears to me, therefore, in vain for the husband to contend that he is entitled to the beneficial interest.

Then, it is contended, on the part of the next-of-kin, that if the beneficial interest is not intended for the husband, it must go to them either as being undisposed of, or else by virtue of the trust which they say is disclosed in the statement of the husband, by which they can fix his conscience with the particular objects of her intention, for the statement amounts to an admission that there was a definite class of objects, viz. his wife's own relations, amongst whom she has given him a power of disposition; and they say that where there is a power of division among definite objects which is not exercised by the donee, the Court will execute it in favour of all the objects, treating those words as creating a valid trust in their favour. It appears to me, upon the statement of the husband, impossible to contend that there was a definite trust in favour of any class of objects. Upon that point Williams v. Williams is an express authority, that the doctrine of Brown v. Higgs cannot be applied to such a statement as this. The statement amounts to nothing more than an opinion that it was the wish of the testatrix, not that her own relations of different degrees, but that they, or some of them, should be the parties benefited. In some respects the expression is weaker than that which occurred in Williams v. Williams, where the same contest arose. The words which were relied upon as creating a trust in that case were, "It is my wish that you should enjoy everything in my power to give, using your judgment as to where to dispose of it amongst your children when you can no longer enjoy it yourself. But I should be unhappy if I thought it possible that any one not of your family should be the better for what I feel confident you will so well direct the disposal of." And it was held there that the word 'family' was not confined to children, but included descendants in every degree, and that the wife was entitled to the property absolutely, and not merely for life, with a power in the nature of a trust for her children. Lord Cranworth says, "I think that the word 'family' as used in the codicil is not confined to children only, but would include descendants in every degree. The word 'family' is one of doubtful import, and may according to the context mean children, or heir, or next-of-kin. But, here, I think the words 'of your family' are equivalent to 'of your blood,' that is, 'your posterity, your descendants';" and he says afterwards, "the power, if it be a power, is one of distribution not of selection; and so, if the widow should die without exercising the power, leaving children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren, they would all take as a class per capita. It is impossible to imagine that this was ever contemplated by the testator, and so the only other contention must prevail, namely, that which would enable the wife to give to any descendant, by virtue of an absolute interest vested in her by her husband." Those observations are quite sufficient to shew, that where the class is so indefinitely described as here, there is no trust which the Court can execute, independently of the circumstance that there is no evidence of the intention of the testatrix to benefit so vague and indefinite a class beyond the mere opinion of the husband; and the case of Brown v. Higgs, therefore, is not applicable.

Then the husband says, that if the will had imported into it his statement of what took place between the testatrix and himself, then, the objects being so indefinite, it is intended to leave the property to be dealt with at his absolute discretion, but I cannot import into the will what the husband, however honestly, says he understood as being what she understood at the time of making her will. What she understood was something that, as she distinctly says, she believed to be distinctly known to her husband, which were some wishes, as she says, often expressed to him by word. It is, I think, a fallacy to say that I can, by importing the wife's wishes into the will, be led on that ground to construe it in his behalf as a gift to him absolutely. The question then arises whether the original appointment having failed from the impossibility of ascertaining its object, the husband is entitled to the fund under the residuary bequest in the will.—[His Honour read the residuary bequest, and proceeded]—Now, in the first place, I will put out of consideration the mention of the testatrix's wishes often expressed to him by word, because some little change may take place in the character of this case, from it appearing that the husband was, in a certain sense, benefiting by his want of recollection, or his want of accuracy in ascertaining what the intentions of this lady were, and I will suppose the original appointment to have been to the husband "in trust for

(blank)." Would the residuary clause have comprised the property which was the subject of such an appointment? The plaintiff relied on the 27th section of the Wills Act, which enacts that "a bequest of the personal estate of the testator, or any bequest of personal property described in a general manner shall be construed to include any personal estate, or any personal estate to which such description shall extend (as the case may be), which he may have power to appoint in any manner he may think proper, and shall operate as an execution of such power, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will." I apprehend that if this were a simple case of a residuary bequest not preceded by any exercise of the power of appointment, there could be no doubt that it would include all property over which the testatrix had a disposing power, unless Mr. Giffard's objection, founded on the 8th section of the act, were to prevail, viz., that the 27th section does not apply to the will of a married woman. The 8th section enacts "that no will made by any married woman shall be valid except such a will as might have been made by a married woman before the passing of this act," and it was argued by Mr. Giffard that, inasmuch as before the passing of the act a residuary bequest in the words here used would not have had the effect of passing property over which the testatrix had merely a power of appointment, it cannot have that effect since the passing of the act. I did not hear a reply upon that part of the argument, because it appeared to me to be plain, looking to the whole scope of the act, that such a construction could not be contended for. It is quite plain what was the intention of the act, when you come to examine the several sections. By the 3rd section, it shall be lawful for every person to devise, bequeath or dispose of by his will, executed in the manner hereinafter required, all real and personal property which if not so disposed of would pass to his real and personal representatives. Then the 7th section says that, "no will made by any person under the age of twenty-one years shall be valid;" and then comes this 8th section, which enacts that "no will made by any married woman shall be valid, except such a will as might have been made by a married woman before the passing of this act." The obvious meaning is, that she shall not dispose of any property by will which she could not have disposed of before. If I were to hold upon that section that all the rest of the act was inapplicable to wills made by married women, I must hold that an appointment which by the terms of the power is required to be made by an instrument under seal is not good if made by a married woman by will executed in the form prescribed by the act, unless it is also sealed. I apprehend the act merely meant that the capacity of a married woman to execute a will should be regulated by the rules which existed before the passing of the act, and when her capacity to make a will is established, the other provisions of the act apply to the will made by her, just as they would apply to the will of any other person. I have no difficulty, therefore, in holding that a residuary bequest in the will of a married woman passes property over which she has a power of disposition.

Then the question occurs, whether the word "other" in this bequest makes any difference by way of excepting this property out of the residuary gift. I do not think any distinction can be taken between the words "all and singular other my property" and "all and singular my residuary property." Upon this point Mr. Dart cited a case which was decided by myself, but I would rather refer to a case which I there relied on, of Evans v. Jones (3), before Knight Bruce, V.C., in which the residuary bequest was of the testator's other personal estate, after excepting money laid out in stock, mortgages and bonds, which he gave to B, and a portion of the gift to B. failed; and the question was, whether the residuary legatee was entitled to the property so excepted. The Vice Chancellor held that she was. He said:—"It has been argued that the next-of-kin are entitled to a moiety of John Evans's share. That, however, is not my opinion. The case seems to me to fall within the rule most correctly, I believe, stated by Sir William Grant in Cambridge v. Rous and Leake v. Robinson (4), notwithstanding the expression of exception, which appears to me to mean no more than saying that the testator intends to make certain bequests afterwards made by him." And elsewhere, I think in the same case, he says the question to be considered is, whether the property is intended to be excepted for all purposes, or only for the purpose of giving it to somebody else. If the latter, then on the failure of the particular purpose it falls into the residue notwithstanding the exception. In Cambridge v. Rous there was a gift of the "residue" in terms, but there Sir William Grant said, "It has been long settled that a residuary bequest of personal estate (for it is otherwise as to real) carries, not only everything not disposed of, but everything that in the event turns out not to be disposed of;" the rule being that you look to the general object of the bequest, which is to prevent an intestacy and to sweep in everything that may fall by any means within the residue rather than the testator should die intestate; "not," as Lord Cottenham says in Easum v. Appleford, "that it effects in specie what the testator intended, for he probably contemplated nothing beyond the particular legacy taking effect; but because the residuary clause is understood to be intended to embrace everything not otherwise effectually given; because, as Sir William Grant expressed it in Cambridge v. Rous, the testator is supposed to give it away from the residuary legatee only for the sake of the particular legatee; so that upon failure of the particular intent, the Court gives effect to the general intent." I think, therefore, that the words of the residuary clause are sufficient to comprise the 13,000*l.* "unless a contrary intention appears by the will," and it becomes necessary to see whether such a contrary intention appears. Mr. Shapter says, the testatrix has plainly dedicated this fund in a particular way, and this, coupled with the use of the word "other" in the residuary clause, affords such a clear manifestation of a contrary intention, that I ought to hold this fund to be excepted out of the residuary clause. But I cannot say that any of the cases cited by him bear out his argument. The earliest of those cases was Doe v. Pearson. That was the case of a will of real estate; and by the old law, if a devise of real estate failed, it would not be comprised in the residuary devise. If you once find any real estate given out and out, whatever is given as residue is subsequent. If a testator happens to have Blackacre and Whiteacre, and he gives Whiteacre out and out, the residue is Blackacre, and nothing else; but if he does not give Whiteacre in fee, but only for life, then the residue would be Blackacre, and the reversion in fee of Whiteacre. In Doe v. Pearson the fee was given defeasible upon condition; and it was held, that the heir-at-law was the only person who could avail himself of the condition being broken, and therefore the estate being given out and out the residuary devisee took nothing. Upjohn v. Upjohn was a similar case.

(3) 2 Coll. 516.

(4) 2 Mer. 363.

Again, in the case of Circuit v. Perry, the will, after a devise of freehold hereditaments and copyhold estate upon certain trusts, contained the following recital:—"As my nephews and nieces are provided for by the will of their late grandfather, and the property left to me and my brother under that will will, on failure of our issue, devolve on them at our death"; and by a subsequent clause, after a bequest in favour of his wife, the testator gave all the residue of his estate to trustees. It turned out that the property referred to as devolving upon his nephews and nieces had actually descended upon himself in fee; and upon the question whether it was included in the general devise of all his real estate, the Master of the Rolls held that it was not, on the ground that as he treated the estate as not being his to dispose of, the Court could not hold that he intended to pass it. In Pomfret v. Perring the testatrix having, under a settlement and a will respectively, a power of appointment over two funds, appointed the will fund, reserving a power of revocation and new appointment; and afterwards by will devised and bequeathed and by virtue of every power given by the settlement, "or otherwise however enabling her," appointed all the real and personal estate which she might at her decease, under the powers contained in the settlement, "or otherwise," have power to appoint; and it was held that this appointment was confined to the settlement fund, because it did not necessarily imply an intention to revoke the previous appointment. All those cases, therefore, are clear upon the face of the will; but here I have nothing but the fact that a particular disposition is made of this fund which fails, and none of those cases, therefore, are an authority for saying that a contrary intention appears. Easum v. Appleford was a case of an appointment of a particular share of a sum of stock, and then an appointment of the residue of the same sum; and Lord Cottenham there said:—"The appellant relied upon the well-known rule that a residuary gift will, in general, carry a lapsed legacy, and that the same rule has been held to apply to gifts by way of appointment as to legacies. Oke v. Heath (5) was the first case referred to, and that case is important as containing Lord Hardwicke's opinion, that, in these questions, the appointment being by will, the same rule must be followed as in other cases of legacies; but the facts of that case prevent its being any authority for the present. In that case the donee of the power gave, by her will, part of the fund absolutely to a person who died in her lifetime, and gave all the rest and residue of what she had power to dispose of to her niece, in whose favour Lord Hardwicke decided; not the fractional part of a specified fund, but all that should remain subject to her power, which at the time of her death was that interest which had been appointed to the deceased." And then he held, in the case before him, that what was given over was the residue of a specific fund, after deducting therefrom a fractional part; and that it amounted to the same thing as if the part given over had been specified (6). But the case before me is not the case of a gift of a fractional part of a specific fund, and then a gift over of the residue of that fund; but I have a simple failure of the appointment, and then what I have held to be a general residuary gift, and therefore if the appointment had been to the husband, in trust for —, it must fall into the residue and pass with it; and I think, upon the facts before me, I must take it as if the appointment had been in trust for —. In the absence of evidence to the contrary, I must take the statement of this gentleman to be perfectly true when he says that the testatrix really pointed out no objects, and the result is, that it is a total blank. Where a part of a particular fund is given, and then the residue of that fund is given over, the particular part is excepted out of the residue; but where there is a general residuary bequest, it sweeps in, according to Cambridge v. Rous, everything which turns out to be undisposed of; and consequently I must hold the husband entitled to the whole of the 13,000*l*.

March 22, 26. { HOSPITAL.
THE ATTORNEY GENERAL
v. PHILPOTT.

Charity — Scheme — Jurisdiction of the Court.

If a testator points out clearly the purposes of a charity he intends to establish, this Court cannot speculate upon whether it would be better for the community if a different application of the funds had been established, but it is bound to carry them into effect, provided they are not in opposition to the law of the country.

The Right Hon. John R. P. Earl Beauchamp, by his will, dated the 18th of June 1847, said, I have contemplated erecting and endowing almshouses, either upon some part of my estate or elsewhere, in the hamlet of Newland, in the county of Worcester, for the residence of twelve or such larger number of poor men and women, members of the Church of England, who shall have been employed in agriculture, and have been reduced by sickness, misfortune or infirmity; now, in case I happen to die without effecting such object, and any person or persons should within twelve months after my decease, at their, his or her expense, purchase or give a suitable piece of land in Newland aforesaid as a site for such almshouses, and with intent that the same should be devoted to such purpose, then I empower and direct the trustees or trustee for the time being of this my will, when and so soon as such land shall have been legally dedicated to charitable uses, provided they, he or she shall approve of the scheme of the intended charity, and the rules and regulations proposed for the government thereof, to pay to the trustees of the said intended charity out of such part of my personal estate as is hereinafter mentioned the sum of 60,000*l*., to be by them devoted to the several purposes of the said charity in the manner to be determined in respect of the funds of the same, but so nevertheless that the said sum or any part thereof shall not be applied in or towards the purchase of any lands for the purposes of the said charity; and if and in case no such piece or parcel of land shall be found and provided as aforesaid, or being such the scheme of the intended charity, or the rules and regulations for the government thereof shall not in the opinion of the majority of my said trustees be in accordance with what they may consider my wishes upon the subject to have been, then I give and bequeath the said sum of 60,000*l*. to the trustees for the time being of St. George's Hospital, situate at Hyde Park Corner, to be by them applied to the purposes of that institution.

The testator died on the 22nd of January 1853; and on the 6th of December following, a piece of land was dedicated to the use of the charity.

A suit was afterwards instituted in this Court, by the trustees of the will, for the establishment of the charity, and for the erection of the almshouses. It was, however, held, in accordance with Trye v. the Corporation of Gloucester (1), that the bequest for the erection and endowment of almshouses was void under the Statute of Mortmain; and upon the cause being again brought on, it was held that the gift to the hospital also failed (2). The plaintiffs appealed against this decision to the House of Lords (3).

The Attorney General was not made a party to the suit; and upon a certificate of the Charity Commissioners, dated the 30th of June 1855, he, after the decree made in the suit, considering that the interests of the charity were not sufficiently protected, filed an information ex officio against the trustees of the charity. This information was dismissed at the hearing; but, upon appeal, the House of Lords reversed the decree made in both the suits, and the cause was remitted to this Court, which made an order in both the suits, directing a scheme to be settled in chambers, and the carriage of the order was given to the plaintiffs in Philpott v. St. George's Hospital.

The plaintiffs accordingly prepared a scheme, which provided for the erection of the almshouses, at a cost not exceeding 12,700*l.*, to be called the "Beauchamp Almshouses," which were to contain a house for a chaplain, and necessary offices and accommodation for twenty-four alms-people—viz. eight sets of rooms for married couples, eight sets for single men and widowers, and eight sets for spinsters or widows, who were to consist of persons who had been engaged in agriculture, and were not under fifty-five years of age. The alms-people were to consist of eight married men, eight single men or widowers and eight spinsters or widows. It provided for the appointment of a matron, who was to perform such duties with reference to the alms-people as the trustees should direct. The trustees were also to appoint from time to time a master or porter, and also a medical practitioner in the neighbourhood, at a remuneration not to exceed 30*l.* per annum, to attend upon and supply medicines to the sick and infirm alms-people.

The Attorney General proposed an alteration in the scheme, to the effect that the building should consist of a centre, for the residence of the chaplain and the necessary offices, and two wings, for the accommodation of twenty-four alms-people; twelve of the twenty-four sets of rooms were to be for persons married or single labouring under some permanent or chronic disease; one wing to be called "the almshouse wing," and the other "the hospital wing." Twelve of the alms-people were to be persons married or single labouring at the time of their admission under some permanent or chronic disease, curable or incurable. There was to be a nurse in addition to the matron.

The matron was to have the superintendence, under the direction of the chaplain, of all the alms-people, and in particular those of the hospital wing, and to be specially charged with attendance on the latter. The nurse was to assist the matron in such attendance under her directions, and to perform such duties as to attendance on the sick poor living near the almshouse as the trustees should direct. The stipend of the medical practitioner was to be 100*l.* per annum.

The plaintiffs objected to this alteration in the scheme, and they alleged that such a charity was not in the contemplation of the testator; the question was, therefore, adjourned into court.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. T. H. Terrell, for the Attorney General.

Mr. Lloyd, for the plaintiff, Thomas Philpott.

Mr. Wickens, for the Crown.

Mr. C. T. Simpson, for two of the trustees.—The altered scheme is not in accordance with the intention of the testator, and the Court will not lose sight of that part of the gift over if the purposes of the will are not carried into effect.

Mr. R. Palmer, in reply.—The Court, whilst paying every attention to the trustees, must exercise its discretion: an almshouse for the reception and lodging of the poor is within the term "hospital"; a school also implied education. In the present case, the almshouse clearly included relief in sickness, and the Court would say in what way it should be administered.

March 26.—THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The cases of Ashton's Trust and Philpott v. St. George's Hospital are so connected that I propose to give my judgment upon them conjointly. Having come to what would appear prima facie opposite conclusions in the two cases, it becomes important that I should explain the principle which regulates cases of this description. It has been too much of late considered, that whenever the Court had to direct a scheme to be framed for the establishment of a charity, it had power to deal with the property just as it pleased, and that in point of fact anything which within certain limits it thought expedient might be done with the property. A more erroneous opinion, and one less in accordance with the decisions of this Court in matters of charity, can hardly be conceived. But the confusion and error have arisen from this—that in certain cases the Court has the power to do what it pleases where it makes a scheme, or very nearly so, and that in other cases it has not. The distinction consists in this:—If the testator or the testatrix has by the will pointed out clearly what is intended to be done, provided always that the directions are such as are not contradictory to the laws of this country, this Court is bound to carry that into effect; and the Court has not any right, nor is it at liberty to speculate upon whether it would be more expedient, or better for the community, if a different application of the charity had occurred to the mind of the testator, and he had appointed some different scheme to be carried into effect. Accordingly, this Court has had instances of charities of the most absurd description, which the Court has considered itself bound to carry into effect. I remember one, before Lord Justice Knight Bruce, when Vice Chancellor, where a gentleman left a large sum of money to reprint and circulate books that nobody would buy, which was clearly a mere throwing away of so much paper and printing; but the Court, nevertheless, was bound to carry that into effect as well as it could. This distinction arises in a case, where a testatrix has devoted funds to the charity, but has not specified any charity at all; and if the Queen, by her sign-manual, does not appoint the charity, but directs it to be carried into effect by the Attorney General, or by this Court, then the Court has full power to adopt any scheme which the Attorney General, after considering the matter fully, should consider to be expedient. So, also, if there are accretions of a charity; if there are sums of money which have accrued which are not specifically disposed of, the Court in that case may act. So, also, where the fund is given for a particular object which entirely fails, as in the case of Lady Mico's Charity (4), where a large property was given for freeing poor slaves, and the charity entirely failed for want of objects. In all those cases the Court, under what is called the doctrine of cy-pres, may regulate it as far as it can be considered consistent with the laws of the country and with the views of the Attorney General. But in the case of Philpott v. the St. George's Hospital the gift is of this description. It is to be observed, this is to carry into effect a charity founded by the testator himself, and therefore this Court is not in any one of those positions which I have described, in which it is at liberty to do what it pleases, but it must do that which is in accordance with the will of the testator. Here he says, "Whereas I have contemplated erecting and endowing almshouses either upon some part of my estate, or elsewhere, in the hamlet of Newland aforesaid, for the residence of twelve or such larger number of poor men and women, members of the Church of England, who shall have been employed in agriculture and have been reduced by sickness, misfortune or infirmity." He then proceeds to describe how the charity is to be founded, gives 60,000*l.* for that purpose, and directs it to be carried into effect, and also gives a considerable discretion to his trustees. "Provided they, he or she shall approve of the scheme of the intended charity, and the rules and regulations proposed for the government thereof, to pay to the trustees of the said intended charity out of such part of my personal estate as is hereinafter mentioned the sum of 60,000*l.*" A scheme is framed for founding almshouses, the land having been given, which was a necessary condition for the establishment of it, and the Attorney General, to whose opinion and suggestions this Court on all occasions pays the greatest possible regard, suggests an addition to the almshouses, or rather an application of a part of them, which would, in his opinion, and probably in the opinion of most persons, be a more beneficial application of the fund than simply giving it for alms-persons generally who are reduced to poverty by reason of sickness, misfortune or infirmity, and something, in fact, in the nature of an hospital to be attached to it. It occurred to me in the course of the argument that I might, to a certain extent, adopt the view of the Attorney General, still making it an almshouse, directing that the trustees should have regard in the first instance and give priority to persons who were reduced by sickness or infirmity over those who were reduced by misfortune. But, upon looking through the clauses (I find nothing else in the will which bears on the subject), I do not think there is anything in the will which justifies that view of the case. No doubt the approbation of the trustees is a matter of importance; but only to this extent: that the Court regards their view of the case, because the testator has entrusted them with the consideration of the case. Otherwise, of course, the whole discretion is vested in the Court; but I regard their opinion in the matter with very considerable respect. They being opposed to this, not considering that it comes within the scope of the will, and I not thinking there is anything in the will to give precedence to one over the other, I think they must all stand on their own footing, always considering that the trustees themselves in the selection of the objects will be regulated by that which they think will really be most beneficial, and most conduce to the advantage of the community.

(4) The Attorney General v. Gibson, 3 Beav. 317, n.

Accordingly, in the case of The Attorney General v. Philpott, I am of opinion that I cannot vary the scheme in the manner proposed, but the scheme must stand as it at present stands. It was a proper case to be brought before the Court. There must be an allowance of counsel, and the costs of all the proceedings must be paid out of the charity.

STUART, V.C. }

 LORDS JUSTICES. } PERRY v. SHIPWAY.
 June 6, 7.

Trust—Trustees of Chapel—Powers, Rights and Duties of.

The duly elected pastor of a society of Baptists having been charged with conduct unbecoming his position of minister, the majority of the trustees of the chapel of the society and a considerable number of the members of the society, at a meeting convened for the purpose of considering such charges, passed a resolution, in execution of which he was removed from his office of pastor, and the chapel and pulpit were closed against him. The deposed pastor, alleging that the meeting at which he was deposed had been irregularly convened, and that its resolutions were not binding upon the society, procured, at a meeting irregularly convened, a resolution to be passed by a portion of the society, including the minority of the trustees, reinstating him in his office, and, in execution of such resolution, took forcible possession of the chapel and held it against the majority of the trustees.

An injunction was granted by the Vice Chancellor, restraining the pastor and the minority of the trustees from molesting or interfering with the majority of the trustees in the exercise of their right to the possession and management of the chapel; and, on appeal, this decision was affirmed by the Lords Justices.

This cause came on upon motion for decree, on behalf of nine out of the twelve trustees of the Baptist Chapel at Sible Hedingham, in Essex, first, that the trusts of certain indentures, dated respectively the 21st of September 1808 and the 13th of December 1814, might be administered under the direction of the Court; secondly, that the defendant Charles Shipway might be restrained by injunction from disturbing, hindering or molesting the pastor, deacons and members of the congregation of Calvinistic Baptists in the performance of divine worship, or from otherwise disturbing any of the members in the enjoyment of the use of the said chapel; thirdly, that the defendant Shipway might be restrained from officiating as pastor of the said congregation, and from preaching or intermeddling with the service to be performed in the same chapel; and, fourthly, that the defendants Ruggles, Barrell and Finch might be restrained from sanctioning or permitting Shipway to preach or officiate in the said chapel.

By the indentures of the 21st of September 1808 and the 13th of December 1814, land which had been purchased and a meeting-house which had been erected thereon at Sible Hedingham with money subscribed by a society of Protestant Dissenters, called Particular or Calvinistic Baptists, were conveyed to trustees "upon trust for the use and benefit of the society or congregation of Protestant Dissenters, called Particular or Calvinistic Baptists, then assembling at the said meeting-house, under the pastoral care of William Scandrett (one of the trustees named in the said indentures), maintaining the doctrines of the one living and true God, three equal persons in the Godhead, eternal and personal election, original sin, particular redemption, free justification by the imputed righteousness of Christ, regeneration, conversion and sanctification by the spirit and grace of God, the final perseverance of the Saints, the resurrection of the body to eternal life, the future judgment, the eternal happiness of the righteous and everlasting misery of such as die impenitent; and practising baptism by immersion to such as are of years of understanding, upon their own personal confession of repentance towards God and faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ, for the exercise of divine worship by them at the meeting-house aforesaid. And, upon further trust, to convey the said messuage, tenement or meeting-house and premises, with the appurtenances, from time to time, to such persons, for the purposes aforesaid, as the men members, communicants of the said society or congregation of Particular or Calvinistic Baptists, holding the doctrines aforesaid, for the time being, in their church-meeting duly assembled, or the major part or number of them so assembled, shall, by any deed or instrument in writing, from time to time direct or appoint, so that the same may be made use of only as far as it lawfully can or may, as a place of convenient worship for Particular or Calvinistic Baptists, holding the doctrines before mentioned. But in case the society or congregation of Particular or Calvinistic Baptists shall be totally dissolved or dispersed, and the public worship at the said meeting-house discontinued by them for the space of twelve calendar months together, then, upon further trust, to convey the said messuage, tenement or meeting-house, hereditaments and premises, with the appurtenances, unto such person or persons in such manner and for such purposes, either religious or civil, as the men members, communicants of the said congregation or society, who at the time of such dissolution or dispersion shall have been members, communicants and subscribers to the support of public worship for the space of twelve calendar months then next preceding, and contributing thereto, or the major part in number of such men members, communicants, shall, by any deed or deeds, writing or writings, direct or appoint."

From the evidence in the suit it appeared that a Calvinistic Baptist church or society consists of three classes, the pastor, the deacons, and the other communicants who are called "members"; that the society is governed by general ordinances, which are settled by the general body of Calvinistic Baptists; and that every person seeking to become a member of a church of Calvinistic Baptists is admitted a member of such church at a meeting called for that purpose, and his admission is duly enrolled in the book of such church. Any member charged with an offence against the ordinances of the church to which he belongs, is liable to be temporarily separated from such church by the resolution of a majority of the members and communicants of such church called to investigate the charge, and if deemed incorrigible, to be finally separated; an entry of the said resolution is made in the church book, and the said temporary or final separation is thereupon indorsed. The pastor of such congregation or church is first invited to officiate for a given time, by way of probation, and if approved, is then elected a pastor by a majority of the church present at a meeting called for that purpose. He is also liable to temporary or final separation for the same causes as the other members.

The defendant Shipway had, by the invitation of the congregation, preached by way of probation from Christmas 1857 to Christmas 1858, and had also continued to officiate as pastor until April 1858. The deacons and trustees having been informed that Shipway had attempted to seduce the wife of one of the congregation, on the 10th of April (with the exception of the trustee Goss, who took no part in the dispute), requested the attendance of Shipway at a meeting at which this charge against him was about to be taken into consideration. Upon his excusing himself from attendance on the ground of illness, they proceeded at once to the consideration of the matter for which the meeting was called, and having come to the conclusion that the charge was proved against him, they resolved that the chapel should be closed against him, and that he should occupy the pulpit no more.

A written notice of this resolution, signed by all the trustees of the chapel, &c., except the trustee James Goss and some of the deacons, was sent to Shipway on the evening of the same day. Two of the trustees and deacons (viz. Ruggles and Barrell), and Finch, one of the deacons who had signed the above notice, afterwards became adherents and supporters of the defendant Shipway as against the plaintiffs and their supporters. On the following day the chapel was closed, and a constable stationed at the door by order of the plaintiffs. On the 27th of April Shipway was convicted before the magistrates of Sible Hedingham of a common assault on the wife of a member of the congregation, and herself a member, and fined 1*l*.

On the 15th of May 1858 a resolution was passed at a church meeting, a minute of which was entered in the church-book as follows:—

"1858.—At a church meeting, held at noon, the 16th of May, being Lord's Day, the church then expressed their satisfaction at what had been done in keeping Mr. Shipway out of the pulpit, and passed a resolution never to allow him to occupy the pulpit again."

After the 16th of May, up to which time the chapel had remained closed, the trustees got several other ministers to officiate.

On Sunday, the 30th of May, a church meeting, consisting of from thirty to forty members, male and female, was held, for the special purpose of giving the opinion of the congregation with reference to those members who adhered to Mr. Shipway, and to many of whom he had, since his ejection from the chapel pulpit, preached at his own house and elsewhere. The meeting expressed its opinion that those persons were disorderly in trying to uphold such a character, and resolved not to acknowledge them as members so long as they followed him.

On the 4th of July 1858 a Mr. Murrell Plaice, by direction of some of the trustees and deacons opposed to Mr. Shipway, officiated at the chapel in the morning and afternoon.

At the conclusion of the afternoon service Shipway, accompanied by a large number of his adherents, entered and took possession of the chapel, and, professing to hold a church meeting, passed resolutions to the effect following:—First, that Charles Shipway be elected a member of the church; secondly, that he become pastor; thirdly, that new locks be placed on the chapel-doors. At the termination of the proceedings watchmen were left in the chapel, and remained there all night under the direction of Shipway, who supplied them with beer from a neighbouring public-house; and on the next day new keys were, by his order, placed upon the doors of the chapel.

The present bill was then filed against Shipway, Barrell, Goss, Ruggles and Finch; and a motion for an injunction was made before his Honour on the 29th of March. It was on that occasion arranged that an answer should be put in by the defendants, and that the plaintiffs should give notice of motion for decree.

By the answer of the defendants, it was stated that in the interval between the motion for an injunction and the present motion for decree, the defendants Ruggles, Barrell and Finch, on the 2nd of April, gave notice, by printed circular sent to every member of the congregation, male and female, that on the 3rd of April, being Sunday, at twelve o'clock, a church-meeting would be held to enable the men members, communicants of the society, to resolve whether or not they desired that Shipway should continue to be the minister of the chapel. The answer stated that the meeting was accordingly held, and that Shipway was then and there elected by about eighty members; and that the whole congregation did not consist of more than 120 members.

The defendants, by their answer and evidence, denied the charges against Shipway of immorality and intoxication, and endeavoured to shew that the meetings at which the resolutions relied on by the plaintiffs were passed, were informal, not having been convened on notice.

Mr. Malins and Mr. J. T. Turner appeared for the plaintiffs.

Mr. Bacon, Mr. Craig and Mr. Graham Hastings, for the defendants.

STUART, V.C. said, that under the deeds of September 1808 and December 1814 the legal estate in the chapel was clearly vested in the trustees for the use and benefit of the society or congregation assembling therein for public worship. Having accepted the trusts of the deed, they had not only the right to the legal estate, but had imposed upon them the duty of seeing that the chapel was used for the purposes and in conformity with the trusts declared by the deeds. One of their plainest duties was to see that the possession of the chapel, legally vested in themselves, was not improperly disturbed. The only question in this case was, whether the proceedings of the defendants amounted to an illegal disturbance of the estate vested in the trustees. A minority of the trustees were defendants to the suit; but it was settled law that where a trust was created of such a general or public character as that of this chapel, it was essential to the due execution of the trust that the majority should have the power of binding the minority—Wilkinson v. Malin (1). Now the defendant Shipway had asserted his right against the will of the majority of the trustees to retain possession of this chapel; to officiate as pastor therein. It was unquestionably the law that when the legal estate in a chapel is vested in trustees, a pastor or minister, though duly elected, is only tenant at will of the trustees—Doe d. Jones v. Jones (2) and Doe d. Nicholl v. M'Kaeg (3). According to law, therefore, the plaintiffs, as the majority of the trustees, were the landlords of this chapel. The defendant Shipway was in possession against their will, and was at law a trespasser on their right. It then remained to consider the position he occupied with regard to them in this court. It appeared that early in 1858 dissatisfaction was felt at his continuing minister, and he was served with notice to attend a meeting at which certain charges were preferred against him. It was immaterial to consider whether that notice was duly served, or to examine the grounds on which the trustees proceeded. Without going into the particulars of the evidence, it appeared that the trustees, in the exercise of their duty, and acting honestly, according to their own discretion, and with the sanction of a considerable portion of the congregation, thought right to close this chapel against Shipway for several Sundays. If this step of the trustees met with the disapproval of any portion of the congregation, it was open to them to call the trustees to account in the regular way. On the last Sunday in May 1858, at a church meeting regularly held, it was resolved that Shipway should no longer continue to officiate as pastor. It was said that this meeting was irregularly held, and that the resolution passed at it did not bind the whole society. Assuming that there might be a question as to this, it was plain that a church meeting might have been regularly convened for arranging any disputes or differences between the members of the congregation, or between them and the trustees; but the proceeding which was shewn to have taken place on the 4th of July was highly irregular and improper, and such as could not meet with the approbation or sanction of this Court. On the morning and evening of that day the trustees had the chapel opened for divine service, which was performed by a minister of the name of Plaice, apparently in an orderly manner. When the afternoon service was concluded and the trustees would have closed the chapel-doors, they were prevented from so doing by the defendant Shipway, who thought it consistent with his duty as a minister of the Gospel to enter the pulpit, keep forcible possession of the chapel and keep persons in possession of the chapel all night, and then change the locks, so as forcibly to exclude the majority of the trustees. This seemed to be as much a violation of the trusts and purposes for which the legal estate was vested in the trustees, as it was a trespass at law upon that legal estate.

His Honour then pronounced a decree, awarding an injunction to restrain the defendant C. Shipway, his servants and agents, from disturbing, hindering or molesting the pastor, deacons and members of the congregation of Particular or Calvinistic Baptists in the plaintiffs' bill named, in the performance of divine service in the said chapel of Sible Hedingham, in the said bill mentioned, or from otherwise disturbing, hindering or molesting any of the members aforesaid in the employment or use of the said chapel and hereditaments conveyed by the said indentures of the 21st of September 1808 and the 13th of December 1814, or either of them, and also to restrain the defendant C. Shipway from officiating as pastor of the said congregation, and from preaching or intermeddling with the service to be performed in the said chapel and hereditaments conveyed by the said indentures, and to restrain the defendants J. Ruggles, W. Barrell and C. Finch from in any way aiding or permitting the said defendant C. Shipway to preach or officiate in the said chapel. And it was ordered that the defendants C. Shipway, J. Ruggles, W. Barrell and C. Finch should pay the said plaintiffs their costs of the suit when taxed. No order as to the costs of the defendant W. Goss. Liberty to apply.

From this decision the defendants appealed.

The same counsel appeared as in the court below, and the following cases were then referred to—

The Attorney General v. Gascoigne, 2 Myl. & K. 647; s. c. 1 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 122.

The Attorney General v. Scott, 1 Ves. sen. 413.

Stat. 9 Geo. 4. c. 31.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE, in delivering judgment, said, that for many years before this litigation a certain tenement had been vested in trustees, who were changed from time to time, and it was now vested in a body of trustees for religious purposes—namely, for the benefit of a particular class of Christians, described as Particular or Calvinistic Baptists. The trusts were general in that respect; but practically, by usage or otherwise, the temporal affairs of the congregation had been administered by persons selected for that purpose called deacons—trustees of the legal estate, therefore, for providing for the religious purposes of the communicants. In the year 1858 disputes arose amongst those who were interested and concerned in this place of worship and its affairs, one consequence of which was the present suit, including as parties to it, either as plaintiffs or defendants, all the trustees and all the deacons. The object of that suit was not the general management of the affairs of the trust, but only protection against an alleged breach of trust of a particular kind. The substance of the suit was on behalf of all the persons interested in the trust, though it was not so in form; and as it included all the deacons and all the trustees, and as the objection had not been taken on the ground of absence of parties, this Court might well deal with the suit as not insufficient, if there were merits to support and justify it. Complaint was made by some of the persons interested, and was alleged to be without foundation by others of them, that the religious affairs were conducted by a minister against whom objections existed, that they were conducted by him without sufficient authority, and that his acts and interference prevented all proper management of the affairs, and that they were therefore entitled to the assistance of the Court. There was no doubt that the plaintiffs making this complaint had been so interfered with, and there was no doubt, if their allegations were correct, that this was a proper case for the interference of this Court at their instance. It appeared that in the course of the year 1857, Mr. Shipway, the defendant, had been elected temporarily, or on probation, to be the minister of this congregation; he accepted the office and continued to discharge the duties for two or three months, and at Christmas 1857 he was continued for another year, which would, of course, expire at the end of the year 1858. But the year 1858 was not far advanced when, either without or with sufficient reason, some dissatisfaction arose in the minds of some amongst the trustees and some amongst the deacons with Mr. Shipway, and, whether regularly or irregularly, by those who had the power of enforcing their opinions, Mr. Shipway was displaced from his position. Another minister then officiated in the chapel for several Sundays until, as it appeared, that occurrence took place which had been described as having happened on the 4th of July. At the close of the afternoon service of that day, notice was given of a "church meeting" (as it was called) to be then and there held, and at that meeting Mr. Shipway was appointed, or re-appointed, or continued as minister of the congregation. He himself appeared to have been present at the meeting, and to have taken part in it; in fact he seemed to have entered the chapel, to have ascended into the pulpit, to have gone out, to have come back again and to have given a sort of "word of command" to his followers. He himself, or by his friends, retained possession of the building during the whole night, in order that the keys and locks might be changed, and placed in the power of his own supporters, so that they might be in a condition to keep out what his Lordship thought he might fairly term "the enemy." With this object in view, in order to sustain their spirits or their strength during the watch, Mr. Shipway himself very good-naturedly supplied them with beer from a neighbouring public-house, although to a very moderate amount only. From that moment he was virtually re-installed as minister; and although he (the Lord Justice) felt great regret at the whole course of proceedings, yet it was his duty to declare his opinion that this re-appointment was a nullity, and that it was accompanied by the most indecent irregularity. Mr. Shipway's opponents were, however, advised that he could not be lawfully displaced until the year of probation, for which he had been appointed, was over; and for this reason no suit was instituted until the month of January in the present year. Whilst the defendant Shipway was in possession thus irregularly, the ceremony called "ordination" took place; it did not appear what that amounted to, or what it precisely meant; but it was to be collected that it was equivalent to institution and induction in the Church of England, although there was no evidence upon that point. However, there were certainly some forms observed; ministers from other places attended and took part in them; but this ceremony was, under the circumstances which existed, wholly immaterial. Early in the present year this bill was filed, and affidavits were made of great bulk, as his Lordship felt bound to say, and in respect to the length and bulk of which he certainly could not exculpate the plaintiffs, though the Court would of course hear their counsel on that point. A motion for an injunction was then brought on before the Vice Chancellor, but on that occasion it was suggested that an answer should be put in, and the motion converted into a motion for a decree; and it was arranged that it should be so. Whilst the matter was thus standing over, a notice was given, bearing date the 31st of March, but not delivered before the 2nd of April, which was a Saturday; that notice was to this effect: that on Sunday the 3rd of April, after morning service, a church meeting would be held in the chapel to enable the men members of the congregation to resolve whether they did or did not desire that Charles Shipway should continue to be their minister. This notice was signed by three of the deacons, who were defendants to this suit, and two of those three deacons were also trustees. His Lordship would not lay any stress on the words "men members," nor on the expression "continue to be their minister;" but not only was this notice given pendente lite, while the matter was standing over to be heard, but the practice, so far as the Court had the means of judging, had always been to give notice for any meeting in the chapel itself upon a Sunday, for which practice there was, no doubt, good reason. This notice was not given upon any Sunday, but upon a Saturday for the next following day; it was given in an entirely new form, and the meeting was called not only pendente lite, but while possession of the chapel itself, and the administration of its affairs, were in the condition induced, created and sustained by the anomalous, improper and highly irregular proceedings of the 4th of July of the previous year. Therefore this meeting also was a mere nullity, and notwithstanding the so-called ordination of September 1858, and the election of the 3rd of April 1859, the matter stood upon the election or re-election of the 4th of July 1858, which was no title at all. The decree of the Vice Chancellor had only protected the plaintiffs by declaring—not who was the minister of the chapel, but that a particular individual was not. Although the plaintiffs' case might have been much narrowed, yet, remembering that it was quite impossible for a plaintiff to know what would be the particular parts of his case which would most powerfully influence the opinion of the Court, he (the Lord Justice) thought it was hard upon persons who had substantially a good case to punish them for having presented their case to the judgment of the Court in every way in which it might appear necessary to them, in the exercise of their discretion, to bring it before the Court. On these grounds his Lordship was of opinion that the circumstances did not warrant him from departing from the decree pronounced by the Vice Chancellor.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER said, that it was much to be lamented that such a case as this should have been brought into Court; it afforded a melancholy example of the extent to which strong personal feeling might be carried; but with these considerations the Court had nothing to do, and it was the duty of the Court to decide according to the legal and equitable rights of the parties before it. Some of the trusts of the deed of the 21st of September 1808 were as follows:—"And upon further trust to convey the said tenement or meeting-house and premises, with the appurtenances, from time to time to such persons for the purposes aforesaid as the men members, communicants of the said society or congregation of Particular or Calvinistic Baptists, holding the doctrines aforesaid, for the time being, in their church-meeting duly assembled, or the major part in number of them so assembled, shall, by any deed or instrument in writing, from time to time direct or appoint, so that the same may be made use of only so far as it lawfully could or might as a place of worship for Particular or Calvinistic Baptists, holding the doctrines before mentioned." Those trusts would necessarily involve the appointment of a minister, through whom divine worship might be performed in the chapel; but that appointment was to be made, not by the trustees, but by the congregation for whose benefit the appointment was to be exercised. If an election was not held according to the rules and practice of the body, every member had a right to complain of an undue exercise of the trust; and if he had such ground, he had a right to come to this Court for relief. This bill was, therefore, properly filed. But it was said, on behalf of the defendants, that the plaintiffs had seceded from the congregation, and had removed from the chapel the books and cushions which belonged to them. His Lordship did not look upon this as a withdrawal in the light of a cessation from being members, but simply a withdrawal in consequence of the unlawful conduct of the defendant Shipway and those who supported him; and, therefore, those persons were entitled to come to this Court. It might possibly have been more strictly correct if the bill had been filed by them on behalf of themselves and all others interested; but that was only a matter of form, and, if it had been necessary, leave would have been given to amend the bill in that respect. What, then, were the facts of the case?—[His Lordship here detailed the facts, and observed on the conduct of Mr. Shipway on the 4th of July 1858, and on the matters said to be then determined, viz., the resolution that Mr. Shipway should be elected a member of the congregation; that he should be elected pastor of the congregation; and that new locks should be placed upon the chapel-doors.]—His Lordship's opinion was, that the election was not valid, and could not be supported, and he thought so upon two grounds: in the first place, because no due notice had been given of the intention to hold the meeting; and in the next place, because this pretended meeting was composed of members and non-members alike, and there could be no due and valid election unless it was confined to the members of the congregation only, without the interference of those who had not the rights of membership. For these reasons the alleged election in July 1858 was entirely out of the case. Then in the September following there came the ordination, as it was called; and all that was before the Court upon that subject was contained in the answer of the defendants, which alleged that by the desire of the church and of the congregation, the defendant Mr. Shipway was ordained to be the minister; but who composed the church, and how the alleged desire was expressed, in no way appeared, by the answer or otherwise. Then there remained nothing but the election of the 3rd of April 1859, and the question was, whether that election was a valid election, and one which entitled the defendant Mr. Shipway to retain his position as minister. He, the Lord Justice, did not intend to say that the circumstance of the whole case being under the jurisdiction of this Court would preclude the congregation from the right of expressing their views and opinions upon the subject, nor would he say that the Court would refuse to attend to those views and opinions; but the pendency of this suit rendered it imperative upon the parties that every rule and observance which had in former instances been observed, should be most strictly and regularly attended and adhered to. This had not been the case in the present instance, and the meeting then held was not of such a character that the Court would attend to the conclusions it might have adopted. It was contended, on the part of the defendants, that, if Mr. Shipway was not actually displaced by the congregation, he was continued as minister; but that rule could at all events have no application to a case where there was nothing more than an unauthorized assertion of a permanent appointment. The decree was therefore, in substance, right, and it would be upheld. The only question was as to the costs, on which he felt some doubt.

Mr. Bacon called the attention of the Court to the terms of the injunction, which he said would prevent the re-election of Mr. Shipway even if the congregation should be desirous of having his ministration.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—I do not think that a re-election of Mr. Shipway would be a contempt of Court; for that re-election would confer on him a new title, about which we express no further opinion.

A discussion ensued as to costs, and it was determined that there should be no costs on the appeal beyond the deposit, which was ordered to be paid over to the plaintiffs.

M.R. }
March 26. } BRADBURY v. DICKENS.

Partnership—Periodical—Trade Name—Discontinuance—Advertisement.

If a partner in a periodical withdraws from the publication and determines the partnership, so that the right to use the name must be sold and the affairs wound up, he will not be restrained from advertising a work of a similar description under a new name, or the discontinuance of the former work, so far as his connexion with it was concerned.

The bill in this suit was filed by Messrs. Bradbury & Evans, printers and publishers, against Charles Dickens and William Henry Wills, praying that the partnership between them might be dissolved and its affairs wound up, and praying that the defendant Charles Dickens might be restrained from advertising or publishing any notice or advertisement announcing the discontinuance of a periodical called Household Words, or the substitution of any periodical in place thereof, or succession thereto, or continuing any announcement to the same or a similar effect. The bill also prayed that the copyright of the Household Words might be forthwith sold as a going concern.

On the 28th of March 1850 articles of agreement were entered into between Charles Dickens of the first part, William Bradbury and Frederick Mullett Evans of the second part, John Forster of the third part, and W. H. Wills of the fourth part, whereby they agreed to be and continue joint proprietors of the weekly periodical called Household Words, and to be interested therein upon the following terms:—That Mr. Dickens should have one-half part or share, the plaintiffs one-fourth, and Mr. Forster and Mr. Wills one-eighth respectively; that Mr. Dickens should be editor, and in that capacity exercise absolute control over the literary department, and over all agreements, rates of payment, and orders of payment made in respect of the literary department, and be entitled so long as he continued editor to receive 500*l.* per annum while he occupied that position, and to be paid in addition for any literary articles he might contribute, as well as to participate in any profits that might accrue to him as part proprietor; that the plaintiffs should be printers and publishers of the work, as well as general managers, so long as they continued to be personally interested; and that as such they were to have the entire management of the commercial department, and "bear, pay and discharge," in the first instance, the rent of any premises required for carrying on the business of the same, as well as any expenses incident thereto, and receive and pay all monies due to, or which might become payable in respect thereof, and should charge the publication with any payments made on account of the publication; that Mr. Forster should, from time to time, in consideration of his share, contribute literary articles without any additional remuneration for the same; and that Mr. Wills, in consideration of the share reserved to him, should act as sub-editor, and should not be at liberty to withdraw therefrom without giving twelve calendar months' notice to his co-proprietors, and that he should receive 8*l.* a week as sub-editor in addition to any profits arising to him as part proprietor. Moreover, it was provided that Mr. Dickens might dismiss Mr. Wills on giving him six calendar months' notice, or the payment of a sum equivalent to his salary for that time, and that none of the proprietors "should sell, assign or transfer his share or interest in the publication, without first tendering or offering the same to his co-proprietors." It was further provided that meetings of the proprietors should be held on the second Tuesday in May and November of each year, at the counting-house of the concern, for the purpose of auditing the accounts, considering the state of the publication, and passing such resolutions as they might deem fit; and it was agreed also that at any special meeting of the proprietors there should be present at least two proprietors in addition to the plaintiffs. At the expiration of the publication, by agreement or otherwise, all the stock, chattels and property, except debts owing to the same, should, unless the parties agreed to the value thereof, or to some appropriation of the same, be sold by public auction to the highest bidder or bidders, with liberty for any or either of the parties to bid for the same.

Mr. Forster retired from the partnership some years ago, and with the consent of the other proprietors sold his share to Mr. Dickens, since which time the periodical had been carried on by the plaintiffs and the defendants as partners, under the articles originally agreed to. On the 15th of November last Mr. Dickens convened a meeting, at which he deputed Mr. Forster to represent him, and that gentleman attended the meeting, and proposed the following resolution:—"That the present partnership be dissolved, by the cessation and discontinuance of the publication on the completion of its nineteenth volume." That resolution was seconded by Mr. Wills, the defendant. The plaintiffs refused to recognize the right of Mr. Forster to be present at the meeting, and did not vote, considering such meeting as not being properly constituted, and that Mr. Dickens had no right to be represented and vote by proxy under the articles of the agreement. Mr. Dickens, having been informed that the validity of the resolution in question was disputed, on the 22nd of December sent a notice to Mr. Wills and the plaintiffs to the effect that upon the completion of the nineteenth volume of the work, which would take place in the month of May, the partnership should be dissolved, and that he would immediately afterwards take such steps as he might be advised for the winding up of the affairs of the partnership.

Mr. Dickens subsequently sent the following circular to the booksellers, and it afterwards appeared in the newspapers as an advertisement:—

"The story of our lives from year to year.

Shakespeare.

"On Saturday, the 30th of April 1859, will be published, price 2*d.*, the first number of All the Year Round, a weekly journal, designed for the instruction and entertainment of all classes of readers, and to assist in the discussion of the social questions of the day, conducted by Charles Dickens.

"Address.

"Nine years of Household Words are the best practical assurance that can be offered to the public, of the spirit and object of All the Year Round. In transferring myself and my strongest energies from the publication that is about to be discontinued to the publication that is about to begin, I have the happiness of taking with me the staff of writers with whom I have laboured, and all the literary business and co-operation that can make my work a pleasure. In some important respects I am now free greatly to advance on past arrangements; these I leave to testify for themselves in due course. That fusion of the graces of the imagination with the realities of life, which is vital to the welfare of any community, and for which I have striven from week to week as honestly as I could during the last nine years will be striven for All the Year Round. The old weekly cares and duties become things of the past, merely to be assumed with an increased love for them, and brighter hopes springing out of them in the present and future, I look and plan for a very much wider circle of readers; and yet, again, for a steadily expanding circle of readers on the projects, I hope to carry through All the Year Round, and I feel confident that this expectation will be realized if it deserve realization. The task of my new journal is set, and it will steadily try to work the task out. Its pages shall shew to what good purpose their motto is remembered in them, and with how much fidelity and earnestness they tell the story of our lives from year to year. Charles Dickens."

At the foot of the circular it was stated, that "On Saturday, the 28th of May 1859, Mr. Charles Dickens will cease to conduct Household Words; that periodical will be discontinued and its partnership of proprietors dissolved."

The plaintiffs then filed this bill, alleging that Charles Dickens had no right to dissolve the partnership, but that he refused to continue as editor of Household Words; that the plaintiffs had refused his offer of 1,000*l.* for their share of the copyright, and that Charles Dickens was endeavouring to deprive them of all their share and interest therein, and to appropriate the benefit of the copyright to himself by establishing such a periodical and endeavouring to procure the discontinuance of the Household Words, and that he had with that view prepared the circular to the trade, which was injurious to the plaintiffs, and calculated to diminish the value of the copyright. It insisted also that he had no right to announce that the work would be discontinued. The plaintiffs now asked that Mr. Dickens might be restrained from publishing the circular, or any advertisement announcing the discontinuing of the periodical called Household Words, or the substitution of any periodical in the place thereof or in succession thereto.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Jessel, for the plaintiffs.—The articles fix no period for the continuance of the partnership; it was, however, co-equal with the publication, and it was provided, that the interest of a proprietor was not to cease at his death. It had all the essentials of permanency. The work was established, and the name Household Words had become of great value; and Mr. Dickens had, by his circular saying it would cease, been guilty of a violation of the duty of a partner. Provision was made for the sale of the work for the benefit of all; and Mr. Dickens had no right to seek a continuity or succession of the property of his partners by carrying on the work under another name, neither had he any right to announce that the partnership of proprietors in Household Words would be discontinued. The partnership must, in fact, continue until the publication was sold.

Mr. Selwyn and Mr. Hobhouse, for the defendants.—The partnership was not in the Household Words only, but in Household Words conducted by Charles Dickens, and the public were entitled to know that he had ceased to edit it, or to have any interest in it. The articles did not stipulate that Mr. Dickens was to give his sole literary service to this periodical; he was at liberty, therefore, during its continuance to set up another.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—A slight alteration after the words "about to be discontinued," by adding the words "by me" might obviate any objection.

Mr. Selwyn.—I can see no objection to it, except that it would seem to hold out the idea that this Court encourages what is felt to be nothing else than a most vexatious suit. Mr. Dickens, in his circular, has published only what is strictly true: he will cease to edit, his connexion with it will terminate, the work agreed to be published will be at an end, and the partnership will be dissolved. Under such circumstances there surely can be no hesitation in refusing the application, as being at once unnecessary and vexatious.

Mr. R. Palmer, in reply.—The addition of the words “by me” will not protect the plaintiffs; it will still leave open the objection that the Household Words is to be discontinued. The name of Mr. Dickens was not essential either to the work or to its continuance. The articles provided that another editor might be appointed, and Mr. Dickens might have died; but still the articles contemplated a continuance of the publication as a serial work. If, then, there is no right to discontinue the work, he has no right to damage the sale by sending advertisements abroad, stating that it will be discontinued; and his adding “by him” or “by me” can make no difference: he has a right to say, I shall cease to be connected with it, or that my supervision and management will be discontinued, but he has no right to say that the periodical will be discontinued either absolutely or by himself.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The property in a literary periodical is confined to the mere title, and the title to this work is Household Words; it has been made the subject of partnership articles, and accordingly it is a part of the partnership assets, and may be sold, such as it is, provided it has any existence. I stated during the argument that putting in the words “by me” or “by him,” or “by the editor” after the word “discontinued” in the Address and in the concluding paragraph would remove all grounds of cavil. On the part of the plaintiffs it has been argued, that Mr. Dickens has no power to put an end to the work; but I am not clear that he has not, or that his mere retirement will not ipso facto annihilate it, or that it is not considered as entirely and solely associated with his name; and that the name Household Words would be literally worth nothing as soon as it is known that he has nothing to do with it. However that may be, the statement that he has nothing more to do with it is properly represented by saying “it is discontinued by me”; that does not import the fact that it is discontinued absolutely; it merely asserts that he himself, so far as he had anything to do with it, has discontinued it: that is all the plaintiffs are entitled to require. Accordingly, upon the undertaking of Mr. Dickens in the publication of future advertisements to put in those or equivalent words, I will make no order upon this motion; but I shall reserve the costs until I see the result when the partnership property comes to be disposed of.

Jan. 17. } HOWARD v. ROBINSON.

Production of Documents—Mortgage-Deed.

A legatee under a will filed a bill against the trustee who had raised money to pay legacies, and against the mortgagee, who had lent the money, charging that the trustee had effected a certain mortgage; that he had borrowed the money for his own purposes, and not to pay off the legacies; and that the mortgagee knew of the alleged breach of trust. The mortgagee admitted the mortgage-deed, “and for greater certainty as to the contents thereof craved leave to refer to it when produced to the Court,” but denied the other allegations. The plaintiff obtained an order in chambers for production of the mortgage-deed:—Held, upon an adjourned summons, that the plaintiff, who did not allege that the deed contained anything which would support his case, was not entitled to the production, except upon redeeming the mortgage.

This was an application upon an adjourned summons from chambers to vary an order made for the production of documents.

The testator in the cause, Richard Chaffers, gave a legacy of 1,500*l.* to Ann Howard, and he vested all his real estate in two trustees named VEVERS and CHAFFERS, for a term of 800 years, upon trust to sell, or by other ways and means at their discretion, to raise money for the purpose of paying such debts and legacies as the personalty was insufficient to satisfy, and the receipts of the trustees were to be good discharges to purchasers, mortgagees, &c.

Ann Howard died shortly after the date of the will, and the testator, by a codicil, gave the aforesaid legacy of 1,500*l.* to the infant children of Ann Howard, to be paid to them at twenty-one, and in case of their death under twenty-one without issue, then he gave the said legacy to Thomas Chaffers and Benjamin Chaffers absolutely.

By an indenture of mortgage, dated the 1st of July 1853, B. Chaffers, the surviving trustee under the will, assigned the term of 800 years, by way of mortgage, to the defendants John Robinson and William Birtwhistle, to secure the sum of 1,000*l.*

The legacy not having been paid, the infant children of Ann Howard instituted this suit, by their next friend, for the purpose of having their legacy raised, and the bill charged that B. Chaffers had mortgaged the property to the other defendants, and had applied the money to his own purposes. The bill also charged that the mortgagees well knew that the plaintiffs were infants, and that their legacy had not been paid.

The defendants, the mortgagees, by their answer, admitted that they had possession of the mortgage-deed of the 1st of July 1853, and that it was to the effect set out in the plaintiffs' bill, "But for greater certainty as to the contents thereof they craved leave to refer to the same when produced to this honourable Court," but they denied that they were aware of the fact that the legacy of the plaintiffs was charged upon the lands devised by the testator, or that such legacy had not been paid.

On the 19th of November 1858 an order was obtained by the plaintiffs, in chambers, for production by the defendants J. Robinson and W. Birtwhistle of the several deeds, books, papers and writings, mentioned in the schedule to the answer of the defendants, and also the mortgage-deed of the 1st of July 1853 in the said answer referred to, and admitted to be in their possession.

The application now made was to vary the order for production by omitting the direction to produce the mortgage-deed.

Mr. Sidney Smith appeared in support of the application, and contended that a mortgagee could not be compelled to produce his mortgage-deed without the principal and interest being tendered to him. The fact of the defendants having referred to the deed for greater certainty as to its contents did not alter the general rule. This was merely to satisfy the defendants' conscience. The deed was not set up by the defendants, but only referred to in answer to the plaintiffs' allegation.—He cited—

Mr. G. M. Giffard, contra, submitted that the defendants, having admitted the possession of the deed, and having asked leave to refer to it, had given the plaintiffs a right to call for inspection. It might be very material for the plaintiffs in making out their case to shew the form of the mortgage-deed, and if the deed, upon the face of it, was as alleged by the plaintiffs, then it would go to shew their title to the relief prayed.

KINDERSLEY, V.C. (without calling for a reply) said—My opinion is, that the defendants cannot be compelled to produce this deed. There is no doubt that as an abstract proposition the plaintiff has a right to inspection of every deed, paper or writing in the possession of the defendant, which would help to make out the plaintiff's case; but he has no right to see those documents in the defendant's possession which only tend to make out the defendant's case. The case of a mortgagee is supposed to stand on some special footing, but, in fact, it is only one of the cases within the general rule; and, ordinarily speaking, where a mortgagor files a bill against a mortgagee, he cannot see the mortgage-deed without redeeming the mortgage. There may be cases in which a mortgagor, or a person in the same situation, may have a special case to entitle him to inspection, because the document might serve to make out the plaintiff's case; but, in other respects, a mortgagee may put the deeds in a box and defy the mortgagor to obtain inspection until he engages to pay principal, interest and costs. If a mortgagor files a bill simply to redeem, and states the mortgage-deed in his bill, and the defendant, by his answer, as he is bound to do, admits the deed to be to the effect stated, then, when the cause comes to a hearing, the mortgagor has a right to redeem in accordance with the deed, and then, for the first time, he has a right to see the deed. Supposing, in the case put, that the defendant admits the deed, and says, "I admit the effect of the deed to be as stated in the bill to the best of my knowledge," does it make any difference that he should go on to say—"but still, for greater certainty, and to satisfy my conscience that I am not misstating the facts, I crave leave to refer to it when produced"? How does this reservation give the plaintiff any special right to see the deed before the hearing? Another case might arise:—Suppose the plaintiff states a case upon which he considers he may have relief, and the defendant, by his answer, states a certain deed which the plaintiff has not referred to, and such deed, instead of helping the plaintiff, destroys his case. In that state of things the plaintiff would have no right to inspection of a deed, which does not assist him. But, suppose the defendant, after setting up a deed of this nature, goes on in the common form to refer to it for greater certainty. I am wholly at a loss to comprehend how a plaintiff who, without this reference, would not be entitled to production, should have any greater right owing to such a statement. There is no ground whatever for the proposition; but every principle of reasoning shews it to be the other way. These, then, are two cases which might arise on what may be called the technical grounds; but if the putting those words into the answer would, in either case, give a right to inspection, it would not be in the case where the deed referred to by the defendant is in opposition to the plaintiff's case. Now, in the case of Hardman v. Ellames, Lord Cottenham held that a reference in the answer did entitle to production, but when he found that that decision was challenged in the subsequent case of Adams v. Fisher, he explained what he meant to decide in Hardman v. Ellames, which was that, where a defendant had thought proper to put his defence upon a particular document, he himself having introduced it and put it forward, the plaintiff was entitled to see whether the defendant had rightly stated it. The decision caused great astonishment at the time to the profession at large, and I am bound to say that I cannot follow the reasoning. However, on the technical ground, this is not the case of Hardman v. Ellames; if it were, I might be bound to follow it, but it is the contrary, and the very point which Lord Cottenham said he did not mean to decide.

I must put the case, then, on the general footing. If the defendant's mortgage is prior to the plaintiff's claim he has no right to the production of the deed. If the defendant's title is posterior to the plaintiff's claim it would be immaterial to him to have production, and there is no rule, that I am aware of, which would give a prior mortgagee a right to see the deed of a subsequent mortgagee. Here the very contest is as to priority. The plaintiff claims to be first incumbrancer, and so does the defendant. It is clear that it would never do to let a plaintiff, on his mere allegation of being first incumbrancer, have inspection of the deed of a party whom he alleges to be subsequent to him, although there certainly might be cases in which, the plaintiff's right depending upon what is contained in the defendant's deed he would be entitled to inspection. Does the plaintiff's right to relief in this case depend at all on the contents of the deed —[His Honour then stated the facts, and said]—The plaintiff here charges the defendant with knowing certain circumstances at the time of taking his deed, which would make him a party to a breach of trust, and with neglecting to make further inquiries as to the facts, and alleges that the mortgage was effected for the private purposes of Chaffers, and not for paying off the legacies. If the plaintiff makes out these allegations he establishes his case, but there is no other allegation that would entitle him to relief. The defendant denies the allegations, and the production of the deed will not assist the plaintiff in any way. The plaintiff alleges what the deed contains, but he does not allege that it contains anything which would support his case. If, at the hearing, the defendant proves that he did not know of the private purposes for which Chaffers obtained the money upon mortgage, then the plaintiff will have no right against him, except to redeem. On these grounds, therefore, I think that the order for production must be discharged. The costs to be costs in the cause.

Legacy—Vesting—Election.

*A testator gave his real and personal estate to trustees upon trust out of the income to pay an annuity of 500*l.* a year to his widow for life, or for so long as she should continue his widow, for the maintenance of herself and his children, and to invest the surplus; and after her death or marriage again upon trust to apply such annual income for the maintenance and advancement of such of his children as should be under twenty-one; and when the youngest of his children should attain the said age, then upon trust to distribute all his property equally between his children, except so much as would secure to his wife, if she should be then alive and married again, an annuity of 100*l.* a year for life. And in case of the death of any of his children, leaving lawful issue, the testator directed that the share of such child or children should go to his or her children:—Held, that the share of each child became vested on attaining twenty-one, that no division was to be made until the youngest child attained twenty-one, or during the life or widowhood of the testator's wife, and that the share of any child dying and leaving issue was given over to the children of such deceased child, on the death of a child before the period of distribution.*

*After the date of the above-mentioned will, the testator, on the marriage of one of his daughters, settled 2,000*l.* for the benefit* of herself, her husband and children:—Held, that the daughter must elect whether to take under the will or the settlement.

Joseph Beckton, by his will, dated the 14th of October 1842, devised and bequeathed his real and personal estate to trustees, upon trust to convert the same and to stand possessed of the monies to arise therefrom, upon trust that they should pay out of the interest, dividends, rents and annual produce, unto his said wife, an annuity or clear yearly sum of 500*l.* for and during the term of her natural life, or for so long a time as she should continue his widow, for the maintenance of herself, and for the bringing up, maintaining and educating of all and every his child and children living at the time of his decease, or born in due time afterwards. . . . And that his trustees should pay to his sister-in-law, Mary Nuttall, a clear annuity of 80*l.* for her life. And after payment of the said annuities, he directed that the overplus of the interest, rents and annual income, when and as the accumulations thereof should amount to 500*l.* (unless the same should be required for the advancement in the world of his child or children as thereafter mentioned), should be invested as therein mentioned, and be applied as aforesaid; and from and immediately after the death or second marriage of his wife, then upon further trust to apply such part of the annual proceeds for the maintenance, education and advancement in life of all his said child and children as should be then under the age of twenty-one years, as they, in their discretion, should see proper, and when the youngest of his children should attain the said age, then upon further trust to call in all his monies, and pay, divide, distribute and convey all his property between his children, share and share alike, save and except so much as would secure to his said wife (if she should be then alive and married) an annuity or yearly sum of 100*l.* as thereafter mentioned; and at her death the principal thereof he directed should be equally divided amongst his children, as thereinbefore mentioned. And in case of the death of any of his said children leaving lawful issue him, her or them surviving, then it was his will that the share or shares of such deceased parent or parents should go to the child or children of such parents. And the testator declared that in case his said wife should marry again, the said annuity of 500*l.* should cease, and in lieu thereof he bequeathed to her an annuity of 100*l.* for her own sole use and benefit for her natural life. And on each of his said children attaining the age of twenty-one years he directed that the sum of 500*l.* should be paid to him or her so coming of age, out of the accumulations of his property. And he empowered his said trustees to advance such further sum or sums of money (with the consent of his said wife, in case she should be then his widow) as they in their judgment should consider prudent and proper for the advancement in the world of such his son and daughter or sons and daughters respectively so arriving of age as aforesaid; and such 500*l.* and other sum or sums so advanced should go in part and be accounted for and be deducted from his, her or their share under his will.

On the marriage of his daughter, Mrs. Longshaw, the testator transferred a sum of 2,000*l.* to the trustees of her settlement, which was dated the 11th of November 1843, upon trusts for the benefit of her husband, herself, and their children; and their daughter, Jane Longshaw, was the only child of their marriage.

The testator died on the 5th of October 1844, leaving several children; two attained twenty-one in the life of the testator. The remaining children afterwards attained twenty-one. The testator's widow had not married again.

The annual income arising from the testator's estate was more than sufficient to satisfy the annuities payable to the widow and Mary Nuttall. Three questions were raised:—the first, at what time the shares of the testator's children were to vest; the second, at what period the gift over to the issue of children was to take effect, in the event of their dying leaving issue; the third, whether the settlement made by the testator upon the marriage of his daughter was a satisfaction pro tanto of her share given by the will.

tator, by his will, gives an annuity of 500*l.* a year to his wife, with a direction that in case of her marriage the annuity shall be reduced to an annuity of 100*l.* a year; he then gives powers of advancement to the children, and directs that upon the youngest of the children attaining twenty-one, the property shall be divided amongst them, subject to the annuity of 100*l.* a year to his wife if married again; and he also directs that upon each of his children attaining twenty-one, he shall have 500*l.* Now, the point upon the question of vesting appears to be whether this clause, which directs a division of the property, is only to take effect after the death or marriage of the widow, or whether it is to take effect absolutely upon the youngest of the children attaining twenty-one; whether the only mode of reading this will, without inconsistency, is to say that this clause is to take effect only upon the death or marriage of the widow, and that it is not to take effect absolutely on the youngest child attaining twenty-one. When the whole of the will is read together, although undoubtedly some of its provisions are peculiar, and in many respects inconsistent, its effect appears to be this: the testator, in the first place, gives a direction that the trustees are to stand possessed of all his property, and to pay out of the income an annuity of 500*l.* a year to his wife for her life, or until she shall marry again; the surplus is to be accumulated in order to provide a fund for the advancement of the children, and this is to go on as long as the annuity continues, and there is nothing whatever to limit its duration. Then the will goes on, "and from and immediately after the death or marriage again of my said wife, then upon further trust to apply such part of the said rents, interest and annual proceeds for the maintenance, education and advancement in life of all my child and children, as shall be then under the age of twenty-one years, as they in their discretion shall see necessary and proper." Now, stopping here, it is quite clear what is to take place; if the widow shall marry again, or shall die, and any of the children are under age, then the trustees are to perform the duties and functions of providing for the maintenance and education of the children; and the widow, if she shall marry again, is not to interfere with that matter. The will then goes on, "And when the youngest of my said children shall attain the said age, then upon further trust to call in all my monies, and pay, divide, distribute and convey all my property between my children, share and share alike, save and except so much as will secure to my said wife (if she shall be then alive and married) an annuity or yearly sum of 100*l.* hereinafter mentioned." If I read this clause as it stands, the annuity of 500*l.* a year to the wife is to be cut down to an annuity of 100*l.* merely because the youngest of the children shall have attained twenty-one. It is obvious that cannot be the meaning of the testator. If it is meant that the property is to be absolutely divided upon the youngest of his children attaining twenty-one, either these words respecting the 100*l.* a year must be omitted, or the testator himself must have omitted some such words as, "but in case she shall not be married again, subject to the annuity of 500*l.* a year"; but the testator has not said so, and I cannot introduce those words. If the words "after the death or marriage again of my wife" govern the whole sentence the will is consistent, because in that event if she is dead and the youngest of the children shall have attained twenty-one, the property is to be divided; or if she is alive and married again, the capital necessary for providing for the annuity of 100*l.* is to be set aside, and at her death the principal of the annuity is to be equally divided among the children; and then he directs, that in case the children cannot agree as to the division of the estate, it is to be sold by the trustees. The testator goes on thus: "and in case of the death of any of my said children leaving lawful issue, him, her or them surviving, then it is my will and mind that the share or shares of such deceased parent or parents shall go to the child or children of such parents." Now I pass over that for a moment. "Provided always, that in case my said wife shall marry again, I direct the said annuity or yearly sum of 500*l.* shall cease, and in lieu thereof I give her an annuity of 100*l.*," shewing that he must have intended to provide for this event in the clause which relates to the division of the property on the youngest child attaining twenty-one;

and then he says, that "on each of my said children attaining the age of twenty-one years, I direct the sum of 500*l.* shall be paid to him or her so coming of age, and out of accumulations of my property, which will have accumulated beyond my said wife's annuity of 500*l.*," and he gives power to the trustees, with the consent of the wife, if she shall be then a widow, to advance in the world such son or daughter so coming of age, and then both the sum of 500*l.* and the other sums for advancement are to be deducted out of their shares. The meaning of the will therefore seems to be clear—the widow is to have 500*l.* a year for her life if she does not marry again, and in that event according as every child attains twenty-one his share becomes absolutely vested, and therefore he receives 500*l.*, and the trustees may allow a further sum for the advancement of that child, and this is to go on until the death of the widow, and then upon the youngest child attaining twenty-one the whole of the fund is to be divided among all the children, each of them bringing into hotchpot the sums they may have already received; but if the widow marry again, though it is true that up to the time of the youngest child attaining twenty-one, those clauses with respect to the elder children receiving 500*l.*, and being advanced in life are in force, yet upon the youngest child attaining twenty-one the division is to take place. The will, therefore, does not require that any words should be added to or taken from it to make it consistent, and though in some events its provisions may be inconvenient, as it suspends the distribution of the fund until after the death or marriage of the widow, yet the Court cannot avoid that conclusion if the testator has expressly so directed it.

Upon the second question I am of opinion, upon the authority of the cases which I considered very fully in Edwards v. Edwards, that the period which is referred to by the words "in case of the death of any of my said children leaving lawful issue," is the death before the period of distribution, that is, before the youngest child shall have attained twenty-one, if the mother shall have married again, or before her death, in case of her death without marrying again.

Upon the question whether there was an advancement by the testator to his daughter upon her marriage, I have no doubt. The case of Lord Thynne v. the Earl of Glengall is decisive on the point, and removes any doubt as to whether the doctrine of satisfaction did not affect any case where residue was given, and it is impossible to draw that distinction which was advanced in argument on behalf of Mr. and Mrs. Longshaw, that though it would be a satisfaction where the will followed the advancement, it did not hold where the advancement followed the will. There is, however, no such distinction. The testator must be taken to have known what he had done by the will which he had previously executed, and whether the previous instrument was a will or a deed does not affect the question of advancement; this lady, therefore, must be put to elect whether she will take under the will or under her settlement. If she elects to take under the will she must bring into hotchpot the amount paid for her advancement.

Company—Powers of Directors—Cancellation of Shares—Demurrer.

Directors of a company subscribed for a large number of shares in their respective names, but they paid the deposit upon a small number only. At a board they resolved to cancel the shares upon which they had paid no deposit, and they also purchased the shares of another director who desired to retire, and paid for them out of the funds of the company. At a general meeting the shareholders confirmed the resolution. Upon a bill of some of the shareholders, alleging that these acts were not authorized either by the constitution of the company or by the deed of settlement, and that they were a fraud upon the shareholders—Held, at the Rolls, upon demurrer, that the allegations were sufficient to support the bill, and that the demurrer must be overruled (1); and this decision was affirmed on appeal.

The National Live Stock Insurance Company was established in the year 1853, for insuring the owners of horses, cattle and other live stock against loss from the death of or injury from accidental causes to the property insured. The capital was to be 250,000*l.* in 100,000 shares of 2*l.* 10*s.* each, with a deposit of 10*s.* per share. The deed of settlement was subscribed by various persons for 65,000 shares, and the company was completely registered on the 14th of September 1853.

The business of the company did not succeed, and a dividend declared for the half-year ending the 30th of June 1854 was paid out of the capital of the company.

George Hodgkinson, in his own name, subscribed for 1,200 shares, and in the name of his wife for 1,000 shares more. William Henry Turner and Thomas Sheffield subscribed for 1,000 shares each, and they all paid the deposit.

The directors of the company consisted of Edward Johnstone, who subscribed for 4,000 shares, John Thomas Croft, James Fennell, Robert Garland and Thomas Vaughan, who each subscribed for 2,000 shares, and John Moss, Edmond Sheppard Symes and Edward Lloyd, who each subscribed for 1,000 shares, but they each only paid the deposit upon 500 of such shares, though in the reports made to the company it was represented that the deposit had been paid upon the whole of the shares subscribed for.

The bill was filed, by G. Hodgkinson, on behalf of himself and his wife, and by Messrs. Turner and Sheffield, on behalf of themselves and all the other shareholders of the company, except the defendants, against the company and the directors and against William Gee, William Tanner Chave and John Trex, who had previously filed a bill against the directors, complaining of their acts, which they had afterwards compromised, to obtain a declaration that the cancellation of various shares made by them were wholly illegal, fraudulent and void against the plaintiffs and the other shareholders of the company, and praying that the defendants might be decreed to pay the amount due for the deposit and calls in respect of such shares, and that it might be declared that the purchase by the defendants of 560 shares in the company out of its funds was fraudulent and void, and that the defendants might be decreed to make good the sum paid by them in respect thereof. The bill also prayed that in the mean time the defendants might be restrained from making any calls to pay the debts of the company.

The bill stated, paragraph 19, that, "In the latter part of the year 1853 the defendant Edward Johnstone, who had paid the deposit on 500 shares of the 4,000 shares for which he had subscribed the deed of settlement, was desirous of retiring from the company, and in fraud of the plaintiffs and the other shareholders of the company other than the defendants, the directors, agreed with the other defendants, his co-directors, that he should be exonerated from all liability in respect of the 4,000 shares for which he had subscribed the deed of settlement as aforesaid, and that he should be deemed to be, and should be made to appear as the holder of 500 shares in the said company, and upon which he had paid the deposit, and that the company out of its funds should purchase of the defendant Edward Johnstone such 500 shares, and that he should transfer the same to the company, or some nominee or trustee on its behalf, and that some provision should be made to indemnify him from the consequences of having subscribed the said deed of settlement for 4,000 shares."

The plaintiffs, upon an investigation made in March 1858, for the first time, discovered that 280*l.*, part of the funds of the company, had been paid to the defendant Edward Johnstone by the directors for the purchase of the 500 shares, part of the 4,000 shares for which he had subscribed the deed of settlement, and of 60 other shares of which he had become the holder and on which the deposit had been paid. This payment was authorised by a resolution of the defendants, the directors, dated the 14th of January 1856.

The 22nd paragraph stated "In February 1856, to carry into effect the said arrangement for the release of the defendant Edward Johnstone, the defendants, the directors, agreed to, and in fraud of the plaintiffs and other shareholders did cancel 3,500 shares of the company, being the residue of the 4,000 shares for which the defendant Edward Johnstone had subscribed the deed of settlement as aforesaid, and the deposit whereon he had not paid; the defendants, the directors, in fraud of the plaintiffs and the other shareholders, agreed to and did cancel the 1,500 shares for which the said several defendants other than Edward Johnstone had respectively subscribed."

No return was made by the defendants, the directors, to the registrar of joint-stock companies of the cancellation of such shares until the month of March 1858, and the defendants appeared as the registered owners. Upon the discovery of these facts, a requisition was sent to the directors, to call an extraordinary general meeting of the shareholders, to consider the position of the company. On the 27th of March 1858 the directors, with a view, as the bill alleged, to frustrate any inquiry into these matters, made a call of 5s. a share on the capital of the company, payable on or before the 28th of April 1858, and in compliance with the requisition of the shareholders, convened an extraordinary general meeting of the shareholders, for the 4th of May 1858 (being six days after the call was made payable); at which meeting the shareholders of the company who had not previously paid such call would be, according to the terms of the said deed of settlement, prevented from voting or taking part in the proceedings. The plaintiffs, not having paid up the said call of 5s. per share, were consequently disqualified from attending and voting at such meeting. The meeting confirmed the purchase and cancellation of the shares.

The 51st paragraph of the bill stated that "The cancellation by the said defendants, the directors, of the shares for which they severally subscribed the said deed of settlement, was illegal and fraudulent and void as against the plaintiffs and the other shareholders in the said company, other than the defendants, the directors."

The 52nd paragraph stated, "The purchase by the defendants, the directors, on behalf of the company, and payment therefor, out of the funds of the company of the 560 shares in the company of the defendant Edward Johnstone, was a fraud upon the plaintiffs and the other shareholders of the company, and was not authorized by the constitution thereof, or by the provisions of the deed of settlement; and the plaintiffs insist that the defendants, the directors, have, by their acts and from and under the circumstances aforesaid, rendered themselves and are jointly and severally liable to make good to or for the benefit of the company and the shareholders therein, all sums of money paid or applied by the defendants, the directors, in or towards the payment for the shares; and that they are in like manner jointly and severally liable to the company and the shareholders therein for the deposit of 10s. per share."

Three demurrers were filed to this bill for want of equity and for want of parties, one on behalf of the company, and two on behalf of the directors and the other defendants.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I think this demurrer must be overruled. There are several matters on which I do not wish to express any opinion until the whole case is gone into, but the conclusion which I have come to, upon the point which has been principally argued, viz., the cancellation of the shares, looking at the allegations in the bill in the fairest way I can, is, that it is a subject-matter that could not be confirmed by a general meeting. I refer to the nineteenth and fifty-second paragraphs of the bill. It was suggested, taking everything most strongly against the pleader, that there must be taken to be no prohibition against the purchase and cancellation of the shares, but the allegation is, that this was not authorized by the constitution of the company or by the deed of settlement, because the directors could not do it unless it was authorized by the constitution of the company or by the deed of settlement, and if it was not authorized by either, and could not be, then that it was a matter which could not be confirmed by a general meeting. It is unnecessary to say anything upon Foss v. Harbottle, as I have always followed it. There is, therefore, a sufficient allegation to support the bill; but it is impossible to ascertain the extent of the other allegations until the hearing of the cause. The demurrer must be overruled, but the costs must be reserved.

June 14.—From this decision the directors appealed. The same counsel appeared as upon the original hearing. In addition to the cases cited at the Rolls, the following were referred to:—

Moxley v. Alston, 1 Phill. 790; s. c.

The York and North Midland Railway

Company v. Hudson, 18 Beav. 485;

s. c. 23 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 695.

Counsel for the respondents were not called upon. The substance of the appellants' argument is stated in the judgment.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE said that this was a bill by principals against their agents, seeking to be relieved against a fraud, which, as the former contended, was sufficiently alleged in the bill, to have been committed by the agents. Of course, if this description was accurate, a demurrer was out of the question. It was suggested that the alleged frauds were remediable in such a manner under the provisions of the deed of settlement as to exclude or destroy the remedy of the shareholders. It might be that the deed of settlement contained such provisions, but as the deed of settlement appeared upon the bill, it appeared clearly that it contained no such clause. The Master of the Rolls thought the demurrer excluded by the 19th and 52nd sections, to which his Lordship would add the 21st, 28th, 37th, 51st and 54th. It was conceded at the bar, and rightly conceded, that if the bill was sustainable against any of the defendants, it was sustainable against all; but it was very properly suggested by Mr. Cooper, that if the bill was sustainable on the merits there were other persons who ought to be defendants here, and that those persons who had paid the call of 5s. per share ought to be represented. He (the Lord Justice) was not satisfied that if these parties were before the Court, it would affect the question, independently of the thirty-seventh paragraph; and the thirty-seventh paragraph alleged ignorance on the plaintiffs' part of the names of the parties, and stated that they were known to the directors. If the ignorance alleged by the plaintiffs was of a fact which they were bound to know, they could not allege that as an excuse; but here it was ignorance of a fact which they were not bound to know.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER added that it was quite unnecessary to go beyond the fifty-second paragraph of the bill, which was as follows:—"The purchase by the defendants, the directors, on behalf of the company, and payment therefor out of the funds of the company of the 560 shares in the said company of the defendant Edward Johnstone, was a fraud upon the plaintiffs and the other shareholders of the company, and was not authorized by the constitution thereof, or by the provisions of the said deed of settlement; and the plaintiffs insist that the defendants, the directors, have by their acts, and from and under the circumstances aforesaid, rendered themselves and are jointly and severally liable to make good to or for the benefit of the said company and the shareholders therein, all sums of money paid or applied by the said defendants in or towards the payment for the said shares." As to the argument that the directors derived authority under the general act, his Lordship was not aware of any enactment which sanctioned directors to enter into transactions of this description when they did not derive that authority under their own act or their deed of settlement.

After some further discussion it was arranged and ordered that the defendants should have six months' time to answer the bill.

May 7, 11. } HUNT v. ELMES.

Production of Deeds—Mortgagee—Purchaser without Notice.

A defendant by his answer stating that he was a purchaser for value without notice, is not bound to produce the title-deeds of an estate to a mortgagee whose security preceded the purchase, though the bill charged that the deeds were fraudulently retained by the mortgagor.

If the defendant, in his answer, sets out partially the conveyance made to his vendor, he must produce the deed to verify the statement.

A summons was taken out in chambers to compel the defendant to produce divers deeds and papers, admitted by his answer to be in his possession. It was adjourned into court.

The bill was filed, by a mortgagee of certain freehold premises, praying for a declaration, that the defendant's right (if any) to the premises might be subject to the plaintiff's charge, and that he might be decreed to pay to the plaintiff what was due to him.

The plaintiff's mortgage was made by David Hughes, the then owner of the estate, and he subsequently sold the premises in question to the defendant.

The bill stated that the mortgagor was the solicitor of the plaintiff when he executed the mortgage, and that the plaintiff employed no other solicitor in the transaction; that the mortgage included other estates, and that the mortgagor, after the execution of the mortgage-deed, sent a bundle of deeds to the plaintiff, on which was indorsed "Deeds and mortgage of premises, situate at," &c., and naming both the estates; that the plaintiff at the time omitted to examine the deeds; but that subsequently he discovered that the defendant claimed one of the estates, and also that the deeds relating to that estate had been kept back by the mortgagor.

By his answer, the defendant denied that he had any knowledge of the plaintiff's mortgage at the time he purchased the estate in question; and he claimed to be a purchaser of the estate for valuable consideration, without notice of the plaintiff's claim.

The deeds were delivered up to him at the time of the completion of the purchase, and he insisted on his right to priority, both as to the deeds and the estate. In answer to an interrogatory with reference to the purchase of the estate by the mortgagor, he said, "that by an indenture, dated the 30th of May 1854, a piece of freehold land at Maryland Point, near Stratford, in the parish of West Ham, in the county of Essex, with five unfinished houses then in course of erection thereon (the premises in question), were, in consideration of 700*l.* therein expressed to be paid by the said David Hughes, conveyed to the said David Hughes for an estate in fee simple, and that the said land and houses were more particularly described in the said last-mentioned indenture, and I have no reason to doubt the truth thereof; but I do not otherwise know it to be the fact, that the said David Hughes purchased the said last-mentioned premises by public auction, at the Auction Mart, in the city of London, on the 7th of October 1852, for the sum of 700*l*."

The answer to the interrogatory, requiring documents in the defendant's possession to be set out, was:—"And I say that the documents mentioned in the second part of the said schedule are the title-deeds and muniments of title relating to the fee simple and inheritance of the said land and houses at Maryland Point aforesaid; and I am advised and I verily believe that the plaintiff has not any right or title to the production of, or any interest in, the documents, papers and writings in the said second part of the said schedule mentioned, or any of them; and I object to produce the same, or any of them."

Mr. Swenson, for the plaintiff.—The conveyance to Hughes has been partially stated in the answer. The defendant is therefore bound to produce it; and as to the other deeds, the refusal to produce them is unsupported by any sufficient claim.

Mr. Godfrey, for the defendant.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS—after reading the answer:—I think the defendant has sufficiently claimed protection from the production of all the documents required to be produced, except one. The defence is, that he is a purchaser for value without notice, and he sets up this defence by his answer; and then having stated that he has set out in the second part of the schedule certain documents, he says that they are the muniments of his title, and that he is advised that the plaintiff has no right to the production of, or any interest in, the documents, and he objects to produce them. Certainly the facts are not very strongly put in the answer, and they must be taken most strongly against the pleader; but I think that there is good ground for giving effect to the privilege from production, and that a case is sufficiently stated. With regard to the conveyance of the 30th of May 1854, to David Hughes, the mortgagor, which the defendant has admitted and referred to by his answer, on the principle of Latimer v. Neale (1), by which I am bound (though it has been doubted), I think that the defendant must produce it to satisfy the defendant of the correctness of the statement.

KINDERSLEY, V.C. } LAWRENCE v.
Feb. 28. } MAULE.

Practice—Evidence—Affidavits filed in former Proceedings—Services on the Attorney General.

One of the partners in a firm died intestate, and in a suit for winding up the partnership affairs, a sum of money was paid into court. The intestate was also possessed of two other sums of stock, which were transferred to the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, since no next-of-kin of the intestate could be found. A claimant came forward as next-of-kin, and presented a petition in the partnership suit, claiming the money standing to the separate account of the intestate. In that suit nine affidavits were filed. The same claimant presented a petition praying for a transfer of the sums paid to the Commissioners, when nineteen affidavits were filed. On this petition the Attorney General appeared, as representing the Crown and the Commissioners. Letters of administration were then granted to the solicitor for the Treasury, as nominee of the Crown, and a suit was instituted against him by the representatives of the first claimant, to prove his relationship to the intestate. Another claimant also came forward in this suit, by whom one affidavit was filed. The persons who made the affidavits were all dead:—Held, that evidence produced on a former occasion could only be made use of in subsequent proceedings, between the same parties and upon the same issue. Upon this principle, the nine affidavits in the partnership suit and the one affidavit in the present suit by a different claimant, were rejected, but the nineteen affidavits on the petition were admitted.

The Attorney General having been served, under the 56 Geo. 3. c. 60, must be presumed to have represented the Crown and the National Debt Commissioners and the beneficial interests of the Crown.

This was an adjourned summons upon a question as to whether certain affidavits filed upon former occasions were to be admitted as evidence upon this hearing, the deponents in such affidavits being all dead.

The facts were as follows:—John Lawrence, a native of England, died in America in the year 1814, intestate. At the time of his death he was a partner in the firm of Sparling, Boulden & Lawrence, and his share of the partnership assets amounted to about 20,000*l.* He also died possessed of two sums of stock amounting to 17,749*l.* and 3,000*l.* A suit entitled Wilding v. Boulden was then instituted for the purpose of winding up the partnership, and the next-of-kin of John Lawrence not being known, advertisements were issued for such next-of-kin, and in consequence of these advertisements several persons sent in claims, and three of them, named Diana Kemp and Matthew and Elizabeth Wilkinson, took out administration to the estate of John Lawrence in May 1828, upon their claiming to be cousins of the intestate. It appeared that the sum found to be due to the intestate, upon the partnership account in the cause of Wilding v. Boulden, was transferred to his separate account, and the two sums of stock, namely, the 17,749*l.* and the 3,000*l.*, were transferred, under the statute 56 Geo. 3.

c. 60, to the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt. A petition was then presented, by Diana Kemp and M. and E. Wilkinson, for payment out of court of the sum of money standing to the separate account of J. Lawrence; and on that petition, in the suit of Wilding v. Boulden, nine affidavits were filed.

Another petition was presented, by Diana Kemp and the Wilkinsons, entitled In re Lawrence, for the re-transfer to them of the two sums of stock so transferred to the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, and an order was made referring it to the Master to inquire who were the parties beneficially entitled to these sums. Upon this petition the Attorney General appeared both for the Commissioners for Reduction of the National Debt and for the Crown. When the matter was before the Master, the petitioners, Diana Kemp and the two Wilkinsons, carried in a claim to be beneficially entitled to the fund, and in support of their case nineteen affidavits were filed. No report was made upon this inquiry. Proceedings were then taken in the Prerogative Court for the purpose of revoking the letters of administration so granted to D. Kemp and the Wilkinsons, and the same were revoked, and letters of administration were granted to Mr. Maule, as nominee of the Crown.

This suit was then instituted in 1835, by William Lawrence and others, claiming to be next-of-kin of the intestate, against Mr. Maule, and an order of reference was made in January 1838, to inquire who were the next-of-kin. Various claims were carried in before the Master, and in one of them, which failed, an affidavit of Sarah Hemingsley, filed on the 31st of October 1843, was used.

John Bryan and Susannah his wife, as legal representatives of Matthew Wilkinson, subsequently carried in a claim, and in support of their claim they tendered as evidence before the Master the nine affidavits made in the cause of Wilding v. Boulden, the nineteen affidavits filed in Re Lawrence and the affidavit of Sarah Hemingsley filed in this suit of Lawrence v. Maule. The Master refused to receive all these various affidavits, and the claim was disallowed. To that report the claimants excepted, and the case having been continued in chambers, the question as to the reception of the affidavits now came on for argument, upon adjournment from chambers.

Mr. Anderson and Mr. Toulmin appeared in support of the exceptions, and submitted that the whole of the affidavits ought to be received in evidence. The parties now before the Court were virtually representing the same interest as when the affidavits were filed, and the issue was, in fact, the same as that which had before been raised. They cited—

Trevelyan v. Fraser, cited in 1 Taylor on Evidence, 410.

Mr. Wickens, on behalf of the Attorney General, appeared for the Crown and for the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt.

[The VICE CHANCELLOR intimated that he should not require any argument as to the admission of the nine affidavits.]

As to the remaining affidavits they were none of them used between the same parties. The present claimants had an adverse interest, and were not represented on the former occasion, and the beneficial interest in the Crown was not represented. The affidavit made by Sarah Hemingsley was made upon a claim which failed, and upon the rejection of a claim all evidence relating to it was thrown out of the office. Moreover, the evidence was taken under the old practice, when there was not power of cross-examination, and as the witnesses were now dead, they could not be cross-examined under the rules at present in force.

Mr. Anderson was heard in reply.

KINDERSLEY, V.C. — There are three classes of affidavits to be considered in this case. With regard to the nineteen which were filed in Re Lawrence, I think I ought to admit them as evidence, but I must reject the nine made in the suit of Wilding v. Boulden, and the one affidavit made by Mrs. Hemingsley in the present suit. The general rule as to the admission of evidence is, that where an issue is raised between parties in a court of competent jurisdiction, and evidence has been given upon that issue by either of the parties against the other, and if in subsequent proceedings there is the same issue between the same parties, and the witnesses who gave the evidence in the former proceeding have died, the Court will admit the evidence given by the deceased witnesses in the former, as evidence in the subsequent proceeding. But the evidence is not admissible unless the issue is the same, and the parties are the same, in both proceedings. The issue in this case is whether Matthew Wilkinson was next-of-kin or one of the next-of-kin of John Lawrence, the intestate, at the time of his death. It is an issue in the strict sense of the term, because it admits of an affirmation on the one side and of a denial on the other. Then what was the issue which was raised in Re Lawrence in the year 1828, in which the nineteen affidavits were filed? That was a proceeding under the statute 56 Geo. 3. c. 60, for the purpose of getting back from the National Debt Commissioners a sum of consols which had stood in the name of the intestate at the time of his death, and which had under the provisions of that act been transferred to them. That act of parliament authorizes applications to be made by the persons claiming to be entitled. Two persons named Wilkinson, of whom the said Matthew Wilkinson was one, and a person named Diana Kemp, who had obtained letters of administration to the intestate's estate, presented a petition under the act, asking that the sums of money which had belonged to the intestate, and which had been transferred into the names of the Commissioners, might be re-transferred to them, they claiming to be entitled thereto as his next-of-kin. Upon that petition an order was made for an inquiry as to what stock was standing in the name of the intestate, and as to the persons who were beneficially entitled to the same, and in the course of the proceedings upon that order the nineteen affidavits were made. So far as regards Matthew Wilkinson being one of the next-of-kin, there was the same issue on that inquiry as there is in the present proceeding; for in both we have an affirmation on the one side that Matthew Wilkinson was one of the next-of-kin, which is denied on the other.

The next question is, are the parties to that issue the same as the parties to the present issue? The parties now before the Court are the representatives of Matthew Wilkinson, who assert that he was the intestate's next-of-kin and the intestate's legal personal representative. That legal personal representative is Mr. Maule, who is the nominee and trustee of the Crown, to whom administration was granted upon the footing that, as it did not appear that there were any next-of-kin, the Crown was beneficially entitled to the estate; and it was upon that footing only that Mr. Maule was constituted the legal personal representative. I adhere to what I held in the case of Edgar v. Reynolds, that where the grant of administration is made to the nominee of the Crown, that nominee is as regards third persons liable like any other legal personal representative to the claims of all parties. In that case I made the legal personal representative liable for interest on balances. But as between the administrator and the Crown the matter is different, for there the administrator cannot be heard to say that he is not a trustee for the Crown. It was, indeed, unnecessary to have had upon the record any person representing the Crown; but in chambers, as in the Master's office formerly, the Crown would have been required to be present, because where the Crown is beneficial owner it is always represented. The issue in the present case is between the claimant and the Crown, the claimant insisting that he is next-of-kin and the Crown insisting that he is not, and the parties were in fact the same in Re Lawrence. Upon the position of the Attorney General there is also a fair question. By the act 56 Geo. 3. c. 60. it is required, that where a petition is presented under that act, there shall be service on the Commissioners and on the Attorney General, but the act does not state in what capacity the Attorney General is to be served. Prima facie it would appear that service on the Commissioners is sufficient protection to the public, as their interest is to make the fund as large as possible. When the Attorney General is required to be served, it is, I presume, to represent the Crown. It may be that the Crown has no pecuniary interest, and then the Attorney General represents the public, but only through the Crown, which protects public interests. The Attorney General, however, when he is served, must represent the Crown in every interest, and he would fail in his duty if he did not. If there should be a case in which the public and private interests of the Crown should conflict, then the separate interests would be represented by different counsel. In this case the same solicitor and counsel appear for the Crown and for the Commissioners of the National Debt, but that is because the two have the same interest. It appears to me that the Crown was before the Court in Re Lawrence in the same capacity in which it is before me now in this case, and, therefore, that not only the issue is the same, but the parties also are the same in both proceedings.

When the affidavits in question were brought in, the practice in the Master's office was, at one of the preliminary meetings to determine in what way the evidence should be taken, whether by interrogatories or affidavit or vidé voce; and if neither of the parties objected, the Master directed the evidence to be taken by affidavit, and all those affidavits were good evidence with regard to the parties to that proceeding. Now a change has taken place, for although all the proceedings in the Judge's chambers are by affidavit, there is now a power to cross-examine witnesses. If the evidence was good at the time it was given, it appears to me that the subsequent change in the practice does not make the evidence bad. I must, therefore, admit the nineteen affidavits filed in Re Lawrence. With regard to the affidavits filed in the suit of Wilding v. Boulden, there was in that case neither the same issue nor the same parties as in the present, and I must therefore reject them.

With regard to the one affidavit filed in the present cause, prima facie the evidence in a cause must be received as against all parties, but in this case there has been an inquiry as to who are the next-of-kin of the intestate, and several persons have come forward. When one person comes in there is an issue between him and the Crown, and when another comes forward there is an issue between that other and the Crown, but the two issues are different as they are between different parties, and they may have totally different cases. As between one party and the Crown there might be an affidavit filed which the Crown may not think it necessary to answer, as he may have beaten himself upon his own shewing. Surely then a second claimant cannot be allowed to use that affidavit upon a different issue between different parties. I think, therefore, that I must reject the one affidavit, upon the same principle that I reject the nine affidavits and admit the nineteen.

Baron and Feme—Separate Estate—Breach of Trust.

Property settled to the separate use of a married woman, without power of anticipation, cannot be applied to make good a breach of trust committed by her; and the circumstance that she herself was the settlor makes no difference.

The bill in this case was filed for the purpose of obtaining the directions of the Court with a view to recovering or replacing a pearl necklace, which had been settled to the separate use of one of the defendants, a married woman, for life, with remainder over, and had been first pledged and then sold by her. The question was, whether other property which had been settled to her separate use, without power of anticipation, could be made available for the purpose of replacing the value. The circumstances of the case are fully stated in the judgment.

Mr. Wickes appeared for the plaintiff; and
Mr. Southgate, for the defendants.

The cases cited were—

Jackson v. Hobhouse, 2 Mer. 483.
Robinson v. Wheelerwright, 6 De Gex,
 M. & G. 535; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep.
 (N.S.) Chanc. 385.
Barrow v. Barrow, 4 Kay & J. 409;
 s. c. 27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc.

WOOD, V.C.—The point that arises in this case is a very singular one, although it depends upon a short state of facts. A settlement was made by three several indentures of even dates, on the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Carew, the defendants, and amongst other articles settled there were a number of trinkets and jewels, one of which was a pearl necklace, stated by the deed to be of the estimated value of 1,000*l*. This was settled for the benefit of Mrs. Carew, for life, with remainder to her first or only son. The rest of the articles in the settlement were settled simply to her separate use. Besides that, however, she had, by one of the other indentures of even date, an interest given to her in certain freehold and leasehold estates of considerable value, the rents of which were to be paid to her for her separate use, without power of anticipation. The pearl necklace being a chattel of considerable value, and being thus limited to her for life, with remainder to her children, of course she was entitled to the use of it for her life; it was placed, therefore, in her custody. In this state of things she first pawned and then sold the necklace, in consequence of difficulties in which her husband was placed by his bankruptcy. The question, therefore, arises whether or not her property settled to her separate use, and the other property settled without power of anticipation, can be applied, under the direction of the Court, to make good the breach of trust on her part. I have not any doubt whatever about the property settled to her own separate use. As to that she is a feme sole, and the breach of trust must be answered out of that property, just as much as a breach of trust committed by a male or by a single woman. The real difficulty has been as to the property settled to her separate use, without power of anticipation, and I confess the case is novel, and I feel considerable difficulty in it. On the one hand, the observations made by Lord Eldon, in Jackson v. Hobhouse, are very cogent, namely, that if you say that a fraud committed by a married woman is to entitle those who are affected by it, to insist upon having any loss occasioned thereby made good out of property settled to her separate use, without power of anticipation, the husband has only by the marital control to secure the committal of the fraud by the wife, in order to obtain the benefit of the property settled without power of anticipation, and thus disappoint the intention of the settlor. On the other hand, the intention of the settlor, in a case like this, is, of course, just as strong, that the property settled in a particular mode shall go in that direction in which she has settled it, as that she shall have this power of receiving the income of the estate, without power of anticipation. The question becomes extremely nicely balanced as to what is the proper course to take with regard to a case so circumstanced. The circumstance here, that she herself was the settlor, I do not think is material, or that it makes a material distinction between this case and Jackson v. Hobhouse. The Court protects a married woman in respect of her coverture against the marital control in the most effective manner, and that protection has been extended to giving effect to clauses in restraint of anticipation; so that during the coverture she shall be in a state in which it would be impossible for her to deal with the property so settled. The length to which the Court has carried that protection is shewn in a late case before the Lords Justices (Robinson v. Wheelwright), where it was held, that although there was a very great benefit given by a will to a lady, on condition of giving up property thus settled of far less value, yet the Court could not, on her behalf, assist her in dealing with it, although for a much more valuable consideration. I think, upon the whole, that the better course is to adhere to the rule laid down by Lord Eldon, in Jackson v. Hobhouse, that is to say, that the Court, having once authorized this species of protection to a married woman, it is impossible for her, in any way whatever, to deal with the fund. The Court must hold her right and interest in the fund protected, even against her own acts, regard being had to the degree of influence and control which, during the coverture, must be supposed to be exercised over these acts by her husband. Accordingly, therefore, I have come to the conclusion, that I can only affect the property held simply to her separate use. As to the rest, liberty must be given to apply on the coverture determining, because, should she survive her husband, there may be a possibility of reaching this fund, as the restraint upon anticipation will then be removed. "Declare, that the several jewels and other chattels mentioned in the schedule to the first of the three several indentures of settlement, bearing date respectively the 6th of July 1855, in the bill mentioned, other than the pearl necklace therein mentioned, or such of them as now remain in the possession or subject to the control of the defendant Mary Fanny Carew, or her husband, are chargeable with, and liable to make good the costs hereafter directed to be taxed and paid, and the value of the pearl necklace, improperly sold by the defendant Mary Fanny Carew, but that her interest under the said indenture of settlement in the trust property limited to her separate use for life, with restraint on her anticipation, is not so liable during the present coverture."

Statute of Mortmain—Shares in Railway on Lease—Costs in Equity—Administration Suit.

A bequest for charitable purposes of shares in a railway company, which, at the testator's death, had granted a lease of its railway property and undertaking for 999 years to another railway company at a fixed rent, and with an option of purchasing on notice,—Held, not to be void under the Statute of Mortmain.

Charge by testator of his funeral and testamentary expenses upon a particular portion of his property specified in his will:—Held, not sufficient to justify the Court in throwing upon that specified portion the costs of a suit for the general administration of the testator's estate.

Matthew Turner, the testator in the cause, by his will, dated in October 1853, gave all his real estate, and all such parts of his personal estate as he was not by law allowed to bequeath for charitable purposes, upon trust to sell the same, and to stand possessed of the nett monies to arise therefrom, upon trust, in the first place, to keep the said monies, and which monies were thereafter denominated his "general fund," separate and apart from the principal monies thereafter mentioned, and called his "charity fund"; and, in the next place, to pay and apply his general fund in liquidation of his just debts, and of all the legacies thereafter bequeathed. The testator then, after bequeathing certain annuities and legacies, directed that, if his general fund should be insufficient, after payment of his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, to pay all the annuities and pecuniary legacies chargeable thereon in full, all such annuities and pecuniary legacies should abate proportionally, according to the amount thereof, but that no part whatever of his charity fund should be appropriated towards the payment of them; and he directed that if his general fund should be more than sufficient for payment of such annuities and pecuniary legacies, the surplus of his general fund should be divided amongst the legatees, payable out of such general fund proportionally, according to the amount of their respective legacies or annuities.

The testator then gave and bequeathed all his printed books, household furniture, and all such his monies and securities for money, and other parts of his personal estate and effects whatsoever and where-soever not thereinbefore bequeathed, as might lawfully be bequeathed by him for charitable purposes, unto the said trustees, together with another person therein named, whom he called his charity trustees, upon trust to keep the same separate and distinct from the proceeds of the sale of his real estate, and such parts of his personal estate as could not be lawfully applied to charitable purposes, and, as soon as conveniently might be after his decease, to sell the same and dispose of the monies and proceeds to arise from such sale, according to the trusts thereafter declared.

The testator, after giving certain other directions, declared that his charity fund should be held by his charity trustees, upon trust that the same should be distributed by his said trustees and the mayor of Beverley, and the vicar of St. Mary's, Beverley, for the time being, for the benefit of honest and deserving domestic female servants living within eight miles of the Guildhall of Beverley, in the manner and subject to the regulations in the will expressly declared and provided.

The testator died in July 1856, and the present suit was instituted by some of the parties interested under the will to have the trusts of such will carried into execution under the decree of the Court.

Amongst the property of which the estate of the testator consisted were included forty-seven shares of 50*l.* each, in the Hull and Selby Railway Company, and a sum of money arising from dividends in respect of such shares. The chief clerk had found, by his certificate, that these shares and the amount of dividends thereon did not form part of the "charity fund" mentioned in the testator's will, inasmuch as, being property of the nature of impure personal estate, they could not be bequeathed for charitable purposes.

The case now came on before his Honour for further consideration of the Court, upon the question (amongst others), whether these shares and dividends formed part of the testator's "charity fund," as being property unaffected by the Statute of Mortmain, and, consequently, applicable to charitable purposes.

It appeared that the Hull and Selby Railway Company was incorporated in 1836, by an act of the 6 Will. 4. c. lxxx., the 114th section of which enacted, that "all the shares in the said undertaking, or the joint stock or fund of the said company shall, to all intents and purposes, be deemed personal estate, and transmissible as such, and shall not be deemed to be of the nature of real property." By the statute 9 & 10 Vict. cap. ccxli., passed in 1846, the Hull and Selby Railway Company were empowered to lease for any term of years, and also to absolutely sell their undertaking, and the premises con-therewith to the York and North and Railway Company, and the Manchester and Leeds Railway Company, or of them, as the case might be. The 15th sections of this act enacted, that the purchase-money of the Hull and Selby Company should be paid to the directors of that company, to be held by them upon trust, after paying or providing for the payment of debts, &c., to divide the said purchase and other monies rateably between the several persons who, at the time of the payment of the said purchase-money, should be proprietors of shares in the capital of the company, in proportion to the number and amount of their shares. By the 5th section of the same act, it was provided that, upon the payment of the purchase-money to the Hull and Selby directors as aforesaid, the acts relating to the said Hull and Selby Railway Company should be, and the same were thereby repealed.

Under the powers contained in the said act of 1846, the Hull and Selby Railway Company by an indenture, dated in May 1862, demised their line and property to the North-Eastern Railway Company (which the York and North Midland Railway Company had become united), for the term of 999 years at an annual rent of 70,000l.; and under the same powers, by a deed of arrangement of the said date, it was covenanted that the said North-Eastern Railway Company should at any time during the subsistence of the said lease, be at liberty, on giving six months' notice as therein mentioned, to purchase the whole of the said Hull and Selby Railway works, property and effects. It appeared that the North-Eastern Railway Company had intimated an intention of exercising their right of purchase under this contract, but that they had as yet given no formal notice to that effect.

Mr. Greene and Mr. Smythe, for one of the executors, who supported the certificate, contended that, inasmuch as the Hull and Selby Railway Company had ceased to carry on business, having now in relation for 999 years, they were now in receipt, not of a share of the profits derived from working the land, but of an annual sum of 70,000l. paid as rent for the use of their property, which could now no longer be considered as vested in their trading company, but as landlords of land let to another company. To such a state of circumstances the principle of the decisions in Myers v. Perigal (1) and Edwards v. Hall (2) did not apply: but the case was governed by—

Ware v. Cumberlege, 20. Beav. 603; s. c. 24 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Chanc. 630.
Toplin v. Lomas, 16 Com. B. Rep. 159; s. c. 24 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 144.
Watson v. Spratley, 10 Exch. Rep. 222; s. c. 24 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 53.
Hayter v. Tucker, 4 Kay & J. 243.

Mr. Malins and Mr. Bury, for the charity trustees, submitted that the fact that the land held by one trading company was let out for the purposes of trade to another trading company, could make no difference in the quality of the shares in the letting company. The annual sum they received as lessors was still a profit derived from the use of the land for the purposes of trade and the case remained equally within the principle of the decisions in Myers v. Perigal and Bacon, Mr. Curvey and Mr. G. Edwards appeared for parties interested under the will.

Mr. Greene, in reply.

STUART, V.C. said, that it had now come settled law that shares in a trading company holding real estate for the purpose of carrying on its business, are an interest in land within the meaning of the Mortmain Act. That was the result of the decisions in Myers v. Perigal and Edwards v. Hall, which were considered binding upon this Court, whatever authority there might be in adopting the principle upon which they were founded then settled that shares in a trading company carrying on its own business

(1) 2 De Gex, M. & G. 599; n.s. Chanc. 481; overruling (n.s.) Chanc. 165; 16 Sim. 527.

sonal estate, he could not see how the circumstance that the trading company, instead of carrying on the trade itself, had demised its trading property to another trading company, could make any difference. All the arguments in favour of the legatees were equally applicable, whether the profits derived by the company arose from the use by them of the land in carrying on their business, or from the lease of the land to another trading company. The Hull and Selby Company still remained the owners of the land for the purposes for which they had acquired it, viz. to make a profit from the use of it in trade, and to divide such profit amongst the shareholders. The land was still used for the purpose of trading, and the only return from it was in the shape of trading profits, out of which the rent was paid.

The certificate of the chief clerk must, therefore, be varied, and a declaration made that these shares were not an interest in land within the meaning of the Mortmain Act.

Mr. Malins, for the trustees of the charity, submitted, that the charity fund ought not to bear any of the costs of the suit, which was for the administration of the testator's estate, and the cost of it was a testamentary expence thrown expressly by the testator upon the fund called the "general fund" in his will. He cited Wilson v. Heaton (3).

Mr. Greene and Mr. T. Smythe, submitted that the costs of the suit ought to be apportioned between the funds called the "charity fund" and "general fund" in the testator's will—citing Tempest v. Tempest (4).

STUART, V.C. said, the charge by the testator of the funeral and testamentary expenses upon that portion of his estate called in his will the "general fund" was not sufficient to justify the Court in throwing the whole costs of a general administration suit upon that fund. The costs of the suit, therefore, would have to be paid out of the whole of the testator's estate.

Power of Appointment—Execution of Election — Feme Covert — Reversionary Interest in Personalty.

A testatrix having, under her marriage settlement, a power of appointment over a trust fund in favour of her children, by her will appointed the trust fund, and also bequeathed her residuary personal estate, upon trust, after the marriage of her daughter C, to assign and transfer the same equally between her two sons and C. ; and by a codicil, after reciting the marriage of C, she directed that the income of any sums, &c. to which C. might become entitled under her will should be enjoyed by her, for her separate use, during her life, and at her death the principal should become the property of her children :—Held, that C. was entitled to her share of the trust fund, for her separate use, during the life of her husband, with remainder to herself absolutely, and that no case of election arose; and a declaration having been made to this effect, the Court declined to alter it, on the ground that the absolute interest, being in remainder, was inalienable during coverture.

By the settlement made upon the marriage of James Wooldridge and Caroline Treweeke, and dated the 26th of June 1809, certain stock was vested in trustees, upon trust for the benefit of the husband and wife during their lives; and after the death of the survivor, upon trust for the children of the marriage, as the husband should appoint; and in default of such appointment, in trust for all and every the children of the marriage, at such time and times, and in such manner and proportions, &c. as the wife (Caroline) should by deed or will appoint or bequeath the same; and in default of appointment, upon trust for all and every the child or children of the marriage, to be divided equally between or amongst them, if more than one, share and share alike, and to his and their executors, administrators and assigns, the interests to become vested at twenty-one or marriage.

There were three children of the marriage: the plaintiff, Samuel Otway Wooldridge, and the defendants, Caroline Biscoe and James Wooldridge, who was of unsound mind.

James Wooldridge, the husband, died on the 31st of August 1814, intestate, and without having exercised his power of appointment.

Caroline Wooldridge (his widow), by her will, dated the 16th of May 1825, in execution of the power of appointment reserved to her by the settlement, appointed the settled stock, and also bequeathed all other monies and real and personal estate which should belong to her at her death, upon trust, out of the annual proceeds, to pay her daughter Caroline such yearly sum as, with her other income, would make up 180*l.* per annum, to commence from the death of the testatrix; and as to the residue of the interest and annual proceeds, upon trust for the testatrix's two sons, in equal shares as tenants in common; and after the marriage of her daughter, then upon trust to assign and transfer all the trust premises unto and between her sons and daughters, in equal shares as tenants in common; the daughter's portion to be, at the discretion of the trustees, either paid to her husband, upon his making a competent settlement, or to be settled on her and her issue, in such manner as the trustees should think proper; the shares of the sons to be vested interests at twenty-one; the share of either dying before that time to go to the survivor. It was also provided, that if her son James Wooldridge should, through ill-health, be incapacitated from following any profession, the trustees were to pay him out of the trust-monies an annuity of 80*l.*, in lieu of his share of the principal of the trust-monies, which were in that case to be divided equally between Caroline and her other brother, S. O. Wooldridge.

By a codicil to her will, bearing date the 28th of August 1850, Mrs. Wooldridge, after reciting the marriage of her daughter, Mrs. Biscoe, directed that the income of any sums, &c. to which she might become entitled under the testatrix's will should be enjoyed by her, for her own sole use and benefit, during her life; and after her death the principal to become the property of any child or children she might leave at her death, to be equally divided amongst them. With respect to her son S. O. Wooldridge, the testatrix directed the income of his proportion of the trust funds to be enjoyed by him during his life, and after his death the principal to be equally divided between any child or children he might have, lawfully begotten; in case of his dying without children and unmarried, the testatrix consented to the disposal of his share of the property to his sister, Mrs. Biscoe, or amongst her children.

The testatrix died on the 21st of January 1852.

The plaintiff, S. Otway Wooldridge, was a bachelor. James Wooldridge was incapacitated by ill-health from gaining his livelihood in any profession, and was a lunatic.

The questions proposed by this special case for the opinion of the Court were as to what interests in the trust funds the plaintiff and Mrs. Biscoe and her family were entitled to.

Mr. Sandys, Mr. Wickens, Mr. Law and Mr. Melville appeared for the several parties.—For Samuel Otway Wooldridge and Mrs. Biscoe, it was contended that each was entitled absolutely to one moiety of the settled funds, subject, as to each, to a moiety of the annuity of the 80*l.* created by the testatrix in favour of James. In the events which had happened there was an absolute appointment, not cut down by any of the directions in the will or codicil in favour of the testatrix's grandchildren, and no case of election arose. On behalf of James Wooldridge, it was contended that the interests of the plaintiff and Mrs. Biscoe were cut down by the codicil to life interests, so that the reversion remained unappointed; and that at any rate a case for election was raised.

WOOD, V.C.—With regard to the quantity of interest which the parties take, the case falls clearly within the authority of Carver v. Bowles. There is here, as there, first, a valid appointment, and then an invalid attempt to cut down the interests of the plaintiff and the defendant, Caroline Biscoe, to estates for life, with remainder to their children, the children not being objects of the power; and the consequence is, that the appointees take absolutely. Then, it was contended that a case of election was raised, and that no claim could be made under the residuary gift without giving full effect to the rest of the will. The same question also arose in Carver v. Bowles, and was decided by Sir John Leach, who held that, the testator having made an absolute appointment in the first instance, no case of election was raised; the meaning of which is, as I take it, that an absolute appointment having been made in favour of proper objects of the power, the Court treats any subsequent attempts to modify that appointment, in a way which the law will not allow, as if they had no existence for any purpose whatever. In conformity with this view, there will be a declaration that, according to the true construction of the will and codicil of Caroline Wooldridge, the plaintiff, S. O. Wooldridge, is entitled absolutely to one moiety of the funds comprised in the settlement of the 26th of June 1809, subject only to the charge of 80*l.* a year on the said settled funds and the other residuary estate of the testatrix, created by the will in favour of J. Wooldridge during his life, and a declaration that Caroline Biscoe is entitled absolutely to the other moiety of the said funds comprised in the settlement, subject only to the said charge of 80*l.* a year, but during the life of her husband, William Biscoe, for her separate use.

On a subsequent day,
Mr. Law moved, on behalf of Mrs. Biscoe, that so much of the decree, made on the 21st of February, as declared that Mrs. Biscoe was, during the life of her husband, entitled for her separate use to one moiety of the funds comprised in the settlement, subject to the charge of 80*l.*, might be varied or amended; and that it might be declared that Mrs. Biscoe was entitled absolutely, for her separate use, to one moiety of the funds comprised in the settlement, subject only to the charge of 80*l.* a year; or that the defendant was entitled absolutely to one moiety of the funds comprised in the settlement, subject only to the charge of 80*l.* a year.

The object of this application was to obtain for Mrs. Biscoe a power of alienation; since, if she took, during her husband's life, an estate for her separate use, with remainder to herself absolutely, the latter would be a reversionary interest, which could not be disposed of during the coverture.

JULY 1.—WOOD, V.C.—This was a case in which a testatrix, having a power of appointment over a fund in favour of her children, made, by her will, an appointment of part of that fund in favour of a married woman, an object of the power, absolutely, and afterwards by codicil attempted to cut down this gift to an estate for life, to her separate use, with remainder over to her children, who were not objects of the power. I held that the gift of the life estate to her separate use would prevail, but that the gift over, being beyond the power, would not; and that Mrs. Biscoe, therefore, was absolutely entitled in remainder expectant on the determination of the coverture. What I am now asked to do is, to alter my declaration, because it has been held that a married woman cannot deal with an interest in remainder in personalty; but I cannot alter the words of the will in order to accommodate the views of the parties. The case is so clear that I do not think I ought to allow the costs of this application to come out of the estate.

Motion refused, with costs.

LINDSAY v. GIBBS.

Ship and Shipping — Freight — Wages — Insurance — Charges on Freight — Part-Owners — Notice.

As between the owners of a vessel and the assignees of the freight, the wages of the captain and seamen and the expenses are proper deductions to be made from the gross freight.

Where part-owners of a vessel authorize co-owners to insure the whole vessel, and afterwards assign their interest in the freight, and the assignees do not give express notice of the assignment, the co-owners are entitled to insure the vessel and deduct the costs of insurance from the freight.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Master of the Rolls refusing to vary his chief clerk's certificate, and by arrangement (during the argument) the hearing was taken as a re-hearing of the decree made in the cause. The facts are few and are as follows:—

By a charter-party dated the 27th of April 1854, Mr. W. P. Hammond, the owner of a vessel called the Genghis Khan, chartered her to the defendants Messrs. Gibbs & Sons, for a voyage to Moreton Bay, Australia, and from thence to Peru, to load and bring to England a cargo of guano, at a certain rate of freight, and in the charter-party Mr. Hammond was described as being "the owner" of the vessel. In or previously to the month of November 1854, Mr. Hammond executed bills of sale of three-eighths of the ship to the defendant Mr. Briggs and three other defendants, and these transfers were registered in that month. Mr. Hammond also executed bills of sale of the remaining five-eighths of the ship to eleven of the other defendants, but these transfers were not registered until the month of January following. In the meanwhile the plaintiffs, Messrs. Lindsay & Co., who had made advances for Mr. Hammond, required security, and he offered them the freight which would become payable by Messrs. Gibbs & Sons under the charter-party of the Genghis Khan. The plaintiffs accepted this security, and Mr. Hammond thereupon wrote and delivered to the defendants Messrs. Gibbs & Sons a letter as follows:—

"Dec. 29, 1854.

"Gentlemen, — We hereby assign to Messrs. W. S. Lindsay & Co. the freight which will become due from you to us on the delivery of the cargo shipped by your house abroad, in the ship Genghis Khan, in the month of November last, to the extent of 4,300*l.* sterling; and we therefore request you to hold this amount at their disposal, whose receipt for the same shall be binding on us.

"W. P. Hammond & Co."

On the same day the plaintiffs communicated this letter, and produced the original, to Messrs. Gibbs & Sons; but it did not appear that they made any search of the register, nor did it appear that they had any notice of the transfer of the three-eighths of the ship to the defendants Messrs. Briggs and others. But it was stated that Messrs. Briggs had no notice of the plaintiffs' claims until after the termination of the ship's homeward voyage. The cargo was delivered to Messrs. Gibbs & Sons, and a sum exceeding 8,000*l.* was, at the time of the filing of the bill, still due from them on the charter-party in respect of the freight, which Messrs. Gibbs & Sons declined to pay over, on the ground of the conflicting claims upon it, but they paid the freight into court. The plaintiffs claimed a lien on the freight for the amount due to them. At the hearing of the cause in July 1855 the Master of the Rolls decided that transfer of a share in a ship passed the corresponding share in the freight under an existing charter-party without the express assignment of the freight, and he referred several matters to chambers, directing "an account of all charges and expenses properly incurred by and on behalf of the said ship, and of her voyage in earning the freight under the said charter-party."

The chief clerk, in taking the accounts, allowed against the freight the premiums of insurance effected by Messrs. Thompson & Co., who, in the month of January 1855, had been appointed by the then owners of the ship (Messrs. Briggs and others) to act as the ship's brokers; and neither the owners nor Messrs. Thompson had then received any notice of the charge of the plaintiffs upon the freight. Upon the arrival of the vessel in England, Messrs. Thompson & Co. also paid the wages due to the captain and the seamen, and this charge was also by the chief clerk allowed against the freight. Upon a motion by the plaintiffs to vary the chief clerk's certificate, upon the question whether the wages of the captain and crew, and the insurance upon the ship which had been effected by the other parties interested shortly after the assignment of the freight, were expenses which could properly be deducted from the earnings before the division of the nett freight, his Honour was of opinion that they were, and made an order confirming the chief clerk's allowance, from which decision the plaintiffs now appealed (1).

For the appellants, it was contended that

(1) The judgment of the Master of the Rolls, delivered on the 2nd of July 1858, was, in substance, as follows:—After some hesitation upon the question of insurance, I have come to the conclusion that the chief clerk's certificate is correct. The question of wages I disposed of yesterday. It appeared to me that the persons who were entitled to the freight had nothing to do with the insurance, but upon further considering the question, I am of opinion that the insurance of the ship must be treated as part of the expenses of the voyage itself, as much as the insurance upon the freight, and that the persons who are entitled to the profits of the voyage are only entitled to the profits after paying the insurance, as being part of the expenses. My attention was called to that class of cases in which it is laid down that one person cannot insure the share of another person; but I think it was established both upon the hearing and before the chief clerk, that the owners of the ship had authority to make the insurance which they thought proper and necessary, and that it is to be implied from the course of dealing between the parties; and, consequently, that if there had been an assignment of the freight, Mr. Hammond, the assignor himself, could not have resisted the payments for the insurance of the ship, or the insurance of the freight, and that it was not open to him afterwards to say that his partners and the co-owners of the ship had not any authority to insure the freight or to insure the ship. If that be so, I am of opinion that the assignee of the forty sixty-fourths of the freight must stand exactly in the same situation, unless he gives direct and personal notice to the co-owners that such an assignment has been made. The principle of implied or constructive notice does not apply. I am of opinion that all persons who claim under Mr. Hammond are bound by his acts, unless they gave distinct and specific notice to the

Mr. Hammond having transferred his interest in the freight, could create no valid charges on it; that the plaintiffs never having authorized an insurance, no such expenses as the chief clerk and the Master of the Rolls had allowed, ought to be deducted; that it was plain from the reported cases, that a part-owner of a ship could not recover against the other owners sums paid by him for insurance; that as the plaintiffs were alone made aware of the interest of Messrs. Gibbs & Sons, it was sufficient for them to do as they had done, namely, give notice to those gentlemen.

Reference was made, among other authorities, to

Abbott on Shipping (latest edition), p. 73, and the cases there collected.

Bell v. Humphries, 2 Stark. 345.

French v. Backhouse, 5 Burr. 2727.

For the defendants Briggs and others, owners of three-eighths of the vessel, it co-proprietors of the ship that they had an interest distinct from Mr. Hammond, in which case it would probably have been necessary to have obtained their consent to any steps that were taken for the purpose of binding the parties. I find that this was the view which I took of the case at the hearing of the cause, although the point, I am bound to say, did not come before me in the same specific form in which it comes before me now. My decree was, that the freight was to be divided after deducting the expenses of the voyage; and if I am of opinion that the cost of insurance is properly one of the expenses of the voyage, then it necessarily follows from my decree that the nett freight must be divided after deducting the insurance, as one of the expenses of the voyage. Another question was raised upon the terms of the charter-party, upon a point which was not before me, as far as I can make out, at the hearing of the cause. I think nothing turns upon the construction of the charter-party. It is to be observed that it is a contract between the owners and the charterers of the vessel, and I think that the passage in the charter-party which was referred to really relates solely to the contract between the owners and the charterers, and was not intended to bind or to affect the rights of the co-owners between themselves. The passage in question specifies that the master shall be "supplied with a sum not exceeding 500*l.*, free of interest and commission, but the cost of insurance is to be borne by the owners, and the amount so to be advanced, and the cost of the insurance thereof, shall be in part payment of the freight at a certain exchange; and also that, if the charterers and their agents shall think fit to advance the master, beyond the sum of 500*l.*, any sum for repairs, stores or other disbursements whatsoever, such sum, with interest and insurance, shall be in payment of freight at the exchange aforesaid." In my opinion this was argued that the registered owner of a ship was to be treated as the owner of it, and that, upon principle, there was no distinction between the freight and the ship; that the assignment, therefore, of a part of the ship was in itself an assignment of so much of the freight. On their behalf the following cases were cited:—

March 1. — LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—This case is reported, as to the original hearing when the decree was made, in the 22nd volume of Mr. Beavan's Reports; and as to the motion for varying the certificate, with the hearing on further considerations, in the Jurist of the 28th of August 1858. The order made upon that motion and the hearing on further consideration is the subject of the present appeal. It was originally the only subject of appeal; but while the matter was in argument before us, the counsel on each merely means that, when the charterers pay the freight to the co-owners, they are to be at liberty, instead of paying the gross freight, to deduct from the amount whatever they may have paid in respect of the articles specified in the charter-party; but, as soon as the freight is paid to the co-owners and proprietors, then it becomes subject to all those charges with which the co-owners have to do, and in which they are concerned; and I am of opinion that, as between the co-owners, those are properly to be allowed, and bind all persons who claim under any one of the co-partners. The chief clerk's certificate will be confirmed.

side agreed that, in addition, the original decree, so far as the terms in which it describes the accounts directed by it, and the declaration or direction contained in it concerning the application of a clear balance of both those accounts, are concerned, should also be considered as under rehearing, and we so dealt with the matter. The only dispute remaining in the cause besides the question of costs is, whether the wages of the captain and crew of the vessel for the voyage under discussion—their wages, I mean, in respect of that voyage out and home—and the payment made for insuring the ship and freight in respect of the same voyage ought to be allowed as charges upon the freight, and so be payable out of it, and, therefore, accordingly the plaintiffs' proportion out of their share of it.

The plaintiffs assert the negative of this proposition; but I think that they are not well grounded in this assertion, and that they fail upon it. That they are wrong as to the wages I take to be very clear, and, indeed, beyond rational controversy. This point was, in truth, all but conceded; and with regard to the charges for insurance, it is established by the evidence that if the plaintiffs had been out of the case and the other parties interested in the circumstances in contention had been the only persons so interested, those charges must have been allowed against the freight and paid out of it. But the plaintiffs' title was originally, and has remained, equitable merely; and it does not appear that previously to the determination of the homeward voyage any one of the owners of the vessel—I exclude, of course, both Mr. Hammond and the assignees under his bankruptcy—had any notice of the assignment under which the plaintiffs claim—had any notice of their title—had any notice that any person besides Mr. Hammond and the defendants were interested in the freight. The counsel in the cause having come to the agreement that I have stated, I am of opinion that substantially the controversy must remain settled as it was at the Rolls by the order made there (the only original subject of the appeal), and that the decision then made must in effect stand. It may be as well to add distinctly, that reasons sufficient for a conclusion against the plaintiffs, as to the payment for insurance, are, in my judgment, to be found in this: that the insurances in question, both upon the ship and on the freight, were effected not only without notice of the plaintiffs' title, but were also effected, bonâ fide, under the authority of the owner with reference to the voyage which we are now considering and in connexion with it, and were, consistently with what is an ordinary course of business, and from the beginning, intended to fall in point of expense upon the freight. So, at least, I view the facts, Mr. Anderson's evidence appearing to me decisive.

The notices served by the plaintiffs on Messrs. Gibbs & Co., the freighters, seem to me not for any present purpose material. My opinion is also against disturbing what has been done by the Master of the Rolls as to the costs, except that of the motion before his Honour to vary the certificate, there should, I think, be no costs on either side—an alteration which is, in my judgment, not to affect the costs of the appeal. I conceive that the whole costs of the appeal should be paid by the plaintiffs.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER. — This is an appeal from an order of the Master of the Rolls, made upon the hearing of the cause on further consideration, and upon motion to vary the chief clerk's certificate, who in taking the accounts directed by the decree, allowed against the freight the premiums of insurance effected by Messrs. Thompson & Co., and the wages paid by them. The plaintiffs sought by their motion to vary the certificate by disallowing these payments; but the Master of the Rolls, by the order under appeal, refused the motion with costs, and ordered an apportionment between the parties, in the proportion of twenty-four sixty-fourths, or three-eighths, to Briggs and others, and the remainder to the plaintiffs. Upon the hearing of the appeal, some doubts were suggested, whether the terms in which the account was directed by the original decree might not, as to some of the items, preclude us from deciding the question in dispute according to the real merits of the case; but in order to save the necessity of a petition to rehear the original decree, it was very properly agreed that that decree should in this respect be considered open. I am of opinion that the order of the Master of the Rolls in this case is, in substance, right. Mr. W. P. Hammond, before he assigned the freight to the plaintiffs, had transferred twenty-four sixty-fourths of the ship to the defendants Briggs and others; and, of course, twenty-four sixty-fourths of the freight had passed with these transfers. An interest in the nature of a partnership was thus created between W. P. Hammond and the defendants Briggs and others; and when the plaintiffs became the assignees of the freight, they became in truth the assignees only of W. P. Hammond's share in this partnership interest—namely, the five-eighths which had not been transferred by him. Taking thus the partnership interest, the plaintiffs must, of course, take it subject to the burdens of the partnership; and the first of those burdens is the payment of the expenses which produce the income of the partnership—the wages of the captain and seamen. I feel no doubt, therefore, that the plaintiffs are bound to pay their proportion of the wages. Then, as to the insurances. The plaintiffs gave no notice to the defendants Briggs and others of the interest which they had acquired in the freight. They allowed Mr. W. P. Hammond to deal with those defendants as if he had continued to be the sole owner, not only of his shares in the ship, but of his shares in the freight; and these insurances were effected upon his authority concurrently with the authority of those defendants. Are they then entitled to throw upon those defendants the whole burden of the insurances? I think that they are not, and that upon every principle of equity they must bear their proportions of these payments also. There being a partnership interest, the case is no more than this: a partner assigns his interest in the partnership, gives no notice of the assignment of his interest to the copartners, but permits the partnership to go on as if no such assignment had been made; and then claims the share of the partnership profits discharged of the liabilities which have been incurred. I think that he cannot be so entitled. Parties who stand by without asserting their rights, and allow others to incur liabilities which they might not have incurred if those rights had been asserted, cannot, I apprehend, afterwards set up those rights in this court to the prejudice of those by whom such liabilities have been incurred. It was argued for the plaintiffs that W. P. Hammond, having assigned to them his interest in the freight, could not, as against them, afterwards create any charges upon it. But this argument is beside the point; it deals with the case with reference merely to the rights of W. P. Hammond, without regard to the rights of the other parties with whom the question really arises. The plaintiffs, it was said, did not know of the interests of those other parties; they had no knowledge of the transfer of three-eighths of the ship; but their ignorance in this respect arose solely from their own negligence in not having searched the register, and they can be in no better position than they would have been in if they had made the search. The plaintiffs also relied upon the cases at law, that a managing owner cannot recover for insurance against part-owners who have not authorized the insurance; but the present case does not in any way involve that point; it depends upon wholly different considerations. It was further argued for the plaintiffs that they had given notice to Messrs. Gibbs & Sons, from whom the freight was coming due; but the interest of the defendants Briggs and others had been created before that notice was given, and the plaintiffs had the means of knowing, and ought to have known it; and it does not seem to me that the notice can do away with the effect of the parties having by the negligence of the plaintiffs been allowed to go on as if no assignment of the freight had been made. I agree, therefore, in substance with the opinion of his Honour; but looking to the terms of the decree, I think that there was ground for the motion to vary the certificate, and that that motion ought not to have been refused with costs. There should, as I think, have been no costs of the motion, and in this respect I think that the order should be altered; but this does not affect the substance of the appeal, and the costs of it must, as I conceive, be paid by the plaintiffs, notwithstanding this variation in the order.

. Thellusson Act, 39 & 40 Geo. 3. c. 98.—
"Portion."

A testator devised real estates in trust for his son G. during the joint lives of himself and T, and after the decease of either of them upon trust to invest and accumulate the rents, &c., until 3,000l. sterling should have been invested, and subject thereto upon trust for G. for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail, with successive remainders over; and he directed that the stock to be purchased and the accumulations thereof should be in trust for the children of G, and for default of such issue upon such trusts as G. should by will appoint, and in default of appointment, for his next-of-kin. G. and T. survived the testator seventeen years, when G. died without issue, having by will appointed the 3,000l. to F. D, a stranger, and the trustees invested and accumulated the rents for a period of ten years from that time, when 3,000l. had been invested:—Held, first, that the direction to accumulate was void, except for the period of twenty-one years from the death of the testator, the 3,000l. not being in the event which happened, viz., the death of G. without issue, a portion for his children, nor under the power of appointment a portion for G. himself; secondly, that F. D. was entitled to so much of the stock as was purchased with the accumulations that took place within the twenty-one years from the death of the testator, and to the interest thereon; and, thirdly, that, subject thereto, the income directed to be accumulated, with the accumulations thereon, belonged to the persons from time to time entitled to the rents and profits under the limitations in the testator's will.

William Clulow, by his will, dated the 25th of May 1821, devised real estate to trustees in fee, upon trust for his son George Clulow during the joint lives of himself and Hugh Totty, and from and after the decease of either of them, his said son George Clulow and the said Hugh Totty, which should first happen to die, then upon trust from time to time to receive and take the yearly rents and profits, and to lay out and invest the whole of the said rents and profits, when received, in the purchase of stock, transferable at the Bank of England, not being annuities for lives or years, in the names of the trustees, and from time to time to receive the dividends, &c., and to lay out and invest the same in the purchase of other like stock, in manner aforesaid, to be added to the stock first purchased and be held therewith, and so to accumulate by way of compound interest until, by means of such investments of rents and dividends, the said trustees should have laid out and invested in the purchase of stock 3,000*l.* sterling money, of which stock so to be purchased his trustees should stand possessed upon the trusts thereafter declared concerning the same; and, subject to such trust for investment as last aforesaid, upon trust for his son George for his life, with remainder to his first and other sons successively in tail, with successive remainders to the testator's sons Joseph, Aaron and William Whitaker Clulow and their first and other sons in tail, with remainder to the testator's right heirs for ever. And the testator directed, concerning the stock so to be purchased and the accumulations thereof, that the trustees should stand possessed thereof upon certain trusts for the benefit of the child or children of his said son George, and in default of such issue upon such trusts, &c. as his said son George by will should appoint, and in default of appointment, upon trust for the next-of-kin of his said son George, according to the Statute of Distributions; and the will contained a proviso, that the trust for investing in stock 3,000*l.* sterling should, if not previously determined or satisfied by such investments, cease and determine at the end of twenty-one years from the death of the survivor of himself and his children, and the stock which should at that period have been purchased under such trust, though 3,000*l.* sterling should not have been laid out for purchasing the same, should be held upon the same trusts as if 3,000*l.* had been laid out in the purchase thereof.

The testator died on the 8th of August 1822.

Aaron Clulow died, without issue, in 1826.

George Clulow died, unmarried, on the 17th of July 1839, having by his will, dated the 8rd of May 1839, given the 3,000*l.* to Fanny Dodd absolutely, for her separate use, and having bequeathed his residuary personal estate to his sister-in-law, Eliza, the widow of Aaron.

Joseph Clulow died on the 25th of January 1848, without issue, having by his will appointed his widow, Emily Clulow, his executrix.

William Whitaker Clulow died on the 1st of September 1855, unmarried, and intestate as to real estate, but having appointed executors.

Upon the death of George Clulow, in the lifetime of Hugh Totty, the trusts for accumulation arose, and the trustees of W. Clulow's will invested the rents and accumulated the dividends until 3,000*l.* had been invested.

On the 8th of August 1843, being the expiration of twenty-one years from the death of the testator, W. Clulow, there was standing in the names of the trustees 450*l.* consols, purchased with 411*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.* sterling, partly from rents and partly from dividends, and, on the 25th of March 1859, the further sum of 2,757*l.* 14*s.* 7*d.* consols was purchased, with 2,588*l.* 13*s.* 6*d.* sterling, partly from rents and partly from dividends, making in the whole the sum of 3,000*l.* sterling invested.

Doubts having arisen as to the respective rights of the persons interested in the accumulated fund, the trustees transferred it into court, under the Trustees' Relief Act, and the present petition was presented by the surviving executor of W. Whitaker Clulow, the heir-at-law of the testator, who claimed to be entitled to the 2,757*l.* 14*s.* 7*d.*, being the result of the investments made since the expiration of twenty-one years from the death of W. Clulow, the testator, and the questions which arose were, first, whether the direction to accumulate was void, and, secondly, if so, who was entitled to the accumulations that had accrued since the 8th of August 1843?

Mr. W. M. James and Mr. Lewin, for the petitioner.—The direction to accumulate is clearly within the 1st section of the Thellusson Act (39 & 40 Geo. 3. c. 98), and must cease at the expiration of twenty-one years from the testator's death, notwithstanding that it did not commence for many years after his death—Nettleton v. Stephenson (1)—unless it can be brought within the proviso in the 2nd section "that nothing in this act contained shall extend to any provision for payment of debts of any grantor, settlor or deviser, or other person or persons, or to any provision for raising portions for any child or children of any grantor, settlor or deviser, or any child or children of any person taking any interest under any such conveyance, settlement or devise," &c.; and, in the event which has happened, viz., the death of George without children, the direction does not come within that provision. The consequence is, that the personal representative of the heir-at-law of the original testator is entitled. They cited also—

Mr. Rolt and Mr. C. Hall, for Fanny Dodd.—The case is within the provision in the 2nd section of the act. Independently of the original destination of the fund being for the children of George, the power of appointment gives George himself a portion.—

Mr. James replied.

June 15.—WOOD, V.C.—Three questions were raised in this case:—first, whether the accumulations directed by the will of the testator, William Clulow, were within the protection afforded by the 2nd section of the Thellusson Act; secondly, if they were not within that protection, who were the parties entitled to the income which was accumulated during such time as was in excess of the period allowed by the act? and, thirdly, what was to be done with that portion of the fund which had been accumulated within the period of twenty-one years from the testator's death?—[His Honour then read the will.]—Now, the events that have happened were these. The testator died in 1822, and George died, without issue, in 1839, having made a will, by which he appointed the 3,000*l.* to Fanny Dodd. The period of accumulation commenced on the death of George, and 450*l.* was accumulated between that event and the expiration of twenty-one years from the testator's death, and the rest of the 3,000*l.* is the result of subsequent accumulations; and the first question was, whether these accumulations were protected by the 2nd section of the act. The protection itself is in these words.—[His Honour read the 2nd section of the act.]—It was first argued, on behalf of Miss Dodd, that, inasmuch as the primary trust was for the benefit of the children of George, who took an interest himself under the will, the case clearly came within the protection. It appears to me, however, that you must take the actual events that occur, where the will provides for alternative events, and the validity or invalidity of the directions must depend upon the actual state of facts. In this respect it is exactly analogous to the case of Mony-penny v. Dering (2), where it was held, that if a testator gives over his property upon either of two distinct events, one of which is, and the other is not, too remote, the gift over will take effect if that event should happen which is not too remote. This is the converse of that case. If there were children of George, the accumulation was for one purpose, and if there were no children the accumulation was for another, the direction being valid in one event and invalid in the other, and that event has occurred in which the direction is invalid. It was then argued that the power of appointment given to George was a portion for him, and a great deal of argument was raised upon the meaning of the word "portion." No doubt an arguable case might arise as to a power of appointment by will being a portion; if, for instance, it were limited to a daughter on her marriage, it might be treated as a portion; but here the plain object of the will is not to give any benefit at all to George. It seems to me that this is the very case which was struck at by the legislature in passing the act. That cannot be called a portion for a child which is abstracted from that child's property in order to accumulate a fund at the time of his death. If it were so, and such a provision could be held to be a portion, there might be a series of limitations locking up the whole property during the lives of all the children and giving a power of disposition by will to the last surviving child. All possibility of enjoyment by George himself is shut out, though he might avail himself of the fund for payment of his debts after his death. The next point was, as to the income which was accumulated during this period, whether it was undisposed of and therefore belonged to the heir, or whether it should go to the persons who would have been entitled to the rents and profits if no accumulation had been directed. Clearly, this is a charge and not an exception. A sum of money is to be raised in a particular manner, and subject to that the estate is devised in strict settlement; the charge failing, the persons taking subject to the charge are entitled. I have a clear authority for that position in the case of Shaw v. Rhodes (3). There the testator, after directing two periods of accumulation for the benefit of his grandchildren, directed that from and after the decease of his last surviving son or daughter the estates should stand and be charged for twenty years with the payment of two third parts of the clear produce thereof in equal shares and proportions of so much money as would in fifteen years make in the whole 30,000*l.*, which he directed to be divided amongst all his grandchildren who should attain twenty-one; and charged and chargeable as aforesaid, he devised all his freehold and copyhold estates to the eldest son of his son James in tail, with remainders over. Lord Cottenham, referring to this, says, "Nineteen years were exhausted during the first two accumulations. Then follows the provision which has been termed the third accumulation, by which, being minded to raise the sum of 30,000*l.*, but not to raise it in the ordinary way, by sale or mortgage, the testator directs that two-thirds of the income of the estates shall be accumulated; that out of two-thirds of the rents and profits so much shall be annually laid up as will produce 30,000*l.* in fifteen years; and, as he foresaw a possibility that the portion of the rents thus appropriated might not be adequate to realize the specified sum so soon, he extends the period to twenty years. The money was to be realized by means of that appropriation, and the parties interested have a right to insist that the amount shall not be raised in any but the mode and form prescribed by the testator, that is to say, by an accumulation determinable only at the end of a period of fifteen or twenty years." He then goes on to hold, that this is a trust for accumulation within the terms of the act, and therefore void. And Mr. Justice Bosanquet, in the same case, deals with the rights of the tenant in tail in remainder. He says, "Suppose all the testator's children, and all the grandchildren but two, namely, Thomas, the tenant in tail, and the eldest granddaughter, Elizabeth, to have died, and the two surviving grandchildren to have attained twenty-one in the year 1813, one year after the testator's death, the rents and profits for one year having been divided under the first two clauses, the third clause would come into operation, and might, without being affected by the statute, be acted upon for twenty years, that is, till the 10th of July 1833. Could it, in such a case, have been contended that Elizabeth was entitled to insist either that her share of the 30,000*l.* should be raised immediately, or that one-third, or any other portion of the rents and profits should be paid to her annually till she should have received 15,000*l.*? I think not; for Thomas, the tenant in tail, would have had a right to say, first, that fifteen years were allowed to make up the money; and, secondly, that, provided so much of two-thirds of the rents and profits were annually set apart as would, at the end of fifteen years, amount in the whole to the sum given, he would be entitled to the interest of the fund in the mean time, the estate being only chargeable with the interest and produce upon the sum given from the expiration of fifteen years." All that applies very strongly here, because we are now approaching the third question, which is, who is entitled to the income of the 450*l.* which was accumulated within the period allowed by the act. It is not like the case of Eyre v. Marsden (4), where the interests were subject to be divested up to the end of the period fixed for accumulation, because there is a complete trust for the appointee of George Clulow, and after George Clulow had exercised his power of appointment the appointee was entitled absolutely, and her interest was not subject to be divested by any contingency, as in Saunders v. Vautier (5). I think, therefore, that Fanny Dodd was immediately entitled to the 450*l.* stock, and the dividends which have accrued upon it belong to her.

(1) 3 De Gex & Sm. 366; s. c. 18 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Chanc. 191.

(2) 7 Hare, 568; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Chanc. 153; 2 De Gex, M. & G. 146; 22 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Chanc. 313.

Declare that the accumulation of the rents and profits directed to take place after the death of either Hugh Totty or the testator's son George Clulow, whichever might first happen, is void, except for the period of twenty-one years from the death of the testator, which period expired on the 8th of August 1843. Declare that Fanny Dodd, the appointee under the will of George Clulow, is entitled, as such appointee, to the 450*l.* consols purchased with the accumulations which took place prior to the 8th of August 1843, and to the dividends on such Bank annuities from that time. Declare that, subject to such right of the said Fanny Dodd, the income directed to be accumulated by the will of the said testator, with the accumulations thereon, belonged to the persons from time to time entitled to the rents and profits under the limitations contained in the testator's will. Costs of all parties (except the residuary legatee of George Clulow) to be paid rateably out of the fund.

LORDS JUSTICES. }
 July 21. } THOMPSON v. WEBSTER.

Voluntary Settlement—Intention—Creditors—Statute 13 Eliz. c. 5.

C, being in embarrassed circumstances and indebted to H, applied to his mother for a loan of 190*l.*, which she consented to advance, on condition that he would settle real estate, of which he was seised, in trust for himself for life, with remainder to his children. To this he, with great hesitation, consented, and the same was so settled, the mode of doing so being by two deeds: one mortgage for 400*l.* to his mother, and the other a conveyance of the real estate upon the trusts. No reference was made in either deed to the other. C. subsequently became insolvent, and his assignee filed a bill to set aside the settlement; and one of the Vice Chancellors held, that the same was not void under the statute 13 Eliz. c. 5. (against fraudulent deeds), it being executed of full value, and no proof being given that it was executed to delay, hinder or defraud creditors, which decision was affirmed by the Lords Justices on appeal.

To render a deed void as against creditors, it is not sufficient that it is merely voluntary, but it must be proved that the party making it intended to delay, hinder or defraud his creditors.

On the question of a voluntary deed being void under the Statute of Elizabeth, all the surrounding circumstances must be looked at, and each particular case must depend upon those circumstances.

This was an appeal from a decision of Vice Chancellor Kindersley, dismissing the plaintiff's bill. The circumstances of the case are comprised in the following narnative:—In the year 1854 John Hewettson, a neighbour and friend of Joshua Coupe, applied to the plaintiff to sell goods to him in the way of his business, which the plaintiff consented to do on Hewettson's obtaining some person to join with him as surety for the price of the goods; and upon this J. Coupe agreed to become such surety, and gave, in the first instance, a written guarantie for 300*l.*, which was afterwards followed by a promissory note for the same amount. In the month of April 1857, the amount being still due to the plaintiff, he, being unable to obtain payment, commenced an action against J. Coupe upon his promissory note, and proceeded to judgment and execution, and finally arrested Coupe, upon which the latter took the benefit of the Insolvent Debtors Act; and the plaintiff was appointed assignee under his insolvency. Coupe was also indebted to several other persons, though not to large amounts, and he also owed to George Horsley a sum of 90*l.*, for which Horsley brought an action, in December 1855, and recovered judgment. Under the will of his father J. Coupe was entitled to a moiety of the residue of his estate; and by the death of his brother, Joshua Coupe, under a devise contained in the same will, became entitled to certain real estates at Droylsden, in the county of Lancaster, worth about 45*l.* per annum. In January 1856 J. Coupe, being embarrassed by the recent judgment obtained by Horsley, applied to his mother, a lady far advanced in years, to lend him 190*l.*, which she agreed to do, but only upon the express condition that he would execute a settlement of the property to which he had become entitled under his father's will, upon himself for life, with remainder to his children. After some hesitation and discussion as to the terms, it was finally arranged that his mother should advance to him 400*l.*; and in the month of January 1856 two deeds were prepared by Mr. Welch, who acted as solicitor for all the parties, and were executed. The one was a mortgage of J. Coupe's interest under his father's will, and of his property at Droylsden to his mother, to secure to her the repayment of 400*l.* and interest; the other was the settlement, and by it J. Coupe conveyed (subject to a mortgage) all the property at Droylsden, devised by his father's will, to Henry Antrobus and Thomas Webster, upon trust to sell, with his consent during his life, and after his death at their discretion, and pay the dividends and interest of the proceeds of sale to him the said J. Coupe for his life, with remainder to his children, born or to be born, at twenty-one, or to the issue of such as should die under that age, in equal shares; and if there should be but one child, then the whole to that one.

J. Coupe died, leaving his mother surviving; and on her death this suit was instituted by the assignee, who, by his bill, charged that at the time of the execution of the settlement, J. Coupe was in embarrassed circumstances, and that that fact was known to or suspected by his mother and the trustees appointed, and that the settlement was made with intent to delay, hinder and defraud, and that it did, in fact, delay, hinder and defraud the plaintiff and the other creditors, and that it was fraudulent and void under the statute 13 Eliz. c. 5. The bill also charged that the settlement was not made on such a stipulation as the defendants alleged, and that there was no necessity for making it, as Mr. Coupe's children were otherwise fully provided for. It alleged that the whole sum of 400*l.*, for which the mortgage was given, had not been actually advanced, and that the amount did not exceed 150*l.*; and it charged that the mortgage should be declared to stand only for the amount really lent, the insolvent not being personally liable to pay any sums previously advanced, and further, that nothing whatever had been realized out of the insolvency. The bill prayed that the settlement might be declared fraudulent and void, and be delivered up to be cancelled; that an inquiry might be directed as to the amount really lent upon the mortgage security, and that the same might be declared to stand only for the amount actually due.

The defendants, by their answers, denied all knowledge of the plaintiff's demand at the date of the settlement, which was made at the express instance of Mrs. Coupe, the mother, against the wish of the insolvent, and was the condition upon which she advanced him the money; that the insolvent was at that time entitled to property more than sufficient to satisfy all just demands upon him, and that the case was therefore not within the statute.

The principal parts of the evidence are alluded to in the judgment.

By the 6th section of the statute 13 Eliz. c. 5. (against fraudulent deeds) it is enacted as follows:—"This act or anything therein contained shall not extend to any estate or interest in lands, tenements, hereditaments, leases, rents, commons, profits, goods or chattels, had, made, conveyed or assured, or hereafter to be had, made, conveyed or assured, which estate or interest is or shall be upon good consideration, and bond fide lawfully conveyed or assured to any person or persons or bodies politic or corporate, not having at the time of such conveyance or assurance to them made, any manner of notice or knowledge of such covin, fraud or collusion as is aforesaid, anything before mentioned to the contrary hereof notwithstanding."

At the hearing Vice Chancellor Kindersley dismissed the bill (1), and hence this appeal by the plaintiff.

(1) The substance of the Vice Chancellor's judgment was as follows:—The principle applicable to these cases was now well settled, although in former times there was a difference and fluctuation of opinion. Some of the Judges had held, that to bring the case within the statute it was sufficient that the deed was made without adequate consideration, others that the party making it must be indebted to the extent of insolvency; but it was clear that the mere fact of a settlement being voluntary, or without valuable consideration, was not sufficient ground per se. If two men, one worth 500*l.* and the other worth 100,000*l.*, each made a voluntary settlement, a different rule would be applicable in the two cases. On the other hand, it could not be necessary, for the purpose of bringing the case within the act, that the settlor should be insolvent, for he might hinder or delay his creditors although there was just enough to pay his debts. The language of the act being, that any instrument should be void as against creditors, if made with intent to defraud, hinder or delay them, the Court, or the jury, had to decide in each particular case, on all the circumstances, taken together, whether the conclusion could be reasonably come to that there was such intent; if there was, the case came within the statute—if there was not, it did not. No doubt it was inconvenient to be obliged to judge of each particular case by its circumstances, but, not being able to fathom a party's mind, you must judge of his mind by his acts, connected with the surrounding circumstances. In this case there were circumstances which, per se, led to a strong suspicion, even perhaps a conviction or conclusion, that the intent was fraudulent, but the circumstances

Mr. Anderson and Mr. G. W. Collins were for the appellant, and during an elaborate argument cited the following cases:—

Russell v. Hammond, 1 Atk. 13.

In re Magawley's Trusts, 5 De Gex & Sm. 1.

Penhall v. Elwin, 1 Sm. & G. 258.

French v. French, 6 De Gex, M. & G. 95; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 612.

Clements v. Eccles, 11 Irish Eq. Rep. 229.

Mr. Bazalgette, Sir Hugh Cairns and Mr. Charles Hall, for the defendants, re-must be balanced, and during the argument His Honour had found so much difficulty in applying the principle, that he considered this one of the most doubtful cases that had ever arisen. The effect of the settlement was to draw from the reach of the creditors the only property to which Coupe was absolutely entitled, and to convert it into a life interest; that would, primâ facie, lead to the strong impression that the intention was to hinder, delay or defraud the creditors, and such would be the conclusion if there was nothing more in the case, the settlement being the spontaneous act of Coupe; but the evidence conclusively shewed that he never thought of making such a settlement, but that his mother made it a condition of advancing the money which he required of her that he should settle his property upon his children, the debt to Horsley and not the plaintiff's being referred to. It appeared by the evidence that Mrs. Coupe was ignorant that Coupe was seised in fee of Droylsden, and that neither she, nor Mr. Welch, nor Mr. Webster, knew of the plaintiff's claim at that time. Mrs. Coupe was unfortunately dead, but her sister swore that she (Mrs. Antrobus) was ignorant of it, and believed her sister was. Mrs. Coupe was surprised and dissatisfied when she discovered that her son had an absolute interest in Droylsden, and was desirous of benefiting her grandchildren. Coupe at first rejected the idea, but eventually consented to the arrangement. It was true that there was no valuable money consideration, but, upon the construction of the act, the intent of the settlor was the question, and the onus lay on the party alleging the intent to prove it. The plaintiff certainly shewed a primâ facie case of suspicion, which would have been sufficient in the absence of evidence; but although Coupe, of course, knew of the plaintiff's debt, the sum advanced satisfied all other claims upon him; and applying the principle laid down by the authorities, it was impossible in this case to come to the conclusion that there was an intent to delay, hinder or defraud creditors. The other point, with respect to the mortgage, depending upon the plaintiff's success on the first, it was unnecessary to decide, but if it were, His Honour would hold that the whole money was advanced, the question being put lied upon the case of Holmes v. Penney (2) and the cases there cited, and gave an undertaking to redeem the mortgage.

Mr. Anderson was heard in reply.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—Subject to the question as to the amount due upon the mortgage, I should have thought the present a plain case for supporting the transaction. It is impossible upon the evidence not to see that the mother was anxious to retain in her family a small landed estate, which she erroneously believed had been settled previously. Her son was a person of imprudent conduct, rather addicted to intemperance, given to debt and prone to suretyship, as was apparent—this latter a rather dangerous propensity, as everybody knows. He appeared to have obtained money, as sons very frequently do, whenever he wished it, from his mother; but at last she made a final stand. "I will advance the money," she said, "but the farm must be settled." This was communicated to the son, who appeared not to have been present at the time, the lady being bed-ridden; and the son's answer was, that if a certain additional sum were advanced, and a life estate secured to him in the property, he would consent to the settlement. On that footing the transaction was completed, although the mother was anxious for obvious reasons to deprive him of the estate if she could do so. Two contemporaneous instruments were accordingly executed—the one a mortgage and the other a settlement, neither referring to the other, so that it is necessary to resort to extraneous evidence to shew their connexion, though it would have been better if that connexion had been shewn upon one of them at least. Subject, therefore, to the question of amount due, I should have said that the transaction was very plain; I should clearly say that it was for value. Looking then at the state of the settlor's debts at the time, the transaction was clear under the statute, and clear at the common law. But the validity of the debt of 400*l.* has been plausibly attacked, and not unfairly as it seems; although, according to my judgment, the just inference that a jury would draw from the circumstances would be, that the whole of the money was paid, including the costs of the mortgage. But the mortgage was in the whole, or in part, in respect of a former purchase-money, a charge payable out of the land, and some documents which have been produced tend to throw some doubt on the whole transaction. Still, in my opinion, there is no real fraud, and I doubt whether there is substantially a mistake; and, in addition, it would not, as I think, be a legitimate inference from the evidence to suppose that the son did not know what amount was due, the way in which part had been paid, and what was still due to the former proprietor. The family was not in affluent circumstances, and had not numerous transactions; and speaking in my character as a Judge of fact, my impression is, that it is proved that the son and every one else were aware of what was done. But whatever may be really due upon the mortgage, it could form no ground for impeaching the settlement. With regard to the contingent interests of the son, it may be proper to have some provision, as the children may die without issue. The undertaking that the trustees have given to redeem the mortgage ought to be embodied in our order, and I shall have no objection to insert a clause that this is without prejudice to any question as to what is really due. The circumstances, however, are, in some respects, so singular, the settlement and the mortgages are so near the date of the promissory note given to Mr. Thompson, the plaintiff, and there is such a remarkable silence upon the face of the instruments themselves, and the embarrassments of the son are so certain, and his means of meeting them so far from clear, that I am disposed, with the utmost deference to Vice Chancellor Kindersley, to exempt the plaintiff from payment of

upon the allegation that Coupe was not personally liable for the sums previously advanced. The bill must be dismissed, and, inasmuch as it was filed at the peril of depriving the infant defendants of this property, with costs. On so doubtful a question, if it could have been done with propriety, His Honour's disposition would have been to have dismissed the bill without costs.

all costs of the suit up to the hearing before His Honour. As to the appeal, again I am disposed to give no costs, excepting that the deposit shall be paid over to the respondents.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—My opinion is that the settlement was bond fide made for a valuable consideration, falling within the 6th section of the statute 13 Eliz. c. 5. Upon the evidence, it is clear that not one sixpence of the 190*l.* would have been advanced to the son by his mother, except upon the terms of a settlement being made by him. The bona fides of the settlement is not affected even if the whole of the 400*l.* was not paid; and in all other respects I feel assured that the settlement is perfectly bond fide. I think, however, that the bill should have been dismissed without costs, for I consider that transactions of this description require a searching investigation; and I think so the more because I observe of late that considerations of this nature have been sometimes invented and manufactured to support such settlements against creditors; and still more strongly do I think so, because a direction which refuses to the defendant his costs of the suit would operate beneficially by inducing solicitors to put upon the faces of deeds prepared by them what is the true state of the case, whereas it appears only too common to state nothing of the circumstances upon the deeds themselves by which such arrangements are carried into effect. Upon these considerations, I am certainly not disposed to do anything which will check investigation under such circumstances as those in the present case. The plaintiff was entitled to demand investigation, and I have no objection to the insertion of a clause that the decree is to be without prejudice to any question as to the amount due upon the mortgage. The decree will be varied, as we have said; the bill be dismissed, without costs, up to the hearing before the Vice Chancellor; there will be no costs of the appeal, excepting that the plaintiff's deposit will be paid over to the respondents.

Dismissal—Practice of Bill—Insolvent Defendant.

If a bill filed in this court is not duly prosecuted, it will, though the defendant has taken the benefit of the Insolvent Act, be dismissed, with costs.

The defendant was the lessee of the Garrick Theatre, and the bill was filed against him, praying for an account of the sums received for some stage furniture and fittings alleged to have been sold by the defendant in contravention of the covenants contained in his lease. The bill also prayed for an injunction to restrain any further breaches of covenant. In March 1858 the defendant put in his answer to the bill, and no further step was taken in the suit, as the defendant had since given up possession of the theatre to the plaintiff, and taken the benefit of the Insolvent Act.

Mr. Haddan, in support of the motion to dismiss the bill with costs, cited—

Mr. Joyce.—The plaintiff ought not to be required to proceed with a suit against an insolvent. By getting possession of the theatre, the plaintiff had in a great measure obtained substantial relief, though perhaps not all that was asked. The bill, therefore, might be dismissed, but it must be without costs—Knox v. Brown (1).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The merits of the case are now altogether out of the question. The usual order must, therefore, be made, dismissing the bill with costs, unless the plaintiff will pay the costs of this application, and give an undertaking to proceed with the suit.

Statute of Frauds—Parol Agreement—Evidence—Vendor's Occupation after Contract—Part Performance.

J. L. agreed by parol with J. W. for a conveyance of a life interest in real estate, part of which, a cottage, was in his own occupation; the terms were, that J. W. should be repaid the purchase-money and interest out of the rents, and should allow J. L. to continue to occupy the cottage. G, a witness, swore that this was the effect of the parol arrangement, but two witnesses swore that they had heard J. W. deny it. A short time after this agreement J. W. asked J. L. to execute an absolute conveyance of the same life interest to J. W.'s daughter, then an infant, which J. L. accordingly did; and J. W. entered into possession of the property, leaving the cottage in J. L.'s possession, rent free. J. W. wrote letters afterwards to G. and to J, saying that he had bought the property out and out, and offered J. L. an annuity for life if he would give up possession of the cottage. J. W. by will, devised his real estate to his daughter, and appointed B. his executor and her guardian. B. made J. L. an offer of the annuity on the same terms as J. W. had done, but the offer was refused. Thereupon B, as the next friend of J. W.'s daughter, brought an action of ejectment against J. L, who filed a bill to restrain it, alleging the parol agreement, and praying an injunction to stay the action, and a re-conveyance of the property on payment of what was due. One of the Vice Chancellors decided that evidence of the parol agreement was admissible, notwithstanding the provisions of the Statute of Frauds (29 Car. 2. c. 3.), and made a decree declaring the daughter of J. W. to be a trustee for J. L, who was entitled to redeem on payment of what was due. On appeal, the decision was confirmed.

This was an appeal from a decree made by Vice Chancellor Kindersley. The suit was instituted by John Lincoln, a master mariner, praying relief under the following somewhat complicated state of circumstances:—The plaintiff, by his bill, alleged that in the year 1855 he was seized for his own life of freehold property, consisting of seven cottages, in one of which he resided, a chapel or meeting-house, and six acres of land in the parish of Congham, in the county of Norfolk; that at that time the hereditaments (with others to which the plaintiff was entitled in fee) were, with a policy effected by the plaintiff on his own life, mortgaged to the Rev. Stephen Frost Rippingall, for 700*l.*, with power of sale; that in August 1855 the plaintiff conveyed and assigned all his estate and effects to Mr. Henry Gamble, as trustee for the benefit of his creditors; that the same solicitors acted on behalf of the mortgagee and also of the trustee; that in September 1855 the mortgagee caused the property to be put up for sale, but no purchaser was then found; that early in October of that year Henry Gamble was informed by the solicitors that the mortgagee had been offered 220*l.* for the property, and that unless a higher offer could be procured, they should sell at that price; that thereupon Gamble communicated with the plaintiff, who at once went to the Rev. Joseph Wright, then rector of Congham, but since deceased, the father of Elizabeth Josephine Wright, and asked him to purchase the property for the plaintiff, upon the terms that Mr. Wright should be repaid the purchase-money and interest out of the rents of the cottages and chapel, and allowing the plaintiff to continue to occupy the house and land in which he then resided; that on the evening of the following day the plaintiff and Gamble called together on Mr. Wright, who told Gamble that the plaintiff had been asking him to buy the property for the family of the plaintiff, and he was anxious to know if the money would be safe; that Gamble, in reply, assured him that it would, and pointed out the mode in which he could repay himself with interest; that Mr. Wright then agreed to purchase the life-estate in the hereditaments, and the policy, in behalf or for the benefit of the plaintiff, on the terms that he (Wright) should pay the sum of 230*l.* as purchase-money, and should retain the rents of the cottages and chapel, and apply them towards liquidating or reimbursing to himself the 230*l.*, and in the mean time the plaintiff should pay interest, and should retain possession of or occupy the messuage and land adjoining, and should pay the premiums accruing due upon the policy; that Gamble then added that it would be necessary to raise the rents of the other cottages at the ensuing Michaelmas, and this with the income from the chapel would enable the plaintiff to pay 50*l.* yearly in liquidation of the sum advanced; that this arrangement was communicated to the mortgagee, who acquiesced in it; and that on the 24th of October 1855 Mr. Wright became the purchaser upon the foregoing terms and conditions as regarded the plaintiff. The bill also alleged that the life interest of the plaintiff was then worth much more than 230*l.*, and that another person had offered to make the purchase for the plaintiff; that soon after the arrangement Wright requested the plaintiff to execute a conveyance of the property to his (Wright's) daughter Elizabeth Josephine Wright, which he accordingly did in October 1855; that from the time of the contract the plaintiff resided in the house, and had never paid any rent, but he discharged all taxes and other outgoings, and also regularly paid the premiums on the policy, except one in June 1858, which he would also have paid, but that he was informed that some person acting on behalf of the defendants to the suit had already done so, without any request on his part; that when the premium for the year 1856 was due the plaintiff received a note from Mr. Wright, informing him that the same must be paid without delay; that towards the end of the year 1855 Henry Gamble had occasion to call on Mr. Wright, and a conversation took place which led the former to suspect that Wright meant to depart from the arrangement and to claim the property as his own, and he thereupon wrote to Wright a letter reminding him of the original terms, and stating his suspicions, and in answer Wright wrote to Gamble as follows:—

“ Sir,—I do not understand the purport of your note. You and Lincoln cannot have forgotten the conditions on which I purchased the life interest, namely, that I would allow him and his family the use of the house and land, paying therefrom the policy and other outgoings, and that I would take the cottages and the meetinghouse (commonly called a chapel) into my own hands, and that he should pay for the furniture by instalments. These are the conditions I named to Mr. Groom and several neighbours even before I made the purchase. The deed which the society holds from Lincoln upon the chapel Mr. Partridge has informed me is null and void. The rent I have fixed upon it is 10*l.* a year, to be paid in advance, commencing on the day of purchase. Yours obediently, Joseph Wright.”

That shortly after this Mr. Wright wrote to one Jackson, a member of the religious society which had previously rented the chapel, the following letter:—

“ Congham Rectory, Jan. 15, 1856.

“ Sir,—You no doubt may be aware that I have purchased the life interest of Mr. John Lincoln, of the above parish, allowing him the house in which he lives and the land rent free, for the benefit of his wife and young children, keeping in my own possession the cottages and the meeting-house, commonly called a chapel, upon the latter of which I have fixed a rent 10*l.* per year, to be paid in advance, commencing on the 24th of October 1855, the day on which the purchase was made.

“ Yours obediently,

That Mr. Wright until his death, the guardian of his daughter ever since, received the rents; that Wright died at the end of the year 1856, having by his will devised all his real estate to his daughter, the defendant Elizabeth Josephine Wright (then and still a minor), and appointed the other defendant, Thomas Beck, her guardian and sole executor of his will; that after Wright's death Beck called on the plaintiff and offered to allow him 10*l.* a year for his life if he would give up the house and land, which offer was a repetition of one which had been made in the lifetime of Mr. Wright; and that upon the plaintiff's refusing the offer, Beck said that he would have the plaintiff turned out; and that on the 16th of April 1858 the defendant Miss Wright commenced an action of ejectment against the plaintiff, and this action was prosecuted by her by the defendant Beck as her next friend. The bill then set up and insisted upon the alleged agreement and prayed an injunction to restrain further proceedings in the action; a declaration that Joseph Wright might be declared to have purchased the property and the policy as trustee for the plaintiff; and that upon payment to Wright's representatives of what was due to them, they might be decreed to convey and assign the property and the policy to the plaintiff; and prayed an account of the rents and profits received by Wright or his daughter, and also of what might have been received by them but for their wilful default; and that the defendant Elizabeth Josephine Wright might be ordered to pay the costs of this suit.

The plaintiff and Gamble, examined as witnesses, positively swore to the truth of the bill as to the foregoing statements having been made in their presence, but Mr. Edwards, the solicitor for the defendant, and Mr. Beck, both declared that they had mentioned the subject of the arrangement as alleged by the bill, and that Mr. Wright absolutely denied that any such arrangement had been made. Gamble was not cross-examined by the defendants.

In July 1858 an injunction was awarded without prejudice to any question at the hearing, and, the defendants undertaking not to issue execution, judgment was given in the action.

In the following December the cause was heard before the Vice Chancellor, when his Honour held that the plaintiff was entitled to redeem, for that the parol evidence was in his favour, the Statute of Frauds (20 Car. 2. c. 3.), in his Honour's opinion, not applying to the agreement (1). The defendant Miss Wright appealed. After the decision in the court below the executor of Mr. Wright was made a party to the suit.

Mr. Baily and Mr. W. D. Lewis, sustaining the Vice Chancellor's decree, cited the following cases:—

Dale v. Hamilton, 5 Hare, 369; s. c. 16 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 126: affirmed, ibid. 397; 2 Phil. 266.

Childers v. Childers, 1 De Gex & Jo. 482; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 643, 743.

Ridgway v. Wharton, 3 De Gex, M. & G. 677; s. c. 6 H.L. Cas. 238.

Mr. Toller and Mr. Dickinson, for the defendant, argued, in support of the appeal, that the bill, if one for specific performance of a contract, did not allege the contract in such a manner as to satisfy the requisitions of the Statute of Frauds; and, on the other hand, if it were a redemption bill, which it was confidently submitted that it was not, it was erroneously framed; it was wrong in point of form, for there was no authorized hand to receive the money, the personal representative of Wright not being before the Court. Even if the agreement were considered to be sufficiently established, it was of the most obviously improbable kind, and such as the Court ought not to grant longing to A. But suppose A, wishing to purchase, says to B, "I have not got money, but I wish you would lend me some to buy the property with, for my benefit, taking the conveyance to yourself, you standing as mortgagee of the property, subject to redemption by me." That would constitute a case almost identical with the present. The Statute of Frauds would not then enable B. to say that, although he bought at the request of A, on the understanding that he, B, should advance the money, yet that the agreement not being in writing he could commit a fraud under the shelter of the statute. It has been held over and over again that such a defence will not be allowed. In this case the letters of Mr. Wright shew clearly that there were some stipulations; but he and the plaintiff draw some distinction between what they were each to receive of the rents. The fact of the agreement is clearly proved by the plaintiff and Gamble, and the letters of Wright are consistent with it. The defendant's evidence only proves, at the utmost, the denial of Wright that there was such an agreement; but that is not sufficient evidence that an agreement did not exist. Gamble's evidence, therefore, is not contradicted, and he was a disinterested witness. Although the plaintiff was the debtor, and Gamble

(1) The Vice Chancellor's judgment was as follows:—I was precluded by the course the parties took in this case from getting further evidence, but upon the law of the case I entertain no doubt. From the mode in which the case has been brought on, it is competent to the defendant to take the objection of the Statute of Frauds. On the other hand, the right of the plaintiff is untouched in other respects. Supposing B. at the request of A, and with money of A, in his hands, purchases property for him, but takes a conveyance to himself, can it be said that A. can have no relief because there is no written agreement within the Statute of Frauds? Such a proposition cannot be maintained. That statute was passed to prevent fraud, and a Court of equity will not allow a party to avail himself of it to commit fraud. It is clear in such a case that the Court will give A. relief, although there is no writing to shew; for B. has, in fact, agreed to hold the property for the benefit of A; that is, on the assumption that B. had money be-

and land adjoining, and should pay the premiums accruing due upon the policy; that Gamble then added that it would be necessary to raise the rents of the other cottages at the ensuing Michaelmas, and this with the income from the chapel would enable the plaintiff to pay 50*l.* yearly in liquidation of the sum advanced; that this arrangement was communicated to the mortgagee, who acquiesced in it; and that on the 24th of October 1855 Mr. Wright became the purchaser upon the foregoing terms and conditions as regarded the plaintiff. The bill also alleged that the interest of the plaintiff was then much more than 230*l.*, and that the person had offered to make it for the plaintiff; that soon afterwards Wright requested to execute a conveyance to his (Wright's) daughter, Josephine Wright, who entered into the contract thereon in October 1855: that she entered the house, and he remained in his landlord's house, and he discharged the property in his hands, and he continued to pay the sums on the mortgage. In the present instance, however, it is true that at the time of the plaintiff and Wright entering into the verbal agreement which is proved by the

I possession amount- of the agreement. reumstances, as I Wright was enabled t in the property. ssion, from the time tion of the convey- t, if not from the time , was merely wrongful if not by the verbal agreement with Wright, and must be referred to it. I may add, that although I have referred to the part performance as excluding the Statute of Frauds, I am not sure that the statute is not otherwise avoided in this case. The price mentioned (the deed being silent as to the true contract) was in truth paid, not by the lady, then and still a minor, but by her father, and must be considered as advanced by him on the security of the purchased property. I am of opinion that the absence of plain dealing, if there is any, was not on the plaintiff's part. The decree of the Vice Chancellor is, in substance, right. But I think that the defendant Beck should pay the costs of the plaintiff and of Miss Wright down to the hearing, and of this appeal, and also of the action at law. The decree omits any direction as to wilful default, and this is probably right, nor perhaps does the plaintiff desire it to be varied in this respect. There is also an account directed against Miss Wright as well as against Beck; that perhaps is right, but I am not sure that it is so.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—Having given careful consideration to the case during the argument, and since it stood over, I am satisfied that the decree is well founded, without reference to the question of part performance. I am of opinion that the pro forma evidence is admissible and decisive. The Statute of Frauds was not made for the purpose of covering fraud. If there was a mortgage transaction, it was a fraud for to hold the property absolute before parol evidence is adduced. There was an absolute conveyance had been an agreement only. The cases on this point are very strongly in favour of the plaintiff; I pardon v. Codrington.

The deeds were delivered in this condition, together with the share certificates for the 20l. shares, which had been fraudulently obtained by the broker, to bond fide purchasers, who filled up the blanks. T. filed his bill to set aside the deeds, and one of the Vice Chancellors held that they were void, and that T. was entitled to the shares expressed to be thereby transferred and to have his name restored to the register, which decision the Lords Justices, on appeal, affirmed.

The practice of the Stock Exchange for a broker to deliver deeds of transfer in blank cannot prevail against the rule of law.

This was an appeal from a decision of Vice Chancellor Wood, reported ante, p. 285, where the principal facts fully appear, and they are recapitulated in the judgment. He was also entitled to sixty new shares upon a deposit of 2l. each. He directed his broker, Mr. Bourdillon, to sell the latter shares, but the broker in fact sold eighty of the other shares, and produced deeds of transfer in which the name of the intended transferee, the number of shares intended to be sold, and the distinctive numbers and description of the shares were left in blank, the deeds being stamped with an amount of duty sufficient to cover a sale of 20l. shares. The broker obtained Mr. Tayler's signature to these deeds, and obtained also the share certificates, and sold the eighty shares to bond fide purchasers, but before the registration necessary on a sale had been completed, Mr. Tayler discovered the fraud of his broker, and filed the present bill to set aside the sale, and have the deeds declared void, and also to have his name restored to the register-book of shares. March 11. — LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—The principal or only question of importance in this suit is as to the applicability of the Statute of Frauds, for if that statute is not in the plaintiff's way, his title to a decree is sufficiently plain. The operation, however, of that statute is, as I conceive, concluded by the part performance of the agreement; and I say this not without having given respectful consideration to Sir James Wigram's judgment in the case of Dale v. Hamilton, cited in the argument. The leading decisions are, as is well known, collected by Lord St. Leonards in his distinguished work, and also in the valuable treatises of Mr. Dart and Mr. Fry (3). I agree that when a man holding possession of an estate enters into a verbal agreement with his landlord for the purchase of the property in his possession, the mere fact that he continues in possession does not amount to part performance. In the present instance, however, although it is true that at the time of the plaintiff and Wright entering into the verbal agreement which is proved by the

the trustee of the creditors, there was nothing improbable in the transaction. The defendant's contention is inconsistent with Wright's letters. The plaintiff was not a tenant, but a mortgagor, entitled to redeem. With regard to the costs, this is not a simple bill to redeem, for the defendant disputes the mortgage. When a defendant does that without a ground of right, the common course is to make him pay the costs of the suit up to the hearing. But here the case is peculiar. The defendant is an infant, taking, not as heir of the mortgagee simply, but by virtue of a conveyance direct to her by Wright's direction. The plaintiff has occasioned the state of things in this case by omitting to have some writing declaring precisely what the arrangement was. There must therefore be no costs up to the hearing; and then the ordinary costs, as in a redemption suit. There must also be an account of the amount due, such account to be a simple account, without rests; and with no direction as to what, without wilful default, might have been received. The motion must stand over, pro forma, to bring the present representative of Mr. Wright before the Court.

plaintiff and Mr. Gamble, and at the time when the deed of the conveyance was signed, and continually afterwards, the plaintiff was, as I collect, in actual and corporeal possession of a substantial portion of the property in dispute, yet such possession was never other than that of owner, incumbered owner it was true, but still actual owner, and continued in such possession as such till the death of Mr. Wright. I am of opinion that this possession amounted to part performance of the agreement. It was under these circumstances, as I read the evidence, that Wright was enabled to acquire an interest in the property. The plaintiff's possession, from the time of the vendor's execution of the conveyance to Miss Wright, if not from the time of the contract, was merely wrongful if not sanctioned by the verbal agreement with Wright, and must be referred to it. I may add, that although I have referred to the part performance as excluding the Statute of Frauds, I am not sure that the statute is not otherwise avoided in this case. The price mentioned (the deed being silent as to the true contract) was in truth paid, not by the lady, then and still a minor, but by her father, and must be considered as advanced by him on the security of the purchased property. I am of opinion that the absence of plain dealing, if there is any, was not on the plaintiff's part. The decree of the Vice Chancellor is, in substance, right. But I think that the defendant Beck should pay the costs of the plaintiff and of Miss Wright down to the hearing, and of this appeal, and also of the action at law. The decree omits any direction as to wilful default, and this is probably right, nor perhaps does the plaintiff desire it to be varied in this respect. There is also an account directed against Miss Wright as well as against Beck; that perhaps is right, but I am not sure that it is so.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—Having given careful consideration to the case during the argument, and since it stood over, I am satisfied that the decree is well founded, without reference to the question of part performance. I am of opinion that the parol evidence is admissible and decisive. The Statute of Frauds was not made for the purpose of covering fraud. If there was a mortgage transaction, it was a fraud for the mortgagee to hold the property absolutely, and therefore parol evidence is admissible. Here there was an absolute conveyance, where there had been an agreement for a mortgage only. The cases on this point are remarkably strong; I particularly allude to England v. Codrington (4). The only question here is, whether there is such an agreement as alleged by the bill, and I am satisfied that there is. The questions which were asked by Mr. Wright, as to the security of the investment, and as to the payment of interest and repayment of the principal, are more satisfactory to my mind than if the evidence had been more direct. If there was no such agreement, to what could Mr. Beck's offer of 10*l.* a year to the plaintiff be ascribed? It is a case not of mere trust, but of equitable fraud. The agreement for the mortgage was part of the transaction, and the appellant cannot adopt one part and repudiate the rest. The decree is correct, so far as it was against the appellant. But as I consider the whole of this litigation arose from the action commenced by the defendant, which rendered it necessary for the plaintiff to come to this Court for relief, and considering that he was entitled to that relief, I am of opinion that the plaintiff must be indemnified as to the whole costs.

Mr. W. D. Lewis.—We do not ask for any variance of the decree by the insertion of a direction as to wilful default.

T. filed his bill to set aside the deeds, and one of the Vice Chancellors held that they were void, and that T. was entitled to the shares expressed to be thereby transferred and to have his name restored to the register, which decision the Lords Justices, on appeal, affirmed.*

The practice of the Stock Exchange for a broker to deliver deeds of transfer in blank cannot prevail against the rule of law.

This was an appeal from a decision of Vice Chancellor Wood, reported ante, p. 285, where the principal facts fully appear, and they are recapitulated in the judgment. They following summary will therefore suffice:—Mr. Tayler was owner of 120 paid-up 20*l.* shares in the above-named railway, the same having originally been 480 shares of 5*l.* each. He was also entitled to sixty new shares upon a deposit of 2*l.* each. He directed his broker, Mr. Bourdillon, to sell the latter shares, but the broker in fact sold eighty of the other shares, and produced deeds of transfer in which the name of the intended transferee, the number of shares intended to be sold, and the distinctive numbers and description of the shares were left in blank, the deeds being stamped with an amount of duty sufficient to cover a sale of 20*l.* shares. The broker obtained Mr. Tayler's signature to these deeds, and obtained also the share certificates, and sold the eighty shares to bond fide purchasers, but before the registration necessary on a sale had been completed, Mr. Tayler discovered the fraud of his broker, and filed the present bill to set aside the sale, and have the deeds declared void, and also to have his name restored to the register-book of shares. The Vice Chancellor made a decree in his favour, and now two of the defendants to the suit, Mr. Stephen Spurling and Mr. Bristow, purchasers from Mr. Bourdillon, and who had intended to mortgage the shares to Mr. Percival Spurling to secure a debt due from them to him, appealed.

Mr. Rolt, Mr. W. M. James and Mr. Walford supported the decree, insisting that the defendants, if they had any remedy for the wrong that had been done to them by the fraud of Bourdillon, ought to be left to their action at law, or if they proceeded in equity they might file a bill for specific performance against Mr. Tayler, who was entitled to stand in the same position as he was before the defendants had filled up the blanks in the deeds. They referred to the case of Hibblewhite v. M' Morine (1), cited in the Court below.

Mr. Roundell Palmer, Mr. G. M. Giffard, and Mr. Waley, for the appellants, argued that all the mischief had been occasioned by the plaintiff himself, in signing the deeds in blank; that by doing so, and by leaving the certificates in the hands of Bourdillon, the appellants had been deceived or defrauded; and that the plaintiff was in the eye of a Court of equity a trustee for bonâ fide purchasers from the broker. They cited the following cases, some of which were referred to in the court below :

Mr. J. Hinde Palmer, for the Company, submitted to act as the Court should direct.

Mr. W. M. James was heard in reply, and referred to the case of Hatch v. Searles (2).

July 15.—LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE said, that in the present case all the material facts were undisputed, and there was no question as to the legal right, the controversy being confined to equitable procedure and the application of equitable principles. The bill was filed by a plaintiff, Mr. Tayler, who prayed for relief with respect to certain documents purporting to affect the legal title of the plaintiff to eighty shares of 20*l.* each in the Great Indian Peninsula Railway Company, which were vested legally in him, and to remove a cloud from his title to those shares. The important facts, which, as he had said, were in the main undisputed, were to be found in two affidavits made by the plaintiff in the month of August 1857 and in the month of April 1858 respectively, from which he would read some passages. The former affidavit, that of August 1857, was to the following effect:—"First, the above-named defendants, the Great Indian Peninsula Railway Company, are, as I verily believe, a company duly registered according to the Joint-Stock Companies Registration Act, and duly incorporated by an act of parliament made and passed in the twelfth and thirteenth years of the reign of her present Majesty, by the name of the Great Indian Peninsula Railway Company, and by which name they are by the said last-mentioned act duly authorized to sue and be sued. Secondly, some time since I became and was the owner of the 120 shares (and which are hereinafter referred to as 20*l.* shares) in the said company, and which 120 shares were formerly 5*l.* shares, but afterwards became 20*l.* shares, and upon each of which the sum of 20*l.* was actually paid up by me, and which 120 shares were duly transferred into my name in the books of the said company as the registered holder thereof. Thirdly, I became entitled to have sixty other of certain new shares which were issued by the said company allotted to me, and some time since such sixty new shares in the said company were allotted to me subject to my paying a deposit of 2*l.* per share thereon. Fourthly, for the purpose of paying such deposit, and so that I might become absolutely entitled to the said sixty new shares, I gave Mr. Bourdillon, my stockbroker, a cheque for the sum of 120*l.*, being the amount of the same, with instructions to him to pay such deposit, and which I considered he had done, the cheque for the said 120*l.* having been duly returned by my bankers as paid. Fifthly, in or about the month of July 1857, I became and was desirous of selling the said sixty new shares which had been allotted to me as aforesaid, and instructed my said broker to sell the same accordingly. Sixthly, shortly afterwards my said broker brought to me two printed forms of deeds of transfer, and which I signed, believing them to be deeds of transfer of the said sixty new shares, but the name of the transferee was not then inserted in either of such deeds, and in each of such deeds a blank space was left for the name of the transferee. Seventhly, on or about the 5th of August 1857 I received from my said broker a letter of that date (now produced and shewn to me and marked with the letter A), and which is partly in the words and figures, or to the purport and effect following (that is to say)—“Before you start for Scotland, be so kind as to let me know how and when you wish the 185*l.* paid.” Eighthly, the sum of 185*l.*, referred to in the said letter, was the price for the said sixty new shares, and which I was informed by my said broker was the price to be given for the same. Ninthly, I have lately seen the said two deeds of transfer at the office of the said company, and the same purport to be transfers of eighty of the 120 20*l.* shares in the said company to which I was so entitled as aforesaid, one of such deeds of transfer being of fifty of such shares, and numbered respectively 48,831 to 48,880, and the other of such deeds of transfer being of thirty of the same shares, numbered respectively 48,801 to 48,830, and the word ‘thirty’ is written in ink in such lastly - mentioned deed of transfer apparently over the word ‘ten,’ therein written in pencil, and the name of the said defendant Percival Spurling has, since the said deeds of transfer were so signed by me as aforesaid, been inserted therein respectively as the transferee of such shares. Tenthly, I verily believe the number of the respective shares purported to be transferred by such deeds respectively, and the consideration for the same, and which is therein respectively stated to be 1,000*l.* and 600*l.*, making together 1,600*l.*, have also been inserted in the said deeds of transfer since the same were signed by me. Eleventhly, I positively say that I never gave instructions or authority to any person whomsoever for the sale or transfer of any of the said 120 shares, nor did I ever wish to sell any of the same, nor has any portion of the money in the said two deeds of transfer, or either of them, stated as the consideration for the purchase of the said shares, ever been paid to or received by me, or by any person or persons whomsoever in any way authorized or empowered by me to receive the same. Twelfthly, the said two deeds of transfer were delivered by the said Mr. Bourdillon, as I have been informed by him, to the said Percival Spurling, and at that time the name of the transferee had not, as I verily believe, been inserted therein respectively. . . . 20. I have lately been informed by the said Mr. Bourdillon, and I verily believe that the name of the transferee in the said two deeds of transfer so signed by me as aforesaid, and also the particular numbers of the shares thereby purported to be transferred, were filled up after the same had been signed and executed by me, deponent, by the said Percival Spurling himself, or by some person by his direction and on his behalf. 21. I considered that the proper certificates for the owner of the said 120 20*l.* shares had been delivered to and were in my custody, but I have lately discovered, when I called at the company’s offices as aforesaid, that the certificates so in my said custody are merely transfer certificates, and that I was entitled also to share certificates, and that the share certificates for the said 120 20*l.* shares have during the present year been obtained by the said Mr. Bourdillon from the said company, and that he has delivered to the said defendant Percival Spurling such of the same certificates as relate to the eighty shares so, by the said deeds of transfer, purported to be transferred as aforesaid.

22. I say that the said share certificates so delivered to the said defendant Percival Spurling by the said Mr. Bourdillon as aforesaid were delivered to the said Percival Spurling entirely without my authority, sanction or knowledge. 23. I have been informed that he, the said defendant Percival Spurling, alleges that when the said share certificates so delivered to him as aforesaid were delivered to him by the said Mr. Bourdillon, he paid him, the said Mr. Bourdillon, the sum of 1,600*l.* as the purchase or consideration money for the said eighty shares; and I say that if the said defendant Percival Spurling did pay the said Mr. Bourdillon the said sum of 1,600*l.* as such purchase or consideration money as aforesaid, the same was so paid to him the said Mr. Bourdillon entirely without my sanction or knowledge. 24. I say that I never gave the said Mr. Bourdillon any authority to receive any purchase or consideration money as aforesaid, and that I never gave him any authority to sell, nor did I contemplate selling, any of my said 120 20*l.* shares in the said company, nor has the said sum of 1,600*l.*, or any part thereof, or any purchase or consideration money paid by the said defendant Percival Spurling ever been paid or in any way accounted for to or received by me." The plaintiff's affidavit of the 29th of April 1858 was to this effect:—"1. Shortly after I instructed my stockbroker, Mr. Bourdillon, to sell the sixty new shares in the Great Indian Peninsula Railway Company, as mentioned in the fifth paragraph of my former affidavit sworn in this cause on the 28th of August 1857, the said Mr. Bourdillon informed me he had sold the said sixty new shares; such information was conveyed to me by a broker's note representing the sale as a sale of sixty such shares at one-fourth premium, which note I have searched for, but cannot find, and the same has been destroyed or lost. 2. On the 30th of July 1857, when the said Mr. Bourdillon brought me the two printed forms of deeds of transfer, and which I then signed, believing them to be deeds of transfer of the said sixty new shares, as mentioned in the sixth paragraph of my said former affidavit, the said Mr. Bourdillon informed me that the blank spaces in the said two deeds of transfer for the name of the transferee, and for the number and numbers of the said shares, could not be filled up until it was known how the shares were to be divided. From what is stated in the first paragraph of the answer of the defendants Stephen Spurling and Thomas Lynn Bristow, in this cause, I now concur with them in the belief that the words 'fifty Great Indian Peninsulas' and 'thirty Great Indian Peninsulas' were inserted in the two respective deeds of transfer in the pleadings mentioned by the said Mr. Bourdillon, but such words were not so inserted therein when such deeds respectively were executed by me; and I most positively deny that the same were so inserted therein respectively either by my direction or with my knowledge. 3. I say that the share certificates for the 120 20*l.* shares mentioned in the twenty-first paragraph of my said former affidavit were obtained by the said Mr. Bourdillon from the office of the said Great Indian Peninsula Railway Company without my authority, sanction or knowledge. The only authority which he had with respect to such shares was contained in the following letter:—

"3, Stone Buildings, Dec. 20, 1855.

"Sir,—I hereby request you will pay Mr. C. Bourdillon the dividends on my 480 shares in the Great Indian Peninsula Railway Company, and also send to him any notice relative to the said shares till further notice. I remain, Sir, your obedient servant, W. J. Tayler."

"The Secretary of the Great Indian Peninsula Railway Company."

And I believe that, under colour of that letter, and certainly without any authority from me either to him so to do or to the said company to deliver up the same, he applied for and obtained from the said company the certificates of the shares, and I had no knowledge or suspicion that such certificates had been delivered to him until I learned the same at the office of the company on the 22nd day of August 1857. 4. I say I have carefully read the affidavit of the defendants Stephen Spurling and Thomas Lynn Bristow, filed in this cause on the 10th day of September 1857, and I say that the statements and representations therein mentioned to have been made by the said Mr. Bourdillon to the said defendant Thomas Lynn Bristow, and mentioned in the eleventh paragraph of his said affidavit, as to the said Mr. Bourdillon having an account with me, in which I was indebted to him in a considerable amount for differences, are totally untrue and without foundation. 5. I positively say that I have never had any dealing, transaction or account involving differences in respect of railway or any other shares, with the said Mr. Bourdillon, or with any other broker, jobber or other person, and that such railway and other shares as I have purchased from the said Mr. Bourdillon have been purchased by me bond fide and for money, and with a view to hold the same as an investment. 6. I further say that, in the months of July and August in last year, I did not owe the said Mr. Bourdillon any sum or sums of money whatever; but, on the contrary, he was indebted to me in 120*l.*, which I had paid to him for the purpose of paying for the deposit on the sixty new shares, and the letter of allotment of which shares he contrived, as I have since discovered, to dispose of to another person. The paper writing produced to me at the time of swearing this my affidavit, and marked with the letter L, is the original cheque for the said sum of 120*l.* The name of Mastermans, with which it is crossed, is in the handwriting of the said Mr. Bourdillon. The paper writing also produced to me at the time of swearing this my affidavit, and marked with the letter M, is the original cheque, and written by me at the time, shewing, according to the fact, the person and purpose to whom and for which the cheque was given. 7. I positively say that I have never received, either directly or indirectly, from the said Mr. Bourdillon, or from any other person or persons, the consideration-moneys of 1,000*l.* and 600*l.* mentioned in the said two deeds of transfer respectively, or either of such sums, or any part or parts thereof respectively, or any other sum or sums of money whatever, in respect of the same shares. 8. Shortly after receiving the notice of transfer, dated the 5th of August 1857, of eighty shares of 20*l.* each in the said railway company mentioned in the thirteenth paragraph of my said former affidavit, I wrote to the said Charles Bourdillon, requesting an explanation with reference to the transfer of such 20*l.* shares, and in reply to my application I received from the said Charles Bourdillon two letters, dated respectively the 17th of August and the 20th of August 1857, and the following are true copies of the said letters respectively:—

“ ‘Dear Tayler,—I cannot express to you my utter amazement at your letter of this morning, and I need not tell you that I lost no time in posting off to the office, and there found, true enough, that the wrong stock had been transferred. The mistake was owing, first, to the description of the deed not having specified the 2*l.* shares in particular; secondly, the jobber, believing that I had sold him eighty, had inserted fifty in one deed and thirty in the other, and there being no such number of 2*l.* shares as eighty in your name, this circumstance had aided the mistake. I am very glad you wrote to me at once, and I am only sorry that you should have had any trouble in the matter. The fault, as far as the stock is concerned, is mine, as I ought to have inserted the right shares myself. The matter will at once be set right. I shall have to transfer twenty more 2*l.* shares myself, as the jobber insists that I sold him eighty and not sixty. However, this is no very great hardship. The money will be paid to me in the course of a day or so, and I will then place it to your account with the London Joint-Stock Bank, Western Branch. Just let me know whether you so wish it. If you had not written to me, the mistake would have been discovered by the jobber, no doubt, in a few days; however, it is as well to have the matter settled at once, and I am bound to say that the fault was principally mine. I only hope you will excuse me. Send me the notice in your next. I will forward the Bombays as soon as they come in. Indian shares are a little firmer. Yours, ever,

“ ‘C. Bourdillon.

“ 14, Throgmorton Street, 20th Aug. 1857.

“ ‘My dear Tayler,—I find there is greater difficulty in arranging this transfer matter than I had anticipated. It is clear that eighty 20*l.* shares have passed by the transfer; and, in point of fact, the jobber, to complete his part of the contract, has paid me accordingly. The only way now to rectify this is, by your allowing the transfer to pass at once, and I will, at your option, either remit you the amount, or else re-purchase and send you a transfer of a similar number of 20*l.* shares. As I am bound to admit that this has arisen through my carelessness, I should be glad if you would at once withdraw the letter you sent to the railway company, prohibiting the transfer to Mr. Spurling. The irregularities may subject me to very strong animadversion from the committee of the Stock Exchange, unless the matter is thus arranged forthwith. I regret exceedingly that the circumstance should have arisen; you may put it down to the hurry of business. You shall not be in any way damaged. Please let me have your answer per return, as no time is to be lost. Yours, truly,

“ ‘ C. Bourdillon.

‘ W. J. Tayler, Esq.’

9. I say that each of the said letters is in the handwriting of the said C. Bourdillon, with which I am well acquainted.” His Lordship, after reading the affidavits, added that, before the plaintiff’s alleged execution of the two deeds of transfer, the plaintiff was, undoubtedly, beneficial as well as legal owner of the shares in question, and his legal ownership still continued, notwithstanding these documents, and could not be affected by them. Each of them, if it was at any moment the deed of the plaintiff, ceased to be so when the addition of the words and figures, which were inserted after the plaintiff had executed it, was made. The plaintiff’s object was, that, as he never intended to sell the eighty 20*l.* shares, and as he had received no price for them, but had been grossly defrauded by Bourdillon, his broker, in which fraud the appellants, although innocently, were participators, he might be declared entitled to relief against them, and against the company itself, and be restored to his former position. To this the company entertained no objection, and Mr. P. Spurling, the transferee, one of the defendants, was indifferent; but the other defendants, S. Spurling and T. L. Bristow, who were the parties who had paid Bourdillon the 1,600*l.* purchase-money, contended that the conduct of the plaintiff had been so grossly imprudent as to prevent him from having any superior equity to themselves, and that his bill therefore ought to be dismissed. Upon this ground, then, they appealed from his Honour’s decree; but, in his Lordship’s judgment there were two impediments to the success of that appeal. The first was, that, as this suit was constituted, the defendants could not resist the title of the plaintiff without instituting a cross-suit, and this they had not done; and the other, that the appellants must have known, and must be taken to have had notice, when they accepted the shares, that additions had been made to the deeds of transfer after they were executed by the plaintiff, and that they could not acquire a title to the shares under those instruments without a subsequent act of confirmation on the plaintiff’s part. It could not be alleged that any such act had been done. He, therefore, agreed with the decree, which must be confirmed; but, under the circumstances, thought that there ought to be no costs of the appeal, except those of the company, which the appellants must be ordered to pay.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER added, that this was a bill filed by the plaintiff, to prevent the consequences of a fraud which had been practised upon him. In the Great Indian Peninsula Railway Company there existed two classes of shares—the one class, shares on which 20*l.* had been paid up, and a new issue of shares, on which 2*l.* only had been paid up. The plaintiff was the owner of 120 shares, on which the full amount of 20*l.* had been paid up, and he supposed himself to be the owner also of sixty new shares, which would in reality have belonged to him, had it not been for the previous frauds practised upon him by Mr. Bourdillon, whom he had employed as his broker. The plaintiff was desirous of selling the sixty new shares, and for that purpose he executed two printed forms of deeds of transfer, in which the number of shares to be sold, the distinguishing numbers of those shares, and the names of the transferees, were left in blank, but the stamps which the transfers bore were sufficient in value to cover a transfer of eighty of the shares on which 20*l.* had been paid up; but this was a fact which the plaintiff failed to observe. Bourdillon, the broker, then, in fraud of the plaintiff, sold eighty of the plaintiff's fully paid-up shares to Messrs. Spurling and Bristow, receiving from them as the consideration somewhere about 1,600*l.*, for which he did not account to the plaintiff. It appeared to be usual—perhaps, indeed, it was the universal practice, upon the Stock Exchange—for the broker selling shares to deliver deeds of transfer in blank, leaving the name of the buyer to be filled in when the dealer should have found a purchaser; and according to this practice, the deeds of transfer were delivered by Bourdillon to Messrs. Spurling and Bristow, filled up as to the number of shares, fifty being inserted in the one, and thirty in the other, but in blank so far as the value, distinctive numbers and the names of the transferees were concerned. The actual certificates of the plaintiff's 120 shares of 20*l.* each had remained in the possession of the company, but the broker Bourdillon, without the authority of the plaintiff, obtained them from the company and delivered them to Messrs. Spurling and Bristow, and they then transferred the shares to the defendant Mr. P. Spurling, who forthwith applied to have the transfer of the shares into his name registered in the books of the company. However, before this registration was completed, the plaintiff discovered the fraud, and filed the bill in this suit, praying thereby that the two deeds of transfer might be delivered up to him, and for an injunction to restrain the Great Indian Peninsula Railway Company from taking any steps to perfect the title of the defendant P. Spurling to the shares in question. Vice Chancellor Wood made a decree, which was, in effect, according to the terms of the prayer, and the defendants Messrs. S. Spurling and Bristow appealed against it. The case was one of those unfortunate ones in which the fraud of some third person must inflict a loss upon one of two other innocent parties, and the question was, upon which of them the loss should fall. It could not be doubted that these deeds of transfer were not the deeds of the plaintiff; on this point there could be no question: it was clear that these shares were not transferred by them, for the law was settled upon this subject, and the safety of property depended upon it. This case was indeed a remarkable instance of the value of the existing rule of law upon the subject. To permit the practice of stock-brokers and stock-jobbers to prevail against such a rule was entirely out of the question; brokers must, like all other persons, be bound by the law, and must observe its rules. The Court had to consider what was the consequence of this rule as affecting the case before them. The plaintiff's legal title to these shares remained wholly undisturbed, and that being so, and he being the legal owner, he was entitled to the relief he sought, unless indeed he not merely wanted equity—for the mere want of equity in him ought to have been the subject of a fresh suit, or of a cross-suit—but unless he had in some manner disentitled himself to sue in this court for relief. It was said by the appellants that the plaintiff had so disentitled himself by his imprudence in executing the deeds of transfer in blank, that a principal could limit at his pleasure the authority of his agent, and that the plaintiff by his conduct had enabled a fraud to be committed on a third party. Cases were cited to shew that the authority given to an agent could not be limited by private instructions, and that he whose negligence had occasioned the loss must be the party to bear it. These were, no doubt, good, sound principles; and he desired to say nothing which should weaken them; but the question in this case was, not as to the principles themselves, but as to their application. Such principles were established to protect persons who might otherwise be defrauded, and not to facilitate the commission of frauds. They might, perhaps, have applied in the present case if Bourdillon had filled up the numbers of the shares in the books of the company, and the names of the transferees; but to apply them in favour of the defendants here would be to apply them in favour of those who could not be defrauded—persons who accepted deeds knowing that they had no legal validity. It would be stretching the rules beyond the reasons on which they were founded. The defendants having knowingly taken the shares without a legal title, could not be allowed thus to protect themselves, and they must bear the consequences; but he agreed with his learned Brother in thinking that there had been so much negligence on the part of the plaintiff, that there ought to be no costs to him. The deposit alone would be paid over to the respondent, the plaintiff; and the other defendants must pay the costs of the company.

LORDS JUSTICES. }
June 14, 15, 30. } PAYNE v. MORTIMER.

Voluntary Bond—Marriage Settlement—Debtor and Creditor.

A father having given a voluntary bond to trustees, conditioned for the payment after his death of a sum of money to them for the benefit of his two sons, afterwards, upon the marriages of his sons, assented to such bond being settled upon trust for the benefit of these sons and their respective wives and children. The marriages having taken place upon the faith of the provision thus assented to, one of the Vice Chancellors, in a suit for the administration of the father's estate, held that the trustees of the marriage settlement were entitled to rank as specialty creditors for value, and the Lords Justices, on appeal, affirmed the decision.

The cases of George v. Milbanke (1); and The East India Company v. Clavell (2) observed upon.

This was an appeal from a decision of Vice Chancellor Stuart, reported ante, p. 437, where the facts appear. The following is an epitome of them. The late Mr. Edward Horlock Mortimer, in the year 1842, being then believed to be quite solvent, covenanted with trustees on the marriage of his daughter to pay for her benefit an annuity of 200*l.*, and that his executors should, on his decease, pay them 5,000*l.* for the benefit of his daughter and her children. In the same year he entered into a voluntary bond in the penal sum of 57,200*l.* with three trustees, by way of provision for his six children. In 1843, two of his sons being about to marry, various communications took place between the testator and the relatives of the intended wives, when he informed them of the fact of the giving of the bond to the trustees for the benefit of his children, and that his sons could give a bond which he trusted would be satisfactory. A copy of the voluntary bond was then forwarded to the parties and marriage settlements were made in October 1843, by which the sons assigned their interest in the bond to trustees (the obligor not being a party) upon trust for the wives and their children respectively. The marriages were solemnized, and the obligor died in the year 1857 in insolvent circumstances. A suit was instituted for the administration of his estate, and the trustees of the settlements claimed to be allowed to rank against his estate, which consisted wholly of personalty, as specialty creditors for value, which Vice Chancellor Stuart, overruling his chief clerk's certificate, allowed, whereupon the plaintiffs appealed from his Honour's decision. Among the evidence was that of Mr. Payne's solicitor, who deposed that the two marriages of the sons took place on the faith of the provision made by Mr. Mortimer for them.

Mr. Malins and Mr. Schomberg supported the appeal.—They argued that the debt on the testator's estate was one merely voluntary, and that as it was so in the hands of the original obligee of the bond, no subsequent dealing by any parties with it could in any manner alter its nature or character, unless the obligor himself took part in those dealings, which in this case Mr. Mortimer, the obligor, had not done, he being no party to the settlements made on the marriage of his two sons. It was impossible to draw any well-grounded distinction between the consideration of marriage and any other valuable consideration. With regard to the reported cases bearing on this question, it was to be observed that not one of them was a pure simple debt incurred, but was either having reference to some specific matter or thing, as, for instance, to particular lands, to a share of ascertained property, to a policy of assurance, to a deposit of deeds, or some

Mr. Fooks, for other parties, supported the appeal.

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Freeling, for the respondents, relied upon the case on which the Vice Chancellor grounded his judgment, namely, George v. Milbanke, and contended that the charge was a binding one as a specialty debt against the testator's assets. They insisted that as where real estate, or any other specific thing, was the subject, an assignee for value would prevail, a bond on covenant could not be otherwise treated; and that it appeared from the authorities that a promissory note or bill of exchange, duly negotiated, would confer a similar right. June 30.—LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.
—In the year 1842, the late Mr. Mortimer, of whose assets in this case we have to dispose, entered into a covenant for the payment of 5,000*l.* after his death for certain purposes. This was contained in his daughter's settlement, which was in consideration and in contemplation of her marriage, which afterwards took place, I believe in the same year. Mr. Mortimer died in 1857, and in that or the next year the trustees of the covenant became immediate creditors on the assets for this sum of 5,000*l.*—specialty creditors, of course, for value. It appears, also, that in 1842, the year of his daughter's settlement and marriage, but after the marriage, Mr. Mortimer executed a voluntary bond for securing a large sum of money, to be paid upon, or soon after, his death, for the benefit of some of his children. There was, I repeat, no valuable consideration, but the transaction is not proved to have been an unfair one. The obligor certainly was bound by the bond; and it does not appear that when he executed it he was insolvent, or contemplated insolvency, or expected or believed that he should die insolvent, though in fact he did, more than fourteen years afterwards, die insolvent. It is conceded that, in this jurisdiction, some portion of the bond debt must, on the ground of absence of valuable consideration, be postponed to the covenant debt; but it appears that two of the sons beneficially interested under the bond did, in the testator's lifetime, assign their portions or parts of their portions of the bond debt, on the occasion, and in contemplation, of the respective marriages of these two sons; and therefore for value. This happened in the year 1843, and for the interests in the voluntary bond debt, thus assigned for valuable consideration, a claim is made to equal rank in equity against the assets with the covenant debt. Such is the dispute before us. Now, clearly at law, the covenant debt, and the whole of the bond debt, being both specialty debts, stand on an equal footing. For no purpose of an action, for no purpose merely legal, is the bond, wholly or partially, less entitled to payment, or, if I may so express myself, of lower rank than the covenant, of which the original consideration was valuable. The controversy for priority is one arising and to be decided upon rules of equitable as distinguished from those of legal administration, and certainly the rules of equitable administration do sometimes make an important distinction between debts for value and debts incurred voluntarily, which in all other respects stand on the same footing. But the point for decision here is, whether a specialty debt created voluntarily, but during the life of the debtor assigned for value by the creditor to a third person, the owner of it accordingly in equity at the time of the debtor's death, is obnoxious to the equitable rule of administration, which prefers, or generally prefers, debts for value to debts of the same or of a higher class not for value? I think that it is not; my opinion being, that the difference between the present case and such a case as that of George v. Milbanke, on which Sir William Grant has observed particularly in Daubeny v. Cockburn, is a difference of accident merely, and not essential. The principle—I think the rational and correct principle—on which George v. Milbanke was decided, applies, in my judgment, to the present dispute, and determines it. The fact that neither of the debts in the present instance was payable in the debtor's lifetime is, I think, immaterial; nor do I consider the well-known principle or rule on which Cator v. Burke (6), and other decisions of that class, proceeded, to have any application here in favour of the covenant debt. The dispute is only between general creditors of a deceased debtor—one saying that he ought to be paid out of the assets in preference to the other, which the other denies. But the debtor's estate is not concerned in the matter, since to its extent it is liable to pay the whole of each debt. Prima facie all specialty creditors of a deceased person stand equally as claimants against his assets. If one among them asserts a right in equity superior to the rest—a right incapable of assertion at law—a right which the law does not acknowledge—it is for him to establish it. This the covenant creditors have done, I conceive, with regard to the unassigned parts of the bond debt, but not with regard to the parts of it assigned for value. The circumstance that in one instance the valuable consideration was by immediate contract with the debtor, and in the other not so, but by a contract in his lifetime with the equitable owner of parts of the debt, originally voluntary—a contract made after the debt had been incurred, though it was not to be paid in the debtor's lifetime—is, in my judgment, for every present purpose immaterial; I concur, therefore, in the Vice Chancellor's conclusion. It may be superfluous to add, that I lay no stress on any communication made by or to the obligor after the execution of the bond.

(3) 7 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 98.

(5) 4 H.L. Cas. 1039.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—This is a question whether a voluntary bond assigned for value ought, in the administration of assets, to stand upon the same footing as a bond originally given for value? The Vice Chancellor Sir John Stuart has been of opinion that it ought, and I agree in that opinion. It was not denied on the part of the general creditors on whose behalf the case was argued, that in the absence of fraud, a voluntary assignment of personal estate is made good against creditors by a subsequent assignment of it for valuable consideration. But it was said that this was only by operation of the statute of Elizabeth, preventing the author of the voluntary instrument from disputing the right of the assignee for value, and that the assignment for value could not change the nature of the original debt, and convert an obligation which was voluntary in its inception into an obligation for valuable consideration. Lord Eldon, however, in George v. Milbanke, did not put the case upon the statute of Elizabeth. He had regard, no doubt, and, indeed, the report shews, although but obscurely, that he had regard to the proviso in the statute which protects assignees for value only in the case of absence of notice, and he puts the case upon the ground of the assignee for value having a better equity than the general creditors of the settlor. It may be worth observing that the proviso in the statute of 13 Eliz. c. 5. is in these terms: "Provided also, and be it enacted by the authority aforesaid, that this act, or anything therein contained, shall not extend to any estate or interest in lands, tenements, hereditaments, leases, rents, commons, profits, goods or chattels, had, made, conveyed or assured, or hereafter to be had, made, conveyed or assured, which estate or interest is or shall be upon good consideration, and bona fide lawfully conveyed or assured to any person or persons, or bodies politic or corporate, not having at the time of such conveyance or assurance to them made, any manner of notice or knowledge of such covin, fraud or collusion as aforesaid." And upon referring to Lord Eldon's judgment in George v. Milbanke, it is to be observed that he, when the cause first came on, desired it to stand over to look into the case of The East India Company v. Clavell, and in that part of his judgment, I find him saying this, "I doubt whether it will not be found in the circumstances of that case that the child was not a pure volunteer. If it can be supported, as here stated, it goes a great way to decide this case; for, though this is the case of a stranger, there is no difference between a voluntary settlement made good by a subsequent marriage, and one made good by a subsequent advance of money. There is a good deal of difficulty in supporting it upon anything but the subsequent transaction. The circumstances of notice are not immaterial. What Mark Milbanke"—that should be, What Sir Ralph Milbanke—"gave by that deed was a direction to the trustees to raise a sum of money. The person taking under that direction has clear notice what he is to take; and that, if the party from whom he takes was himself claiming that interest, it would be subject to the debts. Then, it is said, they had not notice of the situation of Sir Ralph Milbanke, and that the state of his affairs was such as to make it probable this might be resorted to as part of his assets. That is only notice that it might be so or not, for it depends upon the state of his affairs, not at the time of that transaction, but at his death." So that Lord Eldon there refers to the point of notice, and I have no doubt that what was passing through his mind on the subject had reference to the proviso in the statute of the 13 Eliz. c. 5, of the effect of notice binding an alienee for value, and taking the case out of the protection given by that proviso.

I think, therefore, the principle on which Lord Eldon decided the case of George v. Milbanke reaches the present case. The bond constitutes a good specialty debt at law against the obligor; and the question is, whether this Court is to cut it down against the alienee for value in favour of the general creditors? The case of The East India Company v. Clavell is to be found in the registrar's minute-book under the title of The East India Company v. Sheppard, and I think it extremely probable that Lord Eldon did not see the decree in The East India Company v. Clavell, as it is not entered in the registrar's book, but is to be found in the registrar's minute-book. That case was much relied on on behalf of the creditors, as shewing that Mr. Clavell—who in that case had become entitled by marriage to 5,000*l.*, secured by a voluntary attilement—was postponed to the East India Company, who were bond-creditors of the settlor. But the case, even as reported, has no application to the present, for the settlement, whether voluntary or not, was not held to be void against the creditors of the settlor, and could not be so held, the East India Company not being creditors at the date of it. And, upon reference to the registrar's minute of the case, with a copy of which I have been favoured, it appears that the facts are not fully stated in the Reports. There was there a term of 1,000 years for raising this 5,000*l.* for the benefit of one of the daughters of Sir Edward Littleton, who married Mr. Clavell; and the case was, that the settlement by which this 5,000*l.* had been voluntarily settled for the benefit of the daughter was produced to Mr. Clavell on the marriage, and it was said he married on the faith of that settlement. It appears that one of the trusts of that term of 1,000 years in that case was to raise 2,000*l.* for payment of such debts as Sir Edward Littleton should appoint. Now, Sir Edward Littleton had entered into articles with the company, by which he had bound himself to account, of course, for what he should receive in the course of the duties of the office to which he was appointed; and he had not only entered into that covenant, but had given a bond in the penalty of 2,000*l.* for performance of articles, in which Sheppard, the defendant, I think, had joined as surety. Now, it appears by the registrar's minute-book that that bond was conditioned only for the due management of Sir Edward Littleton during five years only, and the decree was for an account of the losses sustained by the East India Company during the five years, and of what satisfaction the company had received. What they had received during the five years or afterwards was to go towards satisfying their losses, and what should be remaining due was to be satisfied out of Sir Edward's personal estate; and if the personal estate should be deficient, the deficiency, not exceeding 2,000*l.*, was to be made good out of the monies to be raised by the sale of the term—taking that very sum of 2,000*l.*, not as the penalty of the bond, as it would appear in the reports in Gilbert and in Precedents in Chancery, but as the sum of 2,000*l.*, which was secured by the trusts of the term. A sale was directed of the fee in the estate, and the Master was to estimate the difference between the value of the term and the value of the fee. That difference, together with the 2,000*l.*, was ordered to be set apart to abide the result of the account; that is, put out on security according to the then practice of the Court—not paid into court, but secured in order to abide the result of what might be found due from Sir Edward Littleton to the East India Company; and the surplus of the monies arising from the sale was ordered to be applied according to the decree in Mr. Clavell's suit, that is, in payment of the 5,000*l.* for which he had got the decree. Then, if the company should appear to have received more than would satisfy their losses during the five years, the surplus was to be applied to the general account between them and Sir Edward Littleton, and any deficiency of the surplus to answer what might be due on the general account was to be made good out of the residue of the personal estate not applied to the losses during the five years; and the question was reserved whether, if this residue of the personal estate should not be sufficient to answer what was due on the general account, the 1,000 years' term ought not to be made liable, not to the satisfaction of all the debts, but "to the satisfaction thereof" (that is, of the deficiency) so far as any part of the personal estate had been applied in respect of the 1,000 years' term towards satisfaction of the losses during the five years, in the case of marshalling. The value of the inheritance was also to be subject to the company's satisfaction, so far as it should appear that they had any subsisting demand against Sir Edward Littleton which could affect his inheritance. It is clear, therefore, in that case that Mr. Clavell was not postponed to the company except to the extent of 2,000*l.*, secured by the term for the payment of debts, and that the case does not, either as reported, or upon the more accurate statement to be found in the registrar's minute-book, furnish any authority whatever in favour of the general creditors. This appeal must consequently be dismissed, and, I think, dismissed with costs.

Practice—Trial by Jury.

In cases requiring a jury under the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 27, the practice of the Court in granting issues will be followed; and therefore before the hearing the Court will not summon a jury without the consent of the defendant.

This was a motion for the appointment of a jury to try a question of fact. The affidavit made in support of the motion stated that there was a conflict of testimony between the parties, and that the truth could only be ascertained by the examination of witnesses before a jury.

Mr. W. Morris, in support of the motion.—If the application is refused, the parties will have to proceed to a hearing, and the evidence must be taken either by affidavits or before the examiner, but without any beneficial result; and the expense will be incurred without benefit.

Mr. De Gez, for the defendant, stated that he was instructed to oppose the application.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—It is impossible to grant this motion without consent at this stage of the proceedings. It would be necessary to hear the case upon the evidence to determine whether it would be necessary to require the assistance of a jury. There must be a ground for the application; it cannot be made ex parte. The 21 & 22 Vict. c. 27. has enabled the Court to do by a jury what it formerly did by issue. The practice, therefore, of the Court in granting issues must be followed. Then, after answer, if counsel on both sides state that the facts are so complicated, or that the testimony is so conflicting, that it would be impossible satisfactorily to decide the question without an issue, the Court will immediately make the order. And in the present case, if counsel on both sides will assure me that the case is such as to make it desirable that it should be tried by a jury, I will make the order before the hearing; but that cannot be done in the absence of consent. As the question is new, the costs must be costs in the cause.

W. was induced, on the representation of the secretary of a joint-stock company that there were to be two medical referees, and that he might be appointed one, to take 200 shares, whereupon he was appointed to the office. Soon afterwards W. discovered that there were four instead of two medical referees, on which he resigned his office and demanded back the money he had paid for the shares. By the deed of settlement it was provided that if any shareholder did not pay his calls the secretary might send notice requiring payment within twenty-one days, and if the calls were not paid the directors might declare the shares forfeited. W. (under the foregoing circumstances) refused to pay his calls, and the secretary sent him the required notice, and added that if the calls were not paid within twenty-one days his shares would be forfeited. W. made default, and took no further notice of the matter, and the directors within the twenty-one days declared a forfeiture, but allowed W.'s name to remain on the share register for more than two years, when the company was wound up. One of the Vice Chancellors decided that there had been no such misrepresentation by the company as absolved W. from liability as a shareholder, and that upon the construction of the deed of settlement the forfeiture of the shares had not been completed, and that W.'s name must be placed on the list of contributories. On appeal, it was held, (affirming His Honour's decision) that there was no such misrepresentation or breach of faith as would exonerate W; but (reversing the same decision) that there had been an absolute forfeiture submitted to by W, whose name must therefore be removed from the list.

Their Lordships also held, that whether the directors declared the forfeiture before or after the twenty-one days was a matter of form and not of substance.

This was an appeal from a decision of Vice Chancellor Kindersley, on an adjourned summons from chambers, refusing to remove the name of Dr. Wollaston from the list of contributories, upon which he had been placed by the chief clerk of his Honour.

The Home Counties and General Life Assurance Company was established in 1853.

The deed of settlement was dated the 30th of July in that year, and the company was registered on the 10th of August following. The shares were 1*l.* each, payable in two instalments.

The two important clauses of the deed were the 101st and 103rd, which were respectively as follows:—

101st. "That in case any shareholder shall refuse or neglect to pay such further sum of 10*s.* per share, or any part thereof, as and when called for, in pursuance of the last preceding clause hereof, with interest, if any, payable thereon, and shall continue in such default for the space of two calendar months after the day appointed for the payment thereof, the secretary shall send to such shareholder a notice in writing, specifying the amount due and requiring payment thereof within twenty-one days from the date of such

...e, on pain of forfeiture; and if such sum be not paid within the time so specified, it shall be lawful for the directors to declare the share or shares in respect of which the sum and interest, if any, or any part thereof, shall remain unpaid, to be forfeited, and the same shall be forfeited accordingly to the use of the company."

By the 103rd clause it was provided that the company should be at liberty, if the directors should think fit, to sue for and compel payment of the sums for non-payment whereof any shares should have been forfeited, notwithstanding such forfeiture, and without prejudice thereto.

The particular circumstances of Dr. Wollaston's case may be stated in the following narrative:—

In the early part of the month of January 1854, Mr. Rathbone, one of the directors, called upon Dr. Wollaston and requested him to become the medical referee of the company. He represented that there were to be two, one of whom was Mr. Squire, and that the medical business of the company would be equally divided between such two referees, and estimated that the Doctor's share would be, for the first year, about 400*l.* or 500*l.* On the 28th of the same month Mr. Durnford, the secretary, told Dr. Wollaston that he was appointed one of the two medical referees, and assured him that no more than two would be appointed, the whole of the medical business being divided between them. Dr. Wollaston thereupon consented to act, and Mr. Durnford produced the deed of settlement, and asked him to sign for 200 shares. Dr. Wollaston said that Mr. Rathbone had said nothing of the taking of shares, and thereupon he declined to sign; but upon Mr. Durnford saying that all the office-bearers were required to take shares, which all had hitherto done, and that the Doctor had better take, at any rate, a few, Dr. Wollaston signed for ten shares.

On the 30th of the same month, the directors passed a resolution that Dr. Wollaston, having been proposed by Mr. Rathbone as medical examiner of the company, and appointed, such appointment be confirmed; and that he should be the medical officer of the company upon and from the day of his execution of the deed for an amount of not less than 200 shares, and that he should be paid one guinea for every case reported by him to the company. Mr. Durnford, on the 31st, called on Dr. Wollaston and told him that unless he took 100 shares in the company he could not expect to be appointed one of the two medical referees, and thus Dr. Wollaston consented to sign the deed for another ninety shares. On the 9th of February 1854, Mr. Durnford again called on Dr. Wollaston, and told him that the directors said they could not consent to his appointment unless he took 200 shares; that all the office-bearers of the company were required to take, and had taken, that amount of shares; and that upon Dr. Wollaston's taking that number of shares he would be appointed one of the two medical referees; and that the medical business of the company would be divided equally between him and the other referee. Dr. Wollaston then, in consideration of his appointment as such medical officer, signed the deed for another 100 shares; and paid the company 100*l.* as a first call of 10*s.* on the 200 shares.

Dr. Wollaston saw some patients, and made a journey, by Mr. Durnford's direction, to see a patient sixteen miles distant, and reported on the case to the company. He attended three board days, and was then informed that he need not attend on those days of meeting, but that the directors would send for him when they required him. He observed on the last day of his attendance at the board, that the printed prospectus of the company stated that there were four medical referees—viz. Drs. Hutchinson, Scanlan, Squire and himself. Finding that the directors never sent for him, he, on the 8th of August 1854, tendered his resignation as medical referee, and demanded back his 100*l.* The company did not return that sum; but the directors repeatedly pressed him for payment of the rest of the calls. He put the affair in the hands of his solicitor, considering himself, on account of the fraud practised by him, no longer a shareholder in the company. Dr. Wollaston's solicitor accordingly wrote to the company, plainly repudiating the shares; and the company, on the 14th of October 1854, replied that the 100*l.* call-money was not paid on before Wednesday then next ensuing, they must commence legal proceedings for the recovery of it. Those proceedings, however, were never commenced; but on the 9th of May 1855 a resolution was passed, to the effect that those shareholders who had not fully paid and satisfied the respective calls upon their subscribed shares should receive notice to do so forthwith, and that unless the said shares were fully paid and satisfied within twenty-one days from the date of the notice, then and in such case the said unpaid shares should be immediately forfeited to the sole and exclusive use of the company, under and by virtue of the 101st clause of the deed of settlement. On the 5th of June 1855 they sent a notice of that resolution to Dr. Wollaston's solicitor, and demanding the payment of the 100*l.* within twenty-one days from the date of the notice.

At the same time the secretary wrote to Dr. Wollaston the following letter:—

"29, New Bridge Street, Blackfriars,
June 5, 1855.

"Sir,—In accordance with a resolution of the board of directors, passed on the 9th of May 1855, I now beg to give you notice that unless the call of 100*l.* on 200 shares subscribed for and held by you in this company be fully paid within twenty-one days from this date, then and in that case the said 200 shares will be immediately forfeited to the sole and exclusive use of the company, and that your interest in the same will finally cease. Annexed is a copy of the resolution.

"I am, sir, yours, &c.

"(Signed) John Mills, Secretary."

Before the expiration of the twenty-one days, they declared the shares of Dr. Wollaston forfeited. The 100*l.* was never paid, and no communication of any kind passed between the parties. The company made no further declaration of forfeiture, and took no steps to enforce payment of the call due. They continued carrying on business as usual, until a petition was presented in December 1857 to have the company wound up, and on the 15th of January 1858 an order absolute to that effect was made by Vice Chancellor Kindersley. Upon searching the register-book of shareholders, it was found that Dr. Wollaston's name had never been removed, but that he was still entered as the holder of 200 shares. It also appeared that in none of the returns made in each half-year by the company of all persons who had ceased to be shareholders, in pursuance of the 11th section, 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, did Dr. Wollaston's name appear. The section is this:—"That in the months of January and July in every year the directors of every joint-stock company completely registered under this Act shall make the following returns to the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies, namely, a return, &c. . . . of every transfer of any share in such company which shall have been made since the preceding half-yearly return, &c. . . . and which shall have come to the knowledge of the directors; and also a return, &c. . . . of the names and places of abode of all persons who shall either have ceased to be shareholders of such company, or have become shareholders of such company otherwise than by a transfer as aforesaid, since the preceding half-yearly return, &c. . . . and if within any such period any such return be not made, then, on conviction thereof, every director of such company shall be liable to pay a sum not exceeding 20*l.*"

The chief clerk placed the name of Dr. Wollaston on the list of contributories, which was affirmed by the Vice Chancellor (1), and from that decision Dr. Wollaston

(1) As the Lords Justices differed from the Vice Chancellor on the question of forfeiture of the shares, it seems proper to insert his Honour's judgment, which was as follows:—Everything that could be said on behalf of Dr. Wollaston in this case has been said; but still, notwithstanding all that, I am of opinion that his name must be retained upon the list of contributories to this company. I do not think that he is entitled, notwithstanding the circumstances under which he became a shareholder in it, to say that he is not now liable as a contributory. The case was contested upon two grounds: one, that there was misrepresentation on the part of the company; the other, that his shares were forfeited. With regard to the first ground, on the plainest principles, no man can enforce against another a contract into which he has fraudulently led that other person; and on the same plain principle, a body of men, a company, cannot, quæ company, enforce against any man a contract into which he may have been so led by them. The question then is, what constitutes a fraudulent representation by the company? You cannot, of course, have the representation of each individual shareholder in the company; and, therefore, the difficulty always is to say appealed. It appeared from the evidence that of the office bearers of the company, thirteen in number (exclusive of the bankers), when Dr. Wollaston took his shares, only five held 200 shares, seven held only 100 shares, and one only 50 shares.

what ought to be treated as a representation of the company or body of men composing it? In Brockwell's case (1) I thought it justice that where directors, whose duty it is to make reports to the company, make fraudulent statements in their reports, and the company adopts those reports, they cannot be entitled to insist upon the performance of a contract into which, upon the faith of those fraudulent reports being correct, another person may have entered with them. In Nicol's case (2) the learned Judges were not all of the same opinion. The Lord Chancellor thought the representation was not that of the company. I think Lord Justice Knight Bruce was also of that opinion, or inclined towards it. But Lord Justice Turner seemed to be of a different opinion. The case was, however, decided on another point. What I have to determine here is, whether there was a representation by the company, on the faith of which Dr. Wollaston became a shareholder; and whether that representation, if any, was false. Now, in the first place, there does not appear to have been—nor do I understand that it was contended that there was—any misrepresentation by Mr. Rathbone. He only told Dr. Wollaston that he could get him appointed as one of two medical referees, and that the probable income of his appointment would be for the first year about 400*l.* or 500*l.* At all events it does not appear that there was any wilful misrepresentation by Rathbone. Well, then, how stood the case when Durnford called upon Dr. Wollaston? Why, as it seems to me, thus. His appointment was not then, in reality, in any way dependent on his taking shares. He signed the deed for ten shares on the 28th of January 1854. On the 30th the directors signed the resolution appointing him the medical examiner of the company at a salary of a guinea for every case reported upon, and from the day of his executing the deed for an amount of not less than 200 shares. That resolution was on the 30th of January 1854. At that time Dr. Wollaston had not been led to take, and had not taken, the 200 shares. He took those subsequently. The conduct of Mr. Durnford appears to me to have been very much like that of a person "tickling a trout," and if it had or could have had no other effect, it certainly should have put Dr. Wollaston on his guard. It did not, however, produce that result, and Dr. Wollaston signed the deed for the 200 shares. Well, but then, admitting that he did so on the faith of a representation made to him by Durnford, and that that representation was false, was it such a false representation of the company as to justify the Court in holding Dr. Wollaston not to be a contributory? Brockwell's case was plain. There the

Mr. Glasse and Mr. Brooksbank, for the appellant, argued that Dr. Wollaston had signed the deed of settlement for shares under an entire misconception, and also under very serious misrepresentations made to him by the secretary, for whose misrepresentations the company were answerable, concern was manifestly insolvent at the time the representation was made; and yet the report was of a most flourishing and successful character. Now that report, made as it was in that case, was clearly a false and fraudulent misrepresentation. I think that in this case, even assuming the directors to have authorized Durnford to make the statements he did—though, in truth, that is not quite consistent with the resolution of the 30th of January 1854—still, assuming that, I think they amount only to this: that Durnford told Dr. Wollaston, if he would become a shareholder, he would be made one of the two medical officers of the company. What does Dr. Wollaston then do? He does not, notwithstanding the peculiarity of Durnford's conduct, go to the office for information, but he signs the deed, and becomes a shareholder. He then finds there are more than two medical officers appointed. How far that might have been a breach of the agreement with him is a different question; whether it would have entitled him to recover in respect of it is one thing—but to say that, having signed the deed and taken the 200 shares, he is not a shareholder because there were really four, instead of, as he was informed there were to be, only two medical officers, is quite another thing. On this first ground I think there is no proof of false representation by the company, and Dr. Wollaston's name must still be retained on the list of contributories. Then, as to the second ground, that of forfeiture. I must confess the tendency of my mind has been very strong, not to allow a mere deviation in some small technicality, some small and unimportant form, to relieve persons from a responsibility to which they would clearly be liable if that technicality or that form had been strictly pursued. But what is the case here? Were the directors justified in acting as they did? The clause of forfeiture, as I understand it, says, the directors are to wait two months after the day appointed, by resolution and notice, for the payment thereof, and then to declare a forfeiture of the shares if the money be not paid. Here the resolution was on the 9th of May 1855, and the notice of forfeiture on the 5th of June 1855. This declaration of forfeiture was then made within the twenty-one days from the date of the notice. That declaration, therefore, was one they had no power by their deed to make as they have made it. It is therefore bad, and they have not complied with the requisitions of the deed. The shares, in fact, never were forfeited. Now this conduct of theirs was not, in truth, a mere formal non-observance of the deed; it was a neglect of its substantial provisions. On this ground, then, as I think there was no forfeiture of the shares, Dr. Wollaston cannot be exonerated; and I may add that his sending in his resignation as medical referee could not in any his acts as authorized agent being binding upon them. It was a breach of faith, too, in the directors not to perform the promises which had been made on their behalf by the secretary. Dr. Wollaston had taken the shares on the faith and on the condition that he should be appointed one of two medical referees, and yet as soon as he had bound himself by the execution of the deed, no less than four of such officers appeared to have been appointed. Such a condition being violated operated as a release of Dr. Wollaston of his liability, which principle had been adopted by their Lordships in the unreported case of Ex parte Wood, in re the Sunken Vessels Recovery Company (2). It was decided by Vice Chancellor Kindersley in Brockwell's case (3), that the falsehood of a report issued by directors, on the faith of which a party became a holder of shares, relieved him from liability, and in the present case the same principle ought to be applied, for here the misrepresentations, instead of being contained in a report, prospectus, or such like document, were actually made to the shareholder. From a series of authorities, it was plain that misrepresentation made by the secretary will bind the directors, and the acts of the directors legitimately performed will bind the company, as Ex parte Nicol (4), Holt's case (5), Bell's case (6), Ayre's case (7), and in the observations of Lord St. Leonards in delivering judgment in The National Exchange Company of Glasgow v. Drew (8). This was a purchase made, not as in a market, but directly from the directors—The Liverpool Borough Bank, ex parte Duranty (9), and there being a taint of misrepresentation, Dr. Wollaston ought to be relieved from all consequences. If, however, the appellant was not for these reasons relieved, way exonerate him from his liability as a shareholder. His name must, on both grounds, be retained on the list of contributories, and the official manager must have his costs out of the estate.

he certainly ought to be by reason of the forfeiture made by the directors. If in strictness these gentlemen ought to have proceeded at the end of twenty-one days to declare formally the forfeiture of the shares, what they did was in substance the same thing, and the appellant had no power to compel them to perform that act. Dr. Wollaston for a space of more than two years had repudiated the shares and refused to recognize any liability upon them, and in that conduct the directors, without complaint, acquiesced, and the declaration, which according to the strict grammatical construction of the 101st clause of the deed of settlement, ought to have followed the expiration of the twenty-one days and the default, was only made in advance and before the default had taken place. If the declaration of forfeiture was within the powers of the directors, which in this case it plainly was, the present came strictly within the reported cases of Richmond's Executors (10), Beresford's case (11) and White's case (12). In the present instance there was no collusion, nor was the forfeiture intended for the appellant's benefit, as in Richmond's case (13), and the forfeiture had been entirely acquiesced in—Barton's case (14).

[LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE said that as both members of the Court were of opinion that the alleged misrepresentations amounted to nothing, the respondent's counsel might confine his argument to the question of forfeiture.]

[LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—Dr. Wollaston acted as medical referee, and whatever breach of contract there was, it does not affect his liability as a shareholder.]

Mr. W. D. Lewis and Mr. J. N. Higgins argued that the declaration of forfeiture by the constitution of the deed of settlement should have been, and to be effectual must be, by a subsequent act, and therefore the act in that respect done by the directors was of no avail. The question was one, not of form merely, but essentially of substance, for the deed gave power to the directors to threaten forfeiture, and they had done so here, and they still retained the power at their discretion to say whether they would absolutely forfeit shares of defaulting shareholders. What, it might reasonably be asked, was the meaning of the directors allowing Dr. Wollaston's name to remain on the share-list after he had refused to pay, but that the directors knew they had not performed the solemn act of forfeiting his shares? and it would make this fact the more conspicuous when it was recollected that the Doctor's name was uniformly omitted, as a party who had ceased to hold shares, in the return made to the Government under the 11th section of the statute 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110. By the 13th section of the same act it was provided that, until the return of the transfer of any share should have been made, the person whose share should have been thereby transferred should, so far as respected his liability to the debts and engagements of the company, be deemed to continue a shareholder of such company. The resolution of the 9th of May 1855 was addressed to numerous shareholders; could it have been intended to declare forfeiture against persons whose names could not possibly until twenty-one days after notice be ascertained? There must be mutuality between the parties; and as the shareholder had twenty-one days in which to decide whether he should incur the risk of forfeiture or not, so the company was entitled to the same delay before they absolutely confiscated the shares. The position of the company might be materially changed within that time, and it might be, therefore, more beneficial to maintain the liability of the shareholder than to release him by forfeiture. For these reasons, it was contended that the declaration of forfeiture was invalid, and Dr. Wollaston was still liable.

Mr. Glasse, in reply, observed, that counsel for the directors could hardly be permitted to claim any advantage from their (the directors,) own laches in not making a correct return. The shareholders, moreover, had no power conferred upon them of compelling the directors to rectify any mistakes in the Share Register; that power not having been conferred until the passing of the statute 19 & 20 Vict. c. 47, which did not take place until 1856.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—I think that the directors had power to create and declare a forfeiture of the shares in question in the events that have occurred. I think they intended to exercise and execute that power, and I think, in their manner of exercising it, in their mode of executing it, there has been no substantial excess and no material deviation from their proper functions. The forfeiture seems, as I have already said, to have been intended. It seems to have been submitted to, and on that ground (respectfully differing from the learned Judge before whom this has been, although agreeing with him altogether on the other point) I am of opinion that Dr. Wollaston's name ought to be removed from the list of contributories; but he has added so much useless matter to the case, that I do not think he ought to have any costs.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—I think also the appellant's name must be removed from the list of contributories. By the deed, in case any shareholder refuses or neglects to pay for the period of two months after the call is made, the secretary is to send the shareholder notice in writing, specifying the amount, and requiring payment within twenty-one days from the date of the notice on pain of forfeiture. The argument on that was, not that he must pay within twenty-one days on pain of forfeiture, but that he must have an absolute and unqualified notice, that if he did not pay within the twenty-one days the shares would be absolutely and irremediably forfeited to the sole and exclusive use of the company. The directors by that, therefore, made a clear and direct declaration of forfeiture, by the notice they had given him, and they left that declaration in force for a period of above two years. But it is said that they have no power to do this, because by the latter part of the same clause it is provided, "if the amount be not paid within the time specified, it shall be lawful for the directors to declare the share or shares in respect of which such sum and interest shall then remain unpaid, to be forfeited, and the same shall be forfeited accordingly to the use of the company." It is said that the declaration of forfeiture could not be made by the requisition made to the shareholder to pay on pain of forfeiture, but that it must be made after the twenty-one days had expired. It may be so in strictness, but it is a question of form and not of substance, unless it can be shewn that as to the declaration it was material to all the parties interested in this company that the directors should make the declaration at the end of the twenty-one days, and should not make it before the expiration of the twenty-one days. I cannot see that it would make any material difference in the exercise of the discretion of the directors, whether they declared the forfeiture before the expiration of the twenty-one days, or whether they declared the forfeiture from the end of the twenty-one days. Looking upon it, therefore, as a question of form, not of substance, I am of opinion that there has been, what it was clearly intended there should be, a forfeiture of the shares within the provisions of the deed. I think, therefore, that this gentleman's name must be struck out of the list of contributories. I fully agree that there should be no costs in the case, and I confess I view with some regret the case itself.

July 11, 13. { PANY.

Canal—Traction by Steam—Public Rights.

The right of traverse by the public on a canal cannot be confined within the state of science as it existed when the undertaking was projected.

The public may adapt the inventions and discoveries of practical science to secure a more complete and efficient enjoyment of rights conferred, but such inventions and discoveries must not interfere with or endanger the existence of the property in or over which such rights exist.

A carrier claimed a right to navigate a canal with boats propelled by steam, both for carrying loads as well as for drawing barges. Upon a bill to establish the right, —Held, after experiments made by an engineer at the instance of the Court, that the plaintiff had a right to adapt modern improvements to the enjoyment of his rights, provided such improvements did not injure the canal or tend to destroy its existence.

This cause came on upon a motion for a decree.

The Ashby-de-la-Zouch Canal, with its branches, was made under the 34 Geo. 3. c. xciii. It runs into the Coventry Canal and forms, with the Oxford Grand Junction and the Regent's Canal, a communication between the counties of Derby and Leicester and London, for the conveyance of coal, iron, and other heavy merchandise.

By section 113. it was enacted that all and every person and persons shall have free liberty to use with horses, cattle and carriages the private ways and roads belonging to the company of proprietors, except the towing-paths, for conveying goods and other things to and from the said canal, cuts or branches, and the wharfs, quays or landing-places belonging thereto, and also with boats and other vessels to navigate, pass up and use the said canal, cuts or branches and roads respectively, for the purpose of conveying any iron, stone, lime, goods and other merchandise, and also to use the said wharfs, quays and landing-places for the loading and unloading of any goods or other things, and the said towing-paths for the leading and drawing of such boats and vessels, upon payment of such rates, tolls and duties as shall be demanded by the said company for the same, not exceeding the several rates, tolls and duties herein mentioned, and subject always to the rules, orders, bye-laws and regulations which shall from time to time be made by the said company by virtue of the powers of the act; and power was thereby granted to the said company from time to time to demand and take for the tonnage of materials, merchandise, &c. carried or conveyed upon the canal, cuts or branches, the rates and duties therein mentioned respectively, and also to make such rules, orders and regulations for the passing of any locks with any boats or vessels as they should think proper, which, upon being published as therein mentioned, should be binding upon and be conformed to by the owners, masters or persons having the care or conduct of such boats or other vessels.

By the 7 & 8 Vict. c. xviii. the defendants were united and incorporated into one company, under the name of the Midland Railway Company, and several railways and other works therein mentioned were vested in them.

The 9 & 10 Vict. c. cciii. enabled the Midland Railway to make a railway from Burton-upon-Trent to Nuneaton, with branches, and to purchase the Ashby-de-la-Zouch Canal. It recited that the railway would be detrimental to the canal company, and that it would, in some respects, render it useless. It then empowered and required the railway company, on demand of the canal company, to purchase the Ashby-de-la-Zouch Canal, with all the rights and privileges, for a price therein named; and it declared that, on execution of the conveyance, the canal, and all lands, buildings, railways, tramways and other works belonging thereto, and all powers, rights and privileges of the canal company in relation thereto, should belong to and be absolutely vested in the defendants, and that from thenceforth the defendants, their directors, officers and servants and agents, might exercise all the said powers and rights in the same manner as if the name of the defendants had been inserted in the 34 Geo. 3. c. xciii. in lieu of the name of the company of proprietors; and the defendants were required, for ever thereafter, at their own costs, to keep, repair, support and maintain the Ashby-de-la-Zouch Canal and the several railways, reservoirs, tunnels, towing-paths, land, buildings and works belonging thereto well and sufficiently repaired, dredged, cleansed and scoured, and in good order and condition for the purposes thereof, and to preserve the supplies of water to the canal as amply as they were then and had theretofore been usually maintained, so that the navigation should at all times be kept open and navigable for all persons desirous to use and navigate the same.

The Midland Railway Company, under their act, accordingly purchased, and they are now the owners of the Ashby-de-la-Zouch Canal.

Messrs. Case, the plaintiffs, were coal-merchants and owners of the Moira Colliery, and they carried coals from the Moira Colliery, and from various other coal-fields in the counties of Derby and Leicester, to London, by means of such canal navigation. The defendants also carried large quantities of coal and other merchandise, both for themselves and as carriers, along their lines of railway, from various places in the Midland Counties to London and other places, and it was their interest to divert the traffic from the canals to their railway.

The method of drawing boats on the canals by horses having been found too expensive to enable traders carrying coals and other merchandise by the canals to compete on equal terms with persons trading in the same goods and conveying them by railways, the attention of engineers and others was directed to the application of steam-power to the traction of boats and other vessels navigating canals, and the result was an invention by John Inshaw of a species of canal-boat of the ordinary size and dimensions, propelled by a pair of small screws fixed in hollows on each quarter of the boat, near its stern, which were driven by steam-power, and moved in a contrary direction, the effect of which was to prevent that injurious action of the water upon the banks of the canal which generally arises when a boat is propelled by steam in the usual manner. These boats could be used, not only to carry cargo, but also, at the same time, to draw a train of other boats; and boats constructed upon the principle of this invention had been successfully used on the Regent's Canal, and upon other canals.

The plaintiffs were the owners of a boat constructed on this principle, called The Pioneer; its length from stem to stern was 71 feet; its breadth at the broadest part 7 feet 1 inch; and its depth from the gunwale to the bottom of the lowest part of the keel, 3 feet 11 inches; and its burthen 30 tons. The plaintiffs had used this boat on the canals communicating with the Ashby-de-la-Zouch Canal; but the defendants had refused to permit it to enter or pass along the Ashby-de-la-Zouch Canal, alleging that it would damage the banks by the wash it caused against them; but the plaintiffs denied this, as the ordinary speed of travelling of such boats was only from two to three miles an hour, and the greatest speed at which they were capable of travelling was at the rate of from five to six miles an hour.

By the 34 Geo. 3. c. xciii. it was enacted that the owner of any boat navigating the canal should be answerable for any damage, spoil or mischief which might be done by such vessel to the canal or the works.

The plaintiffs instituted this suit to establish their right to navigate the canal by means of steam-power, and the bill prayed that they might be declared entitled to navigate and use the canal with the Pioneer, or any other boat of similar construction, with coals or other merchandise, upon paying the tolls, and conforming to the bye-laws and regulations lawfully made for the management of the canal. It also prayed for an injunction to restrain the defendants from obstructing the plaintiffs in navigating the canal.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. W. Pearson, for the plaintiffs.—The Canal Act must be construed most beneficially for the public. The company could not restrict the public in the use of the canal. The plaintiffs had been prevented from navigating the canal, but it was upon the principle of sic volo, sic jubeo, stet pro ratione voluntas. The defendants had made a bye-law that no boat should travel faster than a walk; they had no power to make such a law. It was said that the boat caused the water to surge and destroy the banks; but, assuming it to be so, the act does not say that a boat shall not be used when parties had a right to use the canal. If any injury was done by parties navigating the canal the company could obtain compensation; but the mere wear of the canal by the ordinary traffic was compensated by the tolls. The plaintiffs' boat was a practical improvement upon canal traction; it could be used without damage to the canal, and the act of parliament must be altered before the plaintiffs' right to use the boat could be interfered with. This was an attempt to exclude the plaintiffs and practical science from the canal—

The Solicitor General and Mr. Speed, for the defendants.—The plaintiffs had no right to exercise a right of traffic in a way injurious to the canal; the question ought to be determined by a Court of law, and the bill ought to be retained for a year, with liberty for the plaintiffs to bring an action to try their right.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The case should, I think, stand over to make experiments, to ascertain the amount of damage done by the boat: if the boat does such damage that it imperils the existence of the canal, the plaintiffs cannot be entitled to use it; but if there is no further damage than what horses produce, and they always produce some, then the plaintiffs are entitled to use the canal. The defendants' proposition, that the cause should stand over to try the legal right, would be quite correct if this was a case in which the right to the highway was disputed; but that, I apprehend, cannot be so: not only the right to use this as a highway, under the 34 Geo. 3. c. xciii. is not disputed, but as it appears in the cause it cannot be disputed.

The Solicitor General.—If the boat is suitable for a canal, the defendants do not dispute the right.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The best course is to let the cause stand over, and let the plaintiffs make use of the boat on the canal in such manner as they may think fit, they undertaking to make good, as the Court shall direct, any damage it may cause. Means must then be taken accurately to ascertain the extent of the damage done by the use of the boat. The plaintiffs may be able to use it at such a reduced speed as to cause no damage, and they would take the greatest care to effect that end. If the Court makes a decree simply that they have a right to use the boat, they might double the speed and produce great damage, which the Court would have no means of controlling. Of course, the Court might direct that the plaintiffs were at liberty to use the boat at not exceeding a certain amount of speed, but their statement is, that they cannot use it beyond five or six miles an hour.

Mr. Palmer.—Empty boats.

The Solicitor General.—Three miles with a load of 140 tons.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I do not know at what rate horses walk by the side of a canal.

Mr. Palmer.—From two-and-a-half to three miles an hour, according to the plaintiffs' testimony.

The Solicitor General.—The defendants say from two to two-and-a-half.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The extra half mile an hour might produce a considerable surge. I should also like to know what the effect would be of going at a greater speed than three miles an hour.

The Solicitor General.—In Dickinson v. the Grand Junction Canal (1) experiments were directed to be made by persons named by the Court, who were to have both the control and direction of the experiments. It was to ascertain the effect of a pump. They ordered it to be worked sometimes faster and sometimes slower, that they might take every view of the case.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—It would be most satisfactory to appoint an engineer of eminence wholly unconnected with the parties to superintend the experiments made, letting the plaintiffs work the boat as they pleased, he making any suggestions he might think fit to ascertain what the result would be, and that he should report to me.

An order was then made, that the defendants, by their counsel, undertaking to permit the plaintiffs to pass upon, navigate and use the canal as the plaintiffs shall see fit, with any boat or vessel propelled according to the same principle and method as the Pioneer, and the plaintiffs undertaking to abide by any order of the Court with respect to the damage (if any) which shall be occasioned by such use, and to make any experiments with any boat or other vessel which may be directed by the engineer to be named, and the plaintiffs and defendants undertaking to abide by any order the Court may make as to the payment of the fees and expenses of such engineer; refer the following question to Wm. Pole, C.E.: What effect the use of the canal by such boats or vessels, with and without other vessels in tow, and at the different rates of speed of which they are capable, will have upon the banks and other works of the canal and the navigation of the defendants? and with a view to ascertaining such effect, he is to be at liberty to direct and conduct such experiments with the boats, &c. as he shall think proper at such times and upon such parts of the canal as he may deem necessary or expedient; and both parties are to have notice of and to be at liberty to attend such experiments; and Mr. Pole is to certify to the Court the particulars of such experiments, and the result thereof. In the mean time the cause was to stand over, with liberty to apply.

After several experiments made with the Pioneer, Mr. Pole certified that the greatest speed arrived at when running alone was four miles an hour, and the greatest speed when towing three miles an hour, and on one part of the canal, where the width and depth of the canal increased the speed reached five miles an hour. That the method of propulsion caused no surge injurious to the banks; that the only wave likely to be detrimental was that arising from the passage of the boat through the water. The results deduced were: that up to a speed of three miles an hour no wave of an injurious character appeared; that between three and three-and-a-half miles an hour a breaking wave appeared on occasional curves and shallows; that above three-and-a-half miles an hour the bre-wave became more continuous and took a more marked character; that at four miles an hour the injurious character of the wave became very decided; that at five miles an hour, even in the increased section of the canal near Moira, the wave was still more increased, breaking sometimes over the towing-path and being followed by other waves in succession; that the use of such boats did not affect the ordinary traffic.

July 11.—The cause was again brought on upon this certificate.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. W. Pearson, for the plaintiffs.

Sir H. Cairns and Mr. Speed, for the defendants.

July 13.—The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The whole question in this case has been caused by the course pursued by the company. It is evident both from the answer and the correspondence, that the company positively insisted that no vessel propelled by steam should be allowed to enter the canal upon any terms or conditions whatever. If before that they had said to the plaintiffs, we believe it impossible, but if you navigate the canal with a boat propelled by steam, it must be on the terms that it will produce no greater ripple than that produced by a boat drawn by horses, the case would have been altogether different. The case against the company is quite clear; without, therefore, going into details, I must declare, That the plaintiffs are entitled to navigate the canal with the boat called the Pioneer, and with any other boat or boats constructed on the like principle and of the like dimensions, with or without barges in tow, provided they do not exceed with such boats or boat the speed of three miles an hour; and the plaintiffs undertaking not to exceed that rate of speed, a perpetual injunction must be granted to restrain the defendants from obstructing them; there must also be liberty to apply, and the defendants must pay the costs of the suit and the costs of Mr. Pole; and any costs connected therewith must be dealt with as costs in the cause.

LORDS JUSTICES. { BURT v. THE BRITISH NA-

ASSOCIATION.

Joint-Stock Company — Promotership Deed—Shares taken for the Purpose of Registration—Annuities to certain Directors—Knowledge—Acquiescence.

E. B. and J. B. in 1854, by deed, assigned leasehold premises, and the copyright of a book on life assurance, to trustees, in consideration of a sum of 1,000*l.* and annuities to each, with a view to form a company. E. B. subscribed for 25,000 shares, and J. B. for 30,000; each paid such a sum for deposits as would leave 1,000*l.* due from each. In 1855 the directors accepted and confirmed the deed of 1854, and obtained the sanction of a general meeting to a loan to the company from another company. In 1856 H. M. B. a lawyer, became a shareholder and director. In December in the same year the directors passed a resolution, that E. B. and J. B. should be relieved from all liability in respect of 20,000 each of their shares, and that the same should be assigned to trustees for the company. These shares were originally taken to facilitate complete registration. H. M. B. early in 1858, filed a bill, on behalf of himself and all other shareholders, except the defendants, against the directors and two shareholders, to set aside this transaction. Afterwards, in April 1858, a general meeting of the shareholders was held, at which the directors were authorised to purchase these shares of E. B. and J. B. on their giving up the benefit of the deed of 1854. One of the Vice Chancellors decided that the transaction of April 1858 was unimpeachable, either under the statute 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110. (the Joint-Stock Companies Act), or as contrary to the deed of settlement, and dismissed the bill, with costs. On appeal by the plaintiff, it was held, affirming the decision, first, that the plaintiff must be taken to have been all along cognizant of and to have acquiesced in the proceedings complained of; secondly, that as the whole of the transactions of the company were entered in their books, he must be held to have had notice of them; and, thirdly, that whatever rights any of the shareholders, who were not precluded by knowledge and acquiescence from suing, might have, the plaintiff's bill could not be sustained, on account of his own incapacity, by reason of his knowledge and his subsequent conduct; his suit being similar to one instituted by a plaintiff who had released the defendants.

COURTS OF CHANCERY:

This was an appeal, by the plaintiff, Mr. Henry Mattock Burt (a solicitor or a certificated conveyancer), against a decision of Vice Chancellor Stuart, dismissing his bill with costs. The bill was filed, by the plaintiff, on behalf of himself and all other shareholders or proprietors of shares in the British Nation Life Assurance Association, except such as were defendants, against the company and the following shareholders, Edward Baylis, George Birmingham, James Furnell, George Charles Richardson, and Colin Thompson (who were directors), and Robert Norton and Henry Lake. The company was originally promoted by the defendants Baylis and Birmingham, and was provisionally registered in 1854; and by an indenture dated the 1st of November in that year the defendants Baylis and Birmingham, and another, transferred to trustees on behalf of the company their interest in certain leasehold premises, No. 35, Cranbourne Street, and also the copyright of a book, entitled An Essay on Life Assurance, which they alleged had been prepared by them with great labour and expense in inventing, classifying and arranging the principles of life assurance, upon condition that the association should, on complete registration, pay to each of them the sum of 1,000*l.*, and also a commission of 2*l.* per cent. on all premiums effected with the association, and that Baylis should receive a certain salary, and Birmingham an annuity of 250*l.* The defendant Birmingham subscribed for 25,000 shares, and on the 20th of November 1854 paid 250*l.* on account of the first instalment of 1*s.* a share, leaving the sum of 1,000*l.* due to the association in respect of such shares. The defendant Baylis subscribed for 30,000 shares, and on the same day paid 500*l.* on account of the first instalment, the remaining 1,000*l.* being, as he alleged, satisfied by the agreement on the part of the association to pay him that sum. The deed of settlement was dated the 28th of February 1855, by which it was agreed that a subscription capital of 300,000*l.*

should be raised, to be divided into 800,000 shares of 1*l.* each, with power to increase the capital, and that on complete registration of the association the sum of 1*s.* should be paid on each share. The above-named gentlemen were appointed directors, and the defendant Baylis was appointed the first consulting actuary, and the defendant Birmingham first consulting surgeon, and these two executed the deed on the day it bore date. On the 12th of March 1855 the association was completely registered, and on the 25th of August following the sum of 5,500*l.* was borrowed by the association from another joint-stock company, called the Unity General Assurance Association. Baylis and Birmingham, by their answers, alleged that at a meeting of the directors, held on the 12th of September 1855, a resolution was passed adopting the deed of the 1st of November 1854, and directing that two sums of 1,000*l.* each should be paid to them; and that on the 14th of September 1855, at an extraordinary general meeting two resolutions were passed, 1st, that the board should be authorized to borrow money; and, 2nd, that the 5,500*l.* (before borrowed) should be deemed as part of the sums so authorized to be borrowed.

Some time about 1856, the plaintiff, after having had interviews with Birmingham and Baylis, became the proprietor of 5,000 shares in the association, and paid the first instalment, amounting to 250*l.*, and became one of the directors, though he had since ceased to be so, but remained proprietor of the 5,000 shares, and subsequently paid the call of 6*d.* a share. On the 3rd of December 1856 a meeting of the board of directors of the association was held, at which the plaintiff and defendants Baylis, Birmingham, Furnell, G. C. Richardson, Thompson and Lake, were present, when the following entry was made in the directors' minute-book: "Messrs. Baylis and Birmingham having this day surrendered all right and claim to 20,000 shares each, respectively held by them, and originally taken in order to facilitate in the first instance the complete registration of the association, in compliance with the act of parliament; and having delivered up their respective certificates for the same: resolved, that Messrs.

Baylis and Bermingham be, and they are hereby relieved from all responsibility as to calls or otherwise on account of the said 20,000 shares each so held by them. That the said shares be transferred into the names of Henry Mattock Burt, G. C. Richardson, C. Thompson and J. Furnell, Esqrs., in trust for the association; and that the proceeds therefrom be applied in due time to the funds of the association." From the 25th of December 1854 to the 25th of March 1857 Baylis received a salary of 500*l.* and Bermingham a salary of 250*l.*, afterwards respectively reduced, and Baylis ceased to act as director and actuary in October 1857. On the 10th of March 1858 a general meeting of the shareholders was held, at which a report of the directors and statement of accounts were adopted, and resolutions were passed (as Baylis, Bermingham, Norton and Lake alleged) for relieving the defendant Baylis from 20,000 of the shares held by him, and the defendant Bermingham from the like number of shares held by him. On the 4th of December 1858 a circular was issued by order of the board, calling upon the proprietors to pay a call of 6*d.* a share, Baylis being called upon to pay the call on 10,650 shares (he having since acquired 650 more shares), and Bermingham on 5,000 shares.

The allegations of the bill were, that Baylis and Bermingham had no beneficial interest in the leaseholds in Cranbourne Street; that the book was worthless, and that the indenture of the 1st of November 1854 was void; and that the business of the association was carried on for the most part under the said defendants' control, in so reckless a manner that not only the income but the paid-up capital of the association was expended in the space of six months from its complete registration; that the sum of 2,000*l.*, part of the 5,500*l.* borrowed from the Unity General Assurance Association, was applied in discharge of the personal liabilities of the said defendants; and that the said application was fraudulent and void; that the directors of the association had no power to pass any such resolution as that of the 3rd of December 1856; that the entry was illegal, and the said resolution void; that the salaries paid to the said two defendants ought to be refunded; that the defendant

Baylis ought to have paid the call upon 30,650 shares instead of 10,650, and the defendant Bermingham upon 25,000 shares instead of 5,000; that the meeting of the 10th of March 1858 was not duly summoned and constituted; and that the resolutions and proceedings at the said pretended meeting were illegal and void, so far as regarded the attempted confirmation of the accounts, and so far as regarded any scheme or contrivance for relieving either of the said two defendants from any part of his shares.

It was then prayed, amongst other things, that a declaration should be made that the defendants Baylis and Bermingham were, to all intents and purposes, the proprietors of the shares for which they respectively executed the deed of settlement; that the entry in the minute-book, dated the 3rd of December 1856, and all other, if any, entries, resolutions and acts by which it had been attempted to relieve the said two defendants from any of the shares actually held by them, might be declared to be illegal, fraudulent and void; that the meeting of the 10th of March 1858 might be declared to be illegal and void; that the said two defendants might be decreed to pay to the association the instalment of 1*s.* a share, and the call of 6*d.* a share on the whole amount of shares held by them respectively, with interest at 5*l.* per cent.; that the said two defendants might be declared to be personally liable for the said loan of 5,500*l.*, and might be decreed to refund the amounts received by them by way of salary.

By their answers the defendants Bermingham and Baylis alleged that an extraordinary general meeting was duly summoned and held on the 14th of September 1855, when two resolutions were passed, by the first of which it was resolved, that the board should be authorized to borrow for the purposes of the association such sums as it should deem expedient; and by the second it was declared, that the said sum of 5,500*l.* and other sums already received on deposit by the board should be deemed part of the sums of money by the preceding resolution authorized to be raised; and further, that the plaintiff was present at the board meeting of the 3rd of December 1856, and concurred in passing the resolution of that date, being cognizant of all the circumstances of the said agreement of the 1st of November 1854, and that they believed such resolution to have been legal, and submitted the question of its legality to the Court. They denied that the sum of 1,000*l.* or that anything was due from them in respect of the first instalment of their shares; and with regard to the meeting of the 10th of March and the resolutions passed thereat, they said that doubts having been raised whether the said meeting was a duly constituted ordinary meeting, the board of directors on the 15th of April 1858 called an extraordinary general meeting of the association, by a notice which they sent to each of the persons entitled to attend such meeting. The notice stated the object of the meeting to be the adoption of a report and balance-sheet for the confirmation of the plaintiff and another defendant (Dr. Norton) as directors, and for other purposes; also for the purchase by the association of 20,000 shares held by the defendant Baylis, and of 20,000 shares held by the defendant Birmingham, on their repaying to the association the sum of 1,000*l.* each. The notice was signed by Henry Lake, manager; and when sent was accompanied by a letter, stating that the object of the proposed meeting was to remove doubts as to whether the meeting of the 10th of March 1858 was regularly convened. The extraordinary general meeting was duly assembled on the 24th of April 1858, (after the filing of the bill,) and at that meeting the report and balance-sheet were adopted as they had been adopted at the meeting of the 10th of March 1858; the resolutions also confirmed the appointments, except that of the plaintiff as director; and the following also was passed, "That this meeting do authorize the purchase from Mr. Birmingham, at the price of 1,000*l.* of 20,000 shares; for which he signed the deed of settlement and for which he paid the sum of 1,000*l.* as the first instalment then due thereon, at the same time and place that he received a sum of 1,000*l.* from the funds of the association as one of its promoters, and do authorize the transfer of such shares to Henry Mattock Burt, James Furnell, George Charles Richardson, and Colin Thompson, as trustees, for the benefit of the proprietors of the association, as the board may at any time hereafter direct; upon condition nevertheless that Mr. Birmingham at the same time repay the sum of 1,000*l.* paid to him as such promoter, and surrender all his rights, if any, under the promotership deed of the 1st of November 1854." A similar resolution related to Mr. Baylis. The plaintiff's name was subsequently omitted as a trustee. Reliance was also placed by the defendants on the validity of the resolutions of April 1858, and also upon the acquiescence of the plaintiff in such resolutions.

The clauses of the deed of settlement bearing upon the question in the suit were in substance as follows:—Clause 14. provided, that an ordinary general meeting of the association should be held on the second Wednesday in every February, or within seven days before or seven days after as the directors should appoint. By the 15th, an extraordinary general meeting could be called by the directors at any time. By the 186th it was provided, that whenever any sum of money shall be wanted for the purposes of the association, it shall be lawful for the board, if they shall think it expedient so to do, with the consent of an extraordinary general meeting, instead of raising the same by calling in any further instalment, to borrow the same at interest, either from the proprietors or by the bond of the association, or by means of any other security, real or personal, subject nevertheless to clause 9, by which the directors and proprietors are protected from personal liability. By clause 195. it was provided, that whenever the holder of any share shall be desirous of selling the same to the board, it shall be lawful for the board, with the sanction of a general meeting, with and out of the proprietors' fund, to purchase such share for the benefit of the proprietors at such time as they shall deem reasonable. By the 270th it was provided, that no holder of any share shall have power to transfer the same, unless the full amount of the instalments for the time being called for on such share shall have been paid.

There were some further important facts stated in the judgment of the Lords Justices; but the foregoing are those chiefly relied upon during the lengthy argument.

When the cause was heard, before the Vice Chancellor, he decided that whatever questions might have arisen as to the validity of the transaction of 1856, neither the deed of 1854 nor the transaction carried into effect by the resolution of the meeting held in April 1858 could be impeached; and he dismissed the bill, with costs: from which decision the plaintiff appealed.

Mr. Greene and Mr. Bromehead, for the appellant, contended that as Messrs. Baylis and Birmingham were directors of the company, the payments of 1,000*l.*, and 1,000*l.* were in fact payments made to themselves; that moreover the contract between the other directors and these two gentlemen was never approved by the body of shareholders before it was executed, and was void under the 29th section of the Joint-Stock Companies Act (7 & 8 Vict. c. 110.), as was decided in the case of Poole v. the National Provincial Life Assurance Company (1), and even the presence of a director of a company interested in a matter when under arrangement as those parties were at the meeting of the 14th of September 1855, was quite sufficient to invalidate the whole—In re Sea, Fire, Life Assurance Company, ex parte the Port of London Assurance Company (2). The objection the plaintiff made to the loan of 5,500*l.* by the Unity Association was, that though it was sanctioned by an extraordinary meeting of the 14th of September 1855, it was contracted before any meeting had authorized it, and even when approved, it was at a meeting held not for the purpose of sanctioning a loan, but to put in action the powers of the directors of borrowing. Besides this, the deed of settlement did not authorize the directors to effect policies and then make them a security to the lender of money to the association. With regard to the board meeting of the 3rd of December 1856, that was held for the purpose of relieving Messrs. Baylis and Birmingham of their responsibility in respect to shares, which was an object beyond the powers of the directors, and that act being altogether illegal, it was not competent for the parties to say, that the acquiescence or concurrence of the plaintiff rendered it valid. The plaintiff was unaware of the nature of the promotership deed, for he thought that the payment of 1,000*l.* came out of the pockets of Baylis and Birmingham. With respect to the ordinary general meeting of the 10th of March 1858, they contended that it was not summoned within the time appointed by the deed; that, if duly summoned and convened, the shareholders could not confirm the accounts in their then form, or pass resolutions relieving Messrs. Baylis and Birmingham from their shares; that the powers of an ordinary general meeting did not extend to the purchase of shares; that the purpose for which the meeting was summoned was not duly set forth in the notice; that it was an ordinary general meeting; that the accounts did not shew a proprietor fund from which the purchase could be made. With regard to the extraordinary general meeting of the 24th of April 1858, there was no proprietors' or other fund with which to purchase the shares; that the calls were not paid up on Messrs. Baylis and Birmingham's shares; that the shares themselves were of no value; that no payment had been made by Messrs. Baylis and Birmingham, the 1,000*l.* being merely in respect of the 1*s.* instalment; that the instalment was consequently unpaid, and no transfer could be made under the 54th section of the act, and the 270th clause of the deed; and, lastly, that the transaction was contrary to the policy of the 7th, 25th and 29th sections of the Joint-Stock Companies Act (7 & 8 Vict. c. 110).

 a bill, filed in the early part of 1858, by a single plaintiff, a shareholder in a company or an association called the British Nation Life Assurance Association, on behalf of himself and all other the shareholders or proprietors of shares in the association, except the defendants; and the defendants are the gentlemen who have been connected with the administration of the affairs of the association during the time which the plaintiff considers material to draw the attention of the Court to.
 Whatever may be the extent of the prayer of the bill, the relief asked at the bar has been confined to these grounds: first, the defendants, who have been concerned in the management of the association, are required to indemnify the association against the consequences of a loan alleged, and probably with truth alleged, to have been irregularly obtained by the managers of the association, on behalf of the association, from another company (I believe also an insurance company) which was in part secured by the effecting of policies with that company. It is said, I repeat, to have been a damaging loan,—a transaction that occasioned loss to this association, and not to have been warranted by the terms of its constitution, and therefore the managing persons who were parties to it are required to make good the consequences. The next head of relief sought at the bar is against two sums of 1,000l.
 each, and certain annuities conceded two of the defendants Mr. Baylis and Bermingham, two of those who were connected with the company, by a deed priminary to the complete registration of the company, called the promoters' deed. It is said those two sums of 1,000l. were unfairly given, unfairly obtained, irregular, improper, unfair; and accordingly redress is sought in those respects against the persons who were parties to the transaction. In the third place, Mr. Baylis and Mr. Bermingham, two of the defendants to whom reference has already been made, are relieved, or profess to be relieved, from a great number of shares which they took in the association, and from all the and consequences; and it is alleged that that transaction was also irregular.

unfair; that they must still be continued to be deemed proprietors in the association to that extent, just as if that attempted relief had not taken place. The plaintiff who makes these complaints became a shareholder in the company in the month of March 1856—some time, I believe, after its complete registration—and in the same month he was elected and became a director, that is, of course, one of the managers of the concern; and, as far as we can judge from the books, it seems admitted in effect, at the bar on both sides, that from the time of his election to be a director,—which, as I have already said, was close upon the time when he became a shareholder, in the same month,—until the end of the year 1857 and somewhat later (a period, therefore, much exceeding a year and a half) he was an active director, constantly, or almost constantly, and with substantial regularity, attending the meetings, being paid for those attendances, and appearing to perform all the duties of a director. Now this gentleman cannot be considered as an ignorant person. He is a certificated conveyancer, was so certainly as early, I believe, as the year 1854, and has been so (it is probable, and I presume) ever since. He was, therefore, a certificated conveyancer when he became a shareholder and director, and cannot have ignorance of matters of business imputed to him, at least as a matter of course. Now, from the time when he began thus to attend as a director, there were regular meetings held, and the accounts of the company and payments on behalf of the company were brought under the attention of the directors from time to time, and entered in the minutes; and, as is usual, I believe, in such cases, at the commencement of every meeting the minutes of the preceding meeting were read, and generally or universally confirmed. And on several of these occasions during the year 1856, after the plaintiff became a director, and subsequently to the year 1856, there are entries of payment on account of this loan obtained from the Unity Insurance Company. One will serve as a specimen of the numerous entries of the description I have mentioned. I am reading from page 357 of the book, from the minutes of the meeting of the 20th of August 1856, which were confirmed at the next meeting:—"No. 63, Unity General Assurance Association. On account of loan premiums, 119*l*. 15*s*. 10*d*.; due 24th inst. 61*l*. 17*s*. 6*d*.—181*l*. 13*s*. 4*d*." As I have said, an entry of that description relating to the same transaction does not occur once only, twice only, or thrice, but on numerous occasions, so far as those periodical payments could be, according to the nature of things within so restricted a time, numerous. They were regular. Now it is impossible—even if this gentleman had said that he was ignorant of the nature of this loan and of the nature of this transaction—it would have been impossible, for any effectual purpose, to hear him say so. It was his duty, I had almost said, as a professional man—certainly it was within his competency as a professional man, and within his obvious duty as a director—to understand what the minute meant if he had any doubt about it. If he was ignorant of the nature or origin of the transaction—which, I agree, had its inception before he became a shareholder, and therefore before he became a director—it was his duty to have obtained information upon it. But, upon the whole of the evidence, it is impossible reasonably to suggest that he relieves himself from the strong, I had almost said the conclusive, presumption against him of knowledge of the nature and particulars of that transaction. With the knowledge which it is necessary thus to impute to him, he acts upon the transaction from time to time; he leads the other directors; he leads all who are associated with him in the management of the company, and who may well have felt confidence in his professional knowledge, to consider that he thought it unobjectionable. He has so treated it; he has not proved, if he could have effectually offered evidence for the purpose of proving, that he was ignorant or misled in the matter; and, upon the materials before us, he must, in my opinion, be taken, as far as his interests are concerned, completely to have adopted it and confirmed it, and to have excluded himself from all ground of complaint on that head, whatever ground of complaint other persons may have. We then come to the 1,000*l*. a-piece paid to Mr. Baylis and to Mr. Bermingham as promoters of the association before this gentleman joined it, and the annuities granted to them on that occasion by what is called the promoters' deed, of the 1st of November 1854, upon which I agree with the plaintiff, it is hardly possible to make observations too strong. I regret very much that it should have been possible to prepare, possible to execute, such a deed; and, above all, I regret to see respectable professional names associated with it. The deed provided for the payments preliminary to the general registration, and annuities for the benefit not only of Mr. Bermingham and Mr. Baylis, but of others. Its recitals are these: It recites the title to leasehold property that was to be acquired for the benefit of the future association. It recites the existence of a book or pamphlet, said to belong to three gentlemen as authors and proprietors, upon life assurance, upon principles which were, "for the most part, of a novel nature, and different from those of any previous life assurance company, are of great worth and value, and it is believed that many and great benefits and advantages will arise and be secured to the general public from the establishment of a society carrying out such principles as aforesaid." Then it recites that the three gentlemen are the joint proprietors of the copyright; that Mr. Baylis, Mr. Bermingham and Mr. Francis Norton Erith "have undertaken upon themselves all preliminary expenses, hazards and liabilities whatsoever in creating and establishing the said association." And then it goes on to recite in effect that it had been agreed that Messrs. Baylis and Bermingham should transfer to the trustees, on behalf of the association, the leasehold property and also the copyright of the book, upon condition that the association should, on complete registration, pay to each of them the sum of 1,000*l.*, and also a commission of 2*l.* per cent. on the premiums of all policies effected with the association, and that Baylis be the consulting actuary, and should receive a salary of 500*l.* even after resignation; and Bermingham should be consulting surgeon, and should receive an annuity of 250*l.*, even after resignation; that Messrs. Trinder & Eyre should be solicitors to the association without power of removal, and should receive a salary for general business to be transacted by them of 250*l.* a year. Then the operative part of the deed proceeds and does provide for all these, I should have thought, most extraordinary payments. As far as I can understand the operative part of the deed, they are all provided for. Now this deed is mentioned in the minute-book upon an occasion previous to the time when the plaintiff became a shareholder in the institution; and I agree it might very possibly be too strict to hold him bound by that—to hold that he was bound to look back through the book to every entry that had preceded the commencement of his directorship. There is, however, in the year 1854, this entry:—"Resolved, that the promoters' deed as prepared by the solicitors to the association, having been read, being cordially approved of, be now confirmed; and that such assignment of agreement for lease of No. 35, Cranbourne Street, Leicester Square, and of copyright in a certain book, entitled 'An Essay on Life Assurance,' illustrative of the modern application of its principles to the requirements of the living, being accepted in its integrity, shall now and hereafter be held binding upon the present or any future directors of the British Nation Life Assurance Association. Mr. Baylis, Mr. Bermingham and Mr. Norton Erith, during the consideration of the deed of assignment upon certain conditions, of their right, title, interest and estate in No. 35, Cranbourne Street, and in their copyright of an essay upon the principles of which, therein detailed, is founded the British Nation Life Assurance Association, declined to use their privileges as directors, and accordingly did not vote or take any part in the decision of the other directors present." I do not impute to the plaintiff the knowledge of the entry; but considering what the deed was, considering how it associated irremovable officers (at least officers substantially irremovable) with the association, and provided for the annuities for which it did provide, it is in the highest degree improbable that the plaintiff should not early have been aware of it. He appears, upon his own statement, some time after he became a director, to have been aware that there was some such instrument—

some such agreement. When, he does not say; but the answers obviously called his attention to that subject; and the state of the pleadings and the evidence, I think, rendered it incumbent on him, if he desired not to have a very early knowledge of the instrument imputed to him, to be precise in his statements and evidence upon that point. The unavoidable inference from the evidence, independently of the entries to which I am about to allude, is, that he became early aware, if not in every sense literally of the instrument itself, aware that there was an agreement containing such provisions or provision to that effect, which affected, or purported to affect, the association. But we find throughout the years 1856 and 1857—I do not allude to the reduction of the annuities, that is immaterial—we find reference to the annuities under the deed of a nature similar in effect, the same indeed in effect mutatis mutandis, as those relating to the loan obtained from the Unity Association. One will serve as a specimen of the whole. I open the book at the 24th of September 1856. These entries are there:—"The following drafts are approved of, drawn and signed, namely, No. 76, Mr. Baylis's annuity, to Michaelmas, 125*l.*;" (that, of course, was the fourth of 500*l.*) "Mr. Bermingham, ditto, 62*l.* 10*s.*," the fourth of 250*l.* Then comes what seems not hitherto to have been observed upon, though it is no discovery at all—it is patent—the solicitors' ditto (ditto meaning annuity), "62*l.* 10*s.*," it being the 250*l.* a year which they were to be paid by way of salary as irremovable solicitors, in addition to their costs. Now, these payments occur from time to time, as I have already said, in the book; they are entered in the minutes in the presence of Mr. Burt, and each set of minutes is confirmed at the next meeting in his presence. It is impossible to impute to him ignorance of business, or that he was not a man of business. He is a practising lawyer, and I have no doubt a well informed and able one—it is impossible to suppose that any man could have these documents read to him or draw cheques, or see drawn cheques for annuities for Mr. Bermingham and Mr. Baylis and the solicitors without asking what they were. No man would think of such an imputation on any man in his senses, especially a man of business and a professional gentleman. I doubt, myself, very much whether this decisive evidence is wanted; the other evidence to which I have referred is so entirely satisfactory. But if that could be considered otherwise than satisfactory, this is completely conclusive. He must, before the end of the year 1856 have had actual notice and knowledge of the provisions of the deed, which deed, independently of the annuities, provided also for the payment, as I have said, of the two sums of 1,000*l.* each to Mr. Bermingham and Mr. Baylis. Then, that being so, all the observations applicable to such transactions with the Unity Assurance Company amount to this: A man of business, with knowledge, allows his brother directors to act and proceed upon the notion that he affirms and adopts those acts, and has no objection to them, and this course of acting goes on from quarter to quarter, from half-year to half-year, during the years 1856 and 1857. It is possible to suppose a case in which a director, even though a member of the profession of the law, might defend himself from the charge of acquiescence and confirmation upon the ground that he was deceived or misled, or that he was ignorant of something which it was not his duty to know. The evidence forbids any such assumption. There is not, in my opinion, the least proof that he was deceived, there is not the least proof that he was ignorant of anything material that it was his duty to know. Accordingly, I think these transactions stand exactly on the same footing as the transaction with regard to the Unity Assurance Company. It seems that the 2,000*l.* was accounted for in this manner—a manner for which I hardly like to trust myself with an epithet: two sums of 1,000*l.* were paid out of the funds of the company, or future company, to Mr. Baylis and Mr. Bermingham, and were applied by them in paying the first instalment, I think, on the shares which they acquired. That is of no moment on the present occasion; but what is of moment on the present occasion is the deliverance subsequently, or attempted deliverance, of Mr. Baylis and Bermingham from the shares on which they paid the 2,000*l.* thus indescribably acquired. Now, that transaction took place also in the year

1856—in the month of December. I turn to the minute of the 3rd of December 1856:—"Messrs. Baylis and Bermingham having this day surrendered all right and claim to 2,000 shares each, respectively held by them, and originally taken in order to facilitate, in the first instance, the complete registration of the association in compliance with the act of parliament, and having delivered up their respective certificates for the same, resolved, that Messrs. Baylis and Bermingham be, and they are hereby relieved from all responsibility as to calls or otherwise, on account of the said 20,000 shares each, so held by them. That the said shares be transferred into the names of H. M. Burt (that is, the plaintiff), G. C. Richardson, Colin Thompson, and James Furnell, Esq., in trust for the association, and that the proceeds therefrom be applied, in due time, to the funds of the association." In this Mr. Burt (the plaintiff) must be taken to have concurred, and the minutes of that meeting are adopted and confirmed at the next. On the 12th of December 1856 the minutes of the last board, and of the extraordinary meeting of the directors held this day, are read and confirmed, Mr. Burt being a party. Now, as I have said, this took place in December 1856. No complaint, no objection, appears to have been made, on the part of Mr. Burt or on the part of any one else, during the year 1856 or the year 1857, as I understand it. But it appears that this transaction had been formally completed by a transfer of the shares in the books without waiting for the authority of a general meeting; and accordingly, in February 1858, a resolution is come to, not at all departing from the resolution of December 1856, but cancelling what I have called the premature action upon it with the view, as I collect, to a confirmation of the transaction by a general meeting. That is done in March 1858, the month in which the bill was filed, but irregularly done. It is done with more formality, if such a transaction could be confirmed effectually, by a meeting in the month of April, the month after the filing of the bill, upon which, as I understand it, the Vice Chancellor appears, as to this part of the case, mainly to have proceeded. I am of opinion, however, looking only at what took place in December 1856, that, by the conduct of the plaintiff and his conduct afterwards, he has precluded himself from any right of complaint, whatever right of complaint others may have, either as against the defendants or as against the plaintiff himself. As to that, it is not necessary to give an opinion. He has sued on behalf of himself and all others; and I assume that there may be others, notwithstanding what has been contended—perhaps correctly, perhaps incorrectly—on the part of the defendants; I assume that there still exist persons who have a right to complain of these transactions; but that will not give the plaintiff a title to sue for them. As, on one hand, a plaintiff who has a right to complain of an act done to a numerous society, of which he is a member, is entitled effectually to sue on behalf of himself and all others similarly interested, though no other may wish to sue, so where, though there are a hundred others who do wish a suit and are entitled to sue, still, if they sue by a plaintiff only who has personally precluded himself, that suit, in my opinion, cannot proceed; and the present case, in my opinion, stands upon the same footing as if the dissatisfied shareholders, supposing them to be dissatisfied, had sued by a plaintiff who had released the defendants—for that, in my opinion, is the position in which, effectually, Mr. Burt has placed himself. Whether, therefore, agreeing or disagreeing with the particular ground on which his Honour the Vice Chancellor has proceeded, I apprehend the grounds I have stated are amply sufficient on which to render a dismissal of the bill necessary. The bill has been dismissed, with costs. I have doubted for some time as to the costs, on account of the conduct that has been exhibited on the part of some of the parties to this record; but, on the whole, I do not think it sufficiently clear that the bill should have been dismissed, without costs, to render it fit for me to give a voice for altering what has been done in that respect. I am of opinion, however, that, in dismissing the appeal, it should be dismissed, without costs, and the deposit be returned.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—I entirely agree with my learned Brother, and for exactly the same reasons, which, therefore, I do not think it necessary to repeat. I desire only to add, that I think the argument on public policy is not applicable to the case, because the transaction is one which might be confirmed by all the shareholders, and, if so confirmed, would not be against public policy.

Practice—Production of Documents on Oath—Corporation—18th Section of the Chancery Amendment Act.

A corporation were sole defendants to a suit, no officer of the company being party for the purpose of discovery. On a motion by the plaintiff that the defendants might file an affidavit, as directed by the 18th section of the statute 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, (the Chancery Amendment Act,) as to the documents in their possession, it was ordered that the company should, before a day named, file an affidavit, made by one or more of its officers, as to such documents, unless they should in the mean time satisfy the Court that they could not procure such officer or officers to make the affidavit.

This was an appeal motion to discharge an order of Vice Chancellor Kindersley, directing that the defendants, the Great Western Railway Company, should, on or before the 24th of April, file a full and sufficient affidavit, stating whether they have, or have had, in their possession or power any, and if any, what documents relating to the matters in question in this suit (beyond those mentioned or referred to in the schedule to the answer of the defendants), and accounting for the same. When the bill was filed three of the directors were made parties, as interested in some of the property of the company, but not for purposes of discovery, and they all died during the progress of the suit, and the company were now the only defendants on the record. Under these circumstances, the company offered to file a schedule of documents, under their corporate seal, but objected to the order of the Vice Chancellor on the ground that there was no officer of the company a party to the suit to make an affidavit.

By the 18th section of the Chancery

Amendment Act (15 & 16 Vict. c. 86.), it is enacted, "that it shall be lawful for the Court, upon the application of the plaintiff in any suit, . . . whether the defendant may or may not have been required to answer the bill, or may or may not have been interrogated as to the possession of documents, to make an order for the production by any defendant, upon oath, of such of the documents in his possession or power relating to matters in question in the suit as the Court shall think right."

Mr. Anderson and Mr. T. Stevens, for the appellants, observed that the 18th section had no application to the case of corporation defendants. It applied to defendants capable of making oath. The plaintiff, had he had the purpose of discovery in view, ought to have made the secretary or other officer of the company a party defendant. They referred to—

Mr. Bailey and Mr. Beeson were not called upon in support of the Vice Chancellor's order.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—I think the proper order to be made would be this, "It is ordered that the defendants, the Great Western Railway Company, do, on or before the 1st day of June next, file a full and sufficient affidavit, to be made by one or more of their proper officers, stating whether they have, or have had, in their possession or power any, and if any, what documents relating to the matters in question in this suit (beyond those, &c.), and accounting for the same, unless they shall in the mean time satisfy this Court by sufficient evidence that they cannot procure such officers or officer to make such affidavit,"—which will vary so far the order of his Honour the Vice Chancellor.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—I agree in that alteration.

Practice—Service of Bill on Defendants residing out of Jurisdiction—Order 33. of May 1845.

*An order to serve a defendant out of the jurisdiction with a copy of the bill is wholly in the discretion of the Court, but it will look into the bill to see that the case made by the plaintiff is not such as prima facie will not obtain relief at the hearing of the cause, notwithstanding that the 33rd Order of May 1845 does not require evidence of the merits or truth of the case.*

The plaintiffs having on the 2nd of March obtained an order, under the 33rd Order of May 1845, for leave to serve a copy of their bill on the defendants William Dawson and Thomas Dawson, now residing in Scotland, this was an appeal from the decision of his Honour the Master of the Rolls refusing to discharge it. The facts are as follows:—The suit was instituted by Henry Dundas Maclean and Eleanor his wife, who was the executrix of Sarah Lodge, who died in 1838, against Henry Dawson, and William Dawson and Thomas Dawson, both out of the jurisdiction of this court, the executors of Joseph Dawson, late manager of the Carron Company, and against the executors of Henry Stainton, the agent of the company in London, and the Carron Company, to set aside the purchase of certain shares in the Carron Company, made from the female plaintiff as such executrix by the said J. Dawson in 1839, on the ground of fraud. For this purpose the bill alleged that H. Stainton, the London agent of the Carron Company, J. Dawson, manager of the company at Carron, and the defendant W. Dawson, then assistant manager of the company (who were also large shareholders of the company), kept and published false accounts of the company's workings, and concealed the true state of the company's affairs from the shareholders from the year 1825 to the year 1851, in order as well to enrich themselves directly, as indirectly to enable them to buy up the shares of their copartners at an under-value; that by these means J. Dawson had purchased the shares of the said Sarah Lodge from the said female plaintiff, as well as shares of various other shareholders, at less than their true value; that he died possessed of seventy shares only, but it was impossible now to discover whether the ten shares bought of the plaintiff were amongst the remaining seventy, or whether J. Dawson had parted with them in his lifetime; that these facts came to the knowledge of the plaintiffs only in the year 1858; that J. Dawson died on the 5th of January 1850, a domiciled Scotchman, having made a trust disposition, whereby he gave his residuary estate, including the seventy shares in the Carron Company, certain sums of stock, and a large debt due to him from the company, to the defendants H. Dawson, W. Dawson and T. Dawson, and appointed them his executors.

The will was not proved in England, but the three residuary legatees were properly constituted executors in Scotland. They accordingly discharged all the funeral and testamentary expenses, and provided for the execution of the trusts of his trust disposition; in pursuance whereof twenty-four shares were transferred to W. Dawson, twenty-three shares to H. Dawson, and the remaining twenty-three to T. Dawson. H. Stainton died in 1851, and his executors were also made defendants.

The defendants W. and T. Dawson having been served with copies of the bill under the above-named general order, put in a conditional appearance, and then moved before the Master of the Rolls to discharge the order, but his Honour refused the motion, and they appealed (1).

(1) The judgment of the Master of the Rolls was as follows:—I am of opinion that this motion altogether fails. I apprehend the sole question—when the order speaks of discretion—is, whether on the facts appearing on the bill, or the facts as the plaintiff ought to have stated them in the bill, and brought to the attention of the Court, it would be a proper case for the Court to direct its process to be served out of the jurisdiction. The defendant may afterwards come to the Court to discharge the order, if not made in accordance with the rules of the court, or if it has been obtained by fraud; as, for instance, if it has been obtained in direct opposition to an agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant, that they should not be served. Such a question as that might be brought before the Court. But, in any other respect—assuming that it is a proper case—I have always considered,

Mr. Roll, Mr. Follett and Mr. Cotton, for the appellants, argued, that the grant of leave was not, as the Master of the Rolls had said, ex debito justitiæ, but was wholly in the discretion of the Court, and in this case it was eminently inconvenient that leave should be given, for the litigation related to Scotch property of a Scotch testator, was between Scotchmen and some of their Scotch representatives, and the plaintiffs themselves resided much nearer to Edinburgh than to London; there was not even an English representative, and if the plaintiff were successful, as to which there were very grave doubts, the estate could not be proved except by putting in motion the powers of the Scotch courts. They at length contended that if leave was given to serve this bill, the Court would essentially assist the plaintiffs in multiplying litigation. This and the other points of argument are examined in the judgment, and they cited—

Whitmore v. Ryan, 4 Hare, 612, 618; s.c. 15 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 232.

Innes v. Mitchell, 4 Drew. 141; s.c. 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 625: on appeal, 1 De Gex & Jo. 423; 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 719.

Mr. Roundell Palmer, Mr. Selwyn and Mr. John Pearson were for the plaintiffs, in support of the order at the Rolls.

Mr. Roll was heard in reply.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—The arguments which have been so ably urged in this case as to the multiplication of litigation, and as to the supposed unlikelihood of the present suit proving of any substantial utility to the plaintiffs, are certainly not wholly irrelevant; on the contrary, they are entitled to attention; but even if they are well founded, that will not be decisive on such an application as this. The 33rd Order of the 8th of May 1845, under which the present order was made, requires no affidavit as to the merits of the plaintiff's case. That order is as follows:—"Where a defendant in any suit is out of the jurisdiction of the Court, the Court, upon ap-raise that question until he has appeared as a properly constituted party to this cause. Then will be the proper time to consider whether the suit can more properly be carried on in this country, or whether the rights of the parties will be better administered in Scotland. Undoubtedly, even in the consideration of that case, the Court will only be guided by what is most for the interests of the parties, and what is most for the interests of justice, and will totally disregard any other consideration. But it is new to me that this Court is to be told, in a case which is primæ facie a proper case, that the Court ought not to make the order on the ground of there being proceedings in Scotland which would try the whole question if the case were left to that jurisdiction. I express no opinion on that question. In my opinion, the defendants cannot raise the question whether they ought to be served or not, or whether the Court, in its proper discretion, has done right in allowing the defendants to be served. If it were otherwise, I see no reason why a party under any circumstances should not be allowed to raise the question. If a party in this country is sued, why should he not come to set aside service of subpœna on the ground that a suit in a foreign court with respect to the same matter would more conveniently dispose of the rights of the parties? The reason is, he has no locus standi. A proper discretion is to be exercised by this Court, on the facts appearing upon the bill, always supposing there is no question of fraud, and that service on the defendants in the country is not contrary to good faith. I am of opinion the motion must be refused with costs.

from the time the act was passed, that it was a matter ex debito justitiæ; that the Court had no right to withhold, if there were a primæ facie case, the order for serving the bill and process on a party in a foreign country; always leaving it open to a defendant, as soon as he appeared, to shew that the bill was one which ought not to be proceeded with against him, or to shew that, in consequence of some arrangement between the parties, it was contrary to good faith on the part of the parties who served him. But it is quite out of the question that this Court should take into its consideration any extraneous facts. The question is, whether, when I was asked for leave to serve this bill out of the jurisdiction of the Court—whether, upon the facts appearing, as stated by the bill, or which ought to have been stated, it was right then to make the order. The fact that there have been subsequent proceedings in Scotland arising out of the same matter cannot affect the propriety of the exercise of the discretion of the Court in determining whether it was right, at the time when the motion was made, that the bill should be served. I cannot conceive a course more likely to produce great expense, great litigation, great loss of time and money to the parties, than that as soon as a defendant is served out of the jurisdiction he should be at liberty, by a series of affidavits, to shew that it would be more convenient that the case should not proceed here. I expressly disclaim any opinion whether it is more desirable that the case should proceed in this court, or that the litigation subsequently commenced should be pursued in Scotland. But I am of opinion that the defendant cannot plication supported by such evidence as shall satisfy the Court in what place or country such defendant is, or may probably be found, may order that the subpœna to appear to, or to appear to and answer the bill, may be served on such defendant in such place or country, or within such limits as the Court thinks fit to direct." I entirely agree that discretion is given to the Court in respect to cases in which it should or should not act under this order; but still it is impossible not to observe that no affidavit or evidence of the truth of the plaintiff's bill is required. It is, however, in my opinion, incumbent on the Court to look into the bill, though not supported by evidence; for it is easy to conceive a case of a bill so plainly absurd, or relating to such a subject-matter, or to a controversy between persons so circumstanced, as to justify the Court in at once declining to act. This case is not of that description. I have certainly been struck during the argument by the circumstance that the bill is demurrable—not upon the merits, indeed, but inasmuch as it states a demand to the discussion of which the presence of a legal personal representative in this country is indispensable, and yet the bill does not suggest the existence of such a person here or elsewhere; but such a ground of demurrer would be one which would not only not preclude the plaintiff from amending his bill, but the course of business in this Court would give him, almost as a matter of right, the liberty of amending, allowing reasonable time for that purpose; therefore, the defective nature of the bill in this respect is not a sufficient ground of objection. Then, it has been said that it is obvious, upon the case made by the bill, that even if an English personal representative be added, the plaintiffs know there can be no effectual relief, two of the executors being resident in Scotland, and only one in England; but I am not satisfied upon that ground either. Still, whether the Court looks at the case with the aid of the evidence added since the order was made at the Rolls, or only upon such materials as were before his Honour, I consider that, although there may be a considerable chance of failure of effectual relief to the plaintiffs, there is also a chance of success; I repeat, a chance of success, for the bill is not, on the face of it, absurd. Then, looking to the subject-matter, and the parties to the controversy, the subject-matter consists exclusively of movables, no part immovables; the suit is not between foreigners, not between a foreigner or foreigners on the one side, and the Queen's subjects on the other; but it is wholly between subjects of the Queen, and subjects of the Queen resident in this island. It is clear that if any circumstances whatever should happen by which the two gentlemen should be brought from Glasgow and Stirling into England, they will be liable to service in the ordinary way, they will be constituted parties, and the suit will proceed. Therefore, although the case is open to doubt, and though the plaintiffs may be proceeding under considerable risk of failing, still, looking at all the facts, the case is not so evidently a bad one as to justify the Court in not allowing that service to take place in Scotland which would be valid if made in England. I repeat, that the case is far from clear; but the motion must, in my opinion, be refused; the costs, if my learned Brother does not object, to be dealt with hereafter by the Judge who shall hear the cause as costs in the cause, as between the plaintiffs on the one side, and the two Messrs. Dawson residing in Scotland on the other.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—As my learned Brother agrees with the Master of the Rolls, it is not necessary for me to express any opinion, and regarding it as a mere question of discretion, it would not be right for me to do so. I desire, however, to say, that, it being, in my judgment, purely a matter of discretion, it is the duty of the Court to look into the bill before making this order, to satisfy itself whether the case is one in which, in the discretion of the Court, the order ought to be made. I agree as to the costs.

Their LORDSHIPS added, that they considered that the costs at the Rolls should be dealt with in the same way as the costs before themselves.

Evidence — Presumption — Marriage — Legitimacy — Jewish Law.

A, a Jew, and B, a Christian woman, cohabited as man and wife for twenty-eight years, and until B's death. They had several children, who were brought up as Christians. They cohabited partly in England and partly in foreign parts. There was no evidence of any marriage having been solemnized, but there was general reputation that the parties were married, and proof of the registry of the baptism in England of several of the children as of A. and B. his wife, and that on a judicial proceeding the parties gave evidence on oath as "A. and B. his wife." The relatives of A. never recognized the fact of a marriage, and some of them swore that they did not know even of the reputation of marriage. A, in his will, referred to such of the children as were living as "my legatees." One of the Vice Chancellors decided that the children were entitled as legitimate children of A. and B. to a fund belonging to A.'s next-of-kin; and that the onus of proof lay upon those who sought to disturb the general reputation and presumption of marriage under the foregoing circumstances: and, on appeal, the decision was affirmed.

This was an appeal, presented by Mary Denis, wife of Denis Denis, of Paris, late Mary Goodman, spinster, the plaintiff in the above-named suit, and by the trustees of their marriage settlement, from an order made by Vice Chancellor Stuart, on the 12th of July 1858, on a petition in the cause. From the allegations of the petition, supported by affidavit, it appeared that a decree was made in a cause of Goodman v. Goodman (1), declaring what was the true construction of the will of one Philip Goodman, and directing the personal estate (a fund of considerable amount,) to be paid into court. The petition alleged that Isaac Goodman had died in August 1856, without ever having been married, and thereupon his share of the residuary personal estate of Philip Goodman had become divisible among his (Isaac's) next-of-kin, of whom the petitioner, Mary Denis, was one. It was prayed that the fund might be sold and paid out of court in the shares in the petition mentioned. The contest, it will be observed, was between the next-of-kin of the testator other than his children, nine in number, who were alleged to be illegitimate, and those nine children, or their representatives, as the lawful children of Isaac Goodman, or, in other words, whether Isaac Goodman and Charlotte Geering were lawful husband and wife.

The petition was heard before Vice Chancellor Stuart, and an affidavit of George John Goodman, of 16, Rue Saint-Jean, Brussels, was read, in which he swore he was a son of Isaac Goodman, deceased, and that Isaac Goodman left seven children him surviving, being issue of his marriage with his wife, deponent's mother, Charlotte Goodman. On the hearing of the petition the Vice Chancellor directed inquiries whether Isaac Goodman had any and what children; and in the same month the chief clerk certified that no evidence had been produced of the solemnization of any marriage of Isaac Goodman, but if the Court should be of opinion from the evidence produced that a marriage between Isaac Goodman and Charlotte Geering, the mother of the children thereafter mentioned, was to be presumed, Isaac Goodman had nine children.

Isaac Goodman, by his will, in which he described himself as of Woburn Place, in the county of Middlesex, gave and bequeathed the whole of his property "to William Isaac Goodman, George John Goodman, Joseph Goodman, Lyon Philip Goodman, and to Rachel Goodman and to Susannah Harvey, the wife of John Harvey, and to Clara Lurrell Brown, the wife of William Brown, all at present living at Brussels." He directed that the whole of his property should be equally divided between his seven aforesaid "legatees," share and share alike. He appointed his "sisters" Harriet Goodman and Rachel Goodman his executrices; and described other persons as his "nephews" and "niece." He nowhere referred to the legatees as his children. This will was made in London, written in the testator's handwriting, and was duly proved by the executrixes.

The evidence before the chief clerk comprised the baptismal certificates of some of the children described as "son" or "daughter" respectively "of Isaac and Charlotte Goodman," extracted from the parish registers of the church of St. Dunstan, Stepney, from the year 1807 to 1819; and affidavits of a nephew, niece, cousin, and two brothers (being all the surviving relatives) of Mrs. Goodman, and of her intimate friends, all of whom deposed to the fact that Mrs. Goodman was always referred to in conversation, and treated and considered, both in London and at her native place Pevensy, in the county of Kent, as the lawful wife of Isaac Goodman. The niece deposed that her aunt often expressed her regret that her marriage "was not recognized by her husband's family." In 1819 Mr. and Mrs. Goodman went to live at Brussels; and evidence was produced to shew the residence together there "of Isaac Goodman and his wife, Charlotte Geering," until their deaths, and that all the children, except one who was married in London, lived with them. Certificates of entries from the registries of births and deaths in the commune described one of the children as born of Isaac Goodman and Charlotte Geering "domiciled with her husband"; another as born of the same persons, "lawfully united." A similar copy from the register of the death of Charlotte described her as "domiciled at Hellis, wife of Isaac"; the register of Isaac Goodman's death described him as "widower of Charlotte Geering"; and the directors of the Israelite community at Brussels, in a burial certificate, described him in the same terms. Evidence was also given, that at the hearing of a public prosecution in Brussels, in 1823, both "Isaac Goodman and Charlotte Geering, wife of the said Goodman," were required and took oath to speak the truth concerning the matter in contest; and that it was customary in Belgium to describe a married woman in all official documents by her maiden name.

This, together with the affidavits of friends of Isaac and Charlotte residing in Brussels, was the evidence in support of the fact of marriage; and which is fully examined and commented on by the Vice Chancellor (2). That on the other hand consisted of the will to the effect before set out, and the affidavits of the two sisters of Isaac Goodman (also remarked upon by his Honour), who deposed that they had heard that their brother Isaac had, many years ago, formed a connexion with a female professing the Chris-

(2) The judgment of the Vice Chancellor was as follows:—These persons who call themselves the children of Isaac Goodman come forward in this cause with a considerable body of evidence to prove that from about the year 1804 Isaac Goodman lived with Charlotte Geering as her husband, and as the legitimate father of Charlotte Geering's children. There are proved declarations by Isaac Goodman to the effect that he was the husband of Charlotte Geering, and that she was his lawful wife. There is evidence that they were received in society as husband and wife. There is also evidence that, having left this country in 1819, they went to Brussels, and resided there together as husband and wife until the death of Charlotte; that, upon solemn occasions on the birth of children, when the law of the country where they were residing required the children to be presented, and also at a judicial act at their baptism, there were solemn declarations that they were the children of Isaac Goodman and Charlotte Goodman as husband and wife. There is in evidence a document shewing that upon a judicial proceeding between other parties, these persons were called as witnesses, and gave their solemn depositions upon oath according to the form of law which was referred to in the judicial proceeding; and upon the fair construction of the documents in evidence as to that, I am bound to hold that, upon oath and upon a solemn occasion, they represented themselves in a court of justice as husband and wife. Upon the death of Charlotte in 1832, when the law of Belgium required registration and a solemn declaration, there was a declaration that Charlotte was buried as the wife of Isaac Goodman. Subsequently to her death, and during the period intervening between her death and his own in 1856, upon repeated solemn occasions he declared himself to be a widower, and the widower of the selfsame Charlotte. Upon this body of evidence the question is, whether the Court is not bound to hold that the presumption of marriage arises. If the presumption of marriage arises, of course the evidence to rebut it must be stronger than the evidence upon which the presumption is raised, or at least as strong. It is a question, then, to be decided on the weight of evidence supporting and rebutting the presumption. Against the presumption, and in order to rebut it, strong circumstances are referred to. In the first place, the will of Isaac Goodman has been produced, in which the children are not named as children, but are named as strangers. They are objects of his bounty as to nearly the whole amount of his property; and upon an occasion when it might have been expected the father of legitimate tian faith, and that he had several children by her; that upon one occasion he asked if he could not make his children legitimate; and that they had been informed and believed, that Mr. Jacobs, their family solicitor, advised their brother Isaac not to name his children in the will as his sons and daughters, because, being illegitimate, they would lose the benefit of any legacy he might intend for them. They verily believed that he never was married; and further, that living and dying in the Jewish faith, he could not, and would not be married in accordance with the forms of the Christian religion; and that he could not have married a Christian in accordance with the Jewish rites; for the laws of the Jews did not permit their intermarrying with Christians, and no Jewish priest would perform the ceremony. Further, that, by the family, it was always understood and reputed that their brother lived with a young woman of the Christian faith as his mistress; that he never told them he was children would declare their legitimacy and recognize their status as legitimate children, he uses language that is quite consistent with the supposition that they were illegitimate. That is the first strong piece of documentary evidence which has been adduced in order to rebut the presumption. Beyond that, an ineffectual attempt has been made to refer to a declaration made by Isaac Goodman in certain judicial proceedings in this court. It is said that in an answer put in in this cause, in which the present petition was presented, the nature of the suit and proceeding making it an important thing that the fact of his having issue should be stated—in this answer put in upon oath, or at any rate with all the solemnities that would attend it if on oath—again, as in his will, he has failed to recognize these persons as his children, or to state that he had any children. The value of that as a circumstance of evidence seems to me to be small, because the frame of the bill was such as not to raise a question which, from the facts apparently in the knowledge of all parties, ought to have been raised. It is certain that other members of the family who were parties to this suit knew of his cohabitation with this woman, and knew of the existence of these children. That is certain, and knowing it, if they knew that the children were illegitimate, and that the woman was not his wife, the occasion naturally arose on which it would have been averred by them on the pleadings that he had no legitimate children. Therefore, on the whole, though it is, no doubt, a circumstance in evidence, it is one which produces small weight on my mind, that on that occasion of putting in his answer he was silent on a subject on which he was not required to speak. The next circumstance referred to is the parol evidence on affidavit of two sisters of Isaac, and of two other persons connected with his family. As to the evidence of the two sisters, it certainly goes to this—that they did not recognize this woman as the lawful wife of their brother; that they treated her, and that the reputation, so far as they were concerned, was, that she was not the lawful wife of their brother Isaac. The evidence of the other two witnesses, which seems material, is as follows:—One of them, a printer, sixty-four years of age, says he was the son of a man who was for some years a resident tutor in the house of Henry Goodman and his family, and he stated that, upon an occasion when the declaration might have been expected to be made with an even mind, Isaac Goodman, with reference to this woman, so conducted himself as to lead to the inference that she was not his lawful wife. The passage is remarkable, and it is this:—“I was upon very intimate terms with the said Isaac Goodman, and was daily at his house, whilst he lived in London, and I was confidentially employed by him and his brother Lyon, and I knew of his acquaintance with Charlotte Geering, who was living in Greenfield Street, Whitechapel. My father, in my presence, frequently remonstrated with him for his illicit intimacy with her, urging him to marry a female of his own faith. My father has also, in my presence, questioned the said Isaac Goodman as to whether he was married to the said Charlotte Geering, which he denied, admitting however, that he was living in concubinage with her.” The affidavit goes on to say, that, about the year 1817 or 1818, the witness’s father was active in promoting a marriage between Isaac Goodman and a woman of his own faith (a Jewess), with the concurrence of the said Isaac Goodman; which was inconsistent with his being at the time a married man; but no history is given as to the latter circumstance, and it produces no great weight on my mind. Still, it is entitled to some weight as a circumstance in evidence. As to the other paragraph, which consists of an avowal that Isaac was not married to this woman, and that he admitted he was living in concubinage with her, it is express evidence upon the subject, liable only to a little deduction from its weight by another circumstance, to which I will refer. The other witness, who gave parol evidence, says that Isaac declared to him that a female with whom he was residing in that particular street (Greenfield Street) was his mistress, and not his lawful wife. I cannot hold that there is sufficient proof of the identity of this woman as being Charlotte Geering, and therefore that evidence must be taken with very great qualification, from its want of express proof of identity. What I have stated from the affidavits of these two sisters and these two individuals constitutes the great weight of the parol evidence to rebut the presumption arising from the cohabitation and repute, as testified to by the other witnesses. But the case does not rest there; for, beyond the parol evidence, there are other circumstances legitimately relied upon by those who seek to rebut the presumption of marriage; and the strongest of these circumstances perhaps is, that this woman was in an inferior position in life—that that made it an improbable thing that he should have been married to married, or that his children were legitimate; nor did he introduce the alleged wife and family to them, or in any way ask to have them recognized as members of the family.

In the suit of Goodman v. Goodman Dr. Adler, Chief Rabbi of the Congregation of British Jews, had been examined, and asked—First, whether the Jewish law prohibited the solemnization of marriage between a Jew and a female of another faith; and, secondly, whether, when a Jewish minister is called upon to solemnize marriage between two persons, who, or either of whom, are or is unknown to him, it is his duty to make inquiries with a view to ascertain that both parties are of the Jewish religion. The answer returned by Dr. Adler to these questions was as follows:—First, the Jewish law prohibits the marriage between a Jew and a female born in and of another faith; and consequently, her without, at least, her preserving some distinct evidence upon the subject of a marriage according to the Christian faith. The other circumstance is this (I do not recollect it to have occurred in any other case) that the strongest parol evidence in support of the presumption of marriage all proceeds from the relatives of the woman, and none from the relatives of the man; that the relatives of the man who is alleged to be the husband never recognized the marriage, and never recognized the children as legitimate children. That is a circumstance of very considerable strength; but it is to be taken with this remarkable qualification—Isaac was a Jew and Charlotte was a Christian; and it seems plain that, to Jews, a marriage with a Christian woman, so far from being a thing readily recognized as an acceptable thing, is considered an odious marriage, and one rather to be rejected. It appears, in fact, that the authorities of the Jewish law would rather refuse recognition of the validity of such a marriage. Upon the other hand, it is said that in this very cause there was the legitimate and admitted—I mean admitted by Jews as a legitimate—daughter of a brother of this Isaac by a Christian woman, with whom he had formerly lived as his mistress. That, no doubt, is a circumstance which shews that between Jews the validity of a marriage with a Christian woman is for judicial purposes recognized, and that it must be recognized; but when I speak of the recognition of a marriage, and of the effect in this case of the non-recognition of this marriage by the Jewish relatives of the alleged husband, who was a Jew, it must be taken with the qualification which arises from the unquestionable fact that, as between a Jew and a Christian woman, the marriage was to Jews, and according to the law of Jews, an odious marriage. Still that is not a conclusive circumstance, for the proceedings in the cause shew that the Jews would recognize such a marriage as legitimate, because the law of England compels them; and it is in vain, therefore, to attempt to do otherwise: still the marriage is open to observation. Then, considering the whole weight of the evidence to rebut the presumption of a marriage, it rests upon the declaration, or rather the sort of language, used in Isaac's will—upon the declaration that he is reported to have made to one person that this woman was his mistress—upon the doubtful identity of the person with whom he said he was living in concubinage—upon the allegations of the husband's sisters, to whom, as Jews, the marriage, or the recognition of the marriage, would be odious—upon their not entertaining that general reputation or that belief of a marriage, or having ever heard, so far as their statements go, any declaration of a marriage, such as have been heard by other persons to whom the marriage had been declared. It rests, moreover, upon the evidence of the circumstance of all the relatives on the husband's side never having partaken in that general reputation, or in the receipt of those declarations which other people received; and upon that weight of evidence I find myself unable judicially to say that the affidavits of those two sisters, the contents of the will, the circumstance of the sisters never having heard the marriage declared, and never recognizing the children, are to outweigh what has been repeatedly and solemnly declared by the husband—declared by him upon oath—declared by him during the wife's lifetime, and after her death in the most solemn manner, and upon one occasion upon his oath. Then what was the reputation among those persons who gave evidence of the general character and status enjoyed by this man and woman as husband and wife from the year 1804 downwards? It is to put the evidence of general reputation and general character against that of particular persons, not knowing the fact—who never heard the fact—and against the silence of the husband as to the fact upon one important occasion; but these circumstances do not appear to my mind sufficient to rebut the presumption which I think arises legitimately from the evidence first propounded in favour of the legitimacy of the children. I need only add, that on a question of this kind, an issue might have been asked; or if the Court felt a judicial doubt, and if its conscience were not sufficiently informed on the evidence, then it would have been the duty of the Court to direct an issue. But the present case does not appear to me so much a question of fact for a jury, but I think it a question of law on the weight of evidence; and even if the case were to be sent to a jury, the question would come back whether the Judge had laid down the law correctly to the jury as to what they ought to presume upon the weight of the evidence, or whether he had misdirected them. For these reasons I should not think myself justified in directing an issue or creating further expense, considering, as I do, that sufficient legitimate evidence has been already adduced to the Court. I will also observe, that by the desire of counsel on both sides, I have treated the question as a question of an English marriage, to be decided according to the law of England. I have some doubt whether that is the true view of

also, the solemnisation of the same. Secondly, a Jewish minister called upon to solemnise a marriage is bound to make inquiries with a view to ascertain that both parties about to be married are of the Jewish religion.

His Honour pronounced in favour of the legitimacy of the nine children of Isaac and that they were entitled to the fund, adding that the burden of proof rested entirely on those who disputed the marriage, from which decision this was an appeal.

Mr. Malins and Mr. Waley supported the appeal.

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Speed, who appeared to support the decision of the Vice Chancellor, were not called upon.

The case so entirely depends upon the weight to be attached to the evidence of presumption, and it is so carefully examined in the judgment of the Vice Chancellor, that no statement of the argument appears necessary.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—There are, in this case, improbabilities on both sides; but the ground for presuming a marriage to have taken place, if not the case, but however that may be, I rejoice that I am able so far to satisfy my mind that, viewing it as a question of English law as to the legitimacy of the whole nine children, I can say that the children are legitimate children, and are not to be excluded from the participation in the property of the original testator, to which on that footing they will be entitled in this cause. No decision has been cited during the argument, but on the question of reputation of marriage the law is well settled in the case of Doe v. Fleming (1). The law is there laid down in the clearest terms in these words:—"The general rule is that reputation is sufficient evidence of marriage, and a party who seeks to impugn a principle so well established, ought at least to furnish cases in support of his position." That is the law on the subject, and it is said, moreover, "that the rule has never been doubted. It appeared upon the trial that the mother of the lessor was received into society as a respectable woman, and under such circumstances improper conduct ought not to be presumed." Taking the law as there laid down, I treat the burden of proof to rebut such a presumption as resting entirely on those parties who dispute the fact of a marriage. The declaration will be, that there has been a marriage, and that the children are legitimate; the costs of all parties must be paid out of the general assets of the testator in the cause.

(1) 4 Bing. 266; s. c. 5 Law J. Rep. C.P. 169.

before the birth of the elder children, at least before that of the younger children, appears to me broader and more solid than the grounds for a contrary opinion. Certainly the language in which the father mentions his children in his will, not speaking of them in that relation; and certainly the total estrangement between the families not only during the life of their mother, but afterwards; and, perhaps, also the denials of the marriage which some of the witnesses allege the father to have made, are circumstances deserving attention; and, were the evidence less strong on the other side, they, in the absence of any proof of a ceremonial marriage, might have led me to a different conclusion. On the other hand, there was the constant cohabitation of the man and woman during many years as man and wife, both here and abroad; the fact of the woman being treated as his wife, and of the children being registered both here and abroad as the children of the father by his wife, the mother—for that is the effect both of the English and Belgian registration. It is true that it is consistent with the English registration that the performance of the christening took place without the presence of the father, who was of a different faith; but this does not apply to the Belgian registration, for there the father signed the register as well as his wife. When there are united to those circumstances the difference of religion—the father being a Jew, the mother a Christian—and the difference of wealth, creating a fancy of difference of station, it seems to me that the consequences from the latter class of facts prevail over the consequences from the other. According to my judgment, precedent and analogy, principle and policy, alike agree in holding the children to be legitimate. I agree with the Vice Chancellor, and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—The most important consideration in this case is the conduct and proceedings of the parties themselves. That from 1804 to 1832 they passed as husband and wife is not in dispute. That their children were brought up as legitimate children from their birth till 1856 is also not in dispute. The Court is now asked to declare them illegitimate. No doubt there is evidence in support of that view. But to what does it amount? It is said, in the first place, that in the former suit the children were not made parties, and, therefore, were treated as not being legitimate, and that the father, in his answer, did not assert their legitimacy, and say that the property would go to them after his death. But that only comes to this, that the bill did not raise the question, and the counsel in drawing the answer did not insert an allegation that the children were legitimate. Then, it was said, that the father in his will described them by name, and not as his children; this argument was met by the case of Lord Braybroke v. Inskip (3). Some declarations by the father are also spoken to by some of the witnesses; but if they are to be relied on, they only raise the presumption of an intention to conceal the marriage which had been contracted with a person of a different religion. The appeal fails, and must be dismissed with costs.

June 14. } RICHMOND.

Power of Appointment—Gift to "Sons" as a Class.

A testator had three sons. After referring to a power in his marriage settlement, he said of the settled fund "the sum of 2,000l. was settled at her marriage upon my daughter Mary"; and then he added, "the remainder I wish to be equally divided among my sons." One of the sons died in the testator's lifetime:—Held, a good appointment; and that it was made to them as a class.

The bill in this cause was filed to determine the rights of the parties in a sum of 16,297l. 12s. 6d. consols.

Sir Charles Augustus Fitzroy, in contemplation of a marriage with Lady Mary Lennox, transferred 16,297l. 12s. 6d. consols to the Duke of Richmond and the Duke of Grafton, as trustees of an indenture dated the 9th of March 1820, upon trust to pay the income to Sir C. A. Fitzroy and his assigns for life, and after his decease to pay the income to Lady M. Lennox for life; and after the decease of the survivor upon trust for all and every, or such one or more exclusively of the other or others, of the children or child of the marriage at such age, day or time, and if more than one in such shares and proportions, and with such annual sums of money and limitations over for the benefit of the children, or some or one of them, with such provisions and upon such conditions, &c. as Sir C. A. Fitzroy and Lady M. Lennox should during their lives jointly appoint, and in default thereof, and so far as the same should not extend, then as Sir C. A. Fitzroy, in case of his surviving, should by deed or will from time to time direct or appoint; and in default thereof, and so far as the same should not extend, and if there should be two or more children of the marriage then the trust funds should be for the portions of such two or more children, to be divided between or among them in equal shares and proportions, to be vested, the shares of sons at their respective ages of twenty-one, and the shares of daughters at twenty-one, or respective days of marriage.

On the 7th of December 1847 Lady M. Fitzroy died, leaving four children, who all attained twenty-one.

Sir C. A. Fitzroy, on the 18th of December 1847, made a will, entitled "Memorandum of my wishes after death"; and thereby stated it to be his desire that property should be sold as therein mentioned, and the proceeds equally divided between his three sons, Augustus Charles Lennox Fitzroy, George Henry Fitzroy, Arthur George Fitzroy, and his daughter Mary Caroline, now the wife of Keith Stewart, or as many of them as might be then living; and after specifying several articles, which he wished to be reserved from sale, and giving some specific and pecuniary legacies, he concluded as follows:—"The funded property confided to trustees under my marriage settlement in 1820 is, I believe, left at my disposal as the survivor as far as appropriating the shares to each of my children, but of this fund the sum of 2,000l. was settled at her marriage upon my daughter Mary; the remainder I wish to be equally divided among my sons, as also any other sum of money that I may die possessed of."

On the 8th of September 1855 A. C. L.

Fitzroy, a captain in the army, was mortally wounded in action before Sebastopol, and on the 10th he died, having never been married. He left no written will; but a question was raised whether or not he left a nuncupative will. Letters of administration, as on an intestacy, were granted to G. H. Fitzroy.

On the 11th of December 1855 Sir C. A. Fitzroy married a second time; he died on the 16th of February 1858, having in no other manner revoked his will than by his second marriage.

On the 9th of July 1858 the Court of Probate granted administration of his estate to his widow, excepting such as under his marriage settlement he had appointed and disposed of by will.

On the 3rd of May 1858 letters of administration, with the will annexed, limited to all such personal estates as Sir C. A. Fitzroy by his marriage settlement had a right to appoint, and had by his will appointed and disposed of, were granted to the plaintiff A. G. Fitzroy.

Doubts arose whether the plaintiff was not entitled to a moiety of the settled stock; and whether A. C. L. Fitzroy was not included in the testamentary appointment; and whether it had not failed as to one-third of the fund, and that one-third had not devolved as in default of appointment.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Hobhouse, for the plaintiff A. G. Fitzroy, left the construction to the Court.

Mr. Farrer, for Mary Caroline Stewart.—The wishes expressed by the testator were the index of his intention. His personal property he gave to his sons and daughter by name if then living. The settled reversionary property was given to the sons in like manner, subject only to the payment of an appointed sum of 2,000*l.*; the death, however, of A. C. L. Fitzroy had left his one-third of the fund unappointed; it remained, therefore, subject to the provisions of the settlement.—

Ackerman v. Burrows, 3 Ves. & B. 54.

Leigh v. Leigh, 17 Beav. 605; s.c. 23 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 287.

Mr. Selwyn and Mr. Fremantle, for G. H. Fitzroy.—The will admitted of no question in respect of the testator's personal estate. The appointment of the settled property was reversionary; it was made to the sons as a class, which was to be determined at the death of the testator. The survivors, therefore, had become entitled to the whole after providing for the 2,000*l.* sterling.

Les v. Pain, 4 Hare, 201; s.c. 14 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 346.

Cruss v. Howell, 4 Drew. 215.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The word "sons" is a general designation of the class. The general rule is clearly established. The cases cited do not point out any violation of it, except where there is a designation of particular persons. In Ackerman v. Burrows the question was the meaning of the word "you": whether "to be divided amongst you" meant the same as if he had said "his mother and sisters"; and so in Ham's Trusts it was a question whether there was not a designation of the particular persons. In this will it is the general residue which he gives. It is not merely the remainder of the fund in the settlement, but "also any other sums of money he may die possessed of." It is the general residue which he gives to his sons, and would clearly include all his sons. Where a person uses only words which designate a class, he leaves it to the law to determine what that class may be. No doubt sons of the second marriage would not have been entitled to take under the fund settled in favour of the issue of the first marriage exclusively, but that cannot in the slightest degree affect the meaning of the words, which are a general class. When he speaks of his children, mentioning them by name, in the former part of his will, he directs that "as many of them as shall be living" shall take. If he intended the same class to take, the only way was to say his children, because so many of them as were living would take; but he intended to exclude the daughter, and therefore he intended to give it to the sons as a class. It would be a dangerous principle in construing a will to introduce any word where it is not required. If I put in "my said sons," and made it a designation of particular persons, I should be introducing words to turn a class, according to the ordinary meaning, into a designation of particular persons, for the purpose of creating an intestacy. And if he had a son by the second marriage, I should exclude that son from taking a share in the general residue not included in the settlement. I am of opinion, it means generally sons in the fullest acceptance of the term; and that the class is to be ascertained at his death, and only those who survived can take.

Settlement—Daughter's Portion—Infancy—Appointment—Marriage.

*Tenants for life of a fund settled on their marriage had a power to appoint the same among the children of the marriage. Upon the marriage of a daughter, one of the children of the marriage, under age, a deed was executed by the tenants for life, by which the reversion in 2,000*l., part of the fund, was assigned by the tenants for life to trustees to pay the income to the intended husband for life, with remainder to the wife for life, with remainder to the children of the marriage:—Held, to be a valid appointment to the daughter, and that the settlement was a good declaration of trust by the intended husband of the fortune of his wife, though an infant.

Mary Caroline Fitzroy, when but seventeen years of age, intermarried with Keith Stewart, and in contemplation of the marriage, by a deed, dated the 9th of August 1841, Sir Charles and Lady M. Fitzroy, after reciting that it had been agreed by virtue of the powers contained in their marriage settlement, that they should appoint 2,000*l.* sterling, part of the settled funds, assigned and set over all that sum of 2,000*l.*, part of 12,000*l.* in their marriage settlement mentioned, and which they authorized jointly to distribute or Lady M. Fitzroy, upon trust to pay the income to Keith Stewart for life, and after his decease to pay the income to M. C. Stewart for life, and after the decease of the survivor to apply the 2,000*l.* for the children of the intended marriage, of whom there were now several.

The 12,000*l.* did not correctly describe the settled funds.

It was doubted whether the power was properly exercised, and whether there was a valid settlement of the fund, as Mary C. Stewart was an infant at the time of her marriage.

Mr. Selwyn and Mr. Fremantle contended that the appointment made was bad, as not being in accordance with the power, and that the settlement made on the marriage of the infant had entirely failed—

Mr. Farrer.—A valid appointment was made by Sir Charles and Lady Fitzroy upon the marriage of their daughter. The power was general, and it could be exercised at any time. Infancy did not prevent its vesting. It was for her benefit. The appointment was not varied by being made the subject of a settlement. She might not then have had any power to consent; her consent, however, was not material to the appointment. Assuming, however, that the appointment was valid, the settlement by the intended husband and wife was valid, and could not be impeached after the marriage, for though the wife was an infant, the husband jure marit had full power to settle the fund.—

June 16.—The MASTER OF THE ROLL.—The settlement made on the marriage of Mary C. Fitzroy may be supported, as an

ing she was an infant at the time it was made, and also when she was married. It being a reversionary fund does not affect the question. The interest was reversionary in White v. St. Barbe, but there it was considered that a good settlement was made. The question of infancy apparently created greater doubt, but the husband can dispose of the property of the wife in expectancy against everyone except the wife him surviving. This must apply as well to an infant as to an adult female, and the Court, if the infant had been its ward, would have approved of a settlement. It would have been binding on the infant in all future time. Accordingly, I think that this must be treated on the same principle as Routledge v. Dorril, where the fund was considered as appointed to the daughter and then settled by the husband for the benefit of the children of the marriage; and, being of that opinion, I shall make a declaration to that effect.

Will—Construction—Cross-Limitations.

A testator bequeathed his residuary estate upon trust as to one moiety for his daughter M. for life, and in default of issue of M. upon trust as to one half part thereof as M. should appoint, and in default of appointment over, and as to the other half part of such moiety, upon the same trusts as were therein after declared concerning the other moiety of his residuary estate; and he proceeded to declare precisely similar trusts of the other moiety, substituting the name of his daughter E. for that of M. Both M. and E. exercised their powers of appointment, and died without issue:—Held, that each appointment effectually disposed of one moiety of the testator's residuary estate.

Richard Battye, by his will, dated the 22nd of May 1829, after certain devises and bequests, gave all other his real and personal estate to trustees, upon trust to sell and convert the same into money, and after setting apart several sums of money amounting to 17,000*l.*, to invest the residue, and to stand possessed thereof, upon trust, during the life of his daughter, Mary Jane, the wife of James Crosland Fenton, to pay and apply the dividends, interest and annual proceeds of one moiety or equal half part or share of such residue as his said daughter Mary Jane Fenton should direct or appoint, or in default of such direction or appointment, for her sole and separate use; and from and immediately after the decease of the said Mary Jane Fenton, should stand possessed of the said moiety, in trust for such of the children or child of his said daughter Mary Jane Fenton, as she should direct or appoint, and in default of such direction and appointment in trust for all and every the children or only child of the said Mary Jane Fenton, who being a son or sons should attain the age of twenty-one years, or being a daughter or daughters, should attain that age, or be married, in equal shares as tenants in common; and if there should be but one child, the whole to be in trust for that one child; and the said will contained trusts for the maintenance and education of the child or children of the said Mary Jane Fenton, and for the accumulation of the surplus income of their respective fortunes. Provided always, and the said testator declared his intention to be, that if there should be no child of the said Mary Jane Fenton (which event happened) who, being a son, should attain the age of twenty-one years, or, being a daughter, should attain that age or marry, then and in such case the said trustees should, from and after the decease of the said Mary Jane Fenton, and such default or failure of children as aforesaid, stand and be possessed of, and interested in the said moiety or equal half part or share of his said residuary estate thereinbefore given in trust for the said Mary Jane Fenton, and the dividends, interest and annual proceeds thereof, or the part or parts thereof unapplied under the trust or direction thereinbefore contained for the maintenance and education of the child or children of the said Mary Jane Fenton, and the accumulations, if any, thereof respectively, upon the trusts following, that is to say, as to one half part of such moiety, upon trust to pay, assign and transfer the same unto such person or persons, and in such parts and proportions, and under and subject to such conditions, restrictions, charges and limitations as the said Mary Jane Fenton should at any time, notwithstanding her coverture, by deed or will appoint; and in default of such appointment, upon trust to pay and divide the same unto and amongst his children or child, or grandchildren or grandchild, equally amongst them, share and share alike; and if but one, then to such only child or grandchild; and as to the other half part of such moiety of his said residuary estate so thereinbefore given in trust for the said Mary Jane Fenton as aforesaid, upon the same trusts as were thereafter declared of the moiety or equal half part or share of his said residuary estate next thereafter disposed of, in trust for his daughter Ellen Elizabeth Battye, or such of them as should be subsisting and capable of taking effect; and as to the remaining moiety or equal half part or share of his said residuary estate, upon trust that the said trustees should, during the life of his daughter Ellen Elizabeth Battye, pay and apply the dividends, interest and annual proceeds thereof, as his said daughter Ellen Elizabeth Battye should direct or appoint, or, in default of such direction or appointment, for her sole and separate use; and from and immediately after the decease of his said daughter Ellen Elizabeth Battye, should stand possessed of the said moiety or equal half part or share, in trust for such of the children or child of his said daughter Ellen Elizabeth Battye as she should direct and appoint, and in default of such direction and appointment, in trust for all and every the children and child of the said Ellen Elizabeth Battye (if any) who, being a son or sons, should attain the age of twenty-one years, or, being a daughter or daughters, should attain that age or be married, in equal shares as tenants in common; and if there should be but one child, the whole to be in trust for that one child; and the said will contained trusts for the maintenance and education of the child or children of the said Ellen Elizabeth Battye, and for the accumulation of the income of their respective fortunes. And the testator declared his will to be, that if there should be no child of the said

Ellen Elizabeth Battye who, being a son, should attain the age of twenty-one years, or, being a daughter, should attain that age or marry, then and in such case the said trustees should, after the decease of the said Ellen Elizabeth Battye and such default or failure of children of her the said Ellen Elizabeth Battye as aforesaid, stand and be possessed of, and interested in, the lastly thereinbefore-mentioned moiety or equal half part or share of his residuary estate so given in trust for the said Ellen Elizabeth Battye as aforesaid, and the dividends, interest and annual proceeds thereof, or the part or parts thereof unapplied under the trust or declaration thereinbefore contained, for the maintenance and education of the child or children of the said Ellen Elizabeth Battye, and the accumulations, if any, thereof respectively, upon the trusts following: that is to say, as to one half part of such moiety, upon trust to pay, assign and transfer the same unto such person or persons, in such parts and proportions, and under and subject to such conditions, restrictions, charges and limitations as the said Ellen Elizabeth Battye, notwithstanding her coverture, by deed or will should direct or appoint; and in default of such appointment, upon trust to pay and divide the same unto and amongst his children or child, grandchildren or grandchild, equally amongst them, share and share alike; and if but one, then to such only child or grandchild; and as to the other half part of such moiety of his said residuary estate so thereinbefore given in trust for the said Ellen Elizabeth Battye as aforesaid, upon the same trusts as were declared of the moiety or equal half part or share of his said residuary estate thereinbefore given in trust for his said daughter Mary Jane Fenton, or such of them as should be subsisting or capable of taking effect.

The will contained no further disposition of residue than as above stated. The testator died on the 29th of November 1829, leaving Mary Jane Fenton and Ellen Elizabeth Battye surviving him.

Mary Jane Fenton, by her will, dated the 30th of November 1829, in pursuance of the power given to her by the will of the testator R. Battye, appointed all and singular the trust-moneys, parts or shares, property and effects, which under the will of R. Battye were vested in trust for her, or over which she had then or might thereafter have any interest, unto her husband, James Crosland Fenton, absolutely.

Mrs. Fenton died in 1848.

Ellen Elizabeth Battye married Mr. Atkinson, the plaintiff, after the death of the testator; and by indenture of settlement made thereon she appointed all her interest under the residuary gift in R. Battye's will to trustees, upon such trusts as Mrs. Atkinson should by deed or will appoint.

By her will, dated the 26th of July 1849, Mrs. Atkinson appointed her interest under the settlement in favour of her husband; and she died in the year 1849. Neither Mrs. Fenton nor Mrs. Atkinson ever had any children.

Mr. Fenton died in the year 1853, having, by his will, appointed the defendants Jones, Fenton and Rayner his executors. Under these circumstances, the question arose as to what interest the plaintiff and W. Fenton's executors took in the testator's residuary estate under the appointments of their respective wives.

Mr. Rolt, Mr. James, Mr. Dart and Mr. W. H. G. Bagshawe, for the plaintiff and the executors of J. C. Fenton, claimed between them the whole fund. The moiety which was by the testator's will given over on the decease of either daughter without issue, would again become divisible into moieties, one of which would be subject to the appointment of the other daughter, and the other would be divisible as before, and so on ad infinitum, continually dividing though never exhausting the residue; and each fresh division would bring one-half thereof within the appointment.

Mr. Daniel, Mr. Hardy and Mr. J. T. Humphry, for the heir-at-law and next-of-kin, contended, that there was an intestacy as to one-half of the moiety of each share, and that when each daughter had appointed one moiety of her own share and one-half of the moiety of her sister's share, the power was exhausted and the residue undisposed of.

Wood, V.C. (without hearing the reply).
—I think that this will is really, though I hardly like to say so after so many opinions upon it (1), reasonably clear. The testator obviously had only three classes of persons in view—that is to say, first, each of these two daughters; secondly, her children; and, thirdly, his own other children and grandchildren. Those are the only persons he contemplated at all in disposing of the whole residue of his estate, and he goes to work by a set of cross-limitations contemplating that as to each daughter's share it shall be settled on her children, and if she has no child then she shall be the absolute owner of one moiety of her share, that is, she shall have an absolute power of appointment over it, which is pretty much the same thing as ownership. She shall be owner, if she thinks fit to make herself owner of the one moiety; if she does not do that, it is to go to the children and the grandchildren of the testator. Then the idea strikes the testator that he would like to give over the other moiety, in case of that daughter having no child, to the other daughter and her children in the same way. But suppose the other daughter has no children, then he has exactly the same intention with regard to her share, that is to say, he prefers in either of these cases the possible children of these favoured daughters, either to giving each of his daughters an absolute power, or to giving any share to the grandchildren and other children in the event of her not making any appointment. For that purpose and that purpose only, namely, for providing for the children of one daughter, in the event of there being no child of the other daughter he takes it out of the power of disposition. It seems natural that he would have given the daughter who had no children a power over the whole fund, but he says, "No, she has no child, and does not want the whole fund; she shall only have power over half the fund, and the other half shall go to the other sister and her children; but if that other sister and her children do not want it, it shall go back. I do not want any longer to abstract it from the control of the daughter to whom it was originally given. I only want to abstract it for that particular purpose, and when that purpose is answered there is no reason for saying that it shall not go back to the old share." He certainly does not advert to the somewhat curious effect it has of drawing it backwards and forwards; it is to go to the same trusts, "or such of them as are subsisting and capable of taking effect." The words, "subsisting and capable of taking effect," would probably remove the absurdity of the case; for if it is written out in full it will then run in this way: "If Mary has no child, then half as Mary shall appoint, and the other half on the same trusts as Ellen's share." Then, when you remember what Ellen's share is, it would be thus: "As to the other half, to Ellen for life, and if she has no child, then as to one moiety as Ellen shall appoint, and as to the other moiety upon the trusts of Mary's share," which are to Mary for life, with remainder to her children, and so on. Those trusts for Mary and her children are no longer capable of taking effect. But Mary's power of appointment still remains, and there still remain the other children and grandchildren of the testator, so that the absurdity is got rid of by the words "or such as are subsisting and capable of taking effect."

It appears to have been thought that when the lady has made an appointment it is done once for all, and though she appoints in words large enough to convey every interest vested or capable of taking effect, there is no trust capable of taking effect. I apprehend when the lady has put her hand to an appointment, her appointees are exactly where the children and grandchildren would have been in the event of no appointment; and the effect of the limitation over would be that the share would have to be continually carried backwards and forwards on each limitation. When you come to the second set of limitations you must leave out the daughter and children, because they would be gone ex hypothesi—they would not be capable of taking; but, then, are not the children and grandchildren and the appointees of each daughter still capable of taking? In this way the share would come backwards and forwards. Although this may seem a whimsical way of limitation, and although it was probably not the way in which the testator contemplated it would go, I think there is apparent an intention to withdraw the moiety in the first instance simply for the purpose of letting in the interest of the others. He introduces a set of words which by this shifting of the limitations seems to me capable of carrying into effect this idea, and I do not see why I am to strike out any portion of the trusts which are capable of taking effect. Even if you take it as a mathematical proposition it will in reality come out that the moiety is given to the appointment of each daughter; and if you take it on the simple practical question, the law would say if the property is given down to a farthing, it is given altogether. Taken either one way or the other, there being no other determination of the case to which I can come, it seems to me that the shares do continue to shift over. It is some satisfaction to find that an eminent conveyancer has thought it right to give a precedent for cross-limitations in this form (2); but I should have thought there would be a more simple way of doing it. I do not remember to have ever met with a will in this form.

Declare that the appointment of Mrs. Atkinson and Mrs. Fenton each effectually disposed of one moiety of the testator's residuary estate.

Devise—"Or" read "and"—Introduction of Repugnant Condition—Gift over made void.

A testator devised specific shares in an estate to several persons nominatim, to hold the same as tenants in common, and not as joint-tenants; and in the event of any of them dying before having heirs of their body, "or" making a particular disposition of his or her property, then his or her share was to go to the survivors:—Held, that the devisees did not take estates tail, but estates in fee; that the gift over could only take effect on the happening of two events; that the word "or" must be read "and," although in effect it introduced a condition repugnant to the estate previously given, and made the gift over void.

Held, also, that the shares of those devisees who died in the testator's lifetime were undisposed of, and passed to the heir-at-law.

Timothy Greated, by his will, dated the 21st of January 1834, devised as follows: "With respect to my real estate, as devised to me by my late sister, I give, devise and bequeath to them (i. e. his children thereafter mentioned) and their heirs, for ever, as follows, viz. to Charles Augustine Greated five thirtieth parts, to Joseph Greated four ditto, to T. Greated four ditto, to James Greated four ditto, to William Arthur Greated four ditto, to Elizabeth Greated three ditto, to Catherine King Greated three ditto, to Emily Greated three ditto, to hold the same as tenants in common, and not as joint-tenants; and in the event of any of them dying before having heirs of their body, or making a particular disposition of his or her property, then and in that case his or her share to go to the survivors in the same proportion as aforesaid as the survivors may bear to each other."

The testator died in July 1858. Elizabeth Greated and William Arthur Greated died unmarried in the testator's lifetime. The other devisees were still living.

The suit was instituted by some of the devisees for the opinion of the Court upon the construction of the devise.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Jessel, for the plaintiffs.—The testator did not intend to die intestate as to any part of the estate given to him by his sister. The parties to take were designated, and whether in fee or in tail, still the shares of those who died in the lifetime of the testator were to pass to the survivors—

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I have to determine what estate the eight persons named take in the devise made by Timothy Greated. This involves the question, whether the word "or" between the words "dying before having heirs of their body" and the words "making a particular disposition of his or her property" is to be read disjunctively or conjunctively—whether the word "or" is to be read "and." In my opinion the estate given to these persons is an estate in fee, with an executory devise over upon the happening of a contingency consisting of two events, namely, a failure of heirs of the body, and the making a particular disposition of the property. If the latter branch of the alternative were omitted, that is, if the words

"or making a particular disposition of his or her property" were struck out of the will, there is no question but that it would be an estate tail; it would be simply a devise to one and his heirs, and a devise over in the event of his dying without heirs of his body, which would be an estate tail. But this is not the only event on which the devise over is to take effect. The words are "dying before having heirs of their body, or making a particular disposition of his or her property, then, in that case, his or her share to go to the survivors." In my opinion the gift over is to take effect upon a double event, and the estate given to these persons cannot be treated as an estate tail, but as an estate in fee, with a gift over upon the happening of a future contingency, which consists of two events, namely, a particular disposition by the devisee, or the failure of heirs of the body. The cases cited sufficiently establish that the Court will convert the word "or" into "and" where the context requires it, although the effect of this may be to introduce a condition repugnant to the estate previously given. In The Incorporated Society v. Richards (1) the words were, "Shall die without issue or make any will," and there the word "or" was read "and," and here the words are, "die before having heirs of their body, or making a particular disposition of his or her property." It is scarcely possible to find two cases more alike; and reading the word "or" as the word "and," which I do for the purpose of giving effect to what is the clear meaning of the context, then I am of opinion that this is a condition repugnant to the estate previously given, and that the gift over after the gift of an estate in fee, on the death of the devisee before having issue or making a particular disposition, is wholly void. It is unnecessary to go through the cases on this point, because it is clear that when an estate is given to a person in fee, with a gift over in case he disposes of the estate, the gift over is wholly repugnant; and the only question here really is, what is the estate given in the first instance—whether it is an estate in fee or an estate tail? and, as I have before stated, it is an estate in fee. With respect to the shares of Elizabeth and William Arthur, who died in the lifetime of the testator, the question is distinct from that which arises where there is a gift to a person, and in case of the neglect or refusal by him to perform a condition, then over,—in such case, if the devisee dies before the testator, the gift over takes effect. It is unnecessary to go into the distinctions which arise in cases similar to Avelyn v. Ward. Most of those cases shew that even if the gift over were not limited to take effect on an event inconsistent with the previous gift, it would fail altogether in consequence of the death of the devisee in the lifetime of the testator. The result therefore is, that the shares devised to Elizabeth and William Arthur were undisposed of, and devolve upon the heir-at-law.

 March 14. } STRINGER v. GARDNER.

Will—Parol Evidence—Ambiguity.

Parol evidence will not be admitted to shew that a bequest in a former will had been inadvertently allowed to remain in a second will.

A testator, in the lifetime of his niece E, made a will containing bequests in her favour. She afterwards died, leaving a granddaughter, E. J, who was a great-great-niece of the testator. With a knowledge of these facts, the testator made a second will, which contained bequests to E, identical with those contained in his former will:—Held, that the testator's great-great-niece was within the description, and that she was entitled to the legacies.

This suit was instituted, by Elizabeth Jane Stringer, to establish her right to the following bequests:—

Benjamin Tapley, by his will, dated the 18th of January 1852, bequeathed as follows:—"I give and bequeath unto my niece Elizabeth Stringer the sum of 20*l.* for mourning"; and after other bequests he said:—"As to all that my cottage and premises, called Rose Cottage, upon trust for my said niece Elizabeth Stringer, her executors, administrators and assigns."

(1) 1 Dru. & W. 258.

The testator died in September 1856. He had not at the date of his will, or at any time afterwards, a niece of the name of Elizabeth Stringer; but Elizabeth Stringer, a niece of the testator, had died, in February 1848, previously to the date of his will, leaving a granddaughter, named Elizabeth Jane Stringer, who was the only relation of the testator of the name of Stringer, or of the name of Elizabeth, living at the date of his will and of his death. She was about five years old at the date of the testator's will.

Evidence was gone into by the next-of-kin to shew that a will, made by the testator in May 1847, contained bequests "to his niece Elizabeth Stringer," who was then living, in the same words as those used in his second will; and that in 1850 he made a codicil to his will, which did not affect those bequests; that in January 1852 the testator instructed his solicitor to prepare a codicil for the purpose of making some alterations in his will; that the solicitor advised the testator not to make a second codicil, but to make such alterations in the will of May 1847 as might be desired; that the solicitor accordingly made such alterations in the will of May 1847, and that the will of the 13th of January 1852 was accordingly executed by the testator; that the solicitor was not aware that Elizabeth Stringer, the testator's niece, was dead at that time, and that the attention of the testator was not drawn to that fact. There was evidence, on the part of the plaintiff, shewing that the testator knew that Elizabeth Stringer was dead, he having been present at her funeral.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Lindley, for the plaintiff.—The will was evidence that the testator did not contemplate intestacy. If there was ambiguity, evidence was admissible to shew the intention of the testator, but the Court would never admit evidence to expunge a bequest: it would be a most dangerous innovation—

Mr. Selwyn and Mr. Dean, for the defendants.—Evidence is always admissible to shew a mistake in the will: the gifts had been inadvertently allowed to remain in the will. It was most improbable that the testator would leave a legacy of 20*l.* for mourning to a child of five years old.—

& W. 363; s. c. 9 Law J. Rep.

(N.S.) Exch. 27.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The plaintiff is entitled to this bequest. The rule as to the reception of parol evidence to explain a will is perfectly clear. In every case of ambiguity, whether latent or patent, parol evidence is admissible to shew the state of the testator's family or property; but the cases in which parol evidence is admissible to shew the person intended to be designated by the testator are those cases of latent ambiguity mentioned by Sir J. Wigram, where there are two or more persons, who answer other descriptions in the will, each of whom, standing alone, would be entitled to take. If there had been another Elizabeth Stringer living at the date of the will parol evidence would have been admissible to ascertain who the person was the testator intended to designate. But in this case the Court is asked to admit parol evidence, not for the purpose of explaining the meaning of the testator, but for the purpose of shewing that he had no meaning at all; in fact, for the purpose of expunging the words from the will altogether. To admit evidence for such a purpose would be to create the greatest alarm in the minds of testators, and to introduce the greatest uncertainty in the construction of wills. All that the Court has to do is to see if the words of the will are sufficiently clear to point to a particular person. If the evidence had gone to shew that the testator had never heard of any Elizabeth Stringer, that there was no such person related to him, and that the person who claimed was a mere stranger, the case would be different. There was a person named Elizabeth related to the testator by blood, who may be described as the great-niece of the testator, or the niece twice removed; but in ordinary language she might be described as the niece of the testator. The question then is, whether the plaintiff is entitled to take under the words "my niece Elizabeth Stringer," her full name being Elizabeth Jane Stringer. One conclusion alone can be arrived at, which is that the plaintiff is entitled; and I must make a declaration to that effect (1).

NELSON v. STOCKER.

Infant—Misrepresentation of Age—Husband and Wife—Settlement—Covenant.

*On the marriage between a minor of seventeen and a widow of thirty-two, possessed of 1,000*l.* in business, he covenanted by settlement to pay 1,000*l.* to a trustee, upon trust for the separate use of the lady for life, and if she should die in his lifetime, for the children of the lady by a former marriage. After the marriage the husband possessed himself of the stock of the wife's business, and carried it on till her death, seven years afterwards. The trustee demanded payment of the 1,000*l., and on the husband refusing to pay, he filed a bill on behalf of the children of the former marriage. The husband set up as his defence that he was an infant, and that the wife knew the fact, at the time of the marriage. The evidence proved the infancy, and an assertion by the husband to the wife's solicitor that he was of age, but it also proved that the wife knew of the infancy. One of the Vice Chancellors decreed that, on the grounds of misrepresentation and acquiescence, the infancy was no defence, and made a decree for the plaintiff. On appeal,—Held, reversing that decision, that the bill must be dismissed, for that the case upon the evidence must be taken as if the fact of infancy had been stated in the settlement; that the rights of the husband must, as to the ground of acquiescence, be taken to be the same as on the day after his marriage; that to deprive an infant of the privilege of infancy, more is necessary than shewing he made a false representation, for it must be proved that the party to whom it is made was deceived, and that contracts made with an infant, known to be so, are binding on those who enter into them, for infancy is a legal privilege, and not to be broken in upon on slight grounds.

This was an appeal from a decree made by Vice Chancellor Stuart, in a suit in which the three surviving (of four) infant children of the late Anne Perkins Stocker (formerly Nelson, widow), by Henry Wise, their next friend, were plaintiffs, and William Burbank Stocker, the second husband of Mrs. Nelson, was defendant, by which his Honour decided that the defendant must pay 1,000*l.*, without interest, within three months. The circumstances are as follows:—The late Mr. J. H. Nelson carried on at Newport, in Monmouthshire, until his death, the business of a pawnbroker, which his widow continued. In contemplation of a second marriage, with Mr. W. B. Stocker, a settlement, dated the 10th of October 1850 was executed, Mr. Stocker being a party of the first part, the widow of the second part, and Mr. Ebenezer Vaughan Jenkins, a trustee, of the third part; by which it was recited that Mrs. Nelson had four children by her former husband, and that she had carried on business at Newport as a pawnbroker, and had then employed in such business a capital of upwards of 1,000*l.*, and that a marriage was intended, and that upon the treaty for the intended marriage it was agreed that Mr. Stocker should enter into such covenant as was thereafter contained for the payment to the said trustee of the sum of 1,000*l.* and interest, and that the said trustee should stand possessed of 1,000*l.* and interest upon and for the trusts thereafter declared. It was then witnessed that, in consideration of the intended marriage and of the agreement, Mr. Stocker thereby for himself, his executors, administrators and assigns, covenanted with the trustee, his executors, administrators and assigns, and also with the trustee or trustees for the time being of the deed, that in case the said marriage should be solemnized, he, his heirs, executors or administrators, would pay to the trustee, his executors, administrators or assigns, or other the trustee or trustees, the sum of 1,000*l.* And it was provided that it should not be lawful for the trustee or trustees, during the lifetime of Anne Perkins Nelson, to compel payment of the 1,000*l.* unless required so to do by her, by writing under her hand. The trusts of the 1,000*l.* were declared to be during the joint lives of Mr. Stocker and Mrs. Nelson, for her separate use, and if she survived, for herself absolutely; but if she should die in the lifetime of Mr. Stocker, then for her four children by John Nelson, her former husband.

The marriage took place three days after the date of the settlement, which was executed by all parties, and Mr. Stocker entered into possession of the stock-in-trade of the pawnbroking business, and carried on the same up to the death of his wife, on the 11th of August 1857. One of her children by the former marriage had died, and she had children by her second husband, the whole family having been maintained in the house and at school by Mr. Stocker and his wife, and after her death, until the institution of this suit, by him alone. A week after Mrs. Stocker died, and on the 17th of August, the trustee of the settlement (who had been appointed in the month of March 1857, in lieu of Mr. Jenkins, who never acted) wrote a letter to Mr. Stocker, requesting payment to be made of the 1,000*l.* A solicitor, on behalf of Mr. Stocker, wrote in reply as follows:—

“Sir,—Mr. Stocker has placed your letter to him in my hands, with instructions to reply that at the time the settlement in question was made he was a minor, and therefore not competent to bind himself by deed, and now that he is of full age and more competent to judge of the propriety of executing such a settlement, he declines to be bound by the document in question; and I may add, that from the time of his majority he has always expressed and acted upon that determination.”

Upon this the bill was filed, alleging that the defendant was, at the execution of the settlement and at the time of his marriage, of full age, and that he represented himself as of full age to his late wife, and that she executed the settlement on the faith of that representation; and praying that the defendant might be decreed to pay to the trustee and next friend of the plaintiffs the sum of 1,000*l.* and interest from the death of the said Anne Perkins Stocker.

The defendant by his answer stated that

shortly after the marriage he found that the business was not worth more than 700*l.*; that he was not of full age at the time of the execution of the settlement and the marriage, and he was then only seventeen years of age, having been born in 1832; that in June 1850 he entered into an engagement with Mrs. Nelson to assist her in her business, and very shortly after Mrs. Nelson, who was then of the age of thirty-two or thereabouts, became very anxious that he should marry her, and frequently pressed him most urgently to do so; that at last he consented, and they were married in October 1850; that at the time when the ceremony was performed, the defendant thought that some person, but who in particular he did not remember, asked him if he was of age, and to the best of his belief Mrs. Nelson answered for him that he was; that at that time he was not aware that he was not of age; that his father died two months before he (defendant) was born, and that he left home at a very early age; that after he had agreed to marry Mrs. Nelson, she proposed the settlement, to which he agreed, and it was executed at her expense; and that previously to his signing the settlement he thought the solicitor asked him, in the course of conversation, whether he was of age, and the defendant replied, as was then the fact, that he thought he was; but he did not then know that the question was of any importance. And by his affidavit he further represented that he had never at any time since he attained the age of twenty-one adopted or confirmed the settlement, but, on the contrary, he had always, since he discovered what his age was at the time of the marriage (which discovery he made within a year after the date of the settlement) refused to be bound by it, and he denied that the marriage was solemnized on the faith of any representation whatever as to his age. Among the pieces of evidence were letters of the late Mrs. Stocker to the trustee, from which it appeared that, in March 1857, she was apprehensive that her husband (as he had threatened) intended to sell the property secretly and at any sacrifice, so as to avoid her claim; and the defendant's near relatives, his mother and his aunt, proved that he was born on the 29th of November 1832, and his age was spoken of in the register book of marriage thus—"William Burbank Stocker, of full age."

There was other evidence in the cause, but it is fully referred to in their Lordships' judgment; and as the effect of the arguments urged on the appeal are there also fully stated and examined, a recapitulation of them is rendered unnecessary.

June 30.—LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—It being established in the cause that the defendant did not attain his majority before the latter part of the year 1853, he is primâ facie not bound by the instrument of settlement signed and sealed by him in the year 1850, the year of his marriage, which it is the object of the suit to enforce against him. The plaintiffs, however, say that the defendant is bound by the instrument; because, as the plaintiffs contend, the defendant, with knowledge of his true age, misrepresented his age to his now deceased wife, and caused her, when the settlement was agreed to, when it was prepared and signed, and when they married, to believe him not on any of those occasions to be a minor. The plaintiffs say that she accepted the settlement in that faith, and married in that belief—a faith and belief induced, they assert, by the defendant's fraud. The plaintiffs also say that, independently of any question of fraud before the marriage, the defendant's conduct after the marriage, and especially after his majority, amounted to a confirmation by him of the settlement, and that, on both grounds or one of them, he is barred from denying his liability to make it good. It appears to me, upon the whole of the evidence, however, that the defendant's deceased wife is not shewn to have been defrauded or deceived by the defendant in any respect before their marriage. I believe that at the time of the marriage and previous to it—I believe that before the instrument of settlement in question was signed by either of them, and before it was prepared—she was aware of his minority, and that the case stands substantially upon the same footing, so far as the parties to the present record are concerned, as if the fact of his infancy had been stated on the face of the settlement. Then, with regard to confirmation: independently of the difficulty placed, perhaps, in the plaintiffs' way by Lord Tenterden's Act as well as the nature of the document which they seek to enforce against the defendant, I conceive that the plaintiffs' claim in this respect, whether excluded or not excluded by the mode in which the bill is framed, fails on the evidence. I think that there is no confirmation, no agreement to confirm, nor conduct tantamount to proof of either. The rights of the defendant seem to me to remain as they did on the day after his marriage. I am of opinion, therefore, that the bill is without foundation, but that it is not a case for costs.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER. — This bill is filed by the infant children of Anne Perkins Stocker, the issue of her marriage by her first husband, John Henry Nelson, and by Henry Wise, a newly-appointed trustee of the settlement made upon the marriage of Anne Perkins Stocker with her second husband, the defendant, William Burbank Stocker, and it is filed for the purpose of compelling the payment by the defendant William Burbank Stocker to the plaintiff Henry Wise, of the sum of 1,000*l.*, to be held by him upon the trusts of the settlement. By the settlement, which was dated the 10th of October 1850, the defendant William Burbank Stocker covenanted with Ebenezer Vaughan Jenkins, and also with the trustee or trustees for the time being of the settlement, that in case the marriage should be solemnized he would pay to Ebenezer Vaughan Jenkins, or other the trustee or trustees thereof, the sum of 1,000*l.*; but it was provided that the trustee or trustees should not, during the life of Anne Perkins Stocker, compel payment of the 1,000*l.* until the decease of the defendant, unless required so to do by Anne Perkins Stocker, by writing under her hand; and it was declared and agreed that the 1,000*l.* should be held upon trusts for the separate use of Anne Perkins Stocker during the joint lives of herself and the defendant William Burbank Stocker, and if she should survive him upon trust for her absolutely; but if she should die in his lifetime, upon trusts which, so far as it is material to refer to them, were for the benefit of the plaintiffs, the children of the first marriage. Ebenezer Vaughan Jenkins never accepted the trusts of the settlement, and in the month of March 1857 the plaintiff Henry Wise was appointed under a power in the settlement to be trustee in his place. The marriage between the defendant William Burbank Stocker and Anne Perkins Stocker was solemnized on the 13th of October 1850, and in the month of August 1857 Anne Perkins Stocker died. The bill alleging these facts alleges also that at the date of the settlement and at the time of the marriage Anne Perkins Stocker carried on the business of a pawnbroker, and was possessed of, and employed in that business, a capital of upwards of 1,000*l.*; that immediately upon the marriage, the defendant William Burbank Stocker took possession of his wife's capital and stock-in-trade, and that he has ever since carried on the business of a pawnbroker; that the defendant William Burbank Stocker was at the execution of the settlement and at the time of the marriage of full age, and that he then represented himself to Anne Perkins Stocker to be of full age, and that on the faith of such representation to the said Anne Perkins Stocker the marriage was solemnized, the settlement executed, and the capital and stock of Anne Perkins Stocker were delivered over to, and taken possession of by, the defendant William Burbank Stocker. It is under these circumstances that the payment of the 1,000*l.* is demanded by this bill. The evidence in the cause seems to me to establish beyond all doubt that at the date of the settlement and at the time of the marriage the defendant William Burbank Stocker was only between seventeen and eighteen years of age, and Anne Perkins Stocker was a widow of the age of thirty-two; and, as I read the evidence, it further establishes in favour of the plaintiffs that the defendant William Burbank Stocker, before the execution of the settlement, was asked by the solicitor who prepared it whether he was of age, and replied that he thought that he was; and in favour of the defendant, that Anne Perkins Stocker herself knew, before the marriage, that the defendant William Burbank Stocker was not of age. This, in my judgment, is the true result of the evidence in the cause, and it is upon these facts that Vice Chancellor Stuart has decreed the payment of the 1,000*l.* The defendant has appealed from the decree. In the course of the argument upon the appeal, some question was raised as to the case being one in which the proper remedy was by an action at law upon the covenant; but, upon consideration, I think that the bill sufficiently alleges a case of fraud on the part of the defendant, and that the case, therefore, is one in which there must be at least a concurrent jurisdiction in equity. If the case had depended simply upon the point of the defendant having represented himself to be of age, when he was not of age, I should have felt no doubt about it; for it would be too much to call upon the Court to believe that this defendant could really have thought himself to be of age at the date of the settlement, when he was under eighteen years of age; and if he did not so think, the representation he made to the solicitor was false and fraudulent. Infants are no more entitled than adults are to gain benefits to themselves by fraud, and had the case, therefore, depended upon this point alone, I should have agreed most fully with the decision of Vice Chancellor Stuart. It is not, however, upon the question of false representation alone that the decision of the case, in my judgment, depends. It is scarcely less difficult to believe that Anne Perkins Stocker did not know that the defendant was under age at the time of the settlement and of the marriage, than that the defendant himself did not know it. In fact, the evidence proves that she knew it. The question, therefore, seems to me to be, not whether the representation made by the defendant was false, but whether a false representation made to a person who knows it to be false can be said to be a fraud, and such a fraud as will take away the privilege of infancy. There can be no doubt that it is morally wrong in an infant of competent age, as it is in any other person, to make any false representation whatever; but the Court cannot enforce the observance of obligations or duties which rest upon moral grounds only. Some wrong or injury must be shewn to the party complaining in order to call the Court into action; and I do not see how any wrong or injury can be said to have been done to any person to whom a false representation is made, when the person to whom it is made knows it to be false. If the representation is known to be false, the person to whom it is made cannot be deceived by it. Looking at the case in this point of view, it opens a question of great general importance. The law has, for the wisest reasons, thrown around infants a protection against acts done by them during their infancy, and the policy of the law cannot be maintained if this privilege of infancy be allowed to be broken in upon on slight and insufficient grounds. If the contracts of infants with persons who know them to be under age are held not to be binding, upon the ground that the infants represented themselves to be of age, there will hardly be a case in which the plea of infancy will be of any avail, and the door will be open to all frauds against infants from which the law was intended to protect them. The privilege of infancy is a legal privilege. On the one hand, it cannot be used by infants for the purposes of fraud. On the other hand, it cannot, I think, be allowed to be infringed upon by persons who, knowing of the infancy, must be taken also to know of the legal consequences which attach to it. This decree, so far as I am aware, is in this respect of the first impression, and I am not prepared to support a precedent which goes so far to destroy the legal privileges of infants. The Vice Chancellor seems, as I collect from his judgment, to have considered the knowledge imputed to Anne Perkins Stocker to have been of no importance, because the representation was made to the solicitor; but, according to the evidence, the solicitor was employed by her: he was her agent in the transaction. The settlement was prepared at her instance and for her benefit, and if the representation made to Anne Perkins Stocker herself would not have rendered the covenant binding upon the defendant, I do not see how the representation made to her agent can have that effect. It may be said, indeed, that the solicitor, had he been informed of the infancy, would have advised some different settlement; but I do not see how this can improve the plaintiffs' case. If there was a false representation made under such circumstances as would render the covenant binding upon the defendant, it would equally do so whether a different settlement would have been made or not. It is, indeed, a mere speculation whether a different settlement, or even any settlement, would have been made if the infancy had been disclosed to the solicitor; and it must be remembered, with reference to this point, that, assuming, as I do, that Anne Perkins Stocker knew of the infancy, it was her duty—no less her duty than it was the duty of the defendant—to have apprised the solicitor of the fact; and that if, on the one hand, there was false representation on the part of the defendant, there was, on the other hand, suppression on the part of Anne Perkins Stocker. It was much insisted upon, on the part of the plaintiffs, that there had been adoption and confirmation by the defendant; but this is wholly denied by the answer, and I can find no evidence of it beyond the fact that the defendant took possession of the business and stock-in-trade, and has continued in possession of it. This was, however, property to which the defendant became entitled jure mariti, and not by virtue of the settlement; and even if he can be considered to have purchased it by means of the settlement, it was not until March 1857 that there was any trustee of the settlement to whom he could notify his dissent; and it is clear, from the correspondence referred to in the affidavit in reply, that at the time when the new trustee was appointed, the defendant was disputing the validity of this settlement. Looking at this correspondence, it is very remarkable that this claim was not brought forward in the lifetime of Anne Perkins Stocker, when she might have been examined as to the facts on which the claim depended. Upon the whole case, much as I disapprove the conduct of this defendant, I cannot go the length of saying that he is bound by this covenant; and I am of opinion, therefore, that this bill ought to have been dismissed, and must now be dismissed, but of course without costs.

Legacy—Alternative Gift to a Legatee or his Executors.

Under a bequest to such of the testator's grandchildren as should be living at the death of a tenant for life, and the executors or administrators of such of them as should be then dead leaving any child or children living at the death of the tenant for life, it was held that the share of a grandchild, who died in the lifetime of the tenant for life leaving a child, belonged to his estate, and was not given either to his executors beneficially, or to his next-of-kin.

Watson Seymour, by his will, dated the 15th of August 1845, directed his executors to purchase such a sum of stock as, together with any sum in the 3l. per cent. reduced bank annuities he might have at the time of his decease, should make up 9,000l. like annuities, and to hold the same upon trust as to 4,000l. stock, part thereof, during the life of his daughter Elizabeth Fowler, to pay the dividends thereof to her for her separate use, and after her decease to pay and divide the said 4,000l. equally between such of his grandchildren (the children of his said daughter) as should be then living, and the executors or administrators of such of them as should be then dead leaving a child or children surviving his said daughter, so that the executors or administrators of any such grandchild who should have so died as aforesaid leaving a child or children surviving his said daughter should take the same share as such grandchild would have taken under the last-mentioned bequest had he or she survived his said daughter; and as to the sum of 4,000l. (other part of the 9,000l. stock), upon trust to pay and apply the dividends thereof for the support, clothing, maintenance and benefit of the testator's son, Watson Seymour, during his life; and after his decease upon trust as to 2,000l., part of the last-mentioned 4,000l., to pay and divide the same between the testator's said daughter and such of his grandchildren as should be living at the death of his said son, and the executors or administrators of such of his said grandchildren as should be then dead leaving any child or children living at the death of his said son, in equal shares, so that such executors or administrators of any such grandchild so dying or leaving a child or children as aforesaid, should take the same share as such grandchild would have taken under the last-mentioned bequest, if he or she had been living at the time of the decease of his said son; and as to 2,000l., residue of the last-mentioned 4,000l., the testator declared trusts similar to those affecting the first-mentioned 4,000l.; and as to 1,000l., residue of the 9,000l., upon trust for his

when that purpose is answered there is no reason for saying that it shall not go back to the old share." He certainly does not advert to the somewhat curious effect it has of drawing it backwards and forwards; it is to go to the same trusts, "or such of them as are subsisting and capable of taking effect." The words, "subsisting and capable of taking effect," would probably remove the absurdity of the case; for if it is written out in full it will then run in this way: "If Mary has no child, then half as Mary shall appoint, and the other half on the same trusts as Ellen's share." Then, when you remember what Ellen's share is, it would be thus: "As to the other half, to Ellen for life, and if she has no child, then as to one moiety as Ellen shall appoint, and as to the other moiety upon the trusts of Mary's share," which are to Mary for life, with remainder to her children, and so on. Those trusts for Mary and her children are no longer capable of taking effect. But Mary's power of appointment still remains, and there still remain the other children and grandchildren of the testator, so that the absurdity is got rid of by the words "or such as are subsisting and capable of taking effect."

It appears to have been thought that when the lady has made an appointment it is done once for all, and though she appoints in words large enough to convey every interest vested or capable of taking effect, there is no trust capable of taking effect. I apprehend when the lady has put her hand to an appointment, her appointees are exactly where the children and grandchildren would have been in the event of no appointment; and the effect of the limitation over would be that the share would have to be continually carried backwards and forwards on each limitation. When you come to the second set of limitations you must leave out the daughter and children, because they would be gone ex hypothesi—they would not be capable of taking; but, then, are not the children and grandchildren and the appointees of each daughter still capable of taking? In this way the share would come backwards and forwards. Although this may seem a whimsical way of limitation, and although it was probably not the way in which the testator contemplated it would go, I think there is apparent an intention to withdraw the moiety in the first instance simply for the purpose of letting in the interest of the others. He introduces a set of words which by this shifting of the limitations seems to me capable of carrying into effect this idea, and I do not see why I am to strike out any portion of the trusts which are capable of taking effect. Even if you take it as a mathematical proposition it will in reality come out that the moiety is given to the appointment of each daughter; and if you take it on the simple practical question, the law would say if the property is given down to a farthing, it is given altogether. Taken either one way or the other, there being no other determination of the case to which I can come, it seems to me that the shares do continue to shift over. It is some satisfaction to find that an eminent conveyancer has thought it right to give a precedent for cross-limitations in this form (2); but I should have thought there would be a more simple way of doing it. I do not remember to have ever met with a will in this form.

Declare that the appointment of Mrs. Atkinson and Mrs. Fenton each effectually disposed of one moiety of the testator's residuary estate.

A testator devised specific shares in an estate to several persons nominatim, to hold the same as tenants in common, and not joint-tenants; and in the event of any of them dying before having heirs of their body, "or" making a particular disposition of his or her property, then his or her share was to go to the survivors:—Held, that the devisees did not take estates tail, but estates in fee; that the gift over could only take effect on the happening of two events; that the

go to the executrix of his sister, to be administered by her as part of her estate; and that, after payment of her debts and legacies, it will belong to her residuary legatee." Then, the only remaining question is, whether under this limitation H. Fowler himself took any interest which would pass to his assignees in bankruptcy, and it was contended that there was no such interest as would pass to them; but I cannot distinguish this case from the case of a gift to a grandchild in either of two events: that is, either his surviving the tenant for life, or dying in her lifetime leaving issue; in which case the estate takes the benefit through the executors and administrators. In Holloway v. Clarkson the bequest was to females, some of whom were married and some single, for their separate use for their respective lives, and after their decease to such persons as they should appoint; and in default of appointment, to their respective executors, administrators and assigns. It is true that in that case the parties took preceding life interests; but in dealing with that point the Vice Chancellor put that circumstance entirely out of the question, and held that each of the legatees was entitled to an immediate transfer of the corpus of her share in the fund. That is exactly what I hold here. I have fortified myself with these authorities; but it seems to me quite clear that this interest belongs to the estate of the bankrupt, and I apprehend it is clearly such an interest as would pass to his assignees, under the 141st section of the Bankruptcy Act. The petitioner, therefore, is entitled to the fund.

M.R. { COLE v. THE WEST LONDON
July 4, 5. { AND CRYSTAL PALACE RAIL-WAY COMPANY.

Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, s. 92.
—Railway Company—Part of a House—Garden.

Three houses were built upon a plot of land, a portion of which was laid out in gardens for each house; a summer-house and other detached out-houses were also built. A railway company, under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act (8 & 9 Vict. c.

18.), required a portion of the gardens for the purpose of their undertaking, but they refused to purchase the whole premises:—Held, upon a bill by the freeholder, that the gardens were part of the houses to which they were attached, and that the company was bound to purchase the two houses and premises from which parts of the gardens were taken, and to make compensation for any injury sustained in respect of the third house.

The bill in this suit was filed, by Thomas Cole, to restrain the defendants from summoning or requiring the Sheriff of Surrey to summon a jury to settle the amount of compensation to be paid by the company for the purchase of a piece of land taken from the plaintiff's garden, or from assessing any damage that might have been sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the execution of the works of the company. It also prayed that they might be restrained from entering upon, or taking or using or continuing in possession of the land and premises, and from taking any further proceedings to acquire the land and premises by compulsory purchase until the defendants should have purchased the whole of the plaintiff's land, houses and premises, and made compensation for all damage sustained in consequence of the entry.

On the 20th of August 1850 the plaintiff was seised in fee of three messuages or dwelling-houses, with the curtilages, buildings, gardens and appurtenances, in the parish of St. Mary, Battersea. These were respectively occupied by the plaintiff T. Cole, the Rev. Monck Mason, and Mary Greenfield, the curtilage, garden and appurtenances attached to each of the houses being less than half an acre.

The company was incorporated by the 16 & 17 Vict. c. clxxx, and the act incorporated in it the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, and the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, and the plan and books of reference shewed that the railway was to pass through the gardens of the three houses.

On the 25th of August 1855 the company served the plaintiff with notice that they required the lands specified in the schedule. The plaintiff required the company to purchase the whole of the three houses and premises, as the damage which they would sustain by portions of the gardens being taken was irreparable; this led to correspondence.

On the 27th of October 1856 the company sent a bond to the plaintiff under thier common seal, with two sureties, which, after reciting that the company desired to enter upon the pieces of land immediately, and that the value had been fixed by Daniel Norton at 900*l.*, and that such amount had been paid into the bank, it was conditioned to be void if the company paid or deposited in the Bank of England for the benefit of the parties interested in the land, such purchase-money or compensation with interest as therein mentioned.

On the 13th of February 1857 the company took possession of a piece of each of the gardens belonging to the houses occupied by Thomas Cole the plaintiff, and by the Rev. M. Mason. It was also alleged that Mrs. Greenfield's premises had been damaged, and that the plaintiff had been forced to reduce her rent.

The plaintiff afterwards caused the three houses to be surveyed by three surveyors, and they were of opinion that the company ought to take the whole of the property, unless the company were prepared to pay liberally for the damage done, and they valued the property at 3,390*l.*, exclusive of the fixtures, which were to be taken at a valuation.

The company refused to purchase the entire property. The plaintiff then filed this bill, alleging that the defendants ought to be held to have come under a liability to purchase the three houses, with the curtilages, gardens and appurtenances, and to pay 3,390*l.*, or such price as the Court might consider proper.

Mr. Selwyn and Mr. W. Morris, for the plaintiff.—A mere payment for land without compensation to a householder for injury present and future, is not a sufficient consideration for a compulsory purchase.

Barker v. the North Staffordshire Railway Company, 2 De Gex & Sm. 55.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. L. Webb, for the railway company.—The full value of the land has been ascertained with reference to its locality; it was wholly distinct from the houses, and ought not to be considered, as to any part of them, within the meaning of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The plaintiff can scarcely expect the company to take Mrs. Greenfield's house and premises: it is a mere question of damage to that house, and he will be entitled either here or at common law to have the amount assessed. The company, however, does not take any portion of that house: they go from the extreme west corner in a line parallel with the railway, cutting through the premises called Belmont Lodge, the house of Mr. Cole, and through the premises occupied by Mr. Mason. As respects Belmont Lodge I entertain no doubt: the railway cuts off not only a yard at the end, but it cuts off the last house—it cuts off the summer-house and a considerable portion of the garden, several feet. The taking these buildings must seriously prejudice the habitation of the place. In Lord Grosvenor v. the Hampstead Junction Railway Company, it has been determined that when the company required the garden, or a part of the garden, they must, under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, section 92, be considered as taking what in a conveyance would be termed a part of the house. Under the word "house" they are liable to take the whole, and the meaning of the word "house" in the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, section 92, is so much as would be included in the word "house" in an ordinary legal instrument; that is to say, supposing Mr. Cole had conveyed a house called Belmont Lodge to A. B. in

The testator died in September 1856. He had not at the date of his will, or at any time afterwards, a niece of the name of Elizabeth Stringer; but Elizabeth Stringer, a niece of the testator, had died, in February 1848, previously to the date of his will, leaving a granddaughter, named Elizabeth Jane Stringer, who was the only relation of the testator of the name of Stringer, or of the name of Elizabeth, living at the date of his will and of his death. She was about five years old at the date of the testator's will.

Evidence was gone into by the next-of-kin to shew that a will, made by the testator in May 1847, contained bequests "to his niece Elizabeth Stringer," who was then living, in the same words as those used in his second will; and that in 1850 he made a codicil to his will, which did not affect those bequests; that in January 1852 the testator instructed his solicitor to prepare a codicil for the purpose of making some alterations in his will; that the solicitor advised the testator not to make a second codicil, but to make such alterations in the will of May 1847 as might be desired; that the solicitor accordingly made such alterations in the will of May 1847, and that the will of the 13th of January 1852 was accordingly executed by the testator; that the solicitor was not aware that Elizabeth Stringer, the testator's niece, was dead at that time, and that the attention of the testator was not drawn to that fact. There was evidence, on the part of the plaintiff, shewing that the testator knew that Elizabeth Stringer was dead, he having been present at her funeral.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Lindley, for the plaintiff.—The will was evidence that the testator did not contemplate intestacy. If there was ambiguity, evidence was admissible to shew the intention of the testator, but the Court would never admit evidence to expunge a bequest: it would be a most dangerous innovation—

Mr. Selwyn and Mr. Dean, for the defendants.—Evidence is always admissible to shew a mistake in the will: the gifts had been inadvertently allowed to remain in the will. It was most improbable that the testator would leave a legacy of 20*l.* for mourning to a child of five years old.—

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. — The plaintiff is entitled to this bequest. The rule as to the reception of parol evidence to explain a will is perfectly clear. In every case of ambiguity, whether latent or patent, parol evidence is admissible to shew the state of the testator's family or property; but the cases in which parol evidence is admissible to shew the person intended to be designated by the testator are those cases of latent ambiguity mentioned by Sir J. Wigram, where there are two or more persons, who answer other descriptions in the will, each of whom, standing alone, would be entitled to take. If there had been another Elizabeth Stringer living at the date of the will parol evidence would have been admissible to ascertain who the person was the testator intended to designate. But in this case the Court is asked to admit parol evidence, not for the purpose of explaining the meaning of the testator, but for the purpose of shewing that he had no meaning at all; in fact, for the purpose of expunging the words from the will altogether. To admit evidence for such a purpose would be to create the greatest alarm in the minds of testators, and to introduce the greatest uncertainty in the construction of wills. All that the Court has to do is to see if the words of the will are sufficiently clear to point to a particular person. If the evidence had gone to shew that the testator had never heard of any Elizabeth Stringer, that there was no such person related to him, and that the person who claimed was a mere stranger, the case would be different. There was a person named Elizabeth related to the testator by blood, who may be described as the great-great-niece of the testator, or the niece twice removed; but in ordinary language she might be described as the niece of the

A number of partners trading as a company, on the terms that their shares shall pass by delivery, does not necessarily shew that they are assuming to exercise the powers of a corporation, or render the company illegal.

If a company not otherwise illegal was rendered so by the 4th section of the statute 19 & 20 Vict. c. 47, the acts done and debts incurred by it in the interval of time between the passing of that act and the passing of the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 14. (repealing the 4th section of the former act) are valid and binding on the company, and are not the mere acts and debts of individual shareholders.

These were two appeals from orders (dated the 18th of April and the 4th and 7th of May last) of the Master of the Rolls, refusing to disturb a decision of his chief clerk, by which he had placed the names of Messrs. Grisewood and Smith, of the Stock Exchange, and of Messrs. B. & D. de Pass, merchants of London, on the list of contributories of the Mexican and South American Company. As the circumstances of the projection and constitution of the company, and of its mode of proceeding are common to both cases, a narrative is sufficient before proceeding to the particulars of each. The Mexican and South American Company was projected in the year 1835 by Messrs. Poules, Ewbank & Schneider, its objects being to promote mining and similar operations in America, by making advances to miners and supplying them with stores in anticipation of the produce of their mines, and to receive in payment gold and silver ore at fixed rates; and also to form a general mercantile establishment for dealing in bullion, metals and stores; the capital to consist of 10,000 shares of 10*l.* each. The projectors constituted themselves a board of management, adding subsequently to their number a Mr. H. Ranking, and opened an office in London, and at once entered upon preliminary operations. No deed of settlement was drawn up, but scrip certificates were issued, upon the back of which was printed the prospectus which had been originally circulated, which, after setting forth the objects of the company, was in the following words:—"For the foregoing purposes it is proposed to raise a capital of 100,000*l.* in 10,000 shares of 10*l.* each; of this sum 5*l.* per share is to be paid at the following periods, namely, 1*l.* per share on subscribing; 1*l.* ditto on the 1st of September 1835; 1*l.* ditto on the 1st of December 1835; 1*l.* ditto on the 1st of February 1836, and 1*l.* ditto on the 1st of April 1836. The remainder of the capital to be called for when required by the directors, in sums not exceeding 1*l.* per share at each call, and at an interval of not less than two months between each call; thirty days' notice of each call to be given in the London Gazette and three daily morning and evening papers. If any call be not paid within thirteen days of the same becoming due, the directors shall, at the first convenient opportunity, sell the shares so in default, and hold the proceeds thereof, after deducting the amount of the call and interest thereon at 5*l.* per cent. per annum, at the disposal of the proprietors thereof. As the principle on which the company is formed is that of putting its capital speedily into active operation, and as one engagement has already been made for this purpose, it is proposed that the dividend at the rate of 6*l.* per cent. per annum on the subscribed capital shall be at once fixed, and that the directors shall make such additions from time to time thereto in the shape of bonus as the state of the company may authorize, the first dividend to be paid on the 1st of January 1837. In the event of the operations of the company admitting of the advantageous employment of a larger amount of capital, the directors shall have the power to create 10,000 additional shares of 10*l.* each, the same to be issued preferably to the holders of the existing shares; and in the event of its appearing expedient still further to increase the capital, a further creation of shares may take place, with the consent of the majority of the shareholders at a general meeting to be called for that purpose, the same being in all cases to be issued preferably to the holders of existing shares. The affairs of the company to be managed by the board of directors; the directors remain in office until the second Wednesday in May 1840, when, and at the same period annually, one director shall go out of office. Vacancies in the direction previously to the second Wednesday in May 1840 shall be filled up by the directors; after that period they shall be filled up by the proprietors at the general annual meeting, or at a general meeting to be called specially for that purpose. A director retiring to be immediately re-eligible. The auditors shall be elected annually at the general meeting of the proprietors. Fifty shares shall be the qualification of a director, and forty shares the qualification of an auditor. A general meeting of the proprietors shall be held on the second Wednesday in May in each year, when the state of the company's affairs will be laid before them. Certificates will be issued for the shares; a proprietor of twenty-five shares to have one vote, &c. &c. It is proposed that on the payments of each dividend a sum equal to 10*l.* per cent. of the amount thereof shall be appropriated to form a reserve fund, and that if at any time the shares of the company should be below par, the directors shall have authority, if they shall see fit, to apply the amount of the reserve fund to the purchase of such shares for the account of the company, such shares, if afterwards disposed of, to be sold by public tender for the account of the company."

The certificates of shares, signed by three of the directors, so issued were in this form:—"The holder of this certificate, having paid 5*l.* to the directors of the Mexican and South American Company, will be entitled to five shares on his making the following payments," &c., and coupons for dividends were attached to each certificate. The scrip passed by delivery without any transfer, and the holder was treated as the owner. No registration of the company was ever effected under any of the Joint-Stock Companies Acts, nor was any deed of settlement ever executed or prepared—the prospectus being the only document of the rules and constitution of the company. The company commenced business, proceeded to make advances, and to work silver and quicksilver mines on their own account. Under their powers in the prospectus the directors increased the capital of the company by the issue of scrip certificates for 10,000 additional shares of

10*l.* each. In the year 1848 the directors undertook operations in Chili, and engaged a manager and superintendent, and established works for the smelting of copper ore in that country. In 1852 the directors called in the scrip certificates which had been issued, and issued others in the following form:—"The holder of this certificate is entitled to five shares of 10*l.* each in the Mexican and South American Company, on which 9*l.* per share has been paid." On the 12th of February 1855 the directors called a special general meeting of the scripholders at the London Tavern, when a resolution was passed, authorizing the directors to create 10,000 additional shares of 10*l.* each, on such terms as they might think expedient, which were to stand in all respects upon the same footing as the other existing shares, and to participate in dividends from the date of their issue; but they were not to be issued at a less price than 6*l.* 10*s.* per share. In accordance with this resolution scrip certificates for 10,000 additional shares were issued. In the mean time the company was regularly paying dividends, and between the years 1852 and 1855 paid, as was alleged, 60,150*l.*, the whole of which came out of the capital, the company never having made any profits applicable to that purpose. The last dividend paid was at the end of the year 1855, and was at the rate of 7*s.* 6*d.* per share for the previous half-year. On the 28th of March 1857 an extraordinary meeting of the company was held, at which the chairman informed the proprietors that serious errors, amounting in the whole to 13,000*l.* or 14,000*l.*, had been discovered, and that a large portion of the capital was lost, and this was attributed partly to interruption of the mining proceedings in Mexico, in consequence of the invasion of that country by the United States, and partly to the fraudulent conduct of the manager of the company's affairs in Chili; the questions were then discussed, and the meeting separated, after unanimously passing a resolution expressing its confidence in the board of directors, and their management of its business. In this year the usual annual meeting in May was not held, nor was any dividend declared, but on the 6th of November 1857 another extraordinary meeting was held, at which it was

A petition for that purpose was accordingly presented, and on the 24th of November 1857 an order for winding up the company was made by the Master of the Rolls; and on the 27th of April 1859 his Honour ordered a call to be made for the payment of debts at the rate of 9l. per share.

Mr. Selwyn, Mr. Waley and Mr. Horace Lloyd, for the appellants, argued that their shares were bought in open market, in the usual course of their business, as share-brokers, on the Stock Exchange, at an average rate of 7½d. per share, and at a time when the affairs of the company were about to be wound up. As to 300 of the shares, the transaction was completed before the date of the winding-up order, the 24th of November 1857, though, as to the remaining 105, a like agreement had been made before that date, yet the scrip certificates were not delivered until afterwards. It was admitted that the certificates of the whole 405 shares did ultimately come into the hands of the appellants; but at the same time it was to be remarked that they never signed any contract, nor executed any deed, nor attended any meeting of the shareholders, paid no call, received no dividend, nor did any other act which could constitute them partners in the concern. All the liabilities which existed, it was admitted by the directors, had been contracted at a date long anterior to the earliest purchase of shares by the appellants; and they, therefore, were not liable as contributors, and claimed to be exempt. If this reason was not deemed sufficient, then it was contended, on the appellants' behalf, that the company was all along altogether illegal, because the directors had committed frauds in making out false accounts in order to deceive the shareholders, and in paying dividends out of capital; and because the debts and liabilities now charged against the company and demanded from the shareholders, were, in point of fact,

DE PASS'S CASE.

June 8.—The particulars of this case are as follows: for eighteen months before the month of November 1857 Messrs. B. & D. de Pass were the legal owners of 250 shares in the company, and had paid calls; one of them had been an auditor of the company; but between the 1st and 9th of that month Mr. B. de Pass disposed of the whole 250 shares by selling them to one of his clerks, a Mr. Spencer, for 20s. He swore that he did so with the intention of benefiting the purchaser, and that he believed some benefit might accrue from the purchase. As the shares passed by mere delivery, there was no agreement, written or otherwise; but the transaction, as deposed to by Mr. B. de Pass himself, was of this nature: he said that at the time mentioned he went to his counting-house one morning, where he found Mr. Spencer; that he then told him of his intention to let him have the shares, and at once handed them over to him, saying at the same time, "I transfer these shares to you for 1*l.*, and any benefit that may arise from them you are welcome to"; that upon this Mr. Spencer accepted the shares, and paid him a sovereign out of his own pocket at the same time. That no agreement for indemnity from the Messrs. de Pass to Mr. Spencer was then or ever entered into, nor was there any reservation or declaration of trust in favour of the appellants, or any understanding that the shares should be considered to belong, or should be re-assigned, to them in any event. In cross-examination Mr. de Pass said that he could not state accurately the amount of salary earned by Mr. Spencer; he believed it to be about 100*l.* a year, but he stated that in addition to this he received gratuities and derived other emoluments. Mr. Spencer had been six years in his employment. Mr. Spencer was also examined as a witness, and deposed that he was never a shareholder, and had never subscribed for shares, but that he had held 250 shares bought on the 8th of November 1857 of Mr. B. de Pass. That that gentleman had never used any recommendation or even persuasion to induce him to take the shares, but had merely put them in his hands, and said, "Here are 250 shares; they may turn out beneficial to you; I hope they may. You shall have them for a sovereign." The witness replied, "Thank you," and took the shares, at the same time paying the purchase-money for them out of his own pocket. Nothing more passed between them. He sold the shares soon afterwards; within a month after; he thought in three weeks. He sold them to a Mr. Joseph, who was a traveller for the Messrs. de Pass. It appeared that the secretary of the company, after this transaction, on several occasions sent to the Messrs. de Pass notices and circulars, and they were duly received by them; but they admitted that they neither handed them over to Spencer, nor themselves replied to them, but destroyed them. There was no proof nor allegation that Spencer is now or ever was insolvent. The Master of the Rolls was of opinion that the sale, occurring at the time and under the circumstances mentioned, was not bonâ fide.

Mr. Hobhouse, who, with Mr. Selwyn, appeared for the appellants, contended that all the legal requirements of a transfer had been observed, and no fraud had been alleged. The appeal of Messrs. de Pass should be allowed. The cases referred to were—

Mr. Roundell Palmer and Mr. Roxburgh, for the official manager, insisted that the Master of the Rolls had come to a correct conclusion in holding that the transaction between Mr. Benjamin de Pass and Mr. Spencer, a clerk of the firm, was not a bonâ fide dealing. It was one resorted to for the purpose of evading liability, it being well known that the concern was in a ruinously bad condition. It was a plain and bare-faced attempt on the part of wealthy merchants to avoid the consequences of holding shares, by pretending to pass them for such an insignificant sum as 1*l.* to a dependent of their own. July 15. — LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—The first of these cases, that of Messrs. Grisewood and Smith, is an appeal from an order of the Master of the Rolls, dated the 7th of May last, by which the appellants have been placed or retained on the list of contributories of the company as the holders of 405 shares; and it is asked by the notice of motion on this appeal, not only that the order of the 7th of May last may be discharged, and the names of the appellants removed from the list of contributories, but also that, if necessary, the order for winding up the company, dated the 24th of November 1857, and an order for a call of 9*l.* per share, dated the 27th of April 1859, may likewise be discharged. The other case, that of Messrs. de Pass, is also an appeal from orders of the Master of the Rolls, dated the 18th of April and 4th of May last, by which those appellants were placed or retained on the list of contributories as the holders of 250 shares in the company. This company was formed in the month of April 1835. It was formed, in the first instance, with the view of making advances of money to the owners of mines in Mexico, and receiving the produce of the mines at fixed rates, yielding a good return for the advances, but it was further extended to mining operations. Upon the foundation of the company, certificates were issued to the subscribers, purporting that the holders of certificates having made a certain specified payment to the directors, were entitled to a specified number of shares in the company, subject to certain further payments mentioned in the prospectus, a copy of which was printed at the foot of the certificates. This prospectus was the only instrument defining the constitution of the company; for there appears to have been no deed of settlement of the company. It is not, in the view which I have taken of these cases, necessary to state the terms of the prospectus. It is sufficient to say it provided for raising a considerable capital, to be divided into a great number of shares; that it placed the company entire under the management of directors; that it contained provisions for the issue of further shares, but that it contained no provisions as to the transfer of shares. The shares were, therefore, as they appeared by the certificates, to be transferable by delivery. At different times after the foundation of the company, further shares were issued, under the powers given by the prospectus, and certificates were issued for these shares, varying somewhat in form from the first certificates, but still purporting that the holders were entitled to the shares. Messrs. Grisewood and Smith, the appellants in the first case, are share-dealers, and the course of their business, as I collect from the evidence, is to duty of the defendant—to have apprised the solicitor of the fact; and that if, on the one hand, there was false representation on the part of the defendant, there was, on the other hand, suppression on the part of Anne Perkins Stocker. It was much insisted upon, on the part of the plaintiffs, that there had been adoption and confirmation by the defendant; but this is wholly denied by the answer, and I can find no evidence of it beyond the fact that the defendant took possession of the business and stock-in-trade, and has continued in possession of it. This was, however, property to which the defendant became entitled jure mariti, and not by virtue of the settlement; and even if he can be considered to have purchased it by means of the settlement, it was not until March 1857 that there was any trustee of the settlement to whom he could notify his dissent; and it is clear, from the correspondence referred to in the affidavit in reply, that at the time when the new trustee was appointed, the defendant was disputing the validity of this settlement. Looking at this correspondence, it is very remarkable that this claim was not brought forward in the lifetime of Anne Perkins Stocker, when she might have been examined as to the facts on which the claim depended. Upon the whole case, much as I disapprove the conduct of this defendant, I cannot go the length of saying that he is bound by this covenant; and I am of opinion, therefore, that this bill ought to have been dismissed, and must now be dismissed, but of course without costs.

the prospectus defining the constitution of the company, everything is left to the management of individual directors, and all the proceedings of the company appear to have been carried on by the directors in their individual character. I think, therefore, that neither the case of illegality nor the case of fraud can be maintained. What fell from the Court of Common Pleas, in the case of Harrison v. Heathorn, seems to me to have an important bearing on this question of illegality, although the case itself may well be distinguished from the present. Another point was raised on the part of these appellants, with reference to the order for the call. It was said that, by the 4th section of the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 47, the trading of the company was illegal from the 3rd of November 1856 to the 14th of July 1857, when the section referred to was repealed by the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 14. s. 3; and that the debts contracted during this period were not debts of the company, but debts of the individuals who were at the time the shareholders in the company. I think that this point is also untenable; for, I apprehend that where an act of parliament, or part of an act of parliament, is repealed, it must, as laid down by Lord Tenterden, in Suttees v. Ellison (2), be considered as if it had never existed, except as to transactions which are passed and closed, and it cannot be said that the transactions in this case were passed and closed whilst the debts remained unpaid. I am of opinion, therefore, that the appeal of Messrs. Grisewood and Smith wholly fails, and that their motion must be refused, and with costs.

Then, as to the case of Messrs. de Pass, they are put upon the list for 250 shares which were formerly held by them, and for which they had paid 1,750*l*. Their case is, that, on the 8th of November 1857, sixteen days before the date of the winding-up order, they delivered over these shares to Mr. Spencer, one of their clerks, in consideration of the sum of 1*l*. paid by him to them. It sufficiently appears, I think, from the evidence, that at this time they were aware, or at all events had good reason to suspect, that the company was in difficulties. It was, indeed, admitted in the reply that their object was to get rid of their liability; and it was insisted that they were entitled to do so. I agree that they were, for I cannot see what equity there would be on the part of the other shareholders to insist upon their retaining the shares. The question, therefore, as to these appellants, seems to me to be, whether they did or did not, on the 8th of November 1857, bond fide part with these shares out and out. I had much doubt on this point when the case was argued, more especially from the fact, that even at a later date the shares appear to have been sold in the market at a price that would have yielded more than was paid for them to the appellants by their clerk; but I have since read and considered the evidence more carefully, and I am satisfied that we can come to no other conclusion upon it than that these shares were, on the 8th of November 1857, absolutely and bond fide parted with by the appellants out and out, without any trust for their benefit, or any reservation whatever; and I am of opinion, therefore, that this order must be discharged, and the names of these gentlemen removed from the list. I think, however, that the transaction was one requiring the most searching investigation, and that there should be no costs to the appellants of any part of the proceedings.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—I am also of opinion that the appeal of Messrs. Grisewood and Smith fails, and that the appeal of Messrs. de Pass does not. I agree also as to costs.

On the application of their respective counsel the costs of the official manager and of the creditors' representative were ordered to be paid out of the estate; and in the first case the appellants were directed to pay only one set of costs.

July 27.—All proceedings to enforce the call in the first case were ordered to be stayed pending an appeal to the House of Lords, Messrs. Grisewood and Smith undertaking to pay the amount of the call into court, or to give satisfactory security for the same.

HALE v. THE METRO-POLITAN SALOON OM-NIBUS COMPANY.

Fraudulent Sale of Goods—Expectant Execution.

A tradesman expecting the execution of a writ of fieri facias issued by the Court of Chancery for payment of costs in a suit, effected a sale of the whole of his furniture and stock-in-trade. The only document passing upon the occasion was a receipt for the money paid upon the purchase. A few days after the purchaser had taken possession the writ was issued, and the sheriff subsequently filed a bill of interpleader, upon which the question arose whether the sale was fraudulent and void:—Held, that it was not a ground for vitiating a sale, that it was made with a view to defeat an expectant execution; that under the particular circumstances of this case, there was no ground for saying that the purchase was not bona fide, and consequently the sale could not be set aside; but, there being facts of a highly suspicious character attending the transfer of the property, the purchaser was ordered to pay his own costs.

Held, also, that the receipt given for the goods did not amount to a "bill of sale" under the provisions of the statute 17 & 18 Vict. c. 36, and therefore that it did not require registration.

This was an interpleader suit, filed by the sheriff under the following circumstances:—The bill stated, that on the 21st of July last an injunction was moved for in this court by Thomas Hawkins, a tradesman carrying on business as a brush and toy dealer, in the Inverness Road, Bayswater, to restrain the directors of the Saloon Omnibus Company from issuing certain debentures, on the ground that such issue was contrary to the provisions of the Joint-Stock Companies' Acts. The injunction was refused, with costs. The costs, having been taxed, were found to amount to about 100*l.*, and this amount not having been paid, a fiери facias was issued under the process of the Court of Chancery.

Previously to the writ being served, Hawkins spoke to his landlord, Mr. Marks, with reference to disposing of his furniture and stock-in-trade, and on the 12th of November 1858 Hawkins was introduced by Mr. Marks to Mr. Sayer, a pawnbroker living in a distant part of town, as a person likely to purchase Hawkins's goods. In pursuance of what took place at this interview, Sayer went to Hawkins's house to view the goods, and subsequently obtained a valuation from Mr. Robins, the auctioneer, who valued them at 508*l.*, but stated, that if sold by auction, about one-third ought to be struck off, and that 300*l.* would then be about the actual value of the property. Mr. Sayer thereupon offered to purchase the furniture and stock-in-trade for the sum of 300*l.*, which proposal was at once accepted by Hawkins. The sale was completed on the 17th of November, when Sayer paid Hawkins the money agreed upon, and took a receipt from him. He also obtained a lease of the house from Mr. Marks, the landlord. It appeared that Sayer, before he entered into the above purchase, consulted with Mr. Pocock, the secretary to the "London Merchants Trading Protection Society," as to the respectability of Hawkins, and found that there was nothing known by the society against his character. It further appeared, that Sayer intended to carry on the business in which Hawkins was engaged, on his own account, and with that view he was desirous of retaining the services of Mrs. Hawkins and of Louisa Compton, a niece of Hawkins, who had been his assistant in the shop. This he was advised by Mr. Pocock not to do; but, eventually, he did engage the niece, Louisa Compton, at an annual salary.

On the 18th of November, the day after the purchase-money was paid, Sayer took possession of the house, but permitted Hawkins and his wife to sleep there for three nights. Sayer also painted out the name of Hawkins, but did not put up his own name previously to the 23rd of November, on which day the writ of fiери facias was executed, and the sheriff took possession.

Upon an application afterwards made in his Honour's chambers, it was arranged that Sayer should give his bond for 400*l.* by way of indemnity to the sheriff, and the sheriff relinquished possession of the premises, which had been occupied ever since by Sayer.

This bill of interpleader was then filed by the sheriff, and the cause now came on to be heard, the question being whether the sale of the goods by Hawkins was fraudulent and void under the statute of Elizabeth, as against the company and directors, it having been made under suspicious circumstances, with a view to defraud the execution creditors, and without an adequate consideration.

The evidence before the Court was taken vidé voce, but Hawkins, the principal party concerned in the transactions, was not called as a witness by either side.

Mr. Glasse and Mr. Robinson, on behalf of Mr. Sayer, contended that there was nothing improper or suspicious in his dealing in respect of the purchase of this property. He was applied to by Marks, with whom he was well acquainted, and he made such inquiries as he thought desirable from the secretary to the "Trade Protection Society," as to the respectability of Hawkins. It was not his business to inquire whether there was an expectant execution upon the goods, nor was it necessary for him to ascertain the reason why Hawkins was desirous of selling with so much haste. The amount paid was what an auctioneer of acknowledged skill had estimated as the value of the property, and the money was actually paid and a receipt taken. There was no necessity for any further document to prove the completion of the contract, and thereupon Sayer took possession of the house. The fact of his allowing Mr. and Mrs. Hawkins the convenience of remaining two or three nights in the house was the most natural thing, and it was also natural that he should wish to retain the services of the shopwoman, in order to carry on the business with profit to himself. Even if Sayer had known that there was an execution expected, that would not have invalidated the transaction, according to the decision in Wood v. Dixie (1), but he knew nothing of it, and the purchase was altogether bond fide on his part.

Mr. Roxburgh and Mr. Hastings appeared for the company, and Mr. W. D. Lewis and Mr. Eddis for the directors, and submitted that the circumstances under which this sale was effected were in the highest degree suspicious. Mr. Sayer ought to have known, that from the suddenness with which the contract was to be completed there must have been some special liability existing on the part of Hawkins, and he might have discovered the impending execution. The sale was merely a colourable transfer of the property to defraud the creditors. There was no actual transfer of possession. Hawkins and his family were allowed to remain on the premises, and the niece was engaged as shopwoman. Sayer did not even put up his own name over the door, though he took the precaution, for the sake of appearances, to paint out the name of Hawkins. The receipt for the money was, in fact, a bill of sale in its operation, and as such it ought to have been registered under the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 36. The Court would, therefore, see that the whole transaction was collusive, and ought not to be supported against the execution creditors.

KINDERSLEY, V.C. — This dispute is between Sayer on the one side and the Saloon Omnibus Company and their directors on the other. The defendants are execution creditors against the goods of Hawkins in respect of the costs which he was ordered to pay upon the proceedings in this court. It appears that at this time he was also indebted to his landlord in the sum of 60*l.* for rent. On the 23rd of November the writ of execution, issued under the process of the Court of Chancery, was executed by the sheriff. The question is, whether at the time of the execution the goods really belonged to Hawkins or not. If they were Hawkins's, the execution was regular, and the creditors must have judgment; if Hawkins had made a bond fide sale previously to Sayer, they were the goods of Sayer. Was the sale, therefore, valid, or void at common law under the statute of Elizabeth, the company

taking upon themselves the onus of proving that it was fraudulent? At the present day, whatever fluctuations of opinion there may have been in the courts of this country as to the construction of that statute, it is not a ground for vitiating a sale that it was made with a view to defeat an intended execution on the goods of the vendor, the subject of the sale, supposing it was in all other respects bond fide. The case of Wood v. Dizie has settled that at law in the most solemn manner, on a motion for a new trial. With respect to the question whether the sale was bond fide, it was at one time attempted to lay down rules that particular things were indelible badges of fraud; but, in truth, every case must stand upon its own footing; and the Court or the jury must consider whether, having regard to all the circumstances, the transaction was a fair one, and intended to pass the property for a good and valuable consideration. The result of the evidence appears to me to be this:—Up to the 12th of November Hawkins was a stranger to Sayer, who was an intimate friend of Marks, Hawkins's landlord. Hawkins then spoke to Marks with reference to getting rid of his stock and furniture, and Marks introduced him to Sayer. The negotiation ended in Sayer purchasing Hawkins's stock and furniture, with the interest in the business, for 300*l*. On the 13th of November, before coming to any agreement with Hawkins, Sayer consulted Mr. Pocock, the secretary to a Trade Protection Society, as to his intended purchase, and was cautioned against employing Hawkins's wife and niece in carrying on the business. Now, this application is made the ground of an argument that Sayer knew he was trading on dangerous ground; but I think if Sayer was intending a fraud, he would not have made these inquiries, nor would he have employed Hawkins's niece after the caution given him by Pocock. It was on the 16th of November that Sayer went to look at the property, and, not liking to trust to his own judgment, he asked Mr. Robins, the auctioneer, to look over the goods. Mr. Robins valued the stock and furniture at 508*l*., but he stated that, if sold by auction, one-third ought to be struck off; and that, under all the circumstances, Sayer ought not to give more than 300*l*.

The result was, that Hawkins agreed to take 300*l*., and the contract was entered into, and at the same time the house was let to Sayer by Marks, the landlord. When the money was paid by Sayer, it appears that no document passed beyond the receipt for the purchase-money. Now, on that receipt two arguments are founded. First, it is said that the receipt, on the face of it, shews that it was a sale of everything on the premises, including wearing apparel; but I cannot view it in that light, and no one had the slightest notion of such an intention. When the receipt speaks of goods, it only meant household furniture and stock-in-trade, together with goods ejusdem generis. Secondly, it is said that the receipt is, in fact, a bill of sale under the act 17 & 18 Vict. c. 36; but upon referring to the 7th section it does not appear to come within the description of any of the things there enumerated. It is neither a "bill of sale, assignment, transfer, declaration of trust without transfer, or other assurance of personal chattels, power of attorney, authority or licence to take possession of personal chattels as security for a debt," but it is simply a receipt for purchase-money, which does not require registration as a bill of sale. It appears that there was no proper taking of possession until the 18th of November, when Miss Compton was engaged, and that was a manifestation that Hawkins was not in possession. It was natural that Sayer should desire to engage a person who was accustomed to the business, and he probably would have engaged the wife had he not received a caution. The fact of not immediately painting up his own name was accounted for satisfactorily by the fact of the sheriff's officer taking possession, and by the few days which previously elapsed, Sunday being one. So far from this being a badge of fraud, it was quite the contrary; for if fraud had been intended the name would have been immediately painted up. The whole transaction, however, was one of the greatest possible suspicion, which has not been entirely removed; one circumstance, in particular, brings its weight of suspicion, namely, the absence of Hawkins as a witness. A number of persons have been called to testify to the transactions in question; but he was a party to them all.

KINDERLEY, V.C. } LAWRENCE G. CAMPBELL.
March 7. } BELL.

Attorney and Solicitor—Privileged Communications—Scotch Solicitor in England.

The rule as to privileged communications between an English solicitor and his client, applies equally to a Scotch solicitor resident in England, not being admitted in England, and his client in Scotland.

the other hand, it was competent to execution creditors to have called him, at the principal obligation to do so lay upon Sayer, although it does not lie in the mouth of the other side to contend that the omission was a proof of fraud. Suspicion, though a good ground for the most minute and searching investigation, is no ground for decision; and that principle applies to this case. Hawkins, if called, could have confirmed the statements of the other witnesses, and removed the suspicion naturally attaching to a transaction, whereby all his stock-in-trade, furniture and lease were transferred at one sweep, without valuation or inventory as between him and Sayer, and without any assignment or question asked. Sayer, a pawnbroker in Brydges Street, Covent Garden, became suddenly, for the first time, a dealer in toys, at Inverness Road, Bayswater, no bill of sale being given, which was certainly suspicious; there was sufficient delivery, but that all this was begun and ended between the 12th and 17th of November, resulting in an actual sale and transfer. No doubt, the execution creditors had just grounds of suspicion, and were misled to expect success by the view that an intention to vitiate the execution was sufficient to defeat the sale. In my opinion, the result of the evidence is, that the sale was bona fide for a sufficient consideration; and there is no ground for imputing fraud, or that Sayer knew anything about Hawkins why he wanted to sell, and Hawkins had told him that it was to defeat an execution, that would have been no ground for impeaching the transaction. With regard to the costs, this is a matter of considerable difficulty; the sheriff, as the stakeholder, must have his costs of money is allowed to deduct his costs first; but here there is no money in court, and therefore the failing parties, must pay what the sheriff (had there been a fund) would have deducted. With regard to Sayer's costs, it is from the beginning a case of grave suspicion, which Hawkins's absence does not tend to remove.

This suit was instituted to enforce payment of the sum of 1731., alleged to have been remitted by the defendant Campbell to the defendants Messrs. Robertson & Simpson, who were practising in London as Scotch solicitors and law agents, in trust for the plaintiff. The defendants Messrs. Robertson & Simpson admitted that they had received from Mr. Campbell a sum of 3000l., which would, under certain circumstances not fulfilled, have been applicable to the payment of the plaintiff's demand, but they denied that they held the money, or any part of it, in trust for the plaintiff. The plaintiff alleged that certain letters and documents in the defendants' possession which had passed between Mr. Campbell and Messrs. Robertson & Simpson, would make out a trust for the plaintiff, and that he was entitled to the production of such documents. The defendants filed an affidavit, with a schedule, containing the alleged documents, but objected to produce them, on the ground of their being privileged communications. The plaintiff obtained the usual order for the production of all documents, and the case now comes on upon adjournment from chambers. The defendants Messrs. Robertson & Simpson stated in their affidavit as follows:—"We have been duly admitted solicitors before the Courts of law in Scotland, and we have been and now are resident and practising in London as Scotch solicitors and law agents, and in our capacity as such were professionally employed by Thomas Rankin, of Edinburgh, the solicitor for the defendant R. D. Campbell, in the actions in the plaintiff's bill mentioned, and we acted in such professional capacity and not as ordinary agents and trustees for the defendant R. D. Campbell, and said bill untruly alleged, and the documents set forth in the second part of the said schedule to the said affidavit consist of letters written to and received by us from the defendant R. D. Campbell and of copies of letters written by us to the defendant R. D. Campbell; and the said letters are communications which passed between us and the defendant R. D. Campbell, in the course and for the purpose of the said employment, and are of a professional and confidential nature, and we object to produce the same or make any further discovery thereof, inasmuch as the said letters and copies of letters were written and received by us confidentially in our professional capacity as aforesaid."

Mr. Anderson and Mr. Rogers, for the plaintiff, contended that the rule respecting privileged documents did not apply to any but English solicitors. Messrs. Robertson & Simpson were solicitors in Scotland only, and here they were mere agents acting for the other defendant. Moreover, as these documents contained the res gestæ of the litigation, they would not, in Scotland, be privileged. The documents did not contain strictly legal matters such as would pass between a solicitor and his client, but they were such as might have been communicated to any ordinary agent.

Mr. Glasse and Mr. G. W. Collins, for Messrs. Robertson & Simpson, submitted that as these gentlemen were Scotch solicitors, practising in London, their status must be fully recognized by the Courts of this country. The documents in question were such as this Court always considered as privileged, and according to the affidavit of the defendants they were communicated in the ordinary professional capacity, and therefore they ought to be protected from inspection. If the Court should hold otherwise, the business of Scotch solicitors, acting as legal and parliamentary agents in London, would be put an end to.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—Had I entertained any doubt on this question, I should not have decided it adversely in the absence of Mr. Campbell; but being of opinion that the privilege ought to prevail, I shall not put the parties to that expense. The statement in the answer and affidavit is distinct; and if these gentlemen had been English solicitors, these documents would have been protected without question, and their statement must be taken to be true, unless on the face of the affidavit or answer it should appear to be otherwise. The case is new in specie, but the authorities have established such a principle as requires the Court to act upon it in the present instance. The general principle is this: the exigencies of mankind require, that in matters of business which may lead to litigation with respect to rights and obligations, a man should be entitled to communicate freely with his professional adviser, and that such communications should be confidential and secret, which no one has a right to require either the client or his professional adviser to disclose. There is no mischief in this rule; nor does it unjustly trench upon the abstract principle, that Courts of equity require production of documents which would assist in establishing the case. Whatever fluctuations of opinion have taken place on the question, it is not now necessary, in the case of an English solicitor, for the purpose of privilege and protection, that the communications should pass, either during or relating to actual or expected litigation; it is sufficient if they are confidential between the attorney and his client, in that capacity. This privilege is generally confined to barristers and solicitors: a wholesome limitation, but subject to some exceptions. This case is not an exception, but rather an appendage to, or illustration of the rule, which is not a general rule with persons not professional, legally speaking. Thus, in the case of a medical or spiritual adviser, although it may be a comfort to a party freely and confidentially to communicate, yet these communications are not privileged by law. In this case, Mr. Campbell is a Scotchman, residing in Scotland, and he, it seems, undertook matters of business relating to the debts of his nephew, who was probably a Scotchman, but resident in England, with obligations, perhaps, of which the Court knows nothing. Suppose Campbell had consulted a writer to the signet or solicitor in Edinburgh, and he happened to cross the border and be found in England, and a bill had been filed, making it requisite to communicate with his client in Scotland, and production was asked of those communications, surely the finding him in England would never prevent the Courts of this country giving protection. It makes no difference, in principle, if a Scotch solicitor is resident in England, as is often the case. It may be more convenient for him to conduct the case of a Scotch client, the case being Scotch, and an English solicitor may not serve the purpose so well; and it is not disputed, that in a Scotch case there is, to a certain extent, a privilege in the Scotch courts. The question really comes to this:—If a Scotchman has occasion to communicate with a professional adviser in this country, may he consult a Scotch solicitor, or must he employ an English lawyer? It appears to me, that the same principle that would justify an Englishman in consulting his English solicitor while in Edinburgh, would justify a Scotchman in employing a Scotch solicitor. As to what the privilege is which is allowed in the Scotch courts, that would in fact be inquiring into the Scotch law, which it might be difficult to ascertain; but sitting in an English court, I am bound to apply the English rule of privilege, and I think that rule applies to these documents. My opinion therefore is, that the letters in question are privileged from production, but as the case is new in specie, I shall direct that the costs be costs in the cause.

TEED v. BEERE.

Statute of Limitations—Confidential Relation—Barrister and Clerk—Retention of Fees—Practice—Chief Clerk's Certificate—Res Judicata—Administration of Estate in Chancery.

To a suit by a barrister to recover out of the assets of his deceased clerk fees embezzled and retained by such clerk, the Statute of Limitations cannot be set up as a defence.

Under a decree in an administration suit, a barrister tendered his claim for an amount of fees embezzled and retained by the intestate, who had been his clerk. The chief clerk, by his certificate, disallowed the claim, on the ground that it was barred by the Statute of Limitations. The claimant took no proceeding in the administration suit to vary the certificate, and a decree was soon afterwards made on further directions, under which the residuary estate was distributed amongst the parties beneficially interested. The barrister subsequently instituted another suit in this court for the recovery of his demand out of the assets in the hands of the parties amongst whom they had been distributed:—Held, that he was entitled to maintain such suit, and to a decree for payment, with costs.

John Beere, deceased, was for many years employed as clerk to the plaintiff, Mr. John Godfrey Teed, one of Her Majesty's counsel, and was in that character accustomed to receive fees for the use of his master. In 1846 he suddenly left the service of Mr. Teed, and it was soon afterwards discovered that he had embezzled fees to the amount of 495*l.*, which he had received for the use of Mr. Teed. Mr. Teed heard nothing further of him until notice of his death, at Guernsey, appeared in the public journals, in the early part of 1854.

A suit having been instituted, in February 1854, for the administration of John Beere's estate, Mr. Teed carried in his claim for the amount of fees of which he had been defrauded, before the chief clerk of Vice Chancellor Wood, to whose court the administration suit was attached.

The claim was, however, disallowed, the chief clerk considering it to have been barred by the Statute of Limitations.

The plaintiff did not move in the administration suit to vary the chief clerk's certificate, and, in March 1857, an order was made in that suit, pursuant to which the residuary estate of the intestate was, in April of that year, paid and distributed to and between his widow and Eliza Caroline Amelia Beere, his daughter and only child.

Mr. Teed, in October 1857, filed his bill in the present suit, which, as originally framed, was against the widow and daughter of Beere, as defendants.

In July 1858 the plaintiff, Mr. Teed, and Mrs. Beere entered into an agreement for the compromise and settlement of the plaintiff's claim, by which the plaintiff agreed to accept and Mrs. Beere to pay the sum of 150*l.* in discharge of the plaintiff's claim; but it was expressly agreed that the said compromise should be without prejudice to the claim of the plaintiff against the other defendant to the bill as originally framed.

Mrs. Beere subsequently paid the 150*l.*, pursuant to the compromise. The plaintiff then amended his bill by making the daughter of John Beere the sole defendant.

The amended bill prayed that it might be declared that the plaintiff was entitled to stand as a creditor against the estate of John Beere, deceased, and to be paid out of his assets the sum of 485*l.* or other the full amount of what was due from the said John Beere to him at the time when he absconded, with interest; and that the defendant Eliza Caroline Amelia Beere ought to be deemed a trustee for the plaintiff of so much of the personal estate of the said intestate John Beere as should be requisite to pay two-thirds of the said sum of 485*l.* and interest; and that the said defendant might be decreed to pay the same.

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Cracknall, for the plaintiff, submitted that, this being a case of fraud committed upon his principal by a confidential agent, the Statute of Limitations was not available as a plea in bar of the demand; and the fact of the plaintiff having failed in his proceeding in the administration suit to obtain the allowance of his claim, did not conclude his right to institute another suit to recover it out of the assets of the testator in the hands of the beneficiaries amongst whom it had been distributed.—They cited

Mr. Malins and Mr. Shebbeare contended that this was not a case of trustee and cestui que trust, but a simple case of debtor and creditor, as in Foley v. Hill, (1), and that the debt therefore became barred by the statute at the end of six years; and, secondly, that the plaintiff, having come in under the decree in the administration suit, and having neglected to take any proceeding in that suit to vary the chief clerk's certificate disallowing his claim, was bound by that certificate as soon as it was allowed by the Court. The 34th section of the act, 15 & 16 Vict. c. 80, enacted that "when any certificate or report of the chief clerk shall have been signed and adopted by the Judge, the same shall be filed in like manner as reports are now filed, and shall thenceforth be binding on all the parties to the proceedings, unless discharged or varied, either at chambers or in open court, according to the nature of the case, upon application by summons or motion." And, in Hayward v. Hayward (2), Wood, V.C. had said, "It is extremely important that it should be understood, with reference to the practice in chambers, that the chief clerk never makes any order which may be called his own order in any sense. All the orders made in chambers are the orders of the Judge." And in The Earl of Mansfield v. Ogle (3) the Lords Justices of Appeal had decided that a certificate of the chief clerk that a certain sum was due to a creditor as arrears of an annuity was not an order under which "a sum of money was payable," under the 18th section of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, so as to carry interest. The plaintiff's contention in the present case, however, goes much further, for to decree in his favour would be, in effect, to decide that the chief clerk's certificate is not a judicial proceeding at all.

STUART, V.C. (without requiring a reply) said that, as to the first question, whether the claim was or was not barred by the Statute of Limitations, he felt no doubt. The clerk was clearly a receiver and agent, by whom money was received in confidence, and therefore under the same implied contract as that supposed to arise out of the duty of trustees, assignees and executors, of faithfully, diligently and accurately accounting, when called upon, to his principal—The Earl of Hardwicke v. Vernon (4), Dinwiddie v. Bailey (5). That being so, the money must be considered as money of the employer in the hands of his confidential agent. There had, therefore, been all along possession by the agent, but no adverse possession; and therefore the bar of the statute, which was founded on adverse possession, did not apply. So much for that part of the defence which was grounded on the Statute of Limitations. Then, as to the effect of the chief clerk's certificate. There had been no order of the Court, but the chief clerk had thereby simply disallowed the claim, i. e., he had certified it as a debt which could not be proved to be legally due. The question was, whether that concluded the claimant from ever making a demand against the assets of the person by whom he had, without doubt, been defrauded. He was of opinion that it did not. The mere fact that the assets had been distributed under the certificate did not bar the right of a creditor of the estate to make the residuary legatee or next-of-kin refund. The only effect of an administration decree was to discharge the executor from responsibility. The difficulty which attended the establishment of the creditor's claim was protection enough to those amongst whom the assets had been distributed, because the creditor who, wilfully and with full knowledge of the decree, allowed the assets to be distributed, was obliged to have recourse to a circuitous proceeding, attended with great risk, and the relief from which, if he obtained relief at all, would probably be upon terms. In such a case, if the Court found there had been negligence on the part of the creditor, it would impose upon him very severe terms. The Court, however, would examine all the circumstances of the case before it imposed any terms. In the present case, he was of opinion that there was no ground whatever for holding that this demand should remain unanswered as against the assets in the hands of the defendant. There had been no adjudication upon the claim till now, and he felt himself bound to decide it against the defendant; and, considering the nature of the plaintiff's demand, there did not appear to be any reason for imposing terms upon the plaintiff, notwithstanding what had taken place in the other suit.

KINDERSLEY, V.C. } MAPLETON v.
May 5. MAPLETON.

Power of Appointment—Partial Execution.

By a marriage settlement personal property was settled in trust for the husband for life, remainder to the wife for life, remainder upon trust after the decease of the wife for such children of the marriage and their issue who should be then living, as the husband should appoint; in default of such appointment to such children and their issue living at the death of the husband as the wife should appoint. There were five children of the marriage all living at the husband's death, and the wife survived her husband. The husband appointed four-fifths to four of these children, omitting any appointment of the remaining fifth. The fifth child died before the wife, leaving three children, one only of whom was born at the husband's death. The wife then appointed the remaining fifth to the only child of the deceased son, who was living at the husband's death, omitting the two children subsequently born, who were the plaintiffs in this suit:—Held, overruling Simpson v. Paul (1), that the partial execution of the primary power by the husband did not preclude the wife from exercising the secondary power in appointing the unappointed fifth; that both the appointments were valid, and that the plaintiffs could take no share in the fund.

A question was raised in this suit as to the validity of two appointments made in pursuance of a power in a marriage settlement. By the settlement, dated the 27th of August 1807, and made upon the marriage of David Mapleton and Sarah Louisa Banbury, certain sums of stock, amounting to 3,000*l.*, were vested in Henry Golding and R. M. Tozer, upon trust to pay the dividends and interest to David Mapleton for life, remainder to Sarah

(1) 2 Eden, 34.

Louisa Banbury for life; and after her decease to pay over, apply, distribute and divide the said trust monies amongst all and every the child and children of the said intended marriage, and the issue of such child or children who should be then living, in such parts, shares and proportions, if more than one, and with, under and subject to such limitations and conditions, and in such manner and form, and with or without power of revocation, as the said David Mapleton should from time to time during his natural life, by any deed or deeds, writing or writings, or by his last will and testament in writing to be duly executed and attested, give, direct or appoint; and for want of such gift, direction or appointment by the said David Mapleton, unto and amongst all and every the child or children of the said intended marriage, and the issue of such child or children who should be living at the time of the decease of the said David Mapleton, in such parts, shares and proportions, if more than one, and with, under and subject to such limitations and conditions, and in such manner and form, and with or without power of revocation, as the said Sarah Louisa Banbury, in case she should survive the said David Mapleton, and he should have made no such gift, direction or appointment, should from time to time during her natural life by any deed or deeds, writing or writings, or by her last will and testament, to be duly executed and attested, give, direct or appoint; and for want of such gift, direction or appointment by the said Sarah Louisa Banbury, then upon trust to pay over, apply, distribute and divide the said trust money and every part thereof, unto and amongst all the children of the said intended marriage, and the issue of such child or children, share and share alike, equally to be divided between them (such issue taking only so much as their respective father or mother, if living at the death of the said David Mapleton, would have taken), to go wholly to such child, if but one, or the issue of such child, and to be paid and payable to him, her or them respectively when and as he, she or they should respectively attain the age of twenty-one years. There was also a trust for maintenance and advancement, with benefit of survivorship.

There were issue of the marriage five children, David Robert Banbury Mapleton, Tamesia Sarah Louisa Mapleton, Henry Mapleton, Christiana Frances Mapleton and Martha Ann Blanche Mapleton, who all survived David Mapleton. In 1837, Tamesia S. L. Mapleton married John Banbury, and David Mapleton appointed one-fifth of the trust fund to her, and that one-fifth was settled upon her and her husband and children. In 1840, Martha A. B. Mapleton married Horatio Compigne, when David Mapleton appointed one other fifth of the trust funds to her, and by a settlement of the same year, that fifth was settled upon her and her husband and children. David Mapleton the elder died on the 22nd of March 1842, having made his will, dated the 16th of August 1829, and a codicil dated the 2nd of December 1840, whereby he appointed one other fifth to Christiana F. the wife of Henry Hockin, and one-fifth to Henry Mapleton. David R. B. Mapleton married in 1839, but no settlement was made upon that marriage. His wife dying, he married Anne Compigne, when the usual settlement was made. There were three children of that marriage, one of whom only was living at the death of David Mapleton, namely, Maberly Anne Mapleton, and two born after his death, Harriet Mapleton and Frederick Mapleton, who were the infant plaintiffs.

Sarah Louisa Mapleton, the wife of David Mapleton, died on the 28th of July 1858, having made her will on the 3rd of November 1855, reciting that four-fifths of the trust fund had been appointed, and thereby appointing the remaining one-fifth (except 20s. part thereof) to Maberly Anne Mapleton, who was living at the death of her said deceased husband, and the sum of 20s. as to one-fourth to Tamesia S. L. Banbury and her issue living at the death of David Mapleton the elder; one other fourth to Christiana F. Shelton, in the same terms; one other fourth to Martha Blanche Compigne, in the same words, and the remaining fourth to Henry Mapleton, in the same terms. The testatrix then ratified and confirmed the several appointments made by her said husband, David Mapleton, of the four fifth parts of the trust fund.

The bill was filed, by the two children of David Robert Banbury Mapleton born after the decease of David Mapleton, praying a declaration that the appointment made by Sarah Louisa Mapleton might be declared void, and that such of the appointments executed by David Mapleton or Sarah Louisa Mapleton as excluded the plaintiffs might be declared void, and that the rights of the parties might be ascertained.

Mr. Anderson and Mr. Briggs, for the plaintiffs, submitted that neither of the powers given by the settlement of August 1807 was exclusive, and that all the children and issue of children were objects of the powers; that the power executed by David Mapleton, the husband, ought to have included the plaintiffs, who were issue of one of the sons, and were alive at the decease of the wife; that after the partial execution of the primary power by the husband, the wife was precluded from exercising the secondary power, which was a proposition expressly laid down in Simpson v. Paul, and that if the wife was capable of exercising her secondary power, then it was invalid, because it did not include the plaintiffs as appointed by way of substitution for their father who was alive at the death of David Mapleton, the husband.

KINDERSLEY, V.C. — I entertain no doubt in this case that it is impossible for the plaintiffs to take any share in this fund.

The settlement is extremely ill drawn, and the question before the Court has arisen owing to that circumstance. Under the first power, the fund, after the death of the husband and wife, is to go amongst all the children of the intended marriage, and the issue of such children who should be "then" living, in such manner as David Mapleton should appoint. Without knowing what the defendants' contention is, I will assume for the plaintiffs, but without expressing any opinion upon the point, that the words of that power are not such as to give a right to an exclusive appointment, but that if there is an appointment of the whole fund, it must be in favour of all the children, and the issue of such children who should be "then" living, the word "then" referring to the death of Mrs. Mapleton. I will assume, therefore, that this power is to be exercised in favour of all the children living at the death of Mrs. Mapleton, and the issue then living of children antecedently dead. Then as to the second power, that is, in default of, or for want of, any such gift, direction or appointment, the words are not, who shall be "then" living, but amongst the child or children and the issue of such child or children "who shall be living at the death of David Mapleton." Now, the natural effect of this language, in my opinion, is to include both the children and the issue of children, so that, to entitle any person to claim as an object of the second power, he must be a child of the marriage or the issue of such child living at the death of David Mapleton. I will assume that this power also does not warrant an exclusive appointment. Now, it was contended that whatever was the effect of the power given to the father, the power to the mother was only to be exercised in the event of the father not having exercised his power. The case of Simpson v. Paul was cited in support of this contention, but in that case there was mixed up with the construction of the instrument something done by the donee of the power in attempting the exercise of it, and nothing can be less satisfactory than Lord Northington's reasoning; still there is the general proposition that if there is a primary power given to one, and in default of execution, a secondary power given, a partial exercise by the donee of the primary power will preclude any exercise of the secondary power. The question then is, whether the wife is precluded in this case from exercising the power given to her after her husband has partially exercised his power? and whether such an abstract proposition as that laid down in Simpson v. Paul can be maintained? Now, Lord St. Leonards has distinctly expressed his opinion that Lord Northington was wrong; and although there is a difference of opinion upon the point, and there are certain other cases in which Simpson v. Paul was referred to without disapprobation, I consider that I am justified in taking Lord St. Leonards' view, that the partial execution of a primary power does not exclude the execution of a secondary power; and in this particular case I think the words are sufficient to enable an exercise of the secondary power by the wife over any portion of the fund not appointed under the original power, provided it is properly exercised, and notwithstanding the partial exercise of the primary power. As to the objects of the wife's power, I think the words must receive the same construction as those used in the primary power, and be held to extend to all the children of the marriage and the issue of such children as should be dead, such issue to be living at the death of David Mapleton. The plaintiffs, therefore, whose father was not dead at the death of David Mapleton, are not within the scope of the second power.

The next question is, whether they are within the scope of the first power. The objects of that power are the child or children of the marriage, and the issue of such child or children who should be "then" living, that is, at the death of Mrs. Mapleton, or the issue of such children living at her death. Now the father of these children predeceased Mrs. Mapleton, but they were living at her death, therefore they are objects of the first power. The facts are these: the father partially executed his power on three occasions, that is, on the marriages of his children, by deed and by will, which he had power to do, but he made no appointment in favour of David R. B. Mapleton, his eldest son, although he was then living, and one-fifth was left unappointed. Now, irrespective of anything which subsequently took place, it is not contended that any of these appointments were bad, and I am clearly of opinion that they were good and valid, at least, during the life of David Mapleton. Then, Mrs. Mapleton, finding that her husband had, within the scope of his power, appointed four-fifths, and there being one-fifth remaining, but no fifth child living, considered that, so far as equality was justice, she would desire to give that fifth to those children who were evidently objects of the power; but on looking at the power, it was found only to refer to children of the marriage or the issue of children living at the death of David Mapleton, and she was no doubt told that she had no exclusive power, but must embrace all the objects of the power, which were all the children of the marriage living at the death of David Mapleton, and if any of them were dead, then the issue; but none of them were dead except David Robert, and on looking to see what issue of David Robert were living when David Mapleton, the father, died, it was found that only one of those children was living at his death, and she accordingly appointed the whole fund to that one child, except a trifle to satisfy the act relating to illusory appointments. That appointment was within her power, and she has not exceeded it. The effect of this certainly is what, if the parties had had it pointed out to them, might have been obviated in drawing the settlement, namely, that the issue were not benefited as the parties might have desired, and from this it is argued that the exercise of the power by the husband was void, and that the wife's execution of the power was void, not because it was in excess, not because it did not provide for all the objects comprised within the power, but because the result is, that by reason of the settlement being bad and obscure, some objects are not provided for who might have been included. That, however, is no reason for holding the appointments to be bad. They seem to be, on the contrary, all good.

But there remains another point which is fatal to the plaintiffs' case. If all these instruments were void, and if the whole fund, or any part of it, could be considered to be unappointed, still the plaintiffs do not come within the ultimate trust in default of appointment, there being no express direction for substitution of issue of children in their particular case. The language is "unto and amongst all the children of the said intended marriage and the issue of such child or children, share and share alike, equally to be divided between them (such issue taking only so much as their respective father or mother, if living at the death of the said David Mapleton, would have taken), to go wholly to such child if but one, or the issue of such child, and to be paid to him, her or them respectively when and as he, she or they should respectively attain the age of twenty-one years." It is true that substitution may be inferred from these words, and if no period had been expressly stated, it would be the period of distribution; but it is expressly stated that the period is the death of David Mapleton, and these children who are plaintiffs were not then alive, consequently they would not be entitled to take in default of appointment, even if the powers were improperly exercised. The bill must, therefore, be dismissed, with a declaration that the several instruments referred to were good and valid executions of the powers.

RUDGE v. WEEDON.

Practice—Supplemental Order—Married Woman sued as a Feme Sole—Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Act—Chancery Practice Amendment Act.

A married woman obtained an order from a magistrate, protecting her property, on the ground of desertion by her husband, under the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Act (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85). A bill was filed against her (her husband not being a party), and she obtained leave to put in a separate answer, and a decree was made against her. Another suit was instituted for the same purposes as the former suit, and she and her husband were made defendants. On his application to the magistrate who granted the protection order, the husband satisfied his Worship that there had been no desertion, and the protection order was discharged. The plaintiff in the first suit thereupon, under the 52nd section of the Chancery Practice Amendment Act (15 & 16 Vict. c. 86.), made the husband a defendant by supplemental order in that suit; but, upon the application of the husband, the order was discharged, by one of the Vice Chancellors. On appeal, by the plaintiff in the first suit,—Held, reversing his Honour's decision, that the supplemental order was proper.

This was an appeal from an order made by Vice Chancellor Kindersley under these circumstances:—A suit was instituted in the month of March 1859 by two infants named Rudge (by Robert Harris, their next friend), two of the residuary legatees of the estate of William Weedon, for the administration of his estate. Another of the residuary legatees was Mrs. Elizabeth Grace Rudge (wife of Mr. George Bickerton Rudge), and she, in the month of August 1858, applied to Mr. Elliott, a police magistrate of the Lambeth district, for an order of protection, on her assertion that she had been deserted by her husband for a period of seventeen years, and obtained the order under the 21st section of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85; by which section it is provided, that the effect of the order shall be to protect the wife's "earnings and property acquired since the commencement of such desertion from her husband, and all creditors and persons claiming under him, and such earnings and property shall belong to the wife as if she were a feme sole;" and further, that "if any such order of protection be made, the wife shall, during the continuance thereof, be and be deemed to have been, during such desertion of her, in the like position in all respects, with regard to property and contracts, and suing and being sued, as she would be under this act, if she obtained a decree of judicial separation." It was also enacted, by the 26th section, that "in every case of a judicial separation the wife shall, whilst so separated, be considered as a feme sole for the purposes of contract and wrongs and injuries, and suing and being sued in any civil proceeding."

In this state of circumstances the plaintiffs made Mrs. Rudge a defendant as a feme sole, her husband not being either plaintiff or defendant. Thereupon Mrs. Rudge obtained leave on motion to put in her answer separately, as a feme sole, and a decree was made against her.

The same infants, by another next friend, afterwards filed a bill for the same purposes, and George Bickerton Rudge and Elizabeth Grace Rudge were made co-defendants. By reason of the proceedings in the second suit Mr. Rudge became aware of the protection order, and on the 28th of March 1859 he applied to Mr. Elliott for its discharge, and having satisfied his Worship that he had never deserted his wife, the order was discharged. On the 30th of the same month, the plaintiffs in the first suit obtained the common supplemental order at the Rolls, under the 52nd section of the Chancery Practice Amendment Act (15 & 16 Vict. c. 86), to make Mr. Rudge a co-defendant with his wife. On motion on behalf of Mr. Rudge, Vice Chancellor Kindersley, on the 16th of April, discharged the supplemental order for the reasons adduced in the following judgment.

"The question in this case turns entirely upon a technicality, and is very unsatisfactory to decide, because it will involve the parties in expense without advancing the suit. I speak of the motion to discharge the order in the nature of a supplemental order, the question on which turns upon the construction to be put upon the 52nd section of the Chancery Practice Amendment Act, 1852. My duty is not to do otherwise, in construing an act of parliament, than to put a fair and natural construction on the words, and not to distort the language in order to give it a more extensive construction. Now, here is a case in which Mrs. Rudge, a married woman, is made a defendant by a person who has an interest in the character of residuary legatee, Mrs. Rudge being also a residuary legatee or at least having an interest in the residue; and she is made a defendant without her husband, the suit being for the administration of the estate. As it turns out, her husband ought to be a party with her, except so far as that rule has been affected by that section of the Divorce Act which makes an exception to the general rule that he must be a party. It appears that before the suit was instituted a magistrate made an order giving her protection, on the ground that she had been deserted by her husband. The effect of such an order is to make her so entirely sole that she may sue and be sued as a feme sole; that is different from the case of a married woman who has a separate estate, for the act of parliament says she may sue and be sued without him, and it has been determined that he need not and ought not to be a party to a suit. The suit, then, was rightly constituted, and the plaintiff had no choice in the matter. A decree was taken with nothing special in it; but it seems that the order for protection was wrong, for there had been no desertion, and accordingly the order was discharged on the ground of its having been wrong ab initio. Then, that order, except so far as there is anything special in the Divorce Act, stood in no higher position than an order made by any Court of justice, and afterwards discharged by another branch of that Court as being wrong, and unless there is something to give it a different effect, the whole of that order is swept away as ab initio. Now it appears to me that there is nothing in the act of parliament to give it any different effect. By the act 21 & 22 Vict. c. 108. s. 8, it is enacted, that 'no discharge, variation or reversal of such order or decree shall prejudice or affect any rights or remedies which any person would have had in case the same had not been so reversed, varied or discharged in respect of any debts, contracts, or acts of the wife incurred, entered into or done between the times of the making such order or decree, and of the discharge, variation or reversal thereof.' So that the effect of the amending statute is, that if, pending that order, the wife has contracted any debt, or entered into any contract, or done any other act as a feme sole, there is to be no alteration, but otherwise the act of parliament gives no validity to her acts. Now, the plaintiff found himself in this position: he had got his decree against a married woman, treating her as a feme sole, and the husband was not before the Court. It is clear, now, that the husband ought to have been a party to the suit, and that the decree, as it stands, is defective. Therefore, the plaintiff says he will obtain an order according to the 52nd section of the 15 & 16 Vict.

c. 86, in the nature of a supplemental decree, and has done so. I cannot find any fault with him; but the question is, whether that order is valid as being regular and proper. It appears to me that it is irregular and improper. The 52nd section of the Amendment Act is this: 'Upon any suit in the said court becoming abated by death, marriage, or otherwise, or defective by reason of some change or transmission of interest or liability, it shall not be necessary to exhibit any bill of revivor or supplemental bill in order to obtain the usual order to revive such suit, or the usual or necessary decree or order to carry on the proceedings; but an order to the effect of the usual order to revive or of the usual supplemental decree may be obtained as of course upon an allegation of the abatement of such suit, or of the same having become defective, and of the change or transmission of interest or liability; and an order so obtained, when served upon the party or parties who, according to the present practice of the said Court, would be defendant or defendants to the bill of revivor or supplemental bill, shall from the time of such service be binding on such party or parties in the same manner in every respect as if such order had been regularly obtained according to the existing practice of the said Court; and such party or parties shall thenceforth become a party or parties to the suit, and shall be bound to enter an appearance thereto in the office of the Clerks of Records and Writs, within such time and in like manner as if he or they had been duly served with process to appear to a bill of revivor or supplemental bill filed against him; provided that it shall be open to the party or parties so served, within such time after service as shall be in that behalf prescribed by any general order of the Lord Chancellor, to apply to the Court by motion or petition to discharge such order on any ground which would have been open to him on a bill of revivor or supplemental bill, stating the previous proceedings in the suit and the alleged change or transmission of interest or liability, and praying the usual relief consequent thereon.' Has then this suit become defective by reason of any change or transmission of interest or liability? If there has been none, then this order is not valid. Now, here the magistrate's order has been swept away, and the thing stands upon the same footing as any discharged order of a Court. Transmission of interest there has been none, and there is nothing changed. Edwards v. Bailey (1) and Cartwright v. Shephard (2) were cases in which an actual party to a suit died, and it was decided that there the act did apply. In Pickford v. Brown (3) there was the birth of a child—that is to say, a change of interest; but here there is no change of interest. Mr. Rudge's rights are now just what they were when the decree was made, although, by the erroneous decision of a magistrate, there had been an order of protection against them. It is just as if there was a decree of the ecclesiastical Court, declaring a marriage null and void. As long as that decision stands the marriage is null and void; and if, pending that decision, there had been a suit against the wife, the husband would not have been a party. But suppose that afterwards that decision was set aside, would she not be a married woman ab initio? The marriage still exists; they do not become married, for they were married throughout. And it appears to me that Mrs. Rudge was not in this case a feme sole from the beginning. For these reasons it appears to me that I must come to the conclusion, that there is in this case no change or transmission of interest; and, therefore, this case does not come within the terms of the 52nd section. The Court had, therefore, no power to make a supplemental order, and the order must therefore be discharged."

From this decision the plaintiffs in the first suit appealed.

Mr. Glasse and Mr. Rogers, for the appellants.

Mr. G. M. Giffard and Mr. George Simpson, for Mr. Rudge.

The cases of Baile v. the Bank of England (4) and Edwards v. Bailey (5) were referred to.

(5) Ubi supra.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—Assuming the magistrate's protection order to have been rightly discharged, still it was an order in force when the first bill was filed, and in force when the decree was made. According, therefore, to what I consider the true construction of the several acts of parliament that have been mentioned, the decree, so far as the absence of the husband was concerned, was right in form and substance, and I consider that, after the magistrate's protection order was discharged, it was a right and direct course to apply to the Rolls for the order in question of the 30th of March; and, with deference to the Vice Chancellor, if his Honour thought otherwise, I am of opinion that that order was also correct in form and substance; and, considering the nature of the wife's interest which is brought into question in this litigation, I am of opinion that the husband should pay the costs of the motion before the Vice Chancellor, and also the costs of the motion here.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—It seems to me also that the order made at the Rolls was a correct and proper order. There are two questions in this case, one arising upon the Divorce Acts, the other arising upon the Equity Jurisdiction Improvement Act. Now, with respect to the Divorce Acts, the 21st section of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85. says, that a wife deserted by her husband may apply in this case to a police magistrate for an order to protect any money or property she may acquire by her industry, or which she may become possessed of after such desertion, against her husband or his creditors, or any person claiming under him; and the magistrate, if satisfied of the fact of such desertion, and that the same was without reasonable cause, may make and give to the wife the order granting her protection for her property and earnings; and it is said that if the order be made, the wife "shall, during the continuance thereof, be and be deemed to have been, during such desertion of her, in the like position in all respects, with regard to property and contracts, and suing and being sued, as she would be under this act if she obtained a decree of judicial separation." And by the 26th section of the act it is provided, "In every case of a judicial separation the wife shall, whilst so separated, be considered as a feme sole for the purposes of contract, and wrongs and injuries, and suing and being sued in any civil proceeding." Now, what has happened in this case is, that on the 18th of August 1858 there was an order made by a police magistrate giving the wife the benefit of the protection of her earnings and property, acquired since the commencement of the desertion; and that order remained in force until the 28th of March 1859, when it was discharged at the instance of the husband. That order being discharged at the instance of the husband, stating that there never was, in fact, any desertion, the argument takes this course, that the statute only applies to the case of a wife deserted by her husband. But when we look at the language of the acts, it is plain that the words used in the act, "a wife deserted by her husband," mean a wife alleging herself to be deserted by her husband, because the immediate and subsequent provision is a provision that the fact of desertion is to be established to the satisfaction of the magistrate. It is impossible, therefore, to read that section without seeing that the words in the early part of it, "a wife deserted by her husband, may, at any time after the desertion, apply to the magistrate," must mean "a wife alleging herself to be deserted may, at any time after such alleged desertion, apply to the magistrate;" and then the magistrate, if satisfied of the desertion, may make the order. I read then the latter part of that section, "If any such order for protection be made, the wife shall during the continuance thereof be, and be deemed to have been, during such desertion of her, in the like position in all respects, with regard to property and contracts, and suing and being sued, as she would be under this act if she obtained a decree of judicial separation." There the words "such desertion" apply, as I understand the act, to the desertion established to the satisfaction of the magistrate; and, therefore, if there has been an establishment of a desertion to the satisfaction of the magistrate, from that time the wife is in the same position in all respects as she would be under a decree of judicial separation; and by the 26th section of the act she is then placed in the position of a feme sole for the purpose of suing and being sued. It is, however, as well to observe, that the 10th section of the amending act of the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 108, seems to me to shew very clearly what, in the view of the legislature, was the construction of the previous act; for the 10th section says, "All persons and corporations who shall, in reliance on any such order or decree as aforesaid, make any payment to, or permit any transfer or act to be made or done by the wife who has obtained the same, shall, notwithstanding such order or decree may then have been discharged, reversed, or varied, or the separation of the wife from her husband may have ceased, or at some time since the making of the order or decree been discontinued, be protected and indemnified in the same way in all respects as if, at the time of such payment, transfer or other act, such order or decree were valid and still subsisting"; treating it as perfectly clear that under the prior act the order had its effect as long as it remained in force, and going to the extent of validating and confirming it, notwithstanding the separation may have ceased—validating and confirming it, I mean, as to persons who take any transfer from the wife; validating and confirming it to that extent, notwithstanding even the separation may have ceased, provided that the party who took the transfer had no knowledge of the fact of the separation having so ceased; and the order having been discharged, it seems to me that, upon the true construction of this act, this lady was, at the time of the filing of this bill, to be considered as a feme sole, to sue and be sued only as a feme sole. Then, if that be the case, we come to the question upon the Improvement of the Jurisdiction in Equity, and by that act, s. 52, it is provided, that if there be any change of interest, the same order is to be made on a motion of course, or on an application of course, as would be made upon the filing of a supplemental bill. Now, can it be said here that there was no change of interest, when the effect of the discharging order is this—that the property which had belonged to the wife for her separate use has, by the operation of that discharging order, ceased to belong to her, and has become the property of the husband? It seems to me that that is clearly a change of interest within the meaning of this act. I think, therefore, that the order made at the Rolls was correct, and that the order of the Vice Chancellor which discharged it must itself be discharged. I have felt for some time some doubt about the question of costs; but I think that that is entirely set at rest by the production of the bill which has been filed by the husband's brother, and by the same solicitor who is acting for the husband in this suit. That perfectly satisfies my mind that this is no more than a contrivance on the part of the solicitor for the purpose of displacing another suit instituted, and properly instituted, on behalf of these infants. I think, therefore, the order must be discharged, with costs, both before the Court below and here.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE added— I believe that we are both of opinion that if the husband shall be desirous of rehearing the decree, he will be entitled to do so.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—Yes. I confine the observations I have made entirely to this particular case. There may be cases in which it would not be right that there should be such a supplemental order made, but in this case there is no question, except the interest of the wife. If she had been executrix before the separation, I am not at all clear that this order could have been properly made.

Will—Construction—Mistake or Miscalculation by Testator—Gift to Legatees "or their Legal Representatives"—Exception out of Residue—Lapse.

*A testator gave a legacy to each of his brothers and sisters (naming them), or to their "legal representatives," to be paid to them two years after his death, and legacies to his nephews, the whole amounting together to 6,100*l*. He then gave the residue of his property to his widow absolutely, except 4,100*l*., which she was only to take for life, and after her death it was to be divided among his relations before mentioned, "in proportion to the legacies left above, which will just make their legacy double the first* bequest." One of the sisters of the testator and two of his nephews died after the date of the will, but in his lifetime, and after his death the widow died.

One of the Vice Chancellors decided that there was not sufficient evidence before the Court to justify it in departing from the words of the will respecting the apparent miscalculation of the amount excepted out of the residue; and with regard to the postponed legacies, that notwithstanding the words "or to their legal representatives," the shares of the pre-deceased legatees in the amounts postponed to the widow's life interest lapsed, and that as the 4,100*l*. was not given as part of the residue, but as an exception out of the residue, those shares which lapsed fell into the residue, and did not go to the testator's next-of-kin; and on appeal the same was affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Vice Chancellor Stuart in an administration suit, and on a petition in the same suit. The questions, two in number, arose on the construction of the will of the late Mr. Miles Whitelock, dated the 4th of March 1815, by which he gave to each of his three brothers and six sisters (naming them), or to their legal representatives, the sum of 500*l*., to be paid to them in two years after his death. He also gave 500*l*. to each of two of his nephews, and 300*l*. to each of two other nephews. After giving two annuities, the testator proceeded thus—"As to the remainder of my property, I leave the same to my wife Sarah, for her to have the absolute disposal of it, except 4,100*l*., of which she is only to have the use during her life, and which I wish to be divided amongst my relations to whom I have left legacies in the fore part of this instrument, in proportion to the legacies left above, which will just make their legacy double the first bequest." Mary Thompson, one of the testator's sisters named in the will (a legatee for 500*l*.), and also two of his nephews, died after the date of the will, but before the testator's death. The testator's wife, and his other relations named in the will, survived him. The testator excepted out of the residuary gift to his wife the sum of 4,100*l*. only, which he stated would just make the legacies previously given to his relations double the first bequest; while the total amount of the legacies given to those relations was 6,100*l.*; and a question arose whether the sum of 4,100*l.* or 6,100*l.* was to be excepted out of the residue. The suit was, therefore, instituted to administer the testator's estate, and to determine the construction of his will. A decree was made by Vice Chancellor Stuart in favour of the smaller amount; and after that the widow, Sarah Whitelock, died, and the reversionary legacies became payable; whereupon a further question arose, whether the shares of Mary Thompson and the two deceased nephews in the sum of 4,100*l.* did or did not lapse, and if they did, whether they went to the widow as residuary legatee, or to the next-of-kin, as undisposed of, on which his Honour decided on petition in the cause that the shares of the sister and nephews lapsed, and fell into the residue for the benefit of the estate of Sarah Whitelock. From these decisions the parties interested appealed.

At the hearing of the appeals, the Lords Justices required the production of the original will, when upon examination it was discovered that there were several erasures and also some interlineations in a different coloured ink from the rest of the will. The exception, 4,100*l.*, was not written in figures, but in words at length. The alterations were proved as part of the will.

On the question whether the exception out of the residue should be read 6,100*l.* or 4,100*l.*,—

Mr. Malins and Mr. Rogers, for the next-of-kin, argued that the insertion of the latter amount was the result of error or miscalculation, for that the expression the testator had used made his intention quite plain, namely, when he said "which will just make their legacies double the first bequest," and that as the 6,100*l.* would effect that intention, the Court would rectify the mistake and declare that the exception from the residue should be of that amount. They cited—

Trevor v. Trevor, 5 Russ. 24; s.c. 6 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 182.

Jordan v. Fortescue, 10 Beav. 259; s.c. 16 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 332.

Sir Francis Goldsmid and Mr. Kingdon, for the personal representatives of Sarah Whitelock, the widow and residuary legatee, claimed to be entitled to the whole residue, with the deduction only of the sum of 4,100*l.*, upon the ground upon which the Vice Chancellor relied in his judgment, namely, that there was no principle of construction to support the view entertained by the plaintiff, that the amount to be deducted from the residue was so much as would make an amount equal in value to the aggregate of the preceding legacies, or 6,100*l.*, and not the lesser sum of 4,100*l.* mentioned in the will. The gift of the last-named sum was plain, clear and distinct, and a gift made in plain, clear, and distinct terms could not be controlled, modified or altered by ambiguous terms, loosely used, moreover, for the purpose of describing the consequences or effect of the gift. The testator had in the clearest language given as a deduction from the residue a sum of 4,100*l.*, and it could not be increased merely because he might have, in a moment of mistake or miscalculation, or which there was no proof whatever, spoken as if he thought that such sum would have the effect suggested.

The cases cited in support of this view were:—

Langham v. Sandford, 19 Ves. 641.

Bibin v. Walker, Amb. 661.

Cole v. Wade, 16 Ves. 27.

Smith v. Fitzgerald, 3 Ves. & B. 2.

Mr. Malins was heard in reply.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—We do not intend to express any opinion on this appeal until we have heard the argument on the other.

Mr. Malins and Mr. Rogers, for the next-of-kin, contended that the money—whether the amount should be decided to be 4,100*l.* or 6,100*l.*—was an exception out of the residuary gift, and as part of it had, by the death of Mary Thompson and the two nephews in the lifetime of the testator, lapsed, it did not fall into the residue, but became the property of the next-of-kin, as upon an absolute intestacy pro tanto. For this they relied upon—

Easum v. Appleford, 5 Myl. & Cr. 56; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Chanc. 81.

Mr. Little, for the children of Mary Thompson, insisted that there had been no lapse whatever, either in favour of the residuary legatee or the next-of-kin. That the testator intended the amount excepted out of the residuary gift to be 6,100*l.* was plain beyond reasonable doubt by the expression he had used—"which will just make their legacy double the first bequest"; and he intended such amount to be given to the relations mentioned "in the fore part of this instrument," these relations being his three brothers and six sisters, "or their legal representatives," which words must be held to apply as well to the deferred legacies as to the legacies immediately payable; for as to the immediate legacies, those words constituted a gift by substitution to the next-of-kin of the legatees, in case of the death of those legatees before the death of the testator, and the postponed legacies were intended to be given in the same manner. That such words would properly bear that construction was plain from—

Sir Francis Goldsmid and Mr. Kingdon, in support of the decision of the Vice Chancellor, argued that where a sum of money is taken out of the residue for a particular purpose, if that purpose failed, the sum fell back into the residue, which was the case in the present instance. All the authorities on the subject had been reviewed by Vice Chancellor Kindersley in Re Crawford's Trusts (1), to which, as well as the following cases, they referred.—

July 4.—LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.

—Upon this appeal there are three points for decision, each arising on the construction of the will of Miles Whitelock, a trader or merchant in the city of London, who died in the month of November 1817, and who was survived by his widow, who was the residuary legatee mentioned in his will, for many years. The bill has not set out the whole of the will, but probably enough, and all that is important; that statement is not quite accurate, but still it is not importantly erroneous. The will, when produced here and examined by ourselves, appeared to be entirely in the testator's handwriting, and was altered and corrected in more than one place. The entire instrument, which uniformly represented amounts not by figures, but in words, was to this effect:—[Here his Lordship read the will.]—The words "or to their legal representatives," and the words "one hundred," following the words "four thousand," are interlined; and in the same passage the word "four" appears to have been originally written "five." As I understand, two of the nephews mentioned died in the testator's lifetime, but after the date of the will; and Mary Thompson, a sister of the testator, also died within the same period. The points argued were three: first, whether, by the words "or to their legal representatives," interlined in the will, each or any of the legacies to Mary Thompson and the two nephews was prevented from lapsing, that is, whether it went by substitution,

(1) 2 Drew. 230; s. c. 23 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Chanc. 625.

to the executors or to the next-of-kin of the legatees. I think that it was not. As to the first legacy the words in question are applied only to the event of the death of the legatee happening after his own death, and before the expiration of the two years for which payment of that legacy was to be postponed; and as to the other two legacies, if the words can be conceived to have any application, they can apply only in the event of the death of the legatees after his own death, and before the death of his wife, during whose lifetime there was postponement of payment. Therefore, there was a lapse of the legacy to Mary Thompson, who had died as I have stated. Then, as to the second point, it was argued that the lapsed portion did not fall into the residue, to the wife as residuary legatee, but lapsed as undisposed of to the testator's next-of-kin. I, however, think that the right of the residuary legatee is not taken away; but my clear opinion is, that the legacies were liable to all the incidents of lapse in the ordinary way, and the exception following the residuary gift and the word "only" in that clause, were not intended to prejudice or affect the wife's interest, except as to the amount of the 4,100*l.* According to my judgment, there has not been an intestacy, total or partial. Then, as to the third point, the first seven legacies given by the will amount together to 6,100*l.*; and it was argued that, by force of the words of the will, "which will just make their legacies double the first bequest," the expression "four thousand one hundred pounds" ought to be read "six thousand one hundred pounds." This construction has appeared, and it still appears to be plausible, although the appellant by that contention calls on the Court to read the word "just" as meaning "exactly." The testator must clearly have made a miscalculation or mistake; but does it follow that he meant to give 6,100*l.*? I am not satisfied of that; I think the testator must have intended to give only 4,100*l.* of postponed legacies, though erroneously calculating the amount of his previous bequests. At all events, his expression is "four thousand one hundred," from which there should be no departure, unless plainly there is aliter sensus, and on the entire will it is not clear to me aliter sensusse testatorem; this does not clearly appear upon considering the whole instrument. I cannot say that I differ from the conclusion in favour of the residuary legatee, at which the Vice Chancellor has arrived.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—The testator has by will given to each of his three brothers and six sisters, or their legal representatives, a sum of 500*l.*, and those legacies, together with other legacies, amount to 6,100*l.* He then gives to his father and mother an annuity of 100*l.* Upon the production of the original will, it appeared that the words "or to their legal representatives" had been interlined; that the word "four" was written in a different ink, and was written over another word, which, so far as I am able to judge, had been the word "five." Vice Chancellor Sir John Stuart has declared that, according to the true construction of the will, the testator's widow, Sarah Whitelock, is entitled to the whole of the testator's estate except the legacies and the sum of 4,100*l.*, which was to be apportioned in a certain manner amongst the legatees; and the widow having died subsequently to the decree, his Honour has, by a subsequent order, declared that Mary Thompson and two of the testator's nephews having died in the lifetime of the testator, the legacies given to them have lapsed, and that Sarah Whitelock, the widow, is entitled to them. These were the orders under appeal. The first and most important question arises upon the decree, the appellant contending that the exception from the residuary gift ought to have been 6,100*l.*, and not 4,100*l.*; and he so contended on the ground that it was the intention of the testator that the legacies to his relations should be doubled upon the death of his widow, and that 6,100*l.* being required to double the legacies, "four thousand one hundred" had been written by mistake for "six thousand one hundred." It may well be that the Court will set right such an error or mistake as this, for it is the duty of the Court to carry the intention of a testator into effect, and if it is clearly demonstrated that the intention is different from what is expressed by the words, the Court will, as a general rule, pay more regard to the intention than to the words. But this rule must be acted on with the utmost caution. It was well said in Mellish v. Mellish (2), that "the rule is, that wherever there is a clear mistake or a clear omission, recourse is to be had to the general scope of the will, and the general intention to be collected from it; but the first thing to be proved is that there is a mistake. I do not find enough to convince me that there is a mistake; and whenever it comes to a doubt, the safest way is to adhere to the words." In the present case there does not appear to be a clear mistake; it therefore comes to a doubt. This is the will of a testator, engaged in trade, who must be presumed to have been fully competent to make such calculations as were here required. The will itself is wholly in his own handwriting, and he has himself altered it, and must, therefore, twice over have made the mistake, if, indeed, there is any mistake at all. There was deliberation, and the testator does not say that "four thousand one hundred pounds" will "exactly" make their legacies double, but that it will "just" make them double. It is possible that he may have meant "nearly." But I attach no great weight to this. Looking at all the circumstances, I cannot bring my mind to a judicial conclusion that there is any mistake at all. I adopt what was said by Sir Pepper Arden, in Mellish v. Mellish, that the safest way is, when it comes only to a doubt, to adhere to the words. Upon these considerations, therefore, I agree with the Vice Chancellor. The other points relate to the order made on the petition. It was contended, by the appellant, that the shares of the deceased legatees do not form part of the residue, but that the 4,100*l.* being excepted from the residue, those shares go to the next-of-kin; but here, again, I think this contention cannot be maintained. The 4,100*l.* is given, not as part of the residue, but as an exception out of it. A more plausible claim was advanced by Mr. Little on behalf of the estate of a sister who died in the testator's lifetime, but this will depend wholly on there being a gift by way of substitution by virtue of the words of the will "or to their legal representatives." But I do not think that those words could affect the decision as to the part of the 4,100*l.*, the only point now in dispute. I agree with the Vice Chancellor as to all the points, and the appeals must be dismissed, but without costs.

Practice—Evidence—Cross-Examination on Answer.

Upon a notice of motion for a decree a plaintiff may cross-examine a defendant on his answer, but other defendants may object to such cross-examination being read as evidence against them.

After notice of motion for a decree witnesses in chief cannot be examined.

An administration suit was instituted, by a party interested in the testator's estate, against the two executors and against other parties interested. The executors alone were required to answer the bill. They put in separate answers. The plaintiff served the defendants with a notice of motion for a decree, and he added to it a notice that he should cross-examine the executors on their answers, and also that he should examine witnesses in chief.

The executors, when before the examiner, objected that the plaintiff had no right to examine them upon their answers. They also insisted that he had no right to examine witnesses in chief.

The examiner certified these objections to the Court.

Mr. Waller, for the plaintiff, insisted that the plaintiff had a right to cross-examine the executors on their answers—Wightman v. Whiddon (1).

Mr. Smythe and Mr. Surrage, for the executors.—The plaintiff cannot examine the executors on their answers: it would be evidence against the executors and against all the other defendants. The plaintiff must confine himself to the examination in chief. The case cited had reference to an application for an injunction, and not to a motion for a decree.

(2) 4 Ves. 45.

(1) 23 Beav. 397.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The plaintiff is entitled to cross-examine the defendants on their answers. If it is intended to use the answer of one defendant or the evidence taken on his cross-examination upon it against other defendants, those defendants must have liberty to cross-examine him upon it. The order, therefore, must be made without prejudice to the right of such of the defendants as are not to be cross-examined to object that the evidence taken on such cross-examination ought not to be used against them. The plaintiff is not entitled to examine witnesses in chief, Costs—Set-off.

An order was made against the plaintiff for payment of the costs of an application for an injunction, and execution was issued upon failure of payment by the plaintiff, but no return had been made to the writ. The defendants were subsequently ordered to pay the costs of an application to dismiss the plaintiff's bill. An appeal by the plaintiff against the first decision of the Court was still pending. The defendants moved to set off their costs against those ordered to be paid by the plaintiff. The motion was granted, upon the defendants undertaking not to levy for more than the balance; and as the defendants had not applied for a set-off when the order was made against them, no costs as to this application were given on either side.

On the 21st of July 1858, the plaintiff in this case moved for an injunction to restrain the defendants, the Metropolitan Saloon Omnibus Company, from issuing certain debentures alleged to be contrary to the powers of their act of parliament. The Court, upon that motion, refused the injunction, and ordered the plaintiff to pay the costs, which amounted, upon taxation, to about 81*l*. The defendants, being unable to obtain payment of these costs, issued process against the plaintiff in respect of such costs, but the sheriff had as yet made no return to the writ. The decision, upon the application for an injunction, was appealed against to the Lords Justices; who differed in their opinion, and the decision of this Court was therefore confirmed. The plaintiff then appealed to the House of Lords, and that appeal was still pending. On the 25th of March last the defendants moved to dismiss the plaintiff's bill, for want of prosecution, but that motion was refused, with costs; the costs amounting to about 21*l*. A motion was now made on behalf of the defendants that they might be at liberty to set off the costs ordered to be paid by them on the 25th of March, against the costs ordered to be paid by the plaintiff to them under the order of the 21st of July 1858.

Mr. Hastings, in support of the motion, submitted that the defendants were entitled to set off their costs against the plaintiff's costs, and cited—

Mr. Glasse, for the plaintiff, contended that the special circumstances of this case would preclude the defendants from the right to a set-off. The defendants had already issued process against the plaintiff in respect of these costs, and no return had yet been made, and there was an appeal still pending; therefore the time had not yet arrived for dealing with the costs. Moreover, the defendants ought to have asked for a set-off at the time when the order for costs was made against them; and even if they now succeeded, they ought to pay the costs of this application.

Mr. Hastings was heard in reply.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—It appears in this case that an order was made for payment of costs by the plaintiff in July 1858, and up to this time nothing has been paid by him, but it does not follow that nothing will be obtained upon the execution of the writ. If the writ had not been issued, or if a return of nulla bona had been made, then there would have been no difficulty; but I cannot assume that such a return will be made. The pendency of an appeal is no ground for refusing a motion of this nature, nor does it prevent the execution of the writ, no special order to that effect having been made by the Court of Appeal. I think, under the circumstances, the defendants are entitled to set off the costs they have been ordered to pay to the plaintiff against those ordered to be paid by the plaintiff, and should give an undertaking not to levy for more than 60*l.*, being the difference after the set-off. As to the costs of this application, I should infer from the language of the Master of the Rolls, in Cattell v. Simons, that he considered it right to order the person against whom the application for a set-off was made, to pay the costs of the motion; but I do not think that course consistent with justice. On the other hand, it does not appear to me to be right that the party against whom the application is made should have his costs; and considering that the defendants ought to have applied to set off their costs when the order was made against them, I shall grant the present application without costs on either side.

divide the net profits of the straw department of the defendant's business from the 25th of December 1857 until the winding up of the said department? secondly, in case the aforesaid question should be answered in the affirmative, then, whether the said agreement provided for the calculation and ascertainment of the said net profits; and, if so, in what manner were the said net profits to be calculated and ascertained? thirdly, in case the first question should be answered in the affirmative, then, whether the said agreement was to divide in the proportion of one-half of the said profits to the plaintiff and one-half to the defendant's firm?

The motion was supported by an affidavit of the plaintiff's solicitor, that he believed the questions were such as ought to be tried by a jury, and by the answers and affidavits in the cause; and it was now asked that a day might be fixed for the trial of the said questions of fact, and that an order might be made for the sheriff to summon a common jury for such trial, or that such other order might be made as to the Court should seem fit.

Practice—Trial of Question of Fact by a Jury—21 & 22 Vict. c. 27.

A cause being ready for hearing upon bill and answer and affidavits, a preliminary motion was made under the statute 21 & 22 Vict. c. 27, that a jury might be summoned to try certain disputed questions of fact:—Held, in conformity with a decision of the Master of the Rolls, that the act was only intended to apply to cases in which, under the old practice, an issue would have been directed at the hearing.

This was a bill for taking the accounts of a partnership. The answer had been put in, and evidence had been gone into upon affidavit, and the cause was set down for hearing. A motion was now made on behalf of the plaintiff, under the act, 21 & 22 Vict. c. 27, that the following questions of fact arising in the cause might be tried by a common jury before the Court:—first, whether there was any agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant to

Mr. Higgins, in support of the motion, contended that it was competent for the Court to make an order of this nature at any period of the suit. The 3rd section of the act made it lawful for the Court to "cause any question of fact arising in any suit or proceedings to be tried by a special or common jury before the Court itself." It had been held, in the case of George v. Whitmore (1), that such an order could only be made after the cause shall have come on for hearing; but this never could have been the intention of the act, for if that was to be the practice the cause would have to be tried twice over, first upon affidavit, and then upon voir dire evidence before a jury. The act provided that the question of fact should be reduced into writing, in such form as the Court should direct, and the Court would be able to settle the terms of the issue by looking at the evidence which had been taken upon affidavit without hearing the cause throughout. It was evident that the act intended that the Court should be at liberty to direct a trial by jury at any stage of the cause on a preliminary motion, for otherwise the utility of the act would be completely neutralized. The affidavits in this case shewed that the evidence was contradictory upon matters of fact; and under the old practice this was a case in which an issue would have been directed, and therefore it was a proper case for a jury to be summoned under the act.

Mr. Baily and Mr. Martindale appeared for the defendant, but were not called upon to address the Court.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—The words of the act would, no doubt, appear to favour the plaintiff's construction; but the point has already been decided by the Master of the Rolls in the case of George v. Whitmore, and in that decision I entirely agree. My opinion is, that the act was only intended to apply to cases in which under the old practice an issue upon a matter of fact might have been directed either at the hearing or upon an interlocutory application, otherwise the Court might be called upon to go into the whole of the evidence merely for the purpose of deciding whether there is a question proper to be referred to a jury, and what that question is to be. Without hearing all the evidence taken in the cause, the Court cannot ascertain that question so as to exercise its discretion under the act. Agreeing as I do with the decision of the Master of the Rolls, I must dismiss this motion with costs.

Probate Duty—Confirmation of Will in Scotland—Statute 21 & 22 Vict. c. 56.—Domicil—Jurisdiction.

Where a testator died domiciled in Scotland, and entitled to property in Scotland, and also to a fund standing in this court, and his executor, after the passing of the statute 21 & 22 Vict. c. 56, obtained a grant of confirmation of the testator's will in Scotland, which he afterwards got sealed under the statute in England,—Held, that this Court had no jurisdiction to question the scale at which the probate duty upon the fund in court had been assessed by the Scotch Commissary Court.

This was a question arising out of the new act (21 & 22 Vict. c. 56), extending the effect of probates in England and Ireland, and confirmations of wills in Scotland, over all parts of the United Kingdom.

The act, section 9, gives power in the case of a person dying domiciled in Scotland, and having assets in England or Ireland as well as in Scotland, to the Commissary Court of Scotland, to grant confirmation to his executors, which shall extend over all his effects, in whatever part of the United Kingdom they may be situated; and the executors in Scotland are to make an inventory of all his assets in all parts of the United Kingdom, and to pay the probate duty on all.

The 12th and 13th sections then provide that the confirmation being produced in the Probate Courts of England or Ireland, and sealed, shall thenceforth have the effect of an English or Irish probate.

In the present case, the testator, William Booth, died, domiciled in Scotland, and entitled to property in Scotland, and to a reversionary interest in a fund in England, expectant on the death of a tenant for life.

The testator died in 1838; the tenant for life did not die until 1857; and the testator's executors did not obtain confirmation of his will until December 1858, after the passing of the new act.

They included in the inventory of the testator's assets the English fund which had just fallen into possession, and paid the duty upon it, calculated according to the Scotch law.

According to the custom of the Scotch Courts, the duty was calculated on the value of the reversion at the death of the testator, and was, therefore, very much less than the duty which would have been payable in England, where it is calculated on the value of the fund when it falls in.

Mr. Dickinson, in support of a petition by the executors, asked for payment to them of the fund which had been paid into court under the Trustees' Relief Act.

Mr. Hanson, for the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, claimed duty upon the fund calculated, as was the custom in England, upon the value of the fund at the death of the tenant for life.

Mr. Dickinson, in reply, submitted that the amount of the duty had been settled by the Scotch Commissary Court, a Court of competent jurisdiction for that purpose, and that this Court would not disturb that settlement.

STUART, V.C. disclaimed any jurisdiction to decide the question; but, upon the parties expressing their desire to have, and consenting to be bound by, his decision upon it, his Honour observed that the grant of confirmation having been regularly obtained in Scotland, the grantee became absolutely entitled, under the recent statute, to have it sealed in England without further inquiry; the effect being to confer on him in England the same rights as if he had obtained probate in England. But if this Court were to sit in judgment on the regularity or irregularity of the grant in Scotland, the intention of the legislature in passing the act would be defeated, and the act itself rendered worse than useless. His opinion, therefore, was, that this Court was bound by the proceedings of the Scotch Commissary Court, and that no additional duty could be claimed.

Ship and Shipping—Expenses connected with Freight—Indemnity of Master—Pleading.

A, the master of a vessel, at the Mauritius, in April 1856, entered into a charter-party, under seal, therein describing himself as commander and owner, with the commissariat officer there, for the conveyance of troops to Gravesend, and paid certain monies and incurred liabilities for fitting up the vessel for the purpose. In the following month A. entered into another charter-party, not under seal, at the Cape of Good Hope, for the conveyance of other troops, and, thereupon, paid further sums and incurred further liabilities to enable him to perform the contract. In October, T, the owner, became bankrupt, having previously mortgaged the vessel to R. & F, who, upon its arrival in the Thames, seized it. The bills drawn by A. upon T, the owner, were dishonoured, and A. filed a bill against T's assignees and R. & F, praying a declaration that he was entitled to be repaid and indemnified out of the fund due from the Admiralty on account of the freight, and the Commissioners of the Admiralty paid the amount into court:—Held, by Wood, V.C., that A. was entitled to be reimbursed out of the fund; but, upon appeal to the Lord Chancellor, this decision was reversed.

The Court has not jurisdiction to declare an equitable right on behalf of the legal owner of property, without something on which the Court can act.

The plaintiff in this case was the master of the ship Kenilworth, of 580 tons, of which John Beckwith Towse was the sole owner, and the bill was filed for a declaration of his rights under the following circumstances:—

On the 19th of April 1856 the ship was lying in the harbour of Port Louis, in the Mauritius, and on that day a charter-party was concluded at Port Louis between the plaintiff (described as commander and owner of the ship) and Commissary General Laidley, the senior commissariat officer at the Mauritius, on behalf of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, for the conveyance of troops to Gravesend; and thereby, amongst other things, the plaintiff agreed to provide and issue to the troops and other persons embarked, during the time they were on board, sweet and wholesome provisions, according to a specified scale; the quality of which provisions was to be approved by a board of officers appointed to inspect them. The vessel was to be provided with a supply of provisions equal to twenty-four weeks' consumption, and the owner to find water in sufficient quantity, as well as fuel for the voyage; in consideration of which it was agreed that the plaintiff should be paid for the passage and accommodation (including victualling) of each officer 65*l.*, of each non-commissioned officer and private soldier 29*l.* 10*s.*, of each woman 25*l.*, and of each child of ten years and above 15*l.*; and the plaintiff engaged to put up, at the expense of the ship, such fittings, berths, tables, &c. as might be required for the men, women and children, the whole to be subject to the approval of the Deputy Quartermaster-General. It was further agreed that the payments should be made after the accounts were passed at the respective offices, by navy bills in the customary manner, but not before all government stores, &c. put on board had been accounted for, in failure of which the value of the deficiency was to be paid for or abated from the freight. For the due performance of this charter-party the plaintiff bound himself in the penalty of 100*l.*, and the document was signed and sealed by both the contracting parties.

To enable the plaintiff to comply with the charter-party, large quantities of provisions and other necessities were purchased and put on board at Port Louis; and other expenses were incurred previously to commencing the voyage, amounting altogether to 810*l.* 12*s.* 9*d.*, of which the plaintiff paid 64*l.* 17*s.* 2*d.* out of his own money, and drew bills for the residue upon the owner.

The ship sailed from Port Louis on the 19th of April 1856, and touched at the Cape of Good Hope, where, on the 27th of May, another charter-party, not under seal, was entered into between the plaintiff and John Nugent Macgregor, the acting naval storekeeper at the Cape, for the conveyance of other troops, women, children, baggage and stores, at the rate of 45*l.* for an officer, 19*l.* 15*s.* for each man, 15*l.* 10*s.* for each woman, and 10*l.* for each child; and it was stipulated that the vessel should be provided and fitted up according to the annexed Inspection Report, as to accommodation, ventilation, fumigation and all other requisites, at the expense of the vessel.

To enable the plaintiff to comply with the terms of this second charter-party, large quantities of provisions and other necessities were purchased and put on board, and other expenses were incurred, amounting to 700*l.* 15*s.* 1*d.*, of which the plaintiff paid 27*l.* 7*s.* 9*d.* out of his own money, and drew a bill upon Towse, the owner, for the residue.

On the 29th of October 1856 Towse became bankrupt, and the bills, on arriving at maturity, were dishonoured, and one of the indorsees commenced an action and recovered judgment against the plaintiff for the amount.

The defendants W. R. Robinson and John Fleming were mortgagees of the ship, under an indenture of mortgage, executed previously to the bankruptcy, and they gave notice of their claims to the Commissioners of the Admiralty, who, in consequence of such notice, and also of the refusal of the assignees in bankruptcy to authorize the payment to the plaintiff of the amount due under the charter-parties, refused to pay the amount of the freight until the right thereto should have been determined by a competent tribunal. The bill, therefore, was filed against the assignees in bankruptcy of Towse and the mortgagees; and it prayed that it might be declared that the plaintiff was entitled to be repaid, out of the monies so due from the Commissioners of the Admiralty, the sums paid by him out of pocket, and also to be indemnified out of the same monies against the amounts of the several bills, and all costs incurred by him in relation thereto; and that such indemnity might be made available for his protection in such a manner as to the Court should seem fit.

Mr. Rolt and Mr. Baggallay, for the plaintiff, were about to open the case, when—

Mr. Amphlett and Mr. E. Macnaghten objected that the Court had no jurisdiction to make such a declaration as was asked by the prayer. Notwithstanding the large words of the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86. s. 50, a bill for a declaratory order alone could not be maintained, unless the plaintiff was entitled to consequential relief—Jackson v. Turnley (1)

Wood, V.C. reserved his judgment upon the point, and the case was then argued upon the question whether the plaintiff was or was not entitled to a lien upon the freight for the expenses and liabilities incurred by him in pursuance of the charter-parties, in supplying provisions and fittings, and otherwise putting the ship in a condition to earn the freight.

Mr. G. M. Giffard appeared for the assignees in bankruptcy of Towse, the owner.

Wilkins v. Carmichael, Dougl. 101.

May 27.—Wood, V.C.—I have made up my mind as to the rights of the parties, but I feel great difficulty in determining anything, in consequence of the objections raised by Mr. Amphlett; and if they are not waived I do not know what I can do but let the cause stand over, with liberty for the plaintiff to take such proceedings as he may be advised. It strikes me there is no power in this Court to make any declaration without something upon which the Court can act. If the Court can act upon anything in the cause—if it has jurisdiction to act—it may waive acting, and may make the declaration; but if there is no jurisdiction to act I cannot make a mere declaration. I have turned over very carefully in my mind every way in which it was suggested that I could interfere by injunction; but what have I to enjoin the defendants from doing? I cannot enjoin them from asserting that they have the legal right to recover the fund. I am exceedingly sorry that I am driven to such a position as that, and I wish very much that the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty could be persuaded to pay the money into court in the suit. I have clearly made up my own mind as to the merits of the case, but I do not see my way to dealing with it, or how I can do more than say that the suit may stand over, with liberty for the plaintiff to take such proceedings as he may be advised for the recovery of the fund.

Mr. Baggallay.—I understand your Honour comes to the conclusion, that this Court has no power to declare an equitable right. What we ask is a declaration of an equitable right.

Wood, V.C.—I consider that I have not the power to declare an equitable right on behalf of the legal owner of the property.

Mr. Baggallay.—But where that legal owner cannot enforce his legal right.

Wood, V.C.—You see you can enforce it by petition of right, and that is the difficulty. If you like it, I will dismiss the bill, so that you may raise that question; or the cause may stand over, with liberty to you to take such proceedings as you may be advised, and liberty to either party to apply.

Ultimately it was arranged that the cause should stand over until the 29th of May, for the plaintiff to consider what course he would adopt.

May 29.—Mr. Rolt mentioned that the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty had consented to pay the money into court, with the leave of the Court, and the cause was ordered to stand over, with liberty for them to do so. This having been done accordingly, on

Dec. 21, Wood, V.C. delivered judgment as follows.—The case that arose upon this bill was a question as to the right of Mr. Bristow, the master of a ship called The Kenilworth, to be recouped certain sums which he had advanced in performance specifically of the contracts entered into by him, on behalf of the owners, with the agent of the Commissioners of the Admiralty for the Mauritius, for the transport of troops, he having entered into two contracts, one at the Mauritius and the other at the Cape. One contract, which is under seal, is an instrument in which he describes himself, somewhat incorrectly, as the master and owner of the vessel. That contract is dated the 19th of April 1856. The other contract is dated the 27th of May. It is not under seal, but a mere memorandum of agreement between the agent of the Admiralty and Mr. Bristow, therein described as the master of the ship.—[His Honour stated the effect of the two contracts and the facts of the case as above detailed, and proceeded as follows:—]—Those two being the contracts, what happened was this. The master himself found some money for the purpose of making those fittings which are specifically mentioned in the contract. The master, with respect to the provisioning of the vessel according to the terms of the contract, drew bills on the owner, Mr. Towse, two of which bills were current at the time of the filing of this bill; and, in the mean time, Mr. Towse, in England, being in a state bordering on insolvency, makes an assignment to the two principal defendants, Mr. Robinson and Mr. Fleming; he makes a transfer of the ship prior to her arrival in England, and afterwards becomes bankrupt. There is also a Mr. Morice who had some claim or lien on the fund, but he raises no discussion on it, and the assignees of the bankrupt raise no question with regard to this freight; so that the whole question is between the plaintiff and the defendants Fleming and Robinson, who claim, under the assignment from Towse, an interest in the freight, on the ground that the ship passed to them, and they took possession of it as owners, claiming as mortgagees before the cargo was fully discharged; and, therefore, within the principle of the authorities, it is said that is time enough to arrest the freight, and make themselves masters of the freight. If it turned on that alone, I confess I should not think that I was justified in deciding against their claim, on the ground that some of the troops had been disembarked. The whole delivery of the troops does not seem to have taken place, and, on the evidence, it would appear to me as if they have brought themselves within those authorities which say that, in that position, they had made themselves masters of the ship so far as that would give them a title to the freight in question.

I have been looking through the authorities on the question, how far the master is or is not entitled under the very peculiar circumstances of this case to be repaid out of the freight these particular charges, which are charges contained in the contract itself, and which were, in fact, payments made in performance of the contract. As regards the general law, no doubt, by a number of cases, by degrees it has been settled that, in the first place, notwithstanding the Roman Law, and the law of almost every foreign country, does give to the master a power not only to hypothecate the ship by way of bottomry, or otherwise for the purpose of raising supplies, but gives him a lien for the expenditure he may have been put to in respect of the ship and its repairs, or any other matter which may be necessary and incidental to the due performance of the ship's voyage; our law does not adopt that view, and in Hussey v. Christie it was held, after considerable discussion on a case sent from the Court of Chancery, where a different view seemed to be held in some degree by the Lord Chancellor, that there was no such lien on the ship. In that case, however, the Court said, that as no opinion was asked as to the master's lien on the freight, they abstained from giving any. In a subsequent case of Smith v. Plummer, which is a leading case on the subject of the freight itself, it was decided by the Court that this lien could not be claimed by the master in respect of freight, and in respect of monies which had been advanced by him in order to put the ship into a condition in which she was able to obtain a charter-party. The circumstances of that case were these:—The ship required repairs before any charter-party could be obtained at all. One Mr. Thompson was the person abroad who lent the money to the master, the master drawing bills on the owners. Thompson also procured the charter-party. He was entitled by arrangement with the master to be paid a premium in respect of so procuring a charter-party, and for that premium and for the repairs necessary to bring the ship into a condition to obtain the charter-party the bills were given, and, under these circumstances, the Court held that there was no lien on the freight. There the question arose upon two sums of money: one the sum which was advanced under the circumstances I have described, and the other a sum of 150*l.* which was paid to the captain by the consignees of the goods after notice that the freight was the property of another person, was paid by them in England, and was attempted to be supported by them as being an advance made for the current purposes of the ship. The judgment of Lord Ellenborough, which is very short, is this: He says, "The owner has, undoubtedly, the primary right to receive the freight and to sue the consignees of the goods for it; and whether the master has any right to receive the freight from them as against his owners will depend upon the question, whether he has any lien upon the freight. In the first place, he has no lien on the ship for his wages; then as to the advances made abroad, they may indeed constitute a debt due to him from the owners, but he has no lien for them. The case of Wilkins v. Carmichael decided that a captain of a ship has no lien on the ship for wages, stores, or repairs done in England, and Hussey v. Christie decides that he has none for money expended or debts incurred by him for repairs on the voyage. Then, if he has no lien on the ship, as appears from these cases, he can have none upon the freight, as the lien on the freight is consequential to the lien upon the ship; and here there is the additional circumstance, that it is not proved that these advances abroad were made for the current expenses of the ship. There is, therefore, in this case no pretence for the lien on the part of the master, through whom the defendant sets up this claim." So, again, Mr. Justice Abbott, as he then was, in speaking of the 150*l.*, says, "It is said that the advance of the 150*l.* to the master was made to enable him to defray the current expenses of the vessel; but it is not stated that these current expenses were actually paid by him, and for anything that appears, the owners might have furnished him with money for that purpose. It is not necessary to say what the law would be if the money had been advanced abroad, and had been actually applied to the expenses of the ship, for this takes place after the arrival of the ship in the river Thames; and it is quite sufficient for the decision of the present case to say that an advance of money to enable the master to defray the current expenses in England cannot be considered as a part payment of freight to the owners by the consignees." I notice those observations, both of Lord Ellenborough, that there was no evidence that the advances were made for the current expenses abroad as regards the first portion of the case, and of Lord Tenterden, that clearly as to 150*l.* they were made for current expenses in England, if at all, and therefore there was no necessity justifying expenditure on the part of the master, as having a considerable bearing on the question now before me of the expenses incurred by the master, not in order to obtain a freight, nor merely for the current expenses after the freight had been obtained; but the position appears to me to be much higher, the money being actually advanced under the contract, and in fulfilment of it.

I have looked through numerous authorities cited by Mr. Amphlett, and other cases which his citation of those authorities enabled me to discover, but I do not find any case in which a precise determination has been come to as to what would be the position of the master borrowing money for the purpose of current expenses abroad. In this particular case there seems to be that which is different entirely from every one of the cases cited, and the difference is this: the expenses incurred by the master in the present case were entirely and simply in fulfilment of the contract which he had made on behalf of the owners. He contracts, on the part of the owners, to fit up a certain ship in a specified manner; it is not the general case of doing certain repairs to the ship in order that she may be able afterwards on a charter-party being made to earn a freight; and it is not the ordinary supply of wages to the crew while earning the freight under the charter-party; but it is a specific part of the charter-party in each of these cases, the charter under seal in the one case and the agreement in the other, that there should be certain fittings and certain provisions provided; and it is made a specific part of the contract that if the provisions are not according to a specified quality there is to be a deduction from the freight in that respect. It is the case of the master buying on behalf of the owners property which is to be paid for in express terms, according to the amount supplied; and the question then really is, simply, whether the person, whoever he be, whether the owner, or assignee by way of mortgage of the ship, or the person entitled to hold the freight, can claim all the benefit of the contract without fulfilling any part of it himself, but leaving the whole to be fulfilled by another. It seems to me that this is a case entirely different from all that have been cited. It is simply the case of a contract entered into by the master for the owners, performed by the master for the owners, and for whoever takes the freight. Qui sentit commodum sentire debet et onus. It is impossible to say that they can take the whole of the freight, not submitting to perform the very contract which has been entered into and performed on their part by the master in respect of the obligations that were entered into by the charter-party.

There is one remark to be made on one of the two instruments which, I think, would clearly entitle the master, independently of these considerations, but I have been unwilling to rest my judgment on that technical view, namely, that it is by deed. One of the charter-parties was made by the master treating himself as owner, and was made by deed. He binds himself under the penalty of 100% for the fulfilment of the contract; and it is quite clear as to that, that the owner could not himself sue for the freight, as he could under the charter-party merely effected on behalf of the ship by the master, in which case either the master or owner can sue. The owner if he chooses to sue can do so instead of the master; but as regards the contract under seal the master alone would be the person to sue, as is emphatically stated by Chief Justice Abbott in his work on Shipping, referring to Atkinson v. Cotesworth (2), where the contrary case existed, in which, the contract not being under seal, it was held that the owner could sue, but that it would have been different if the contract had been under seal. Now the master, if he were the person to sue, clearly on receiving this money, though he would receive it as a trustee of course for the owners, would be entitled, by way of set-off, to deduct all the monies which he had expended in earning the money in question. That, however, would not apply to the other contract, and I have had, therefore, to consider in both cases what was the right course to adopt.

As regards the other charter-party, it may be observed that the parties claiming by assignment, as the mortgagees do in this instance, the payment to them would be a good payment. Yet, there again, according to Morrison v. Parsons, the action would have to be brought in the name of the original owner or the original contractor, and could not be brought by the assignees in their own names; but it does not appear to me that that would make any difference in favour of the master. As regards that second instrument, therefore, I was bound to consider what the effect was on the whole of this contract as to the right of the master to say, I have fulfilled all the terms and conditions of this contract, and everybody who takes the freight is bound by those conditions; and I have come to the conclusion that the plaintiff is entitled to be repaid everything which he paid in the way of performance of the specific obligations entered into by that contract. That does not extend to the wages, as to which nothing is said by the bill, but the payments and liabilities for the fittings, and the payments and liabilities for the provisions of the ship.

The difficulty that arose when the case was before me originally, was one which I felt to be insuperable in point of law. The Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty had not paid the money and would not pay it, in consequence of a notice from Mr. Amphlett's clients of their claim. The money, therefore, was in a position in which neither party could get it, except by a petition of right. Then I was asked by the bill to make a declaration of the right, in order to guide the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty to a conclusion. There was no other relief whatever that could be given, and it did appear to me that notwithstanding the passages in the Chancery Amendment Act, which pointed to the Court making declarations, when declarations alone are necessary, still the cases in which this could be done must be cases in which there is otherwise jurisdiction in the Court, and in which some other operation is to take place than a mere declaration. In other words, it was not intended by that act of parliament that this Court should have a power of declaration, which has often been advocated as a desirable and necessary thing to be exercised by the Court, but which certainly at present it does not possess. Therefore I did not see any mode of giving relief to the plaintiff as matters then stood. Since that time, upon a suggestion I made at the hearing, the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty have paid the money into court, and the cause having stood over for that purpose, it appears to me that a portion of the costs should be paid to Mr. Amphlett's clients, the cause having been brought on prematurely in a state in which no decree could be made. It was no fault of those defendants that matters were not in that position, and if the plaintiff had not been able to procure the Commissioners to pay the money into court, the consequence must have been that the bill would have been dismissed, though, certainly, in such a case, without costs. I think, therefore, it will be proper to give Mr. Amphlett's clients all costs incurred since the day when the cause was in the paper before for judgment. The order which I now propose to make is this: the Lords Commissioners for executing the office of Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom having paid into the Bank of England, to the credit of this cause, the sum of 3,155*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.* in respect of the freight herein mentioned, declare, that the plaintiff F. Bristow is entitled as against all persons interested in the freight, contracted to be paid under or by virtue of the deed of the 19th of April 1856, and the agreement of the 27th of May 1856 respectively, to be indemnified out of the freight in respect of all payments and liabilities made and incurred by the plaintiff, in the fulfilment of the obligations specifically imposed by the said contracts respectively, on the owners of the vessel, as to the fitting and provisioning of the said ship, and also in respect of the costs of this suit. Then inquire what payments have been made or liabilities incurred by the plaintiff in respect of such fittings and provisions. Tax the costs of the plaintiff up to and including the 27th of May 1858, the day on which the cause was ordered to stand over, and also the costs of prosecuting the said inquiry and carrying the directions hereby given into effect; and also including the sum of 78*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.* paid in respect of brokerage; and also tax the costs of the defendants Robinson and Fleming since the 27th of May 1858, up to and including this hearing. And let the plaintiff pay to them the amount of their costs when so taxed, and let out of the said sum of 3,155*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.*, the amount which in prosecuting the inquiry hereinbefore directed shall be certified to have been paid by the said plaintiff, and which he is liable to pay, be paid to the plaintiff; and let thereout also the amount of the said taxed costs of the plaintiff be paid, &c.; and let the residue of the said cash be paid to the defendants Robinson and Fleming. Liberty to apply.

Mr. Rolt and Mr. Baggallay appeared for the plaintiff, the respondent.

Mr. Amphlett and Mr. E. Macnaghten, for the appellants.

Gladstone v. Birley, 2 Mer. 401.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—The question in this case is, whether the master of a vessel has any equitable right to indemnity out of the freight in respect of advances made and bills of exchange drawn by him for the purpose of enabling him to adapt the vessel to the specific performance of two charter-parties, which he entered into with the Commissioners of the Admiralty, at the Mauritius and the Cape of Good Hope; the former being under seal and the latter not under seal.

The bill was filed praying that it might be declared that the plaintiff is entitled to be repaid out of the monies due from the Commissioners of the Admiralty, the sums of 64*l.* 17*s.* 2*d.* and 27*l.* 7*s.* 9*d.*, and also to be indemnified out of the said monies against the amount of the several bills, and against all claims and demands whatsoever which have been or may be made upon him, by reason or on account of such bills, or any of them, and against all costs and expenses which have been or may be incurred or sustained by him in relation thereto.

Upon the case coming on to be heard before Vice Chancellor Wood, his Honour was of opinion that he had no jurisdiction under the 50th section of the act of the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, or otherwise, to make a declaration of right, unless it were one upon which the Court could act by granting consequential relief, and he decided that he had no jurisdiction to entertain the suit, unless the Commissioners of the Admiralty would consent to pay the fund into court. This was afterwards done, and on the final hearing in court the Vice Chancellor pronounced a decree, by which he declared that the plaintiff was entitled to be indemnified out of the freight in respect of all payments and liabilities made and incurred by the plaintiff in fulfilment of the obligations specifically imposed by the said contracts respectively, on the owners of the vessel, as to the fittings and provisions of the said ship, and also in respect of the suit. Against this decree the petition of appeal was presented.

[After stating the circumstances of the case his Lordship continued:—] In determining what are the equitable rights of the master (if any) under the circumstances, it will be necessary, first, to ascertain how the matter would have stood at law. No question has been raised as to the authority of the master to bind the owner by the charter-parties, upon the ground that they are contracts not relating to the usual employment of the vessel; it must, therefore, be assumed that the master had full authority to enter into them. It has been long settled that the master of a vessel has no lien upon the ship or the freight for money which he may have expended or liabilities which he may have incurred for the repairs of the ship or for stores supplied to her, or for wages which he has paid, or for other disbursements which he has made during the voyage. This was determined as to the ship by the case of Hussey v. Christie and others, and as to the freight by the case of Smith v. Plummer. The law upon this subject having been established by those and other decisions, it appears to be a superfluous task to inquire into the reasons which have occasioned the difference between the rule which prevails in this country, and that of most other foreign countries in this respect.

It may have been partly owing to the technical nature of our law of lien, which requires that there should be possession of the property upon which it attaches to enable a party to enforce it. But the master is only the servant of the owner, and therefore cannot, as against him, have any possession of the ship or the freight. He may, on behalf of the owner, detain the goods of a consignee, i. e., assert a lien upon them until the freight is paid; but this is a very different thing from converting a possession of ship or freight in his character of agent for the owner into an independent possession of his own to enforce his rights against the owner. Our law may also have proceeded upon a view of the inconvenience which would result from allowing the master's lien, as the owner would be deprived of his ship and his freight until he had first settled all accounts with the master. But that which most recommends the general rule is, the power which the master has of pledging the credit of the owner, or of hypothecating the vessel for necessary repairs and disbursements, or, according to the case of Stainbank v. Shepard, of doing both, provided the personal credit of the owner is pledged, and the hypothecation of the ship is made by separate and distinct instruments. If, therefore, the master chooses to make advances himself, and he finds that he has no lien for them, he has no right to complain, because, as Mr. Justice Bayley says in Smith v. Plummer, it was in his power, in order to protect himself against any loss from non-payment of wages, or for advances, &c. made by him abroad, to make a specific bargain with the owners and require security for the performance; and a similar remark is made by Lord Ellenborough, in Hussey v. Christie. "If," he says, "the necessary repairs be done abroad, the master may hypothecate the ship for them, and it is his own fault if he subject himself to any personal liability, which he may renounce." Cases may easily be suggested in which it would be extremely hard upon the master that he should not have the power of satisfying himself for advances which he has made, by means of a lien, was here his personal expenditure has been bestowed upon matters of absolute necessity from an utter inability to obtain money, either by pledging his owner's credit or by hypothecation. But the convenience of the general rule, which excludes a lien by the exercise of which the master might detain a vessel or withhold the freight until a general settlement of his accounts with the owner, more than compensates for an inconvenience or hardship which it may produce in a few cases, especially as is observed by Mr. Justice Bayley, in Smith v. Plummer, "If any hardship arise to the master from this, it is owing to his having made an imperfect bargain with his owners." It was contended, on the part of the plaintiff, that, in the case of Smith v. Plummer, the question of a lien for the current expenses of the vessel was left open by both Lord Ellenborough and Mr. Justice Abbott. With respect to the former, I do not think that the mistake imputed to the report, by Mr. Amphlett, sufficiently appears; although, if the judgment be read as it stands, his Lordship seems to have omitted all mention of the 150*l.*, which was claimed as a distinct deduction by the defendants, as a part payment of the freight. He had already stated his opinion that for the advances made abroad the master had no lien. But it had been observed in argument that it was not even shewn that the money advanced was necessary for the ship's disbursements, and, for anything that appeared, it might have been advanced to the master to pay his own wages. This Lord Ellenborough adopts, and, after observing that there was no lien either upon the ship or the freight, he adds, "And here there is the additional circumstance, that it is not proved that these advances abroad were made for the current expenses of the ship." As if he had said, "I have already stated that there is no lien generally, but in this case the possibility of lien is excluded by the absence of proof that the advances were for current expenses." Mr. Justice Abbott, in speaking of the current expenses, is dealing with the advance of 150*l.* to the master, which the defendants, the consignees, claimed as a part payment of the freight, as it was made to enable him to defray the current expenses of the vessel. This was wholly distinct from the question of the lien by the master, of which he had previously disposed. It is difficult to consider the question of a lien for the current expenses of a vessel to be still undetermined when it has been decided that the master has no lien for disbursements for the vessel, unless some distinction can be suggested between "current expenses" and "disbursements," which I am unable to perceive. I asked during the argument whether there was any case to be found in which, upon the general law on the subject, a master had been allowed to have a lien upon ship or freight for an outlay of any description made by him for the purposes of the voyage, and I received for answer that there was none. But it was contended for the plaintiff, that there was a peculiarity in this case which distinguished it from others which were mentioned in the course of the argument; that the money laid out and the liability incurred by the master was only useful for the earning of the particular freight; that it was a necessary expenditure according to the stipulations of the charter-parties to enable the freight to be earned, and might be therefore regarded as an outlay upon the freight itself. Some doubt was expressed in the course of the argument whether the master could have hypothecated the vessel in order to obtain the means of providing the fittings and the other requisites for the particular voyage.

But, if the engagement was not foreign to the usual employment of the vessel (which appears to have been taken for granted), and the master had therefore authority to bind his owner by the charter-parties, I see no reason for thinking that he might not have hypothecated the vessel to provide for things incident and necessary for the due performance of the contract just as he might to enable him to do the necessary repairs to render the vessel seaworthy for the voyage, without which the contract would be equally incapable of performance. I have endeavoured in vain to comprehend the distinction which has been pressed upon me between things which are necessary to adapt a vessel to the particular voyage for which she is engaged, and those which are not peculiar to any one voyage, but which are common to all, such as the repairs of the vessel and the provisioning of the crew. All alike are essential to the due performance of the contract, all are equally an expenditure to enable the freight to be earned ; without them, in all cases, the particular voyage could not be performed, and as the freight cannot become due until the determination of the voyage, they may all be similarly regarded as an outlay upon the freight. I think, therefore, that there is nothing peculiar to this case to remove it from the reach of the authorities which have refused a lien to the master of a vessel for advances made by him for the purposes of the voyage. It is contended, however, that there must, at least, be a difference in this case between the two charter-parties as to the right of the master ; and that, although in the one not under seal the owner might have sued in his own name, according to the cases of Higgins v. Senior and Beckham v. Drake, yet, upon the contract under seal, the action could only be brought in the name of the master. It is quite true that in either case the master might have sued in his own name if the owner had not interposed, and that, with respect to the charter-party under seal, the owner would have been entitled to have brought his action in the name of the master upon indemnifying him against the costs. If the master had brought the action and had recovered and received the freight, he might have paid himself the advances out of it ; for the owner could have obtained the money from him at law only by an action for money had and received, in which the master might have set off the money he had advanced, but he would have obtained no indemnity against his liability on the bills. I do not see what equitable rights the plaintiff has beyond those which he would have had at law. The mortgagees would clearly have been entitled to receive the whole of the freight without being bound to pay the master for the advances which he made, for which the owner alone is personally liable, and of course they could not have been compelled to indemnify the plaintiff from his liability on the bills. I do not think that the mere payment of the freight into court, under the circumstances, by the Commissioners of the Admiralty can give the Court a right to deal with it as against the defendants, the mortgagees. They are not making any claim to it or applying for any relief, but are merely defending themselves in a suit which, when originally brought, the Court had no jurisdiction to entertain. The mortgagees are, in my opinion, entitled to the whole of the freight, without any deduction. They are willing, as I understand, to pay to the plaintiff the money which he has actually disbursed, and they ask for no costs against him in the suit. I think that I am bound to declare that the defendants Robinson and Fleming are entitled to the whole sum of 3,155*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.* standing in the bank to the credit of the cause, and to order it to be paid out to them accordingly.

March 16.} CALDWELL v. ERNEST.

Company, Suit by—Winding up—Official Manager—Substituted Plaintiff—Costs.

The trustees of a freehold land society instituted a suit against the defendant, and pending the proceedings the society became insolvent, and a winding-up order having been obtained, the official manager was substituted as plaintiff by an order of court ; but he was refused leave, by the Court making the winding-up order, to prosecute the suit. Upon a motion by the official manager to the court, which had substituted him as plaintiff, asking that the suit might be stayed on terms, or that some order might be made for its future prosecution:—Held, that insolvency was no ground for staying a suit or preventing its being dismissed, and that the official manager must pay the costs of the motion personally.

The bill in this case was filed, on the 17th of February 1858, by the trustees of the Home Counties Metropolitan Freehold Land Society against Henry Ernest, for the specific performance of an agreement to take certain allotments of land. The defendant put in a voluntary answer on the 13th of May 1858, and a replication was filed on the 3rd of November 1858. On the 13th of November Wood, V.C. made an order to wind up the company, and on the 1st of December 1858 Mr. Caldwell was appointed the official manager. On the 31st of January 1859 an order ex parte was made at the Rolls, under the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 45. s. 53. (the Winding-up Act), substituting the official manager as plaintiff in the suit, and directing him to prosecute the same as nominal plaintiff for and on behalf of the society. The official manager subsequently applied to the chief clerk of Wood, V.C., where the order for winding up was being prosecuted, and he refused to authorize him to take any step in the suit. On the 16th of March a motion was made by the official manager before the Master of the Rolls, that, notwithstanding the order of the 31st of January 1859, the further prosecution of the suit might be stayed on such terms as the Court should think fit, or that such order might be made for prosecuting the suit as might be just.

Mr. Beavan, in support of the motion, referred to the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 45. s. 53, declaring that it should be lawful for the official manager to prosecute suits against third parties. It was necessary that some step should be taken, as the defendant, under the 117th General Order of 1845, might move to dismiss the bill, as upon the merits, and this would effectually prevent any further proceedings being taken against him.

Mr. Selwyn and Mr. Speed, for the defendant.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The official manager must prosecute the suit with the sanction of the Court, or he must abandon it altogether. A suit could not be stayed merely because the plaintiff had become insolvent. If the plaintiff omits to prosecute the suit the defendant has a right to ask that the bill may be dismissed, that he may be relieved from the proceedings. This motion must, therefore, be refused, with costs.

Mr. Speed.—As the motion is made by the official manager as plaintiff, he must answer the costs personally.

Mr. Selwyn.—The question was decided in The Official Manager of the Grand Trunk Railway Company v. Brodie (1).

Mr. Beavan.—The official manager ought not to be restricted in seeking the advice of the Court. This would be the effect if he were personally made liable for costs.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I must make the order. He must answer the costs of this application personally.

May 31. } CALDWELL v. ERNEST.

Company—Winding up—Official Manager—Costs—Liability to pay.

An official manager appointed under an order made to wind up a company was by an order of course substituted as plaintiff in a suit instituted by the trustees of the company. He applied to the Court asking either that the suit might be stayed or that direction might be given for its prosecution. The application was refused, and he was ordered to pay the costs personally. Upon a motion by the defendant, which was served on the original plaintiffs and on the official manager,—Held, that the bill must be dismissed with costs.

Held, also, that the application made by the official manager was not an adoption of the suit, and that he was not personally liable to pay the costs, but that they must be paid by the original plaintiffs.

(1) 9 Hare, 823; s. c. 3 De Gex, M. & G. 146; 22 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 514.

On the 4th of May, the defendant served a notice of motion upon the official manager and on the original plaintiffs, asking that the bill might be dismissed and that the costs might be paid by the official manager personally.

The official manager had no funds in hand, and no list of contributories had been made out.

Mr. Selwyn and Mr. Speed, in support of the motion.—The official manager by moving to stay proceedings adopted the suit and made himself liable to the costs personally; he ought not to have done any act without the sanction of the Court.—

11 & 12 Vict. c. 45. s. 60.

The Official Manager of the Grand Trunk Railway v. Brodie, 9 Hare, 823; s. c. 3 De Gex, M. & G. 146; 22 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 514.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Beavan, for the official manager, were not called upon.

The original plaintiffs, though served with the notice of motion, did not appear.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—If the official manager takes no step in a cause, if he repudiates it, the mere fact of his being substituted as plaintiff for the original plaintiffs does not make him personally liable to the payment of costs. Were it otherwise, the effect of substituting the name of the official manager for the original plaintiffs would be to transfer the liability to pay costs from the shoulders of the plaintiffs to the official manager, to be paid by him personally on the authority of the case referred to, and to be recovered over by him under the winding-up order as best he could. The question here is, whether the costs of the official manager are such as to bring him within the case cited. All that he has done has been to move that the further prosecution of the suit might be stayed on such terms as the Court might think fit, or that such order might be made in relation to the further prosecution of the suit as might be just: the meaning of this is, that the official manager declines to proceed with the suit;—that he repudiates it unless the Court shall think fit to direct him to proceed and specify the terms on which he is to proceed. I dismissed that motion with costs. So far as it goes, that amounts to a prohibition to the official manager to proceed, and I am of opinion that he is not liable to the costs of the suit. The original plaintiffs, though served, have not appeared. The defendant, as against them, is entitled to the usual order for costs, and he must obtain them under the winding-up order against the company.

March 1, 2, 23;
Nov. 19.

Partnership—Shares—Mutual Agreement to purchase—Refusal on Death.

A surgeon sold a share of his business, and took the purchaser into partnership. The articles specified that the partnership was for such term as they should mutually agree, and that in case of death, absence or incapacity of either of the partners the survivor should have the right of purchasing his share at two years' value, or, in case of dispute, at a price to be named by valuers; but in case he should decline to purchase such share, then that it might be sold to any person willing to purchase. The purchaser died fifteen months after the date of the articles; and on his death the surviving partner refused either to purchase his deceased partner's share, or to admit any other person to be a partner with him:—Held, that the surviving partner could not repudiate the articles; and that his refusal to purchase the deceased partner's share, or to admit a new partner in his place, left the surviving partner liable to reimburse the value of the deceased partner's share, and also, in the mean time, to account for the accrued profits.

James William Turner for many years carried on the profession and practice of a surgeon, at Kensington. In January 1856 he agreed to sell one-fifth part of such practice to Edwin Hooker Marsh for two years' purchase, to be computed on the receipts of the previous year, which, upon an investigation of the books, was considered to be worth 800*l*.

By an indenture, dated the 1st of January 1856, after reciting the agreement, Messrs. Turner and Marsh agreed to become partners as surgeons from the date thereof for such term and time as they should mutually agree so to continue partners. It also provided that the instruments, implements, and the fixtures, stock and effects, used in the said business should remain and continue vested in, and be the sole and separate property of Mr. Turner, subject, nevertheless, to be applied and used by the said partners at all times during the co-partnership for the purposes thereof. It then provided, "that if during the said co-partnership either of the said parties shall die or be absent for the space of six consecutive calendar months, or become incapacitated from fulfilling the contract or agreement hereinbefore contained on his part, it shall be deemed and taken to be a retirement from the co-partnership business and practice by and on the part of such absent or incapacitated partner, and a dissolution of such co-partnership, as if the same had happened by or through the death of such last-mentioned partner; and then and in either of the said cases which shall first happen it shall be lawful for the surviving or continuing partner, and he shall have the right of pre-emption accordingly of purchasing the share and interest of such dying or retiring partner of and in the co-partnership business and practice, at and after the rate of two years' purchase for the same, to be calculated upon the gross receipts for the previous year of the co-partnership, ending on the 25th of December then preceding; and also all his estate and interest (if any) in the messuage and premises wherein or whereon the business or practice shall for the time being be carried on, and in the stock, fixtures, implements and things then belonging to or used in the said business or practice, for such price or sum at which the same shall be valued or appraised by two indifferent persons, one to be named on each side; or in case of neglect or refusal by either party to name such valuer or appraiser, then both to be named by the other of them, and such referees shall choose an umpire before entering on such valuations in the ordinary or usual way in case they should differ thereon; and that such surviving or continuing partner shall be allowed and entitled to the space or time of twelve calendar months for paying or discharging the amount of such purchase, upon his giving and entering into a bond, with sufficient surety for the due payment of the said monies aggregately, with interest, at the expiration of such twelve calendar months accordingly; or in case such surviving or continuing partner shall decline to purchase the share and interest of and in the said partnership business and effects of the said partner so dying or retiring therefrom, then and in such case such share and interest of and in the said co-partnership business shall or may be sold and disposed of to any other person who may be willing or desirous to purchase the same."

E. H. Marsh died on the 20th of March 1857; and letters of administration to his estate and effects were granted to the plaintiff, Jane Featherstonhaugh, who was a specialty creditor for 400*l*., lent to enable Mr. Marsh to purchase the one-fifth share of the business.

Mr. Turner refused either to purchase Mr. Marsh's share in the business, or, in case it should be sold, to admit any other person to be a partner with him.

The plaintiff therefore filed this bill against Mr. Turner, praying that the defendant might be restrained from excluding from the business any competent and qualified surgeon who might be willing to purchase the share and interest of E. H. Marsh in the partnership, or that the defendant might be directed to pay to the plaintiff, as such administratrix, a sum by way of compensation in the nature of unliquidated damages.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Macnaghten, for the plaintiff.—The partnership was entered into and the share purchased upon the mutual terms of each purchasing the other's interest on dissolution or death. The partnership was not to be dissolved even by death without a purchase. There was no accruing right even from death. Throughout the price was fixed at two years' value.

A partner might refuse to purchase, but still he was bound to allow a sale. He could not, by refusing to admit a purchaser, obtain an advantage for himself. He had no right to decide on his own personal contract, for his own personal advantage. He was bound either to pay the value, or answer in damages. A party who received a premium to take a person into partnership never could be allowed to determine it immediately afterwards. He must return, at the least, a portion of the consideration—

Buxton v. Lister, 3 Atk. 383.

Hercy v. Birch, 9 Ves. 357.

Crawshay v. Maule, 1 Swanst. 495.

Mr. Selwyn and Mr. Martindale, for the defendant.—The purchaser obtained all the advantages he contracted for, social position and income. The partnership was at will; it was determined by death. The plaintiff might sell the deceased's share in the business, but the articles did not compel the defendant to accept a partner, or prevent an immediate determination of the partnership. The accident which determined the partnership was common to both; it had fallen on Mr. Marsh, and the partnership had survived to the defendant. There was no ambiguity in the contract; the plaintiff had nothing to sell. The Court could not extend the duration of the partnership or limit a time to which it should extend. It cannot give value to nothing: it cannot sell a shadow, or enlarge the interest of Mr. Marsh merely because he had a chance of survivorship. If any right existed under the articles, it was infinitesimal:—

Mr. R. Palmer, in reply.

March 23.—The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.
—The defendant refuses to buy Mr.

Marsh's share in the business, or to allow it to be sold. He insists, except as to one-fifth part of the outstanding debts due to the partnership at the decease of Mr. Marsh, that nothing is owing to his estate. I cannot accede to that construction of the clause in the articles of partnership; it would reduce it to a nullity. To save expense, I suggested the propriety of the parties leaving it to me to consider the sum which ought to be awarded in the shape of damages for any interest which Mr. Marsh might have had in the partnership. I expressed a doubt whether, by the mutual submission of the parties, it was within the power of this Court to enter into a consideration of that question, but the defendant declines to submit to that course. He has a right to insist that the meaning of these words shall be expounded, and that the rights of the parties shall be declared and construed for the benefit of the surviving partner and the estate of the deceased. There is in the clause of pre-emption nothing compulsory on the surviving and continuing partner to purchase the share. It is difficult to construe, because the greater part of the profit of the business must arise from the professional skill and knowledge of the persons who conduct the principal part of the business; but, at the same time, if persons enter into a contract, a meaning and an effect must be given to it. It was argued that the clause had reference solely to the probability that the elder partner would die before the younger, and that it referred only to the event of Mr. Marsh surviving Mr. Turner. To come to that conclusion, the words "if during the said co-partnership either of the parties shall die" must be read "if during the continuance of the partnership W. Turner shall die"; but no such construction can be made or conclusion arrived at. The parties themselves had a meaning; they knew what was to be carried into effect. Very little of the stock, fixtures and implements, probably none at all, belonged to Mr. Marsh. So far, then, the clause of the partnership articles was in abeyance: it could not apply to any property of Mr. Marsh at that time upon the premises; it could apply only to the property that Mr. Turner had. Yet in the progress of the partnership those circumstances might be altered. The clause, however, applies to both the partners, on the event occurring in either case, and it must be so considered. What it would have been in the event of Mr. Turner dying, and Mr. Marsh being the survivor, is only necessary to mention for the purpose of shewing that the same course would have been taken then as must be taken now. But then Mr. Turner declines to purchase, so that I have to consider the effect of the words, "Or in case such surviving or continuing partner shall decline to purchase the share and interest of and in the said co-partnership business and effects of the partner so dying or retiring therefrom, then and in such case such share and interest of and in the said partnership business shall or may be sold and disposed of to any other person who may be willing or desirous to purchase the same." It is difficult to arrive at a meaning, but still I must carry the words into effect; I must first endeavour to sell the share of the deceased partner. It is possible and highly probable that, unless Mr. Turner will give great facilities, it will be extremely difficult to carry any sale into effect. If, then, no facilities are given, will not this Court ascertain what was the interest of the deceased partner under these articles at the time of his decease, and fix a price upon it accordingly, and charge the continuing and surviving partner with that price? That is distinct from pre-emption, because if the surviving partner consented to buy the business, he was to do so at two years' purchase, to be calculated on the gross receipts of the business for the previous year; that is perfectly separate and distinct from ascertaining what the interest or value of the deceased partner was in the business. One of the greatest difficulties in considering this was, whether the interest of the deceased partner did not continue in the profits made by the firm subsequent to his death, and whether, in that event, he would not be entitled to a share of the profits up to the present time, and up to the time when the business was sold? and if so, the share of the profits would have to be calculated. In that case the Court would have to consider what was the amount of the net profits made by the concern (after making a liberal allowance and compensation to the surviving partner for his knowledge, trouble and occupation in carrying on the business), and then to divide it into fifths, and give one-fifth to the estate of the deceased partner. A great number of the words of the clause point in that direction; otherwise, as this is an interest in a surviving partner, what interest is there to sell if the deceased partner has no capital in the concern, that is to say, no interest in the utensils, goods, stock-in-trade, fixtures or implements with which the business is carried on, and, in addition, no connexion (persons brought to the concern by reason of Mr. Marsh being a partner)? If he has none of these, it is not without difficulty that he can be said to have a continuing interest in the business.

The clause is made applicable to events contemplated between the parties when they entered into the partnership, and "absence, incapacity and death" are to be treated in the same way. It follows, therefore, that death must be considered as a dissolution of the partnership, and yet the interest of the surviving or continuing partner is to be sold. I cannot, therefore, as at first inclined, treat this as a continuing partnership, except so far as there were any goods, &c., or any connexions brought to the business by the deceased. What I propose to do is, to refer it to chambers, to sell the share of Mr. Marsh in the business, and to settle and consider the conditions of sale necessary for that purpose; I shall then ascertain the course which the defendant intends to take. If he shall, as he may, interpose any obstruction, so as to deter any person from giving an adequate sum to join the partnership in consequence of an apparent prospect of dissension and trouble, I shall in that event ascertain what the interest of the deceased partner in the business was; and if it shall appear that such interest cannot be sold, there must be an inquiry whether any of the stock, &c. belonged to Mr. Marsh, and whether he had been the means of introducing any patients or customers; and if it shall appear that there were any, and that any profits have been made, then ascertain how much of the profits since made have arisen from such customers. I shall then reserve further consideration of the case, and the costs of the suit.

Mr. Selwyn.—The defendant asks for a decree of the Court. He will as far as possible abide by it, but he will not do what he is not legally compelled to do. In the absence, therefore, of an express decision he will say to any professional gentleman inquiring for a partnership, there is nothing to sell; but assuming you buy a partnership, I have an immediate power of dissolving it.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—That is not my view of the case. When Mr. Marsh purchased a share in the partnership for 800*l.*, it was not in the power of Mr. Turner to dissolve it the next day and keep the money. The Court would have interfered and compelled him to repay it. The contract was, that in case Mr. Marsh should die, his representative, or in case of retirement or incapacity, he himself should have the power of putting a medical man properly qualified in the position in which he was himself. I am unable to give relief in the shape of damages. The difficulty, therefore, is, the uncertainty as to the course Mr. Turner will pursue; if he will not admit a partner, the value of Mr. Marsh's interest must be ascertained, and every source from which profit might have arisen must be included in the computation, and after a liberal allowance to the defendant for his time and knowledge expended in the realization of profit since the death of Mr. Marsh, the defendant must be charged with the amount. There may be difficulty in carrying the decree into effect, but that must not prevent its being made.

The defendant having declined to purchase the share and interest of E. H. Marsh in the co-partnership business, let it be sold; and let the conditions of sale be settled by the Judge; and in case no bond fide sale of such share and interest can be effected, then Inquire what such share and interest of E. H. Marsh was in such co-partnership business at the time of his death. And it being admitted by the plaintiff that there were no fixtures, goods, stock and things used in the said business which belonged to E. H. Marsh, let no inquiry be made as to this; but by reason of E. H. Marsh being a partner, and if so, whether any profits of the co-partnership business have been made since the death of E. H. Marsh properly attributable to or derived from such customers, and if so, take an account of such profits, and in taking such accounts all just allowances are to be made to the defendant; and let an account be taken of all dealings and transactions between E. H. Marsh and the defendant as co-partners.

The parties afterwards carried statements into the Chief Clerk's Office; and on the 29th of July 1858 he certified that the interest of E. H. Marsh in the business at the time of his death consisted of one-fifth of the net profits and gains which arose from the business; that no sale had been made, as the defendant declined to admit a purchaser as partner; that he had taken the accounts as set out in the schedule, and that a sum of 374*l.* 16*s.* 11*d.* was due from the defendant to the plaintiff.

The defendant took out a summons to vary the certificate, and it was adjourned into court.

Nov. 19.—Mr. Selwyn and Mr. Nindale, for the defendant. — The clerk has set no value on the share of deceased; he has assumed that two net receipts would be the purchasing price for what was valueless, and he has done this without making any allowance to the defendant for his skill and knowledge; by this he gave an interest to Mr. Marsh without his contributing anything towards it.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Macnaghten, for the plaintiff.—Is the principle upon which the account has been taken right? Everything must be presumed against the defendant; he chose neither to purchase the share, nor to allow it to be sold, but still he cannot be allowed to retain the value, which can only be ascertained by computations made on the receipts.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS refused the application to vary the certificate, with costs; and, on further directions, he made a decree that the defendant should pay to the plaintiff what was found due, with costs.

M.R. 1858. July 16.	}	JENKINS v. GREEN.

Lease—Reservation of Land by Quantity, not by Description—Right of Selection.

An agreement to let a farm less a stated number of acres will be supported in equity, though the lands to be excepted were not specified.

A rector agreed to let a farm, except 37 acres, with liberty to plant not more than 10 acres of land. The tenant took possession, but before the lease was executed disputes arose respecting the lands to be taken by the rector; and upon a bill filed by him against the tenant for a specific performance of the agreement,—Held, that the rector had a right to select the lands to be reserved as the lease had not been executed, but that had it been executed the rector could not have taken any lands without the concurrence of the tenant.

Held, also, that the right of selection must be exercised so as not to prevent the useful and beneficial occupation of the rest of the farm; and with these declarations a decree was made for a specific performance of the agreement.

The bill in this suit was filed, by William James Jenkins, rector of Fillingham, in the county of Lincoln, against Benjamin Green, praying for the specific performance of an agreement to take a lease of "The Glebe Farm," of which the plaintiff was seised in right of his rectory, excepting thereout certain specified parts, or such other parts as the Court should think proper.

The farm had been estimated to contain 437 acres, but since the agreement with the defendant it had been ascertained to contain 445 a. 2 r. 2 p.

The agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant was dated the 24th of April 1855, and by it the plaintiff, in consideration of the rents and covenants, agreed, with the consent of the bishop of the diocese and patrons of the advowson, on or before the 1st of July then next, to grant the defendant a lease, to be prepared by the plaintiff's solicitor at the expense of the defendant, of the farm-house and farm containing 437 acres or thereabouts, called the Glebe Farm, now in the occupation of W. Glover, except 37 acres thereof, from the 6th of April then last, for fourteen years, with liberty to plough up free of any extra rent one moiety of a close called Thacker Hill Close, but with a reservation out of the demise of timber, mines and gravel, right of sporting, fishing, shooting and stocking ponds with fish; yearly rent 600*l.*, and such further sum as the lessor will have to pay annually to a drainage company or to Government for draining the said farm, or any part thereof, or for any money borrowed for that purpose; and also a further sum of 10*s.* per acre for ploughing one close, called the Third Field, and 5*s.* per acre for the other moiety of the said close called Thacker Hill Close; and also by way of penalty, a further sum of 10*l.* per acre for every acre of grass land ploughed up, except as aforesaid. Rent payable half-yearly, the first half-yearly payment to be made on the 11th of October next, with a proportionate deduction for the interval between the 6th of April instant and the 13th of May next, the latter day being the time at which the tenant will enter. The said W. J. Jenkins agrees with B. Green to obtain the consent of the said bishop of the diocese and of the patrons of the living to the lease; also, if he is able, but this is not compulsory on him, to get the whole of the said farm, or such part thereof as is required, drained by a drainage company, or by borrowing money for that purpose, the said tenant paying the annual payment to the company or to Government for that purpose during the said term of fourteen years. The lease also to contain the following covenants, stipulations and agreements:—Liberty for the lessor to plant during the term not more than 10 acres of land. Tenant to pay all taxes and rates, except landlord's property-tax; to put in and keep the whole of the buildings, including farm-house and dove-cote inside and out, in good and substantial repair, and to paint and cleanse the same; to cleanse ditches and keep hedges well cut and plashed, and fences in good repair. Tenant to insure premises in joint names of himself and lessor in a sum not less than 1,000*l.*; also to insure stock to value of half a year's rent, and produce policy; in default landlord to insure and add premiums paid for insurance as additional rent; the money obtained from insurance office if premises burnt, &c. to be laid out in rebuilding or repairing premises, and if money insufficient tenant to make up deficiency. Course of husbandry to be the four-field system, and the usual and best improved methods thereof according to the custom of the country. Special provisions for farming during the last year of tenancy, and with full power for him or his tenant to go upon farm with horses, &c., to do all ploughing and sowing which tenant does not do; upon request the said tenant to find stable-room for horses, &c. Lessor to have full power to enter and inspect farm and buildings at any time, and also to enter upon farm and house to shew it to others, right of lessor to dig clay on any part of the said farm; power of distress and entry if rent unpaid for twenty-one days after due. Lease to become void if tenant underlet or assign lease, become insolvent, bankrupt, make an assignment for benefit of creditors, compound with creditors, or allow goods to be taken in execution, wilfully waste or not repair after one month's notice given for that purpose. Tenant to supply lessor with ten waggon loads of straw yearly. To load from Lincoln to Fillingham, or from any place, not exceeding ten miles from lessor's residence, twenty-five tons of coal yearly to lessor's residence, upon said lessor giving to tenant a week's notice of his requiring the straw or coal, the said straw to be supplied and the coal to be had in such quantities as the lessor shall from time to time require, and in default the lessor to procure straw and get coals led, and charge same to tenant, and add it to rent. Tenant also to supply the said lessor with thirty quarters of oats or barley, in such proportions as he may require them, at market price, and load the same as required. Lessor to give the said tenant a week's notice of his requiring the said oats or barley. Lessee not to occupy any other farm without consent of lessor. Such lease also to contain the usual covenants and provisions on behalf of both lessor and lessee; costs of this agreement to be borne by the parties hereto in equal moieties.

The bishop of the diocese and the patrons of the rectory gave their consent, and on the 13th of May 1855 the tenant took possession of the whole farm, except two acres of a close, called First Close, and on that occasion it was agreed that he should hold the thirty-seven excepted acres until the plaintiff required them, paying to the plaintiff for the same a rent of 2*l.* per acre.

No special arrangement was made as to which particular thirty-seven acres were to be ultimately reserved.

The General Land Drainage and Improvement Company, incorporated under the 12 & 13 Vict. c. xci., on the 2nd of January 1857, undertook to drain the Glebe Farm, upon being repaid the sums expended, with interest thereon, by thirty-one yearly instalments, not exceeding in any year 6*l.* 13*s.* 2*d.* for every 100*l.*

Accordingly 294 acres were drained; and on the 23rd of July 1857 the Inclosure Commissioners for England and Wales (1) ordered that the inheritance of the land constituting the Glebe Farm should be absolutely charged with the sum of 2,345*l.* 14*s.*, the amount expended or incurred by the company in draining such parts of the Glebe Farm as had been drained, and other parts of the rectory glebe, being the Blundell and Baliol closes, containing 9a. 1r. and 9a. 2r., and with 31*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* for other costs, charges and expenses of the company incident to the contract, amounting in the whole to 2,377*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.*, and that it should be repaid by a rent-charge of 142*l.* 19*s.* 3*d.*, to be paid for thirty-one years from the date of the order, it being computed after the rate of 6*l.* 0*s.* 3½*d.* for every 100*l.* expended or incurred, and they made it payable half-yearly, on the 23rd days of January and July in every year, the first payment to be made on the 23rd of January 1857.

A draft of a lease was accordingly prepared by the plaintiff's solicitor, who at the time acted on behalf of both parties. It excepted out of the demise, in respect of the thirty-seven acres which the plaintiff claimed a right to reserve, two fields, called the South or Third Field, and the Middle Field, which contained together 42 a. 3 r. 5 p. It also excepted 2 a., part of a close called First Close.

After some delay the defendant took the lease to his own solicitor. It was then objected, that the defendant ought to pay no more than the interest of the money expended upon so much of the farm-lands as had been drained. It was also objected that the agreement reserved to the tenant the right of ploughing the Third Field and the second half of Thacker Hill Close, and further that the lease as drawn was at variance with the agreement.

Another draft of a lease was then drawn in conformity with the agreement; but the extent of the First Close was stated at the number of acres to which it was reduced by the plaintiff having inclosed two acres for his own use. A copy was sent to the plaintiff's solicitor; but before it was returned the plaintiff stated his willingness at once to take the farm and relinquish the contract. This draft did not comprise the Second Close and the eastern part of Fish-pond Close, which contained together thirty-seven acres; the defendant's solicitors proposed to include the said Second Close and the whole of Fish-pond Close, and they excluded the Ox Pasture and the Home Close, containing 35a. 2r. 21p., the first, as plaintiff alleged, being inferior land, and both being inconvenient for the occupation of the plaintiff while they adjoined the yard and buildings of the farm. This led to further correspondence, in which the plaintiff insisted that he had a right to select whatever parts of the Glebe Farm he thought proper, not exceeding thirty-seven acres and ten acres, and to have them excepted from the lease. The defendant, however, insisted that no selection could be made by the plaintiff without his concurrence; that he could not exclude the two acres of the First Close, which the plaintiff alleged he had taken, with the concurrence of the defendant, to build upon.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Beaumont, for the plaintiff, claimed a specific performance of the agreement, with a right to select the lands to be excepted from the lease.

Mr. Selwyn and Mr. Nalder, for the defendant.—The terms of the agreement are indefinite and uncertain, and cannot be carried into effect.—

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I must consider this as an agreement to grant a lease at a future period on the obtaining certain consents, and excepting a given number of acres, the selection of which must be made by the person granting the lease before the lease is executed. I can only consider the memorandum of agreement as a legal instrument effectual in a court of law; it would then operate as a covenant under seal, as if it had been executed on the 24th of April 1855, and bind the parties so that the covenantor would agree to grant a lease on the 1st of July then next of a certain quantity of land, say 400 acres, excepting thirty-seven acres and ten acres. The grantor, however, would have to select which of the lands he would except out of the property to be demised. This selection, no doubt, might have been made after the 1st of July 1855 if the lease had been executed in the terms of the agreement, but then the right of selecting the lands to be excepted would have rested with the tenant; he would then, no doubt, have said, "You have granted the 400 acres with a right of reserving thirty-seven acres and ten acres; if now you require these lands the right of selecting them must rest with me." The plaintiff, however, must not exercise the right of selecting the lands to be taken oppressively, or in a manner to make it impossible or difficult for the defendant usefully and advantageously to occupy the rest of the land. I do not intend to enter into the question as to what covenants the lease should contain; that must be settled in chambers; and for that purpose one party must prepare a draft of the lease and hand a copy to the other, that such alterations may be made as may be deemed necessary, and when the parties cannot agree upon any question it may be brought before me for further consideration. The plaintiff must cause an apportionment of the draining rent-charge to be made, so that the defendant may be charged for no portion of the glebe which is not comprised in his lease; that done, I propose to make a decree for a specific performance of the contract, and to declare that the right of selecting the thirty-seven acres and the ten acres belongs of right to the plaintiff, but that it must be so exercised as not to interfere with the other clauses in the contract, or with the defendant's beneficial enjoyment of the land comprised in the contract. I shall then refer it to chambers to settle the lease in case the parties differ, and I shall reserve the costs for further consideration. I think, however, that the plaintiff is entitled to the costs, so far as they have been occasioned by resisting a specific performance of the contract; but I cannot determine the extent of these costs without reading the affidavits.

M.R. }
Feb. 23. } JENKINS v. GREEN.

Lease—Rectory—Glebe.

If a farmer contracts with a rector for a lease of glebe lands, the Court will not assume that both parties had an enabling statute present in their minds, and modify the express terms of the agreement, to make it conform with the provisions of the statute.

Where an agreement had been made by a rector to grant a lease of glebe lands, at a rent to be paid half-yearly, the Court will not vary the agreement in accordance with the provisions of the 5 Vict. sess. 2. c. 27, and direct the rent to be paid quarterly.

A decree was made for the specific performance of a lease of glebe lands. The decree was duly enrolled; it was, however, subsequently found, that the agreement and the statute enabling incumbents to grant leases of their glebe did not conform:—Held, notwithstanding the previous proceedings, that the bill must be dismissed, but without costs.

This cause was again brought on upon an adjourned summons. Under the decree a lease was brought into chambers. It was between the plaintiff of the first part, the Bishop of Lincoln of the second part, the Master and Scholars of Balliol College, Oxford, of the third part, and Benjamin Green of the fourth part.

The defendant objected that it was contrary to the provisions of the 5 Vict. sess. 2. c. 27, enabling incumbents to demise the lands belonging to their benefices; that the reserved rent was made payable half-yearly instead of quarterly, as provided by the statute; and that the stipulations of the agreement, as carried out in the lease, were unusual, inconsistent and at variance with the custom of the country.

The chief clerk certified that the lease was a proper lease, having regard to the agreement.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Beaumont, for the plaintiff.—The defendant knew he was contracting for a lease of ecclesiastical lands; he must, therefore, be taken to have known of the enabling statute, and the act must be considered as being imported into and forming part of the agreement—Kerr v. Pawson (1).

Mr. Selwyn and Mr. Nalder, for the defendant.—The agreement cannot be varied. Courts cannot embody the caprices of legislation into the transactions of mankind, and make an agreement out of the provisions of a statute which the parties never contemplated. A farmer would not think of enabling and disabling statutes while considering the capabilities of a farm.

Mr. Palmer, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The question now raised was not noticed at the hearing. The difficulty arising out of this statute, enabling incumbents to demise land belonging to their benefices, is insuperable. It certainly is the duty of the Court to be acquainted with these acts of parliament; but, really, the duty is nominal. It is quite impossible for the Court to have them present, and in mind. This illustrates the great advantage and assistance which counsel confer; they bring to the attention of the Court much that would otherwise escape notice. I certainly made a decree for specific performance of the agreement. A lease was accordingly carried into chambers; objections were taken, and upon them it has been adjourned into court, and the objection now raised is, that no decree ought to have been made, and though it has been enrolled and cannot be reheard or altered, still the objection raised is one that cannot be got over. Several objections have been taken, but I can get over them all but this one, and it is, therefore, not necessary to refer in detail to them. The most favourable way in which I can put this case for the plaintiff, is to state the grounds on which I think it necessary to dissent from the confirmation of this agreement for a lease. There is no question but that the best rent is reserved. Is, then, the statute imperative when it says that the rent shall be reserved quarterly. Or, rather, there are two questions, viz., first, whether I can force on the defendant a lease which shall reserve the rent quarterly; and, secondly, whether, notwithstanding the provision of the act, I can allow him to have a lease which reserves the rent half-yearly. With respect to the first, I think that the act is imperative. It is impossible to get over the words. It is a permissive clause, no doubt, enabling the incumbent to let on farming leases, but with the express condition that the best rent be reserved quarterly. The agreement here is precise, that the rent shall be paid half-yearly. In Kerr v. Pawson I held, that where there is an act of parliament which regulates the subject-matter of a contract entered into between two persons, it must be assumed that they had that act of parliament in their minds, and, consequently, that on all those matters which are ambiguous, or which are not disposed of, it must be considered that the act of parliament becomes part, and contains the contract entered into between the parties. I should act on that doctrine undoubtedly here, in all those cases which are not mentioned in the agreement. But where the contract is precise, and is directly at variance with the act of parliament, it is impossible that I can hold that the parties had the act of parliament present to their minds, and that they intended that the act of parliament should override and control the express and direct provisions of the contract. I cannot, therefore, incorporate the act of parliament with the contract. Is this, then, the essence of the contract, or is it a mere formal matter? I do not so consider it. It may be of importance; it is not for me to judge, and the question of reserving the rent half-yearly or quarterly may be one of substance, which it is impossible for this Court to decide contrary to the express directions and terms contained in the contract. If the Court could do that, it could reserve the rent in any way it thought fit. I cannot, therefore, put into the contract that it is to be reserved quarterly. Am I then at liberty, under this act of parliament, to sanction a lease which reserves the rent half-yearly? So far as the defendant is concerned, if he had not raised the objection, and the lease had been granted sub silentio, and the matter had not been brought before the Court with the sanction of the patrons and ordinary, the defendant would have got a valid lease. The 5 Vict. sess. 2. c. 27. s. 4. meets this difficulty, and provides that where, through inadvertence or oversight, the act of parliament had not been expressly followed, the fact of the patrons and ordinary having executed it, gave the lessee a perfectly good and valid lease.

But the difficulty I have is this: it is for me as well as for the bishop and patrons to approve of this lease; and having come to the conclusion that the legislature has directed as an imperative condition that the rent shall be reserved quarterly, and having also come to the opinion that I have no power as a matter of equity to enforce that condition on the defendant, can I, with propriety, in that state of things, approve of a lease which reserves the rent half-yearly? And I reluctantly think I cannot, assuming that the bishop and patrons are consenting parties to the lease, because I presume that they would consent to the lease in this manner if the Court thought it fit and proper that they should execute it, and that the matter has not been brought before their attention in the same detailed and particular manner in which it was brought before me. Neither do I think that I am entitled to throw the burden of deciding the question on the bishop and the patrons. I think that I am bound to express an opinion for myself on the subject, and that I am, both morally and legally, bound to say that I cannot override that clause in the act of parliament, and say, that this is a contract which is proper to be executed, reserving the rent in a manner different from that which is made imperative by the act of parliament. That being my view of the case, it is for the parties to consider whether, in order to prevent any further expense in the matter, the better way would not be to consent to treat this matter in the same manner as if it were before me on further consideration that I might deal with the whole case. That would not prevent the opinion of another Court being taken on the subject. I had some little difficulty as to the course to be adopted, and I think that the practice of late years has been, with respect to bills for specific performance, to make a decree for specific performance where the agreement is contested, and then afterwards, if a good title cannot be made, to dismiss the bill, notwithstanding that a decree was made for specific performance. The old practice used to be a decree for a specific performance conditionally on a good title being made, but of late years the practice has been the other way. If so, that course would get rid of the difficulty in this case. I should simply dismiss the bill, and then I would allow counsel to speak to the question with respect to costs. I had determined to make the defendant pay the costs of the suit up to the hearing, so far as they related to the resistance to carry the contract into effect—practically, all the costs. But that was on the assumption that I could make a decree for specific performance. As for making the plaintiff pay costs, that is out of the question. It has frequently been discussed whether the Court will give costs where it dismisses the bill on such occasions. However, it never does give any costs. If the parties, therefore, do not contemplate an appeal, but remain satisfied with my decision, so far as jurisdiction is concerned, I shall simply dismiss the bill, without costs, as if the cause had been brought on for further consideration.

Lease of Farm—Incumbents—Glebe.

Glebe lands which have been usually let on lease by incumbents are not within the 5 Vict. sess. 2. c. 27.

This case was again brought before the Court, for reconsideration of the judgment, upon the 5 Vict. sess. 2. c. 27.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Beaumont insisted that the statute had reference only to lands usually occupied by incumbents, and that it had no reference to farms which had been usually demised, and from which the rector derived the greater part of his income; that the act did not interfere with or repeal previous existing statutes, and that the agreement was within them and ought to be carried into effect.

Mr. Selwyn and Mr. Nalder, for the defendant.—The 5 Vict. sess. 2. c. 27. was general; it must be read with the previous statutes; it applied to all lands belonging to benefices, and substituted new provisions which effectually repealed all existing statutes.—

The Bishop of Hereford v. Scory, Cro. Eliz. 874.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The agreement would, no doubt, have been valid had it been made prior to the 5 Vict. sess. 2. c. 27. Its provisions were in accordance with the powers given to incumbents by the previous statutes respecting leases of lands attached to or forming part of their benefices. When the late statute is considered, it does not seem to vary the former statutes. It was contended, on behalf of the defendant, that all the statutes must be read together: but if I acceded to this argument to its full extent, I should, in fact, decide that the earlier statutes are repealed by the late statute. This statute does not contain a clause repealing the earlier statutes. I think the object of it is to give power to grant leases of land belonging to benefices where such power did not exist before. By the former acts no power was given to let land which had not been accustomed to be let. But those leases which the ecclesiastical persons had power to grant before the late statute, they may, since the statute, grant under the provisions either of the old statute, or the late statute, as they think fit. In this case the incumbent had this power. The discrepancies which the defendant has pointed out in the provisions of the different acts shew that the statutes are not to be read together. Suppose the incumbent under the 13 Eliz. c. 10. had power to let land for twenty-one years for the same rent as had been formerly reserved, payable half-yearly, if that lease since the late statute is not valid, because a portion of one glebe is not reserved out of the lease, or because it does not contain a reservation of the rent quarterly or a covenant for insurance of the property for three-fourths of its value, or because it does not prescribe a particular mode of culture—it is clear that in all these particulars the former statutes are repealed by the 5 Vict. sess. 2. c. 27, and it would, therefore, be impossible to read them together. Suppose the incumbent had been accustomed to lease the glebe-house, then, if I am to read the statutes in the manner proposed, the incumbent would be prohibited from letting the house in future, because this statute contains a clause expressly prohibiting the letting of the glebe-house. There are many cases which by analogy lead to a different construction. The writ of habeas corpus might be issued at common law; but since the passing of the statute granting the right, a person may sue out the writ either at common law or under the statute. According to the invariable interpretation put upon acts of parliament by Courts of law a previous statute cannot be repealed by inference, but only by express enactment. I find, then, that the incumbent has agreed to grant a lease of these lands, which he has been accustomed to let according to the provisions of the statutes in force at the time when the late statute was passed, and which in no way affects the former acts; and I am of opinion that the agreement is perfectly good, and that the lessee must be ordered to accept the lease. The costs of the present application must be paid by the lessee.

Building Society—Change of Purpose—Misapplication of Funds—Breach of Trust.

A building society was established and the rules certified under the 6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 32; the directors subsequently changed the name, and sought to convert it into a freehold land society. They made no alteration in the rules, but they applied the funds of the society towards the payment of the purchase-money of a piece of land they contracted to purchase:—Held, that the objects of the society could not be changed, and that the rules of the original society could not be adapted to any altered purpose; that the rules did not authorize the purchase of land, and that the directors must replace the money; that the trustees were not responsible for the funds, as they only acted ministerially when they signed the cheques for payment; they were, however, refused the costs of the suit.

The Prince of Wales Mutual Benefit Building Society was established in the year 1853, and the following were among its rules:—Rule 1. stated that the object of the society “was to raise a fund by weekly subscriptions of the members in shares of 25*l.* each, out of which each member may receive the amount or value of his share for the erection or purchase of a dwelling-house or houses, or other real or leasehold estate.”

Rule 12.—“Whenever the money in hand shall in the opinion of the directors be sufficient for the purpose, it shall be employed in advancing to those members whose subscriptions are not in arrear the amount of their shares, and the members shall become entitled to such advance by seniority of membership and numerical order of their shares; but no member shall be entitled, unless upon transferred shares, to more than two advances at any one time on any of his original shares, nor until the whole of the members who shall be eligible as above stated and stand next in rotation and numerical order to his last advanced shares shall have been entitled to and been offered an advance in respect of their respective shares; and all money not so employed shall be invested by the trustees in such manner and upon such legal security as the board of directors shall deem necessary in the names of the trustees for the time being; and when any member shall become entitled to an advance, he shall have the option of accepting or declining the same.”

Rule 17.—“All securities to and investments on account of the society shall be made in the names of the trustees for the time being, and all documents shall be deposited and kept in such place as the board of directors shall direct.”

Rule 31.—“The board shall have full power to conduct the affairs of the society, subject only to the rules thereof for the time being, and any committee to be selected and appointed shall have the same power in respect of any matter confided to them, subject to the control from time to time of the board.”

Rule 35.—“No payment above 5*l.* shall be made out of the funds of the society, except by a cheque on the bankers, which cheque must be signed by two of the trustees and countersigned by the secretary; and no such cheque shall be signed by any trustee except upon the direction of the board of directors, such direction to be entered in the minute-book of the society and verified by the signature of two directors at least, not being themselves trustees.”

Rule 39.—“No director, trustee or other officer of this society shall be responsible or liable to make good any deficiency that may arise in the funds, property or effects of the society otherwise than by reason of his wilful neglect or default, nor for the default or defalcation of any other officer; but every such director, trustee or other officer shall be answerable for the money, property and effects actually received by him on account of the society until he shall have disposed of the same in accordance with these rules, when his whole liability in that respect shall cease.”

By rule 47, such of the provisions of the 10 Geo. 4. c. 56. and the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 27. as were applicable to building societies were made applicable to this society.

The revising barrister certified the rules as approved, in pursuance of the 6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 32.

The funds of the society arising from the subscriptions of members amounted, in June 1856, to upwards of 750*l.* The society was then found to be in difficulties, and its operations were discontinued. The affairs of the society were then investigated, and it was found that the directors had made an attempt to vary the objects of the society, and that they had altered its name as follows—“The North-West London Equitable Freehold Land Society, enrolled as the Prince of Wales Mutual Benefit Building Society,” and that they had issued pass-books, containing a copy of the rules of the society and the account of the individual members.

It was also found that, in October 1854, when the whole balance in hand was only 621*l.*, the directors, at a meeting, resolved to purchase a piece of land in West Green Lane, Tottenham, with the funds of the society. This piece of land consisted of three and a half acres, with a cottage upon it, and had then lately been purchased by Mr. Syers, for 2,360*l.* The sum to be paid by the society was to be arranged with Mr. Syers by Messrs. Haden and Bowen, two of the defendants, and they agreed to purchase the piece of land, exclusive of the cottage and garden, for 2,300*l.* A deposit of 150*l.* was then paid, and Mr. Syers acknowledged its receipt as being from "The directors of the North London Freehold Land Society," and indorsed upon the receipt was the following memorandum, which he signed:—"I agree to take payment as follows: 150*l.* already received, as per receipt annexed; 450*l.* within fourteen days of this date; 400*l.* on or before Christmas-day 1854, and the remaining 1,300*l.* by two instalments of 650*l.* each, the first on or before Christmas-day 1856, and the remainder on or before Christmas-day 1857."

On the 10th of October 1854 the directors, at a meeting of the board, ordered a cheque to be drawn for the deposit of 150*l.*, and, at a subsequent meeting, they ordered another cheque to be drawn for 450*l.* These cheques on account of the purchase-money were signed by the trustees, in pursuance of the resolutions of the directors, and this was entered on the minutes, and signed by two directors, in compliance with rule 35. Two other cheques, for 100*l.* each, were also drawn and signed on account of the purchase upon the like resolutions and with the like forms.

The trustees were cognizant of the purpose to which the several sums were to be applied.

The bill was now filed, by John Grimes and three other members of the Prince of Wales Mutual Benefit Building Society, on behalf of themselves and all other members of the society, except the defendants, against the directors and the trustees and Mr. Syers.

The bill charged that the investment was a fraud on the rules of the society, and that it was not a proper purchase, even if authorized by the rules.

The bill prayed that the defendants might be declared to be severally personally liable to replace to the funds of the society the several sums of 150*l.*, 450*l.*, 100*l.* and 100*l.*, so paid out of the funds to the defendant Syers, with interest, and for the appointment of new trustees; or that, if necessary, the said society might be dissolved and wound up under the statutes made in that behalf.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Southgate, for the plaintiffs.—The directors had no power to purchase land; it was contrary to the purposes for which the society was formed. The resolutions of the directors were irregular. The land also was purchased under an idea that it might be sold to the society at an unreasonable price, with a view indirectly to the benefit of one, if not more, of the directors—Matheson v. Ross (1).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—There is a great distinction between a freehold land society and a benefit building society. A freehold land society buys land with the funds subscribed by the members, and then divides that land among them; but a benefit building society advances to members, out of the subscriptions made by the members, sums of money to be laid out in the purchase of land or buildings, which are then mortgaged to the society. That appears to be the principal difference between these two kinds of societies. But in either case these societies must be bound by the rules by which they have been constituted. It does not lie in the mouth of any member of the society to say that the book which professes to contain the rules of the society does not contain the rules by which they are bound. In this society not only is there a rule that every member shall be furnished with a pass-book, containing his account, and a copy of the rules upon which that account is to be audited; but by the 31st rule, the board has full power to conduct the affairs of the society, subject only to the rules thereof for the time being. Therefore, the rules of the society bind all the members. I cannot accede to the argument that, as between the members of the society, the fact of putting a title-page to the pass-book, in which the society is called a freehold land society, will really alter the rules, and convert them into something other than what they purport to be upon the face of them. I make this distinction expressly as between the members of the society and as regards strangers to the society, because in that respect the case of Mr. Syers is different from that of the members of the society. It appears that the certificate of Mr. Tidd Pratt was obtained without any intimation that the words "freehold land society" constituted the title of the society, or that it was intended to be in any respect a freehold land society. It was sworn that this omission was made purposely, because it was known that Mr. Tidd Pratt would not certify the rules of the society, if called a freehold land society, to be within the provisions of the 6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 32, but would only certify it as a benefit building society. Therefore, it is impossible to adopt the argument, that the Court can mould these rules so as to make them applicable to a freehold land society, when by the suppression of the fact that this was a freehold land society, or was intended to be so, these parties have obtained from the officer appointed by the legislature the benefit and advantage derived from being a benefit building society, solely because the society was not known or believed to be a freehold land society. It is therefore impossible to modify these rules so as to make them apply to a freehold land society. The real and material question is, what were the functions, duties and powers of the directors? I find from rule 31, that the duties are, to manage the affairs of the society in accordance with the rules. Rule 1. is strongly insisted upon as being beneficial to the defendants: it is said that it must be so read as to give to the society power to purchase land as they think fit. But upon reading this rule, and considering the society as a benefit building society, it does not confer any such power at all. The obvious meaning of that rule is, that "the amount or value of the share" of each member is to be applied "for the erection or purchase by him of a dwelling-house, or other real or leasehold estate." This contains no authority to the directors to purchase and divide land amongst the members; and in looking through these rules, there is not a single clause which authorizes such a course. Rule 12, no doubt, authorizes the directors to invest money in land; that is perfectly consistent with Cutbill v. Kingdon. The first part of the rule authorizes the directors, when they think proper, to make advances to members. This is in accordance with the objects of a benefit building society, and with the 1st rule of this society. The rule then goes on to direct "that all money not so employed shall be invested by the trustees in such manner and on such legal security as the board shall deem necessary; and when any member shall become entitled to an advance, he shall have the option of accepting or declining the same." The power given by this rule of investing the money not advanced to members authorizes (and I state this as being so far in favour of the defendants) the purchase of land as a mode of investment of the unemployed funds of the society. The argument of the directors is, that at this time no loans were made; that nobody had applied for loans; that the directors intended to treat this society as a freehold land society; and that there was a sum of

621*l.* in hand. But that can hardly be treated as money not required; for if any member had applied for a loan the directors would have been bound to make it. If then this rule gave the directors authority to invest the 621*l.*, it could not be said that they had sufficient funds for the purpose of making loans, and at the same time that there was surplus money which they could invest. Then, what is the contract which was entered into on this occasion? It was not an investment of 600*l.*, but a laying out or incurring liabilities upon a contract, which made the society liable for a purchase to the extent of 2,300*l.* under a power which only authorized the society to purchase in case they should have monies not required for the purpose of loans to members, every one of whom was entitled to have a loan to the amount of his share; and it was under the pretence of investing the surplus money that the directors, with 621*l.* only in hand, made the society incur this liability. On what grounds can this be held a valid and proper discharge of the duties of the directors of this society? Under the contract the sum of 600*l.* was to be paid at once, and 400*l.* more before the Christmas following. According to the regular rate of payment of subscriptions, the society would not receive a sufficient amount of subscriptions to meet this payment; much less the further sum of 1,300*l.*, which was to be paid by two equal instalments, at Christmas 1856 and Christmas 1857. It is impossible to say, upon the rules of the society, that this was a bond fide investment of the surplus funds of the society. It was nothing else than laying out the money of the society in the purchase of an estate, which the directors might think fit to divide again if they pleased. That may be the function of a freehold land society, but it is not the function of a building society. It is not within these rules; and every member is entitled to say to the directors, "You shall not go out of these rules;" and the fact of the society being entitled a Freehold Land Society, or of the pass-book being an account of a freehold land society, or of the minutes being kept as the minutes of the proceedings of a freehold land society, does not entitle the directors so to act, or preclude any one of the members who may think fit from taking the objection to their acting in disobedience of rules to which they are bound to conform. The result is, that the directors were guilty of a breach of trust, and that they had no authority to lay out the money of the society in this contract. What, then, would be the consequence if this were a contract which bound the society? Mr. Syers might file his bill for the specific performance of the contract. How is he to be paid his purchase-money? Is each of the members liable to contribute, or liable to pay the whole amount? Upon the construction of these rules, the members would be at liberty to say, that these were not the terms and conditions on which they joined the society, and that they were not liable to have this contract specifically performed against them; so they are entitled in the same way to say to the directors, "You have exceeded your powers; you have not acted within the scope of that trust which has been committed to you in entering into this contract." The consequence is, that all the directors who authorized the payment of the money must be held liable to repay the amount. It may be very hard upon some of them, who may have had nothing to do with it, beyond assenting to the wishes of others; yet, as they were directors, and were under the obligation to make themselves acquainted with their duties, they must be held liable for what has taken place, and therefore liable to repay this amount. If the transaction were not upon the face of it invalid, I should require further evidence before I could sanction it; it certainly appears singular. As, however, the directors were not authorized to enter into the contract, it becomes unnecessary further to investigate the transaction. I do not see how I can affect the trustees of the society personally. They have not the same character and functions as the directors. They are mere ministerial officers, and hold the money of the society, and are bound to dispose of it as the directors order. The 39th rule may make a difference, but my present impression is, that the trustees only acted ministerially and in compliance with the resolution of the directors, and that they ought to be kept harmless; but I cannot give them the costs of the suit. I cannot see what claims the society has against Mr. Syers; he was dealing with a freehold land society, or what he supposed to be such. These societies, I assume, have powers to buy land and divide it among their members. Mr. Syers was not bound to look at the rules of the society with which he dealt; he could not ascertain that this was not a freehold land society, or that it was entitled to act only as a building society. There is, therefore, no reason for saying that Mr. Syers is liable to replace the money. If the contract is not valid and is set aside, the parties who paid the money to Mr. Syers may or may not have an action at law against Mr. Syers to have the money restored. As to this I express no opinion. If the transaction had been free from suspicion, I should have considered Mr. Syers entitled to costs; but on the circumstances of the case, the bill must be dismissed against Mr. Syers, without costs. With respect to the directors, the plaintiffs are entitled to a declaration that this was a breach of trust, and that they are liable to replace the money, and they must pay the plaintiffs' costs if they ask for them. There will be no order against the trustees, but they must bear their own costs. The rule which provides that they were merely to sign receipts must mean that they were to have no hand or voice in the management of the society, and that they were to sign the receipts presented to them by the directors of the society after they had ascertained that the proper forms had been observed. Had they done no more, they might have been entitled to their costs; but on looking through the answer of the trustees, they do not content themselves with saying that they acted merely as ministerial officers, but they support and justify the allegations made by the other defendants, and insist that this is not a building society, but a freehold land society. This course they ought not to have taken, and it must deprive them of their costs.

Costs — Taxation — Higher or Lower Scale.

The allowance of the higher scale of fees does not depend upon the amount to be recovered, but upon the questions raised in the suit, and whether the suit is one which affects the entire property involved.

The 2nd Order of the 2nd of January 1857, rule 7, provides that solicitors are to be entitled to charge and be allowed the fees according to the lower scale in all proceedings by special case, and in all proceedings relating to funds carried to separate accounts, and in all proceedings under any railway or private act of parliament, or any other statutory or summary jurisdiction, and generally in all other cases where the estate or fund to be dealt with shall be under the amount or value of 1,000*l*.

Mr. Follett and Mr. Southgate, for the plaintiff in this case (reported ante, p. 823), claimed the costs on the higher scale.

Mr. Cracknall and Mr. W. Morris, for the defendants.—The suit sought to have a sum of 800*l*. replaced. That was the principal object of the suit. The question on the appointment of new trustees, and the winding up the society, had not been brought forward at the hearing. The costs should be paid on the lower scale.—

Reade v. Beniley, 3 Kay & J. 271; s. c. 27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 254.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The order referred to does not apply to this case. Whether the costs are to be allowed on the higher or lower scale does not depend upon the amount actually recovered, but whether the whole estate or fund is to be dealt with, though it is under the value of 1,000*l*. It is true that the fund sought to be replaced does not amount to 1,000*l*., but the suit seeks other and material relief, viz., the appointment of new trustees and the dissolution of the society; in fact, the estate is sought to be dealt with as the whole property of the society. In Gibbs v. Gibbs the only question was, who was entitled to the specific sum of 400*l*.? The case, therefore, does not fall within the rule, and the costs must be allowed on the higher scale.

June 2. } THOMAS v. RAWLINGS.

Solicitor and Client—Privilege—Answer—Exceptions.

A solicitor who obtained possession of a lease from a client, which was claimed by a third party, cannot refuse to answer a bill filed against him upon an allegation that the information respecting the matters inquired into was obtained either in the character of solicitor or as a creditor of his client, neither will his claim to be a purchaser for value without notice, in respect of a lien claimed upon the lease for a debt incurred by his client, prevent his being required to answer the bill.

The bill in this case was filed by Frederick Richard Thomas, against William Harris Rawlings and Thomas James Stubbs, praying, inter alia, for a declaration that W. H. Rawlings was a trustee for the plaintiff of a lease, dated the 23rd of June 1854, and that T. J. Stubbs had as against the plaintiff no valid or subsisting charge or lien on the lease either for professional services or otherwise.

The plaintiff set out in his bill various deeds and memoranda of agreement, deducing his title to the lease.

T. J. Stubbs had acted as the solicitor of W. H. Rawlings; the lease was in his possession, and he claimed a lien upon it, on the ground that it came into his hands as a deposit, and that the money due to him was a debt incurred by his client for costs on the faith of the deposit, without notice of the plaintiff's title.

The plaintiff interrogated T. J. Stubbs in respect of the deeds and memorandum of agreement. T. J. Stubbs, in the first paragraph of his answer, said, "All the information I possess as to the matter to which I am interrogated in the suit I have derived either as a creditor of W. H.

Rawlings or as his solicitor. I am advised that the plaintiff does not by his bill offer to pay me the amount which is due from the defendant W. H. Rawlings to me, and in respect of which I hold the lease; and I submit and I hereby insist that I am not bound to make any answer to such part of the interrogatories exhibited in this suit on behalf of the plaintiff as will lead to a disclosure of any claim against the defendant W. H. Rawlings or of the matter which came to my knowledge whilst I acted as the professional adviser of the said defendant; and I claim the benefit of this defence to so much of the bill as I have not hereby fully answered, to the same extent as if I had pleaded to the same."

In answer to the various interrogatories in detail, he declined to give the discovery upon the same grounds or one of them.

The plaintiff excepted to the answer.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Swanston, for the plaintiff, in support of the exception.

Mr. Selwyn and Mr. Cottrell, for T. J. Stubbs, claimed his privilege from further answering, as the communications came to the defendant in his confidential capacity, and his lien was obtained in his character of purchaser without notice.—

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—While I admit the proposition that communications between solicitor and client are privileged, it does not affect this case. The privilege, being that of the client, is confined to communications made by him to the solicitor. All questions relating to privilege are considered in Lord Walsingham v. Goodrich (1). The defendant does not say that the matters in respect of which he refuses discovery were communicated to him by his client, but simply that he obtained the knowledge while he was acting as the solicitor of W. H. Rawlings. If this were a ground of privilege, it would be difficult to obtain any discovery from a solicitor, because he might have acted as solicitor for a great number of clients during a long period of time. He is not bound to disclose communications made by the client to himself, provided those communications have some reference to the lis mota either before and in anticipation of, or subsequent to, the institution of proceedings. The defendant, however, throughout his answer grounds his right to refuse discovery on the fact of his having obtained the information whilst acting professionally for the defendant W. H. Rawlings. All the exceptions which proceed upon this ground of refusal must be allowed. The defendant further says that he obtained the information as a creditor of W. H. Rawlings, or as his legal adviser. This must be taken most strongly against the pleader, and it must be assumed that all the information was obtained in his character of creditor. As such, he is bound to disclose it. It is unnecessary to consider the principle, which is now well established, that if a defendant answers he must answer fully. All the exceptions must be allowed.

*Joint-Stock Company—Winding up—
Loss of Three-fourths of Capital—Sections 67. and 72. of the Joint-Stock Companies

A shareholder in a joint-stock company presented a petition (against the approval of the majority of the shareholders) for the winding up of the company, alleging the loss of three-fourths of its capital (under section 67. of the act 19 & 20 Vict. c. 47); but the Court, being satisfied of the bad faith of the petitioner, and not being satisfied of the loss of capital as alleged, dismissed the petition. Under the 72nd section of the above-named act, the order to be made upon a petition to wind up is entirely in the discretion of the Court.

This was the petition of appeal of Thomas Hawkins, a shareholder in the above-named company, for 150 fully paid-up shares, from a decision of Mr. Commissioner Evans, dismissing, with costs, his petition presented to the Court of Bankruptcy on the 29th of April, praying the dissolution and winding up of the company, on the grounds that the same was insolvent and unable to meet its engagements, and that three-fourths of its capital had been lost or had become unavailable. The allegations of the petition (which, however, were in many particulars denied) were that, out of the 20,000 l. shares into which the capital of the company was divided, 15,000 or thereabouts had been subscribed for, and nearly 15,000*l.* paid thereon, and that that was the whole amount which the company had ever received in respect of shares; that by a balance-sheet made up to the 31st of August 1857, and laid before the shareholders at a general meeting of the company held on the 26th of September 1857, there was shewn to be a deficiency of 2,429*l.* 14*s.* 9*d.*, which was accounted for by the following entry:— “Profit and loss. For balance proposed to be carried to preliminary expenses, 2,429*l.* 14*s.* 9*d.*,” but no detailed statement in explanation accompanied the entry; that on the 9th of March 1858 it was resolved, at an extraordinary meeting of the company, that the directors should be empowered to raise a sum not exceeding 5,000*l.* by way of loan, to be secured by debentures bearing interest, for the service of the company; that the above resolution was confirmed at a second meeting, held on the 22nd of April then following, and at the second meeting a Report of the directors was read, wherein it was stated that the company had incurred a loss of 823*l.* in the half-year's working previous to the date of the balance-sheet; that the stock of horses and omnibuses belonging to the company had materially decreased in value; that the company's engagements and debts had increased to upwards of 7,000*l.*, and that it had no money or means of paying them, excepting by a sale of the horses and omnibuses; that the patent purchased and held by the company was of no value whatever; that this company alone, and no other person, had attempted to work omnibuses built under it, and had wholly failed in working the same to a profit, because of the excessive weight of the vehicles so constructed, and the great outlay required in order to keep them in working order; that the company was insolvent, and that three-fourths of its capital had been lost or become unavailable. The petition, therefore, prayed that the company might be wound up in bankruptcy.

The allegations of the petition were supported by affidavits of the petitioner and others, by which it was stated that, since the month of April 1858, the business of the company had become from bad to worse, and that the whole assets, including horses, omnibuses, plant and stock, stables, offices and furniture, together with the balance at the company's bankers, amounted to less than 3,000*l.* The petitioner also swore that in this petition he was acting wholly independently, and not in collusion with any other person or persons; but it appeared that this was the third petition which had been presented within a twelvemonth, for the purpose of obtaining a winding-up order against this company, the first of which was presented in April 1858 by Mr. Hawkins himself, and was almost identical in its allegations with the present, and was dismissed with costs, Mr. Commissioner Fane being then of opinion that the petitioner had failed to shew that three-fourths of the capital had been lost or had become unavailable. On that occasion his Honour said, upon being pressed to give further time:—"No; certainly not. This is a case in which I shall give no further time. When people begin these things they ought to be fully prepared. You must bring a material fact. There is more than a fourth part of the capital of the company left, even according to your own evidence, and that is without taking the patent into account, which, as I understand, was paid for in shares, and forms part of the capital of the company."

A second petition was presented in the early part of the present year by a Mr. Borsley, a harness-maker, who represented that the company owed him upwards of 400*l.*; but the company, having discharged this debt, his petition was dismissed by consent.

Mr. Pope, the secretary of the company, and others, deposed that the whole number of shares issued was 14,869, of which 3,000, fully paid up, were given to the patentee of the saloon omnibus, together with 200*l.* in money, for the purchase of his patent; and 884 shares had been forfeited for non-payment of calls. Mr. Pope, in his evidence, estimated the assets of the company at 9,689*l.* 5*s.*, and its liabilities at between 3,000*l.* and 4,000*l.*; and also stated that the company had commenced an action against the London General Omnibus Company, in which the damages were laid at 10,000*l.*; that that action was referred to Mr. Barstow, of the common-law bar, as arbitrator, and the reference, which had already occupied thirty days, and in which 100 witnesses had been examined, was still pending; and that, although the costs of Mr. Hawkins's dismissed petition had been paid, yet that Mr. Hawkins had been a co-plaintiff in the suit of Bryon v. the Metropolitan Saloon Omnibus Company, Limited (1), in which a motion for an injunction had been refused with costs, which had been taxed at 15*l.* 19*s.* 11*d.*, no part of which had been paid by the petitioner, for which he was in contempt.

The proper order would, to refuse the motion, without order, and to direct the fund to the plaintiff.

of the Rolls, that the fund was divisible among the nephews and nieces

whether surviving the tenant for life or not, and that the share of the deceased niece devolved upon her next-of-kin, and not upon her administrator.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Master of the Rolls (reported ante, p. 76). Samuel Cleaveland, by his will, dated the 3rd of August 1841, gave to trustees a sum of stock, upon trust for his brother R. F. Cleaveland and his wife Eliza, and the survivor of them for his and her natural lives; and after the decease of his said brother and his said wife, "then in trust to pay and apply the said sum of stock equally amongst his (the testator's) nephews and nieces, children of his said brother R. F. Cleaveland and his said wife, then living, or their legal personal representatives, share and share alike." The testator died in March 1844, and one of his nieces, Henrietta Maria, the wife of George Foster St. Barbe, died on the 15th of December 1853, without issue. The wife of R. F. Cleaveland survived him, and died in August 1857. G. F. St. Barbe took out letters of administration to his wife; and the Master of the Rolls having decided against his claim to the share of his deceased wife, and in favour of her next-of-kin, he appealed. The other question decided by the Master of the Rolls (ante, 74) as to the fund being divisible among all the nephews and nieces whether surviving the tenant for life or not, was also argued on this appeal.

Mr. Selwyn and Mr. Hobhouse, in support of the appeal.—The first question was, whether the words "legal personal representatives" were words of limitation or of substitution. If the words "share and share alike," which were, however, conclusive on the subject, had not been used, it was clear that the word "or" meant an alteration or substitution, not an addition. The words "legal personal representatives" were not those generally used to give an absolute interest; and the testator in the present case had used the words "executors and administrators" where he intended to imply an absolute gift. There were cases which established that a gift to one or his representatives after a gift for life conferred an absolute interest. Tidwell v. Ariel (1) was, however, overruled in Re Porter's Trusts (2). In Bone v. Cook (3) the words were "executors or administrators"; but in Corbyn v. French (4) the words were "their representatives or representative." In this case, however, the reason for holding such words to be words of limitation failed, as they were merely introduced, by way of caution on the testator's part, to shew that the legacy was a transmissible one, and was not to fail by reason of the legatee's death before the period of distribution. This could not apply where the gift was only to those living at the period of distribution, as in such a case the words must be substitutionary or they must mean nothing. Such words could not be construed otherwise than substitutionary in the case of immediate legacies, as they were clearly used with regard to such in this will to prevent lapse. The same sense must, therefore, be attributed to these words when applied to deferred legacies. But supposing the words to import an alternative gift, the question then arose, who ordered the rest of the motion to stand over until this day. The money was accordingly paid into court.

The case now came on again upon motion.

Mr. Craig and Mr. C. Swanston, for the plaintiff, in support of the motion.—The plaintiff in this case must be taken to have had full notice of the settlement and its contents, of which Lord Rosslyn is the surviving trustee, and under which Mr. Walrond exercised his power. Having, therefore, full notice of Lord Rosslyn's title, although a mere equitable title, the plaintiff, as he has been applied to both by Lord Rosslyn and by Mr. Walrond for payment of the rent, has a right to file a bill of interpleader in this court to have the question of title determined—Suart v. Welch (1).

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Jolliffe, for the defendant Walrond; and Mr. Jones Bateman, for the Earl of Rosslyn, objected that there was no case for the exercise of the Court's jurisdiction of interpleader. Mr. Walrond was the landlord of the plaintiff, and, as a general rule, a tenant was not entitled to maintain a bill of interpleader against his landlord. The only exception to that rule was where the landlord had done some act himself to embarrass the tenant—

Dungey v. Angove, 2 Ves. jun. 304.

Jew v. Wood, Cr. & Ph. 185; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Chanc. 262; 3 Beav. 579.

That, however, was not so here, for Lord Rosslyn's claim was made, not under any act done by Mr. Walrond, but under a title alleged to be paramount to his. They cited also Crawshay v. Thornton (2).

STUART, V.C. said, that as a general rule a tenant had no right to file a bill of interpleader against his landlord, and that the only exception to that rule was where, by some act of the landlord, subsequent to the granting of the lease, a difficulty was occasioned by a demand made against the tenant under that subsequent dealing with the landlord. The rule was expressly so laid down by Lord Rosslyn in Dungey v. Angove, and subsequently by Lord Eldon in Cowtan v. Williams (3). The present case was clearly not within the exception, but was governed by the general rule. The tenant, Mr. Cook, with notice of the state of the title, had taken and held possession of the demised premises under those who had the legal estate, upon a covenant assented to by them and Mr. Walrond, the donee of the power, to pay the rent to Mr. Walrond, until they, the owners of the legal estate, should otherwise direct. It had been argued, however, that it was now too late to say that the plaintiff was not entitled to an order to interplead as against the defendants, since both the defendants, by urging their claims upon the Court, had, in fact, submitted to interplead; and that the order which had been made, directing payment of the fund into court, and reserving the rest of the motion until this day, was, in effect, a reservation of every question involved in the case. No doubt that was, in a sense, so; but that, nevertheless, did not appear to be the proper way in which either of the defendants should have met the claim set up by the bill. The bill was clearly open to demurrer, and by taking that course, the defendants might have had the matter disposed of at little or no expense. The Court, however, was now in possession of the fund, and had heard the counter claims of the two defendants. The result was, that it now appeared that one of the defendants was no party to the contract for payment of the rent, and that his receipt could not relieve the plaintiff in this court from a right of action upon the covenant on the part of Mr. Walrond. The case was not, therefore, of a character to admit of the exercise of the jurisdiction of interpleader; and the consequence was, that the motion must be refused. As to the costs, it was impossible justly to throw them upon the plaintiff. All the parties had acted under a mistake. The plaintiff had proceeded by interpleader in a case in which he had no title to do so according to the rule of the Court, and the defendants, instead of demurring to the bill, had come in to

Legacy—Substitution—"Legal Personal Representatives."

A legacy of stock in trust for A.B. for life, and afterwards to divide the same amongst the testator's nephews and nieces, children of A. B, then living, or their legal personal representatives, share and share alike. One of the testator's nieces died in his lifetime, without issue:—Held, affirming the decision of the Master of the Rolls, that the fund was divisible among the nephews and nieces whether surviving the tenant for life or not, and that the share of the deceased niece devolved upon her next-of-kin, and not upon her administrator.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Master of the Rolls (reported ante, p. 76). Samuel Cleaveland, by his will, dated the 3rd of August 1841, gave to trustees a sum of stock, upon trust for his brother R. F. The testator died in March 1844, and one of his nieces, Henrietta Maria, the wife of George Foster St. Barbe, died on the 15th of December 1853, without issue. The wife of R. F. Cleaveland survived him, and died in August 1857. G. F. St. Barbe took out letters of administration to his wife; and the Master of the Rolls having decided against his claim to the share of his deceased wife, and in favour of her next-of-kin, he appealed. The other question decided by the Master of the Rolls (ante, 74) as to the fund being divisible among all the nephews and nieces whether surviving the tenant for life or not, was also argued on this appeal.

Mr. Selwyn and Mr. Hobhouse, in support of the appeal.—The first question was, whether the words "legal personal representatives" were words of limitation or of substitution. If the words "share and share alike," which were, however, conclusive on the subject, had not been used, it was clear that the word "or" meant an alteration or substitution, not an addition. The words "legal personal representatives" were not those generally used to give an absolute interest; and the testator in the present case had used the words "executors and administrators" where he intended to imply an absolute gift. There were cases which established that a gift to one or his representatives after a gift for life conferred an absolute interest. *Tidwell v. In this case, however, the reason for holding such words to be words of limitation failed, as they were merely introduced, by way of caution on the testator's part, to shew that the legacy was a transmissible one, and was not to fail by reason of the legatee's death before the period of distribution. Such words could not be construed otherwise than substitutionary in the case of immediate legacies, as they were clearly used with regard to such in this will to prevent lapse. The same sense must, therefore, be attributed to these words when applied to deferred legacies. But supposing the words to import an alternative gift, the question then arose, who were the persons for whom the substitution was to be made? Upon this question the cases of Coulthurst v. Carter (5), Christopherson v. Naylor (6), Tytherleigh v. Harbin (7) and Jarvis v. Pond (8), were applicable; but the terms of the present gift might be amplified, according to the more natural construction of the words, into language falling precisely within the decision in Tytherleigh v. Harbin. The term "legal personal representatives" clearly pointed to those upon whom the law conferred the personal property; and in this case, whether you look to the legal or the beneficial interest, the husband was the person to take—Dixon v. Dixon (9). The only authority the other way was that of Doody v. Higgins (10). There was, however, no reported case which decided that the words here used meant "next-of-kin." They also cited Re Crawford's Trusts (11).

Mr. Amphlett and Mr. C. Hall appeared for the executors of the father of Mrs. St. Barbe, who was her next-of-kin.—The words "legal personal representatives" could not be taken in their strict ordinary sense, but as a designation of the next-of-kin. The words "share and share alike" took the case out of the decision in Corbyn v. French, and the Master of the Rolls came to the conclusion that the words "legal personal representatives" did not mean administrators, but were used in some other sense. Whenever the words were taken in the secondary sense, it was as "next-of-kin," and no otherwise. The discussion in most of the cases was, whether the words meant "next-of-kin" literally or according to the Statute of Distributions, and nothing was said about the husband—

Doody v. Higgins.

If the appellant's argument were correct, viz., that these words, taken in their secondary sense, must mean the persons entitled to the beneficial interest in the property, then, if the person were illegitimate, the Crown would take; and, therefore, they must say that the Crown was persona designata.

[LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—The question seems to be, whether the words "or their legal personal representatives" have any meaning, force or effect whatever.]

Mr. Amphlett.—At all events, if used in a secondary sense, they could not benefit the appellant, for they must mean "next-of-kin"—Re Porter's Trusts. The question whether the husband could take under the Statute of Distributions in any sense was much argued in Milne v. Gilbert (12). They referred also to Hinchliffe v. Westwood (13).

Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Martelli, Mr. Teed and Mr. Osborne appeared for other defendants; and

Mr. Wickens, for the plaintiff.

July 2.—The LORD CHANCELLOR said, that although the appellant appealed against that part only of the decree by which he was excluded from the one-seventh share, yet the Court was bound to say whether they agreed with the Master of the Rolls when he decided that the fund was divisible into seven shares. During the argument it was suggested that the four nephews and nieces who survived the tenant for life were entitled to the whole. This depended on the construction of the sentence "and after the decease of my said brother and his said wife, then in trust to pay and apply the said sum, &c. equally amongst my nephews and nieces, children of my said brother

(12) 2 De Gex, M. & G. 715; s. c. 5 Ibid. 510; 23 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 828.

R. F. Cleaveland and his said wife then living, or their legal personal representatives, share and share alike." Looking at the whole will, the testator designated two classes, neither of whom took in substitution: first, those nephews and nieces who were living at the death of the tenant for life; and, secondly, the legal personal representatives of those nephews and nieces who were then dead. There was no antecedent to which the word "their" could grammatically be referred. To construe the words "legal personal representatives" as words of representation would be to deprive them of all force. The testator could hardly mean that a nephew or niece dying and leaving children, those children should take nothing, or that the legal personal representatives should take beneficially. The construction, then, by which it was held, that the testator created two classes was fully supported by the authorities referred to by the Master of the Rolls. Thus being of opinion that one-seventh was properly directed to go to the legal personal representatives of such of the nephews or nieces as were dead at the death of the tenant for life, the question arose whether the appellant was the legal personal representative of his deceased wife. His claim must prevail, unless from the whole language of the will the words appeared to have been used in another than the primary sense. To say that the person who happened to be the executor or administrator must take, and must take beneficially, would be clearly contradictory to the testator's intention, for a stranger might be nominated executor, or a creditor might take out administration. After reviewing the various cases cited, and stating that the only case which had raised a doubt in his mind was Hinchliffe v. Westwood, his Lordship said that, both according to the probable intention of the testator and the weight of authority, he considered that the Court ought to decide in favour of the next-of-kin and against the husband, and to dismiss his appeal.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE said, that he was not satisfied that the will should not be interpreted as if the whole phrase upon which the discussion had arisen had been omitted. Did "legal personal representatives" point to consanguinity? He was not satisfied that it did. Although, therefore, the appellant was, according to the correct use of language, the "legal personal representative" whatever the testator meant by the words, his Lordship was not disposed to give him more than the Lord Chancellor and Lord Justice Turner were disposed to give. There was no difference in opinion as to there being no costs of the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER said, that in determining the question the point to be considered was, what was the effect of the word "or," and what effect was to be given to the words "share and share alike,"—whether the latter words constituted a separate and independent gift? It would be absurd to suppose that the testator intended to give to executors "share and share alike." The word "or" also seemed the proper commencement of an independent gift; "or" in contradiction to "then living." Every word, if possible, ought to have effect given to it; and the word "equally," at the commencement of the clause, seemed to override the whole. Assuming the gift to "legal personal representatives" to be an independent gift, his Lordship saw nothing to limit its operation. It had been observed that there was no proper antecedent to "their"; but the gift was an independent one. That the testator did not intend to use the words "legal personal representatives" in their ordinary sense appeared from the context, where he had used the words "executors and administrators" several times.

Appeal dismissed, without costs.

Legacy—Charge on Real Estate—Statute of Limitations.

A testator, who died in 1822, by his will, gave to his brother J. B. a legacy of 100l., to be paid "as soon as conveniently may be after my decease." He then gave an annuity of 50l. to H. H., to be payable out of his real estate until one of the testator's nephews should attain twenty-one, and on the happening of that event he directed his real estate to be exonerated from the annuity of 50l. and his real and personal estate to be sold, and he annuity paid out of the income of the produce. He declared that after the nephew attained twenty-one the annuity should be a charge only on his personal estate. In 1839 the nephew came of age and the real estate was sold, and the whole income paid to H. H. in part of her annuity until 1856, when she died. In 1858 J. B., the legatee, filed a bill for payment out of the trust fund, alleging that the personally was not sufficient, but no personal representative of the testator was made a party. The Master of the Rolls dismissed the bill on the grounds that the legacy was not charged on real estate, and that it was barred by the Statute of Limitations (3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 27). On appeal to the Lords Justices,—Held, that the personal estate was the primary fund, which there was no evidence was insufficient; that there was no personal representative of the testator before the Court, and that by lapse of time the bill came too late. The appeal was dismissed, and leave to amend refused.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Master of the Rolls, dismissing the plaintiff's bill, with costs.

The suit was instituted, by Josias Bright, for payment of a legacy of 100*l.* out of a fund produced by the sale of real estate. The facts were, that Mr. William Bright, of Woodham Ferris, in Essex, by will, dated the 7th of January 1822, after appointing executors, gave to his brother, Josias Bright, the sum of 100*l.* to be paid to him as soon as conveniently might be after his decease, and also to his brother, John Bright, the sum of 150*l.*, to be paid to him within twelve months after his decease. He then bequeathed articles of furniture to his housekeeper, Harriet Hinson, and gave the sum of 150*l.* to such person or persons as the said Harriet Hinson should by her last will appoint, to be paid to such person or persons within three months after Harriet Hinson's decease; and he gave to the said Harriet Hinson and her assigns during her life, in case she should so long remain unmarried, an annuity of 50*l.*, to be issuing and payable out of all his messuages, lands and hereditaments, whether freehold or copyhold, until one of the children of his said brothers Josias Bright and John Bright should attain the age of twenty-one years, and he declared that when and so soon as any one of the children of either of his said brothers should attain the age of twenty-one years, all his said real estate should be exonerated and discharged from the payment of the said annuity to the said Harriet Hinson, it being his will and desire, that from and after that time the said annuity should be paid and payable out of his personal estate only, as thereafter mentioned. He then gave all his real estates to his executors, their heirs and assigns (subject and charged nevertheless, and the testator did thereby subject and charge the same to and with the payment of the aforesaid annuity of 50*l.* to the said Harriet Hinson, during her life, or until her marriage, until one of the children of his said brothers should attain his or her age of twenty-one years), upon trust, as soon as any one of the children of his brothers should attain his or her age of twenty-one years, absolutely to sell and dispose of the same. And the testator gave the residue of his personal estate to the same trustees, upon trust, to convert the same into money; and he directed that the trustees should stand possessed of the produce of his personal estate, upon trust, thereout to pay his debts, legacies and funeral expenses, and the charges of proving his will, and should invest the residue, and also the proceeds of the sale of his real estates in manner therein mentioned, and should stand possessed of the said several monies, stocks, funds and securities, upon trust, to continue invested such part thereof as should by the said trustees be thought adequate and sufficient to answer the payment of the said annuity of 50*l.* to Harriet Hinson, in manner thereinbefore directed, and from and immediately after her decease or marriage, upon trust to pay and apply the same in such manner and the same manner as he had directed the residue of his personal estate to be paid and applied; and as to all the residue of the said trust monies, funds and securities, and the accumulations thereof, upon the trusts therein declared for the benefit of the children of his said two brothers Josias and John Bright, that should be born at the time any one of such children should attain the age of twenty-one years

William Bright, the testator, died in the same year, leaving his two brothers surviving. Joseph Bright, the son of John, came of age on the 10th of January 1839, and was the first grandchild of the testator who did so. Soon afterwards the trustees sold the testator's real estate, and invested part of the proceeds in the sum of 1,472*l.* 4*s.* 2*d.* reduced 3*l.* per cent. annuities, and paid the dividends to Harriet Hinson, towards her annuity of 50*l.* until she died, on the 15th of October 1856. In 1858, Joseph Bright filed a bill against the personal representatives of Robert Woolsey Larcher, the surviving trustee under the will, for the administration of the trusts. The Master of the Rolls made a decree in that suit on the 6th of May 1858, whereby he declared that the legacies of 150*l.*, 100*l.* and 150*l.* given respectively to John Bright, Josias Bright, and the appointees of Harriet Hinson, were not charged upon the produce of the real estate, and directed that the sum of 1,472*l.* 4*s.* 2*d.* reduced 3*l.* per cent. annuities should be divided according to the residuary gift in the testator's will. On appeal to the Lords Justices, on the 27th of July 1858, their Lordships varied the decree only by declaring that the legacy of 150*l.* to the appointees of Harriet Hinson was charged on and payable out of the sum of 1,472*l.* 4*s.* 2*d.* reduced 3*l.* per cent. annuities.

The present bill alleged that Josias Bright, the plaintiff, though not a party to the former suit, was entitled to the benefit of it as respected his legacy of 100*l.*, and prayed a declaration that his legacy was payable out of the residuary real and personal estate, and that his and the other legacies given by the will might be paid out of the sum of 1,472*l.* 4*s.* 2*d.* reduced 3*l.* per cent. annuities. The bill alleged that the personal estate had been entirely exhausted in payment of the testator's debts and funeral and testamentary expenses. The evidence did not satisfactorily prove this, nor was there any legal personal representative of the testator made a party to the suit, there being none in existence. The defendants, by their answer, objected to the suit, on the ground of the absence of such representative, and the Master of the Rolls held, that the legacy of 100*l.* given to the plaintiff was not charged upon the real estate; and also, that if it had been, the plaintiff was barred by the Statute of Limitations. The plaintiff appealed, and for him it was argued, that the produce of the real and personal estates was blended and charged with the payment of the legacies, and that the decree in the former suit had sufficiently established that the personal estate was insufficient, even if it were held not to be conclusive as to this legacy. As to the Statute of Limitations, they insisted that there being a deficiency of the personal estate, the right of the legatee was kept alive until the death of the annuitant, Harriet Hinson, set the fund free from the payment of her and other claimants. They contended that there was no necessity for a personal representative of the testator; but even if the Court should think otherwise, leave ought to be given to the plaintiff to amend his bill. For the plaintiff, the following authorities were referred to:—

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE. — The bill in this case, which was filed in 1858, is for obtaining payment of a legacy of 100*l.*, given by the will of a testator, who died in 1822. The legacy was payable in 1822 or 1823, if there were funds to pay it. If it was payable out of the personal estate alone, of course the bill fails from lapse of time. But it is said that the legacy is charged on the testator's real estate, and at a postponed period; that is, that it is to be paid out of the proceeds of the sale of the real estates, which sale was to be deferred till the death of an annuitant, who died a few months ago. Without giving an opinion whether this is the case, assume it to be so; still the personal estate is the first fund in every sense, if not the only fund. There is no personal representative of the testator before the Court; but there is evidence of the amount of the personal estate from which it is impossible to come to the conclusion that the personal estate, if properly administered, is not sufficient to pay, at least, a part of this legacy. In such a state of circumstances, the bill comes too late, even if the real estate was, in any sense, chargeable, because the personal estate is the first fund. In every possible view the suit fails. I am not for giving the plaintiff leave to amend. The dismissal of the bill must stand, and with costs.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—The plaintiff's case rests on the assumption, that all the legacies are on the same footing as the legacy of 150*l.*, and are to be paid out of the same fund. This is not my view, nor was it the view of the Court at the time of the decision in the former suit. To the best of my remembrance, the ground of that decision was, that the legacy of 150*l.* was not payable till after the death of the annuitant; and that it was plain from the will that the whole of the fund produced by the sale of the real and personal estate, except that portion set apart to answer her annuity, was divisible before her death; and therefore the Court held, that the testator intended that that legacy should be payable out of the fund reserved for the annuity. But this is not the case with the other legacies, which are payable immediately out of the personal estate. Then the question arises, whether after this lapse of time, the plaintiff having brought the suit to a hearing in an imperfect state, the Court ought to give leave to amend the bill. I do not think it ought. I never knew a case in which the plaintiff was less entitled to this indulgence. The plaintiff had notice of the objection in the answer of the defendants. The appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

LORDS JUSTICES. } In re BURDIN'S WILL.
Aug. 4.

Settled Estates Act.

Real estate was given by will to trustees, upon trust, to pay an annuity; and after the death of the annuitant, upon trust for all her children who should attain twenty-one. Some of the children attained twenty-one, and the others were infants. Part of the property was contracted to be purchased, and a petition was presented by the infant children for an order authorizing the sale, under the Act to facilitate Leases and Sales of Settled Estates (19 & 20 Vict. c. 120); but one of the Vice Chancellors refused to make the order, and his decision was affirmed.

This was a petition, presented under the Act to facilitate Leases and Sales of Settled Estates (19 & 20 Vict. c. 120), raising the question whether certain limitations in a will constituted a settlement within the meaning of the statute.

The will in question was made by a gentleman named Burdin, whereby he left his whole property, real and personal, to trustees, upon trust, to pay three annuities, to his mother, wife and daughter; and after the death of his daughter, in trust for all the children of his daughter who should live to attain twenty-one, their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, equally; and in case there should be only one who should live to attain twenty-one, the whole to such one child. There were six children, four of whom had attained twenty-one, and two were infants. A house, part of the property, had been contracted to be purchased by the Church Missionary Society, and was alleged to be a most advantageous purchase; and the two infant children, who were entitled to two-sixths of the house, now presented a petition under the above-named act, raising the question whether this limitation of the property could be considered as a "settlement" as used in the statute.

Vice Chancellor Kindersley was of opinion that the case was not within the act;

but gave leave to apply at once to the Lords Justices, observing that he was not only willing, but desirous that that course should be taken, and that the petition must be taken as heard primarily before their Lordships.

Mr. Bagshawe, jun., supported the prayer of the petition, appearing also for the adult children.

Mr. Pearson, for the purchasers, said that his clients only wished for the opinion of the Court, whether they would have a safe title.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—I am unwilling to say that the purchaser would be safe if we made the order. If the case were carried before the full Court, and the Lord Chancellor and my learned Brother were both of opinion that it came within the Settled Estates Act, I would not dissent. For myself, however, I cannot at present say that I consider the case to be within the act; on the contrary, I think the point exceedingly doubtful.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—At present, I confess my opinion to be that the point is very doubtful; and so far from thinking favourably of the petitioners' case, I own my impression is the other way.

The application was refused; but leave was given to amend the petition.

Vendor and Purchaser — Goodwill — Name of Firm—Fraud.

The goodwill of a business comprises all the advantages that may be derived from the purchasers holding themselves out to the public as the persons interested in that business which has been identified with the name of a particular firm. Therefore, though it is well settled that the sale of a goodwill does not imply a contract on the part of the vendor not to set up again in a similar business, he is not at liberty to hold out to the public that he is continuing the same business by using the name of the old firm, even though his own name may be the only one that appeared in that firm.

For some years previously to July 1857 the defendant, John Douglas, together with the plaintiffs, Churton and Bankart, and one Booker, carried on the business of stuff-merchants at Bradford in co-partnership, under the firm or style of "John Douglas & Co." A notice of dissolution had, however, been given by the plaintiff Churton, and would expire on the 1st of January 1858. In July 1857 the defendant, John Douglas, who was also a partner in the firm of John Muir & Co., of Manchester, wished to retire from the firm of John Douglas & Co., and the plaintiffs entered into a negotiation with him for the purchase of his interest in the business. The plaintiffs alleged that in the course of that negotiation some discussion arose between the plaintiffs and the defendant, John Douglas, as to any resumption by the latter of the business of a stuff-merchant at Bradford, and that the defendant repeatedly and positively declared to the plaintiffs that he had not the remotest intention of resuming that or any other trade at Bradford; but that he would not enter into any written agreement on the subject. These allegations were denied by the defendant, who deposed that, upon the execution of the articles of agreement of July 1857 hereafter mentioned, a suggestion was made to him that such articles should contain a stipulation on his part not to resume the business of a stuff-merchant at Bradford, but that he refused to agree to any provision of that nature, and that, in fact, he had previously informed the plaintiffs of his intention to leave it open to himself to resume such business. Ultimately, articles of agreement were entered into, on the 13th of July 1857, by which the defendant, in consideration of 15,337*l.* 10*s.* 5*d.* (being the estimated amount of his share in the business taken as it then stood in the partnership books, together with a bonus or profit of 1,500*l.*), agreed to sell, and the plaintiffs agreed to purchase, upon the terms and conditions therein expressed, all his shares, rights and interest in the trade or business then carried on by him and the said G. Bank-

art, A. C. Churton and W. H. Booker, at Bradford aforesaid, in copartnership and under the firm of John Douglas & Co., and the goodwill thereof; and in all and singular the book and other debts of the same copartnership and the securities for the said debts respectively; and in all the contracts and engagements entered into with, and orders given to the same copartnership; and in all and singular the monies, goods, wares, merchandise, stock-in-trade, fixtures, furniture, articles and effects, matters and things belonging to the said copartnership, or in anywise used in or appertaining or belonging to the said trade or business. It was also provided that if the consent of Booker should be obtained, the sale was to be considered as taking effect immediately; but if such consent should not be obtained, it was to be considered as taking effect from the 1st of January 1858, when the old partnership would determine under Churton's notice already mentioned; and the plaintiffs were to be entitled to all profits which had accrued or might accrue from the shares, right and interest thereby agreed to be sold, and were to be bound by and have the advantage of certain arrangements entered into by the defendant with Booker; and the dissolution of the partnership was to be gazetted on the 1st of January 1858, or so soon before as the consent of Booker could be obtained. And after making provisions for the payment of the consideration-money (which provisions were duly performed by the plaintiffs), it was agreed that the defendant should let to the plaintiffs the warehouses and buildings situate in Hall Ings in Bradford, in which the business of the firm of John Douglas & Co. had theretofore been carried on, for seven years from the 1st of January 1858, at a rent of 550*l*.

Shortly after the execution of the agreement, the plaintiffs purchased Booker's interest; and in the month of August 1857 the following notice and circular was forwarded to the customers of the firm of John Douglas & Co.:—

"Notice is hereby given, that the partnership heretofore subsisting between us, the undersigned, carrying on business as stuff-merchants in Bradford, in the county of York, under the firm of John Douglas & Co., was dissolved by general consent on the 13th day of July last.

"John Douglas, Geo. Bankart,
"A. C. Churton, W. H. Booker."

"Bradford, August 18, 1857.

"Gentlemen,—Referring to the notice above, we beg to inform you that the business will be carried on in all respects as heretofore, under the style or firm of Churton, Bankart & Hirst (late John Douglas & Co.); and all debts due to and owing by the late firm will be received and discharged by us.

"We are yours, most respectfully,
"A. C. Churton, Geo. Bankart,
"M. S. Hirst."

On the 30th of June 1858 the defendant executed a lease of the premises referred to in the agreement, in pursuance of the stipulations therein contained. The defendant was the owner of the premises (consisting also of a warehouse) which immediately adjoined the premises let to the plaintiffs. After the dissolution of the old firm of Douglas & Co., the plaintiffs, as partners together under agreement between themselves, continued to carry on the business formerly carried on by that firm in the premises occupied by that firm, over which they placed a large sign extending over the adjoining warehouse (above mentioned as the defendant's property), and which sign bore the inscription "Churton, Bankart & Hirst, late John Douglas & Co." In the early part of January 1859 the plaintiffs for the first time discovered that the defendant had been for some months in communication with a Mr. Liversedge, the cashier both of the old firm and the new, and that Mr. Liversedge had been the medium of communication with Mr. Parker, who was also in the service of the firm. The substance of these communications was, that the defendant intended to recommence business at Bradford, as a 'stuff-merchant, and that, if the parties communicated with would enter his service, they should have an interest in the business in addition to their salaries. The result was, that Mr. Liversedge and two other persons left the service of the plaintiffs and entered that of the defendant, and on the 15th of January the defendant issued the following circular to the manufacturers of Bradford :—

"Sir,—Finding that I have not convenience for conducting the stuff-trade in Manchester, I beg to inform you that this department will be transferred to Bradford in February next, when the business will be conducted under the firm of John Douglas & Co. upon my premises in Hall Ings. —I remain, your obedient servant,

"John Douglas."

On the 3rd of February the defendant issued the following circular to the customers of the plaintiffs :—

"Bradford, February 3rd, 1859.

"Gentlemen,—I beg to inform you that the premises belonging to me in Hall Ings will be opened for business about the 15th inst., by Messrs. Liversedge, Parker & Shepherd, in connexion with myself, as stuff-merchants, to be carried on under the firm of John Douglas & Co. These gentlemen were a long time in my employment, the two former upwards of fifteen years, during which they had every opportunity for acquiring a thorough knowledge of the manufactures of this district; and their application to business is so well known, it is unnecessary for me to say more than that I have every confidence that all orders with which you may be pleased to favour the firm will be properly executed. —I remain, your obedient servant,

"John Douglas."

This circular the defendant caused to be widely distributed among the plaintiffs' customers.

On the 1st of February 1859 Mr. Thomas Shepherd, one of the men who had left the plaintiffs and gone over to the defendant, issued the following circular :—

"Bradford, February 1st, 1859.

"Having ceased to represent the firm of Messrs. Churton, Bankart & Hirst, of this town, and having joined Messrs. John Douglas & Co., I beg to thank you for all past favours, and trust I shall be in the position to merit that confidence which I have enjoyed so long. Should you be pleased to send me any orders prior to my visiting you personally, if addressed to Messrs. John Douglas & Co., Bradford, they will receive the best attention of yours, very respectfully,

"Thomas Shepherd."

None of the three last-mentioned circulars came to the knowledge of the plaintiffs, or any of them, until some days after they were respectively issued.

On the 14th of February 1859 the warehouse referred to in the defendant's circular, which is that already mentioned as being the defendant's property, and next door to that demised by him to the plaintiffs, was placarded with the name of John Douglas & Co., and since then large door-plates had been put up with the name of John Douglas & Co. engraved upon them.

On the 26th of February 1859 the plaintiffs filed the present bill against the defendant, and, after stating the facts, charged that the defendant intended to carry on the business of a stuff-merchant at the premises placarded as above mentioned; that his design was, as the plaintiffs believed, to represent his business as a continuance of that carried on by the old firm of John Douglas & Co.; that his proceedings were calculated to create, and unless restrained would create, an impression to that effect amongst the customers of the plaintiffs and the public generally. The bill prayed for an injunction to restrain the defendant from resuming or carrying on the business of a stuff-merchant at the warehouse in the bill mentioned as being next door to that of the plaintiffs, or elsewhere in or in the immediate neighbourhood of Bradford, either alone or in partnership with any other person or persons whatsoever, and either under the style or firm of John Douglas & Co. or under any other style or firm.

Mr. Amphlett and Mr. Wickens now moved for an injunction in the terms of the prayer.

The Solicitor General and Mr. Pemberton appeared for the defendant.

The arguments on both sides are fully considered in the judgment.

The cases cited were :—

Cruttwell v. Lye, 17 Ves. 335.

Shackle v. Baker, 14 Ibid. 468.

Harrison v. Gardner, 2 Madd. 198.

Kennedy v. Lee, 3 Mer. 441.

Burgess v. Burgess, 1 De Gex, M. & G. 896; s. c. 22 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 675.

Wood, V.C.—I will tell you, Mr. Amphlett, what I think you are entitled to, and, if you ask for anything more, I will hear you in reply. It strikes me you are entitled to an injunction restraining the defendant, John Douglas, from carrying on the business of a stuff-merchant, either alone or in partnership with any other person or persons whomsoever, under the style or firm of John Douglas & Co., or in any other manner holding out that he is carrying on the business of a stuff-merchant, in continuation of or in succession to the business carried on by the said late firm of John Douglas & Co.

Mr. Amphlett having waived the right to reply,

Wood, V.C. delivered judgment as follows:—It seems to me that the case, to the extent to which I propose to award the injunction, is an extremely plain one. The Solicitor General argued that the case now set up was an afterthought, and not any part of the case made by the bill; but it appears to me that the injunction, to the extent to which I think it right it should be awarded, is an injunction that is completely in pursuance of the twenty-ninth paragraph of the bill. The twenty-ninth paragraph is this:—"The defendant's intention and design, as the plaintiffs verily believe, is to represent his business as a continuation of, and, in fact, identical with that carried on by the firm of John Douglas & Co., dissolved in July 1857, and his proceedings are calculated to create, and unless restrained will, as the plaintiffs believe and have no doubt, create an impression to that effect among customers of the plaintiff as well as the merchants and manufacturers of Bradford and the public generally." That statement, I think, is clearly established upon the evidence before me. The facts of the case are these: that the business was carried on under the firm of John Douglas & Co. apparently for some considerable time. The exact time is not stated in the bill, but I see in the circular which Mr. Douglas, the defendant, issued upon commencing business with Liversedge, Parker & Shepherd this expression, "these gentlemen were a long time in my employment; the two former upwards of fifteen years." It is certain, therefore, that the firm had been established a considerable time, and the firm being so established, negotiations took place in the spring of 1857, which were not concluded until July. The arrangement ultimately agreed to, and which differed from that which was at first proposed to be made, was, that the defendant should retire from the business and the plaintiff Hirst come in his place. And it was then agreed that the price to be paid to the defendant should be this: that his share in the business should be taken as it stood in the partnership books, and that he should have a bonus or profit, as it is called, of 1,500*l*. The Solicitor General contended, not putting it very forward however, that the goodwill of the business was never meant to be included at all, and that in truth nothing was paid for goodwill. I apprehend that when a man is paid for his share as it stands in the books, he sells his share as in a going concern, and is in a very different position from that of a person at the dissolution of a partnership, when the whole affair has to be wound up, and will only get what it will produce. It is in evidence (though I ought not to rely very much upon it, because it is evidence in reply, and there has not been an opportunity of answering it, but it is sworn to, and I do not think it is suggested that it is erroneously sworn to), that the debts were taken as they stood in the books. I think the affidavit says that all debts were treated as good. We all know, when a partnership is dissolved, the number of debts thrown off as bad is considerably greater than the number which are kept on the list in the current course of business. He gets, therefore, the benefit of his share in the business as a going concern, and, looking at it in that way only, it seems to me it was clearly intended that the goodwill should be disposed of. But I find the goodwill included in the agreement. That agreement was carefully settled by Mr. Douglas's solicitor, and I give him the benefit of that careful preparation with reference to the exclusion of anything which I do not find there. I think also that I cannot do less than hold him most distinctly to everything I do find there. I take everything inserted there to have been inserted carefully. In that agreement I find he assigns his share, right and interest in the business "and the goodwill thereof;" and the question which then comes to be considered is this: what is included in the word "goodwill"? The authorities, I think, are conclusive upon this point, that the mere expression of parting with and selling the goodwill, does not imply a contract on the part of the person parting with that goodwill not to set up again in a similar business. I use the expression "similar" to avoid, at present, including the case (which I think has a material bearing on this) of a vendor seeking to carry on the identical business. He does not contract that he will not carry on an exactly similar business with all the advantages which he might acquire from his industry and labour, and from the regard people may have for him, and that in a place next door if he likes to the very place where the former business was carried on; and upon the authorities it is settled that it is the fault of those who wish for any protection against such a course, if they do not take care to insert provisions to that effect in the deed, namely, that the business shall not be carried on in the district by the vendor. Further than that, I think the defendant is fully entitled to the benefit of the observation that it was proposed to him to insert such a provision, and that he refused it. Therefore, I think this case goes a step higher than the authorities, and that the defendant is entitled to put his case in the highest possible form with regard to his right to carry on the business, provided he does not interfere with what he had sold, namely, the "goodwill," whatever that may mean.

It is said that Lord Eldon has plainly laid down in the case of Shackle v. Baker, and afterwards in Crutwell v. Lye, and again in Kennedy v. Lee, this principle, that goodwill simpliciter carries no more with it than the advantage which is possessed by occupying the premises which were occupied by the former firm, and the chance which is thereby given of the customers being attracted to those premises. It is rather too narrow a view of what is laid down by Lord Eldon there, to say that it is confined to that. Goodwill, I apprehend, must mean every advantage—affirmative advantage, if I may so express it, as contrasted with the negative advantage of the vendor not carrying on the business himself,—that has been acquired by the old firm by carrying on its business, everything connected with the premises, or the name of the firm, and everything connected with or carrying with it the benefit of the business. When Lord Eldon is speaking of a nursery-garden which the customers must frequent to look at the plants, and when Sir Thomas Plumer, in another case, is speaking of a retail shop which a person must enter in order to buy the goods there exposed, they are only, as it appears to me, giving these as illustrations of what goodwill is. But it would be absurd, as it seems to me, to say that when a large wholesale business is conducted, the public are mindful whether it is carried on at one end of the Strand or the other, or in Fleet Street or in the Strand, or any place adjoining, and that they regard that, and do not regard the identity of the house of business, namely, the firm. The word "firm," I believe, like many mercantile terms, is derived from an Italian word, which means simply "signature," and it is as much the name of the house of business, as John Nokes or Thomas Stiles is the name of an individual. The name of a firm is a very important part of the goodwill. A person says, "I have always bought good articles at such a house of business; I knew it by that name, and I send to that house of business for that purpose." There are cases every day in this court with regard to the use of the name of a particular firm, connected generally, no doubt, with the question of trade-marks. But the question of trade-marks is, in fact, the same question. The firm stamps its name on the articles. It stamps the name of the firm which is carrying on its business on its articles as a proof that they emanate from that firm, and it becomes the known firm, to which applications are made. And when a person parts with the goodwill of a business, he means to part with all that good disposition which customers entertain towards his particular shop or house of business, and which may induce them to continue their custom with it. It cannot be put at anything short of that. Surely the name that is there used is an important part of the goodwill. Indeed, we know at this moment that there are large banking firms and brewing firms and others in this metropolis which have not a single member in them of the individual name which is exposed in the firm. That being so, it appears to me that, when the defendant parted with the goodwill to the plaintiffs, he handed over to them all the benefit that might be derived from holding themselves out as the persons interested in that business which had been identified as being carried on by the particular firm.

It does not follow, I admit, from that (and this is a point which the Solicitor General much insisted upon) that there is a right to use the name of that firm simpliciter, especially as it contained an individual and only name—the name of the defendant. It may be that the goodwill of a business is parted with, together with the right of representing the vendor to the world as carrying on that very business. But it may also be that the licence of using the single name of the vendor used in the firm is not sold. Inconvenience might naturally result to Mr. John Douglas from having his name so exposed; and therefore it was very reasonable, and not in the least inconsistent with their case, that the plaintiffs should apply to him for leave to call themselves “John Douglas & Co.” simpliciter. That, it is said, he declined. But he was aware of their calling themselves “Successors to John Douglas & Company,” or “Late John Douglas & Company”; that is to say, that they identified their house of business as the house of business formerly carried on by John Douglas & Co. That, I apprehend, they were entitled to under the sale of the goodwill; and after the sale of the goodwill no one else had a right to do so. Certainly, the defendant had not the right. The name had become a known name, and the defendant himself, having assigned over the goodwill, was not entitled to represent himself to the world as carrying on that business which had been carried on by John Douglas & Co. He had parted with all right to represent himself as carrying on that business when he sold the goodwill. If it were otherwise, he would be attracting to himself the custom, not merely by his own ability, not by the simple fact of calling himself John Douglas alone, but by representing himself as carrying on that same business which he had disposed of, by which he would be obtaining the custom of that business, which emphatically must be meant by the term “goodwill,” namely, that custom which is drawn by the business in the belief that it is the long-continued business. One sees constantly advertised in the shops “Old-established business” and the like, and there is a considerable degree of attraction apparently from the constant repetition of these words. “Late John Douglas & Co.” imports this:—“We are the people who carry on the business formerly the business of John Douglas & Co.” The Solicitor General has argued that he had a right to put the case higher, and to call upon the Court to restrain the plaintiffs from making any use of the name “John Douglas & Co.,” because he says the evidence establishes that the defendant told the plaintiffs that he intended to carry on the business of a stuff-merchant (of which I give him the benefit), and that he might carry it on under the firm of John Douglas & Co. But it seems to me that there is a complete denial of that portion of the defendant's case. Looking at the likelihood of the case, I would ask any one to consider, if it had been put before these gentlemen, at the time of signing their agreement, that the defendant would move his business in the way he has moved it, using the identical name which the old firm bore, whether they would not have hesitated in paying down a sum of money as a price for the goodwill or the connexion of the old firm, which had been trading under the name of John Douglas & Co.

I must next look to what the conduct of the defendant is. I must say I regret extremely to see conduct of this description on the part of a gentleman of activity and energy in business, and anything in the shape of justification for such conduct I have not heard. He sells in July the goodwill of this business. He is at that time in a state of health which his partners believed, and he thought, rendered it unlikely that he could continue in business on so extensive a scale as he had formerly done. I find him, according to his own statement, (and really one is at liberty, in a case where the transactions have been carried on as they have been by this gentleman, to think that his own statements go to the very verge of what is favourable to his case), as early as May 1858, in communication with the principal officer of the late firm, and through that officer endeavouring to influence the other two managing men, in order to carry off the whole managing force of the business, the goodwill of which he had sold to the plaintiffs, and to set up another business under the identical firm next door and in his own name. It is all very well to say this was out of affection for Mr. Liversedge and a feeling that he was ill treated. He was in no way ill treated by those gentlemen, who paid him in cash fully for everything. All this, too, is done clandestinely. There is not the slightest trace of a communication by any one of those men to their employers of what was going on behind the backs of those employers whose interests they were about to betray. I do not want to make strong observations upon those gentlemen, because they are not parties,—they are only witnesses, and are not here. If I did so, my observations would redound much more to Mr. Douglas's discredit than theirs. I find Mr. Douglas, who has sold the goodwill of the business, within a very few months after he has sold it and has been paid for it, endeavouring to withdraw the three managing men of that business in order that he may have them in his employment, and set up the same business, under the same name or firm, and next door to those to whom he had parted with his interest in the business for a pecuniary consideration. That, I think, is an ingredient of fraud in the case which cannot possibly be lost sight of, inasmuch as what I have to try is, whether he is setting up the identical business that he sold.

Now, Cruttwell v. Lye, which is one of the authorities I have been referred to, distinctly admits this, that, although a man may set up a similar business, he is not entitled, when he has sold the goodwill of a business, to represent that he is continuing the same identical business; that he is not to say, in fact, "I am the owner of that which I have sold." Now, what does this defendant here do? Having obtained at last the withdrawal from those to whom he had sold the business, of their three principal managing men, he sets up his shop next door, and he first does this:—(I agree with his counsel that it was guardedly done; he has endeavoured to keep himself clear of actually representing that the business he is about to carry on is the same business as that which he has sold).—He issues two letters; first, a letter from Manchester, saying, "Finding that I have not convenience for conducting the stuff-trade in Manchester, I beg to inform you that this department will be transferred to Bradford in February next, when the business will be conducted under the firm of John Douglas & Co. upon my premises in Hall Ings;" then, in the next letter, "Manchester" is dropped altogether. He takes great care not to represent that he is now going to set up the business in Bradford that was formerly conducted in Manchester. The previous letter prepared the Manchester world, as well as the Bradford world, for the statement that the business was going to be transferred; but the next letter drops "Manchester" altogether, and runs thus:—

"Bradford, February 3rd, 1859.

"Gentlemen,—I beg to inform you that the premises belonging to me in Hall Ings will be opened for business about the 15th inst., by Messrs. Liversedge, Parker & Shepherd, in connexion with myself, as stuff-merchants, to be carried on under the firm of John Douglas & Co. These gentlemen were a long time in my employment, the two former upwards of fifteen years, during which they had every opportunity for acquiring a thorough knowledge of the manufactures of this district, and their application to business is so well known, it is unnecessary for me to say more than that I have every confidence that all orders with which you may be pleased to favour the firm will be properly executed." Now, who were these three men? Why, the three men whom the public had always seen in the old house. He tells the persons he addresses, there are the three men who have been for fifteen years with me, whom you have known so long engaged in the old business, who have managed John Douglas & Co.'s business so well; they have had every opportunity of acquiring a knowledge of the business, and their application to business is so well known that it is unnecessary for me to say anything more; there being not a single indication in that letter of the firm of John Douglas & Co. being different from the old firm, or anything about those gentlemen having done that act which I think would not impress the public very favourably in their behalf, namely, having left the employer to whom their present employer had sold the business, in order that they might come to assist him in setting up an opposition business. It appears to me that the defendant has not contracted against setting up in opposition to the business he has sold, but he must set it up fairly and distinctly as a separate business, not as the business he sold, not as the old-established business that must be known to all the world, but as a new business which he has commenced with the assistance of these gentlemen. It seems to me that this last letter, though attempted to be guarded, is so framed as purposely to convey, and I think it was intended to convey, the impression that it was the old firm going on with the old business, and he was conducting it with a new set of partners. That, it seems to me clearly, he is not at liberty to do after having parted with the goodwill, and I think he ought to be restrained from so doing.

There is another circumstance in the case, a letter, of which the defendant says he knew nothing, but which appears to me to lead to one only necessary result—so necessary, indeed, that one must impute to the defendant the intention of causing the result. It appears to me, that when a result is inevitable, and underhand steps have been taken to bring about that inevitable result, I must take it that the man whose acts have produced that result intended it as a necessary consequence. It is a letter from one of the persons he has so carried off. "Having ceased to represent the firm of Messrs. Churton, Bankart & Hirst, of this town, and having joined Messrs. John Douglas & Co., I beg to thank you for all past favours, and trust I shall be in the position to merit that confidence which I have enjoyed so long." Past favours were only favours to the old house, nothing else. The defendant says, he knew nothing of this, but what must be the consequence—what his intention in taking the three managing men of the old business, but that they should represent to all the world, "we are the persons who have had your past favours: we are the persons who have had that old business, and we are the persons who have established the old connexion"? It was intended, as it appears to me, that it should be so done. I think the whole thing excessively discreditable, though it is happily a case which the Court can reach.

Then, it was said, if the Court cannot restrain a man from setting up business again in competition with the old business under a contract for the sale of the goodwill, how can it stop him from using his own name? My answer first of all is this. The defendant is not using his name—John Douglas—alone, but that of John Douglas & Company. He has joined others with himself. That is the case of Rodgers v. Nowell (1), and also of Johan Maria Farina (2), where people went about and caught a person having a similar name to represent the firm, so that they might introduce the name of J. M. Farina as the chief name of the firm. So here it appears to me plain that had Liversedge, Parker and Shepherd themselves left the new firm which had bought the business of John Douglas & Co. they might be restrained from setting up the business of John Douglas & Co.; and it would be no answer to say, We have brought in a Mr. John Douglas. Does it make any difference that they have introduced the real John Douglas, who had so parted with the goodwill, which it appears to me must clearly include the firm or style of the concern? How the Court would deal with the case if the business had acquired its reputation under the single name of John Douglas, it is not necessary for me to inquire. I apprehend I should not find it necessary in such a case to rely on that fact alone, as I do not here rely on the fact alone of the use of the name of John Douglas & Co. being the only ingredient in the case. But if it had been John Douglas alone, and if I had found there, as I find in this case, that he had taken away the three managing men in the former business, and was going, as here, to set up the old firm with those three managing men, and was sending out circulars to the world, telling the world that they were so well known that it was not necessary to say anything about them, I should have held then, as I hold now, that he was not at liberty to trade under such a misrepresentation. I consider the name of John Douglas & Co. to be an important ingredient, but only an ingredient with many others; and, therefore, looking to all the facts of the case, as establishing plainly an intention or endeavour to represent to the world that he is continuing the old-established business which he had sold, he ought to be enjoined in the terms I have mentioned.

Mr. Pemberton.—Your Honour will see that this is a case in which there may be some doubt; here the business is to be carried on in future, and therefore I do not know whether you will say how it is to be done.

The VICE CHANCELLOR.—One can never do that à priori. All that is wanted is, a fair representation on his part, that it is a totally different business. The order will be: restrain the defendant until the hearing from resuming or carrying on the business of a stuff-merchant at or in the immediate neighbourhood of Bradford, either alone or in partnership with any other person or persons whatsoever under the style or firm of John Douglas & Co., or in any other manner holding out that he is carrying on the business of a stuff-merchant in continuation of or in succession to the business carried on by the late firm of John Douglas & Co.

New Trial—Issue—Devisavit vel non—Heir-at-Law.

After the trial of an issue devisavit vel non, if the verdict given satisfies the conscience of the Court that the capacity of the testator was competent to enable him to execute a will, a new trial will not be granted, at the request of the heir-at-law, though there were discrepancies in the evidence which were not satisfactorily explained.

This was a motion for a new trial of an issue devisavit vel non directed by this Court.

The testator, Samuel Swinfen, was eighty years of age when he made his will. Upon the death of his father, he, as tenant for life, succeeded to the Swinfen Hall estates in the county of Stafford. He went to reside there with his wife. He was altogether overlooked in his father's will; and being left without resources, he confined himself to two rooms at one corner of the mansion, and lived almost secluded, and kept up no intercourse with the neighbouring gentry. He complained that he found the house dilapidated and unfurnished, and the farms and lands impoverished, and he used to say that the cellar alone contained half a barrel of sour beer; he also used to attribute his impoverished means to the extravagance of Francis Swinfen, his half-brother, the father of the plaintiff.

Henry John Swinfen was the only child of the marriage of Samuel Swinfen and Susannah his wife; and in November 1830 the father and son joined in disentailing the Swinfen estates, and resettling them to S. Swinfen for life, with remainder to H. J. Swinfen for life, with an ultimate remainder to the survivor of S. Swinfen and H. J. Swinfen, and the heirs of such survivor. In 1831 H. J. Swinfen married the defendant Patience Swinfen; it was distasteful to his parents, and they were dissatisfied; but finally they were reconciled, and Mr. and Mrs. Henry Swinfen were invited to visit Swinfen Hall, but the visit was postponed, as there was no accommodation for them.

In January 1848 Mrs. S. Swinfen died. Mr. and Mrs. Henry Swinfen were immediately summoned to Swinfen Hall; they were forced, however to go every night to Lichfield to sleep, as there were no furnished apartments for them in Swinfen Hall, and return in the morning. Mr. S. Swinfen requested them to remain with him, and upon their acceding to this, he furnished a bed-room for them, and they remained with him for upwards of nine months, and then went to Barmouth, in North Wales.

The testator was a tall and corpulent man; he was afflicted with severe chronic rheumatism, and also with hydrocele, and during the next three years he became more feeble, and was unable to move about with that celerity which was necessary to the management of his affairs.

In August 1851 Mr. and Mrs. Henry Swinfen returned to Swinfen Hall; his father gave them a welcome, and said he had determined to live no longer alone; that he knew he was robbed, as he could not look after the people about him, and that his son would need two sets of eyes, to see behind as well as before. Mr. and Mrs. Henry Swinfen accordingly took up their residence at Swinfen Hall, and altered his style of living. Upon looking into the management of the estates H. J. Swinfen found it necessary to part with some of the servants; he also took into consideration the requests of Messrs. Standley and Gibson, two of the tenants, who were troublesomely importunate to have their rents reduced, though the farms upon a survey were found to be worth better rents than they paid for them; to both of these the testator gave notice to quit. He also found fault with Thomas Bacon, another tenant.

The testator had a nervous affection in the wrist of his right hand and a trembling, which made it difficult to write, and during the life of his wife she carried on all his correspondence; his son, therefore, shortly after he came to reside with his father, was requested to write his letters; these were then read to the testator, and if approved, he signed them; he also continued to sign his own cheques.

In March 1852 the testator expressed a wish to make a will in favour of his son. Mr. Morphett, his former solicitor, had died in 1848; he accordingly sent for Charles Simpson, the town clerk of Lichfield, whom he had employed on various local matters. Both father and son spoke to him about certain missing title-deeds, and also about a will the testator had made and which he desired to destroy. At the same time H. J. Swinfen produced a will he himself had made on the 14th of February 1840, by which, under a power in the re-settlement made in 1830, he gave his wife, the defendant, a jointure of 300*l.* a year; he also left her all his real and personal estates. When the testator expressed his wish with regard to his son, Mr. Simpson said—"Why the law makes a will for you." The testator, however, reminded him of the former will, and said a new will was necessary. He accordingly, with a knowledge of his son's will, made another will, giving the whole of his real and personal estate to his son. In October 1852, in consequence of reports respecting the solvency of Messrs. Blower, Palmer & Greene's bank, the testator transferred the whole of his balance from their bank to an account he had opened with the Provincial Bank of England at Lichfield.

In October 1853 he complained that writing pained him, and from that time his son signed his letters and also his cheques on his bankers. The testator during the whole of this time dined with his son and daughter-in-law, but she had usually cut his food for him; but in November 1853, while going up stairs with his attendant, Mrs. Ann Taylor, he from a weakness in his knees sank upon the stairs, and was unable to reach his room without further assistance; he was alarmed, but not hurt, and to avoid future risk, it was thought better that he should confine himself to his room. He got up usually at ten and went to bed at three o'clock, and during the day he used to sit by the window and watch the improvements going on upon his estates, and his son and daughter-in-law, and also Mrs. Taylor, sat and conversed with him day by day.

On the 15th of June 1854 H. J. Swinfen died suddenly, after a very short illness. The testator was stunned by the event, and Mrs. Swinfen was for several days unable sufficiently to collect herself for the painful interview that must follow with her father-in-law. She, however, caused the whole of her husband's family to be informed of his death: some of these letters were acknowledged, with condolences and inquiries when the funeral would take place; these were answered at the request of Mrs. H. Swinfen, the defendant. One, by Mrs. Rowley to Lady Clifton, was—

"Dear Madam,—Mrs. Swinfen feels deeply your kind expressions of sympathy for her grief. I am happy to say that though she is most keenly wounded, she is enabled to bear her sorrow with fortitude and great Christian resignation. The interment of the deceased is intended to be on Saturday the 24th, through which, I trust, she will be divinely supported. Mr. Swinfen is happily spared the affliction of this mournful event, being through great loss of memory not equal to dwell many moments upon any subject."

The other, by Mrs. Emilie Lishman to Mrs. Francis Swinfen, was—

"Dear Madam,—As a friend of dear Mrs. Swinfen, I am requested by her to say that Saturday the 24th inst. is fixed for the funeral of her lamented husband. She is much obliged to you for your kind sympathy; she is feeling as composed as her present painful position can admit of. Poor old Mr. Swinfen is unable to comprehend the extent of his great loss, and I cannot help thinking this a merciful dispensation of Providence towards our dear mourner. I am, &c.

"Emilie Lishman."

On the 20th of June Charles Swinfen, the half-brother of the testator, and his wife and daughter came to Swinfen Hall, at the request of the testator and Mrs. H. Swinfen, the defendant, to be present at the funeral, and they remained there to the 20th of July, and were in the habit of seeing the testator daily.

Mrs. H. Swinfen for several days after her husband's death felt unequal to an interview with her father-in-law. He several times inquired for her, and expressed an impatience to see her. On the morning of the 23rd of June, however, she, accompanied by Mrs. Rowley, went to see him; she was full of grief; he embraced her and said, "Do not cry; do not cry: I will take care of you." And subsequently the testator intimated to different persons his intention to leave her Swinfen. He stated it to Mrs. C. Swinfen; he told his daughter-in-law herself; he told Mr. C. Swinfen and Dr. Rowley, and on the latter saying, you will give it her for life, he said "No; I shall give it to her."

Mrs. Swinfen, after her husband's death, was anxious to know in what position that event had placed her; accordingly, on the 19th of June 1854, she sent to Lichfield for Mr. Simpson. He told her that the devise of Swinfen made to her by her husband's will had failed in consequence of his death. She then inquired what she was to do in the position she was placed. Mr. Simpson, who had not seen the testator since he made his will in March 1852, entertained ideas, from conversation with different persons, that the testator was incompetent to manage his affairs, and in consultation with Mr. Charles Swinfen, he recommended that there should be an application to the Lord Chancellor in Lunacy, asking that some person might be appointed to manage and control the affairs of the testator. He, accordingly, wrote some instructions to his agents in London, and they informed him that such an application must be supported by a certificate of two medical men, as to the unsoundness of S. Swinfen. Dr. Rowley and Dr. Evans were selected, the one being his usual medical attendant, the other having never seen him before, and their attendance was requested. On the 2nd of July 1854 they went to Swinfen Hall, but they differed in opinion. In the mean time the testator expressed a desire to make his will; and on the 4th of July 1854 Dr. Rowley and Dr. Evans, on their way to Swinfen Hall, called on Mr. Simpson, and he followed them; but as Dr. Evans expressed an opinion that instructions for making a will ought to be postponed, Mr. Simpson returned home without seeing the testator. In the afternoon of that day the testator said to Mrs.

On the same day that the will was executed Mrs. Francis Swinfen, the mother of the plaintiff, unexpectedly called at Swinfen Hall, where she had not been for years; she was accompanied by Mr. Shadwell, her solicitor. They were received by Mrs. H. Swinfen the defendant, who had never seen either of them before. Mrs. F. Swinfen inquired after the testator, and upon being told he was very well, she expressed a wish to see him. The defendant said, certainly. Mr. and Mrs. C. Swinfen then came into the room, and after a renewal of the request, Mrs. H. Swinfen sent for Mrs. Taylor, and desired her to inform the testator that Mrs. Francis Swinfen was there, and that she would be glad to see him, if he would see her. Mrs. Taylor accordingly left the room, and on her return said that Mr. S. Swinfen begged to be excused; she accordingly left without seeing him.

On the 15th of July 1854 the testator was seized with bronchitis; it proved fatal to him on account of his age, and he died on the 26th of July 1854. The trial of the issue came on on the 12th of August 1858, at the Summer Assizes at Stafford.

Mrs. Rowley, in her evidence, said, that Dr. Rowley sent her to stay with Mrs. Swinfen after the death of H. J. Swinfen; that she saw the testator, but had no conversation with him further than wishing him good morning; that on the 23rd of June she went with Mrs. H. Swinfen into the testator's room; that he received his daughter-in-law affectionately, and embraced her tenderly; and she being full of grief, he said, "Do not cry; do not cry: I will take care of you;" that it was the last time she saw him, and she was satisfied he was competent to make a will; and that she was mistaken when she supposed he did not feel the loss of his son.

Mrs. Lishman said, that she saw the testator on the 16th of June; that he apparently suffered under great mental depression; that her letter to Lady Clifton was written on representations made by Mrs. Rowley.

In her cross-examination she said, that the testator, on the occasion of her interview, had made a mistake. That she said, "Sir, are you aware of the great loss you have sustained?" that he said, "Mrs. Swinfen is dead." That she said, "No, sir, she is not dead: it is your son.' That he said, "Then why does not Mrs. Swinfen come up to me?" That she said, "She is not in a state; her mind is too much distressed to come at present." That she then delivered the message with which Mrs. Swinfen had charged her, and said, "She sends her love to you, and she will come when she is equal to it." That he said, "Go down, and tell her to come up to me." That his mind was tolerably clear up to his last illness.

Mr. Simpson said, he had not seen the testator from March 1852, when he made his will, until the 5th of July 1854; that he had been informed that, after his son's death, he was unable to give any directions for the management of his affairs; that it occurred to him in consequence, that it might be expedient to apply to the Lord Chancellor in Lunacy, but that no medical certificate could be obtained that the testator was of unsound mind and incapable of managing his affairs, and that consequently the notion was abandoned; especially as it was in accordance with the conclusion of other persons competent to form an opinion of the testator's capacity; and that he subsequently saw the testator, and concurred in that opinion.

The jury gave their verdict in favour of the defendant in this suit, and in support of the will.

Mr. Edwin James, Mr. Hobhouse and Mr. Henry James, for the heir-at-law, now moved for a new trial.—The acts of the witnesses were at variance with their evidence. This, and the other discrepancies which were to be found throughout the evidence, entitled the heir-at-law to a new trial of the issue.—

Harewood v. Baker, 3 Moore, P.C.C. 282.

Pemberton v. Pemberton, 13 Ves. 290.

Mr. Kennedy and Mr. Cole, for Mrs. H. Swinfen.—The verdict was right both in fact and in law. The devisee had to prove that the testator was of testamentary capacity; it did not lie upon her to prove that the testator was a man of vigorous intellect or of strong mind; but it was proved by a chain of incontestable evidence that he knew perfectly what he was about when he made his will ; that his real intentions were carried into effect ; that no fraud was practised, and that no undue influence was exercised upon him. The case made by the heir-at-law was, that the testator, from the death of his wife in 1848, fell into a state of imbecility ; that his son and daughter-in-law were forced upon him by Dr. Rowley ; that he was unwilling to receive them, and that their arrival was an intrusion which he only tolerated ; that the son became master, and that the father gradually sunk into a state of imbecility. This case, however, was wholly disproved, and it was finally admitted that the testator was competent to make a will up to November 1853, when he had the fall ; from which time, it was now said, he fell into gradual imbecility. It was proved that he had an affection for his daughter, and that there was none towards the plaintiff's family. There was evidence of memory, and that he was alive to his affairs, and that he was anxious for the welfare and the future of his daughter-in-law. There was no proof that the testator ever made a foolish or irrelevant remark. His servants treated him with respect ; and their treatment, and that of children, has in all ages been considered by philosophers as proving they were entitled to respect ; and Cicero, in De Senectute, speaking of blind Appius says, "Sic senem, in quo est adolescentis aliquid, probo : quod qui sequitur, corpore senex esse poterit, animo nunquam erit." After his son's death he expressed a wish to settle his affairs. He was impatient at the absence of his daughter-in-law ; this was proved by the evidence of the ladies : the letters of the two were mere expressions of opinion, imperfectly formed, and which they found to have been erroneous. On behalf of the plaintiff, some reference had been made to lucid intervals ; they applied to lunacy only, and not to this case, which was one of torpor or comparative feebleness, which might, as in the present case, be caused by a startling or unexpected event. Even Dr. Evans, who had said he was not capable of making a will when he saw him, had not ventured to swear he might not be capable of making a will on another day ; he had gone to the utmost extent, when he said it was highly improbable. It was known in the physical world that paralysis had been counteracted by a strong fit of the gout. Under such circumstances it was that the testator stated his intentions, and impatiently expressed his wish to settle his affairs, and was not satisfied until he had done it. The Court would protect even persons labouring under imbecility in the exercise of their rights. In Ridgeway v. Darwin (1), Miss Kendrick, under a Commission, had been found not lunatic, but of mind sufficient for the government of herself, her manors, &c. Upon a petition complaining of the verdict, the evidence and the result of a personal examination were handed to Lord Eldon, and from these there appeared to exist imbecility of mind, proceeding in a great degree from epilepsy. The order made was that she should be protected, and that she should not be allowed to execute any instrument, except under an attestation directed by the order ; and with respect to her physicians : he said, " I will direct two physicians, who have not been concerned and consulted, to talk to those who have been concerned and consulted, and see the evidence, and afterwards, in the most tender manner, to find the means of visiting her without alarming her, for the purpose of determining whether her state of mind is competent to the management of her affairs." The plaintiffs have to prove a criminal act against five or six persons. Have they proved it? Yet they have to prove it, as if they were indicting them on a charge of conspiracy. The defendant has not to prove the negative. Irresistibly, however, it is shewn that there was no common object, and that no two would have combined to effect it. Mrs. H. Swinfen was left alone on the death of her husband ; it disconnected her with the family. From that moment she, who had been in daily attendance upon him in his room, was absent, and Dr. Rowley, in his attendance upon him, alone conversed with him. On each occasion he expressed his desire to provide for Mrs. Swinfen ; but the Doctor communicated the fact neither to Mr. Simpson nor to Mrs. Swinfen until the 24th of June, when he mentioned it to Mr. Simpson. There was clearly no common object. Mrs. Swinfen also was no friend of Mr. Simpson; he had seen her but once until she sent for him to ascertain her position; and when this was done he of his own accord took a course entirely adverse to her interests. He conceived the idea that the testator was imbecile, and incapable of managing his affairs, and he proceeded to carry out that idea—to obtain a commission to manage the affairs of Samuel Swinfen. Had this been fully developed, there was an end of any probability of a will. This was continued until the 28th of June; it was not abandoned on the 3rd of July; on the 5th of July he saw the testator for the first time since 1852, he then leaves him in doubt whether he will make his will. Again, Mrs. H. Swinfen invites Mr. and Mrs. Charles Swinfen to the house. They were persons of position—members of the family—intimates of the testator. Mr. C. Swinfen was not a young man; and Mrs. C. Swinfen was a lady of talents, accomplishments, and intelligence. Was it probable that Mrs. H. Swinfen could obtain an ascendancy over them? What interest had they to procure a will for the defendant? On one occasion only Mrs. C. Swinfen took an active step, and that was when, at the request of the testator, she sent to Dr. Rowley that he might send to Mr. Simpson. Even that shews Dr. Rowley to have been slow, and that it required some stimulus to put Mr. Simpson in motion. True, he had mentioned it to him on the 24th of June; but Mr. Simpson was not sent for until the 29th of June. Such circumstances as these must satisfy the Court, expand them how you may, that no conspiracy existed; but such must be the end if the plaintiff's case is true. It remains to consider what degree of testamentary capacity the law requires to be established. A man goes into the room of an octogenarian; he finds him sitting silent. Casual observers are apt to fancy he has not much in him, or that his capacity is weak. Those opinions are formed by persons who do not talk to him, or with whom he will not talk, or who do not understand him; but they are not to infer that he has lost his testable capacity, or that his faculties are so impaired that he cannot transact business. That is not so.

Mr. Swinfen had no disease affecting the brain, or likely to affect his mental powers. There was neither apoplexy nor paralysis: his disease was local. Old age merely raises no presumption of testamentary incapacity. In Lewis v. Pead (2) a lady of seventy-five gave a large property to her bailiff. It was there said that "there must be substantial ground for suspecting fraud, and that her being old was no proof that she was imposed upon." There have been cases where persons afflicted with paralysis have been capable of making wills. There was the great Duke of Marlborough, of whom the satirist says:—

Down Marlborough's cheeks the tears of dotage flow.

But history says no such thing of him. He made his will after he was struck with paralysis, and he lived six years after that, and died in 1722; but after the stroke his mouth was so awry that he could not pronounce many words, and many he pronounced so imperfectly that he did not like strangers about him, and he was seen only by his most intimate friends; but still he made an important codicil to his will in 1721, disposing of personal property of considerable amount.—Coxe's Life of the Duke of Marlborough. Lord Somers also was afflicted with paralysis, in the latter days of Queen Anne. This is an instance of capacity being roused by a shock, for having had a severe fit of the gout, which in some degree counteracted the effect of the paralysis, the Ministers around George the First, when he came to the throne, sent for Lord Somers, and he was offered a seat in the Cabinet. Mr. Swinfen had nothing about him to affect the brain. A late honoured Judge was afflicted with hydrocele; his abilities were transcendent, and they remained so to the last, before he retired from the Bench. The late Sir Herbert Jenner Fust was another instance. He was afflicted with both gout and stone, and had the same nervous affliction that Mr. Swinfen had, so that he was scarce able to raise a glass of wine to his lips. Mr. Swinfen could not feed himself; yet Sir Herbert retained his faculties, and so did Mr. Swinfen. His memory was enfeebled; but that is so with old men, particularly with regard to dates, recent events, and trifling matters which do not affect them—things they do not care much about. Cicero, speaking of old men, has truly said—" Omnia quæ curant meminerunt." They remember everything they care about. It was not because his memory was in some degree enfeebled that he became fatuous, or that he was to be pronounced imbecile. The greatest men have their memories enfeebled in advanced age. Lord Campbell, in his Life of Lord Eldon, remarks, that in the last eight or ten years his memory became enfeebled upon ordinary matters; and yet Lord Eldon made his will, disposing of his immense property, a month only before he died; and who ever thought of impeaching that? Yet his age was ninety-three. These cases establish irresistibly the conclusion, that it is not because Samuel Swinfen was an old man, and because his memory was partially enfeebled, that therefore it is to be inferred that he had not the power of judgment on a matter in which he was deeply interested, and upon which he never failed to reiterate his earnest desire. In Osmond v. Fitzroy (3) it was held, that when a weak man gives a bond, if there be no fraud or breach of trust in obtaining it, equity will not set it aside merely because of the weakness of the obligor, if he be compos mentis. The bond there, however, was set aside, having been obtained by a servant trusted with the care of Lord Southampton. In Griffin v. De Veulle (4) Lord Thurlow said:—"This Court will not set aside the voluntary deed of a weak man, who is not absolutely non compos, nor any deed of improvidence or profuseness, where no fraud appears. The case of Osmond v. Fitzroy cannot be supported but on the mixed ground of Lord Southampton's extreme weakness of understanding, as well as of the situation of Osmond." In 1 Madd. Ch. Prac. 375, 3rd edit. it is laid down: "The Court will not measure degrees of understanding, and say that a weak man may not give as well as a wise man." In Pratt v. Barker (5) an infirm man of eighty years old made a deed to save legacy duty, by which he gave property, after his decease, to the defendant, who had attended him as a surgeon. No undue influence was used, and the nature of the deed was explained to the grantor by his solicitor before execution; but, notwithstanding some suspicion, a bill to set aside the deed was dismissed.

In Griffiths v. Robins (6) the donor was eighty-four years of age and nearly blind, and depended upon the assistance of the defendant, who had married his niece; and it was there held, that to maintain a gift under such circumstances the donee must establish by the intervention of a third person that the gift proceeded from the free-will of the donor, and was fully understood by her. The evidence of Mr. Sporling, who had before acted as the attorney of the grantor, did establish the intervention of a third person and the free-will of the grantor, and the decree, upon appeal, was affirmed. Again, the character of the instrument is to be considered, whether it is easily intelligible or whether it is complex or difficult. The will in this case is clear. This principle was adverted to in Willan v. Willan (7), where an uncle a few days before his death, while confined to his bed in a state of bodily and mental weakness, made a complicated agreement for a lease; this was set aside, but on the same day he made a codicil, which was thought valid. Then follows Ingram v. Wyatt (8), the principle of which was that if a testator was of ordinary capacity, sane and strong, proof of bare execution is sufficient; when the man is weak, clear proof of intention is required and the absence of fraud. The will, however, was set aside, because there was no evidence establishing the absence of fraud, but strong evidence impeaching it for fraud. Durling v. Loveland (9) also confirms that principle, and Barry v. Butlin (10) qualifies it, since it decides that instructions are not the only proof of the knowledge of the contents. The will was prepared by the solicitor of the testator, and he took a large benefit under it; but it was upheld, because there was no proof of any fraud, although his only son was excluded; so far it was a strong case. The testator was held to be of weak but testable capacity. Then there is Williams v. Goude (11), the principle of which is that when there is contradictory evidence as to the capacity of a man to make a will, the Court must be guided by what took place when the instructions were given and the will executed. The influence to vitiate an act must amount to force and coercion destroying free agency. In Evans v. Knight (12) the Court considered that there was clear evidence that a man of very weak mind had his faculties roused by his desire to make a will, and it held that evidence to that purport overrode the evidence of medical men, who gave it as their opinion, derived from their visits at other times, that he was incapable. Dr. Pritchard, in his work On Insanity, says, "In cases of impaired memory the faculties of judgment can be exercised in a sound manner when the attention can be sufficiently aroused"; but in this case it is not necessary to resort to that hypothesis, and Sir H. Halford, in a lecture delivered by him at the College of Physicians, mentioned a variety of cases of persons who were always in a torpid state for a great many years, a kind of lethargy, and who had by some startling circumstance all their faculties to such a degree that they were able to do many important acts. It is well known, both in medical and legal experience. The case of Harewood v. Baker has no application to the present; here the testator carried into effect his own expressed intentions of leaving everything to his daughter-in-law. There remain some cases relating to the practice of the Court. Lord Eldon expressed an opinion, most strongly, against granting new trials as a matter of course, and that practice has been entirely altered. All the cases lay it down that the conscience of the Court requires it to be satisfied; that is both a useful and sensible practice, otherwise the litigation may go on in infinitum. But in Wilson v. Bedard (13) it was held, that an heir-at-law was not entitled as a matter of course to a second trial of an issue devisavit vel non. In Waters v. Waters (14) there was only one trial, and a new trial was refused, with costs. In O'Connor v. Cook (15) it was laid down that Courts of equity when they administer equitable relief ought to be satisfied that the questions upon the facts have been distinctly and fully before the jury. There is the case of McGregor v. Topham (16). Then there is Boyse v. Rossborough (17), in which a new trial was granted; but Pemberton v. Pemberton recognizes the principle that the Court is at liberty to refuse a new trial. In Standen v. Edwards (18) a new trial was refused, though some witnesses had been kept back. What, now, has the plaintiff to complain of? Has he not had a fair trial. Has he not had a favourable summing-up by the Judge? Every point was presented to the jury which could be made in his favour. It has been suggested that because the compromise was mentioned, the feelings of the jury were excited by it, but that has not been supported by affidavit; but the only allusion to it was that the plaintiff must have thought very badly of his own case when they persisted so long in the endeavour to enforce that compromise, which the defendant denounced, and the bill to enforce which was said by Lord Justice Knight Bruce to be a pis aller, and he believed it was meant to be nothing more. If that was so, what could they hope to gain but delay and the death of aged witnesses? As it was, the devisee lost some most material witnesses; still she obtained a verdict, and this Court is asked to ignore it, though it has the approval of the jury, the public, the bar and the country.

Mr. Edwin James, in reply.

Jan. 12.—The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The only question is, whether Samuel Swinfen was in a state of mind competent to make a will. The jury have found that he was. The heir-at-law contests the propriety of this finding, and moves for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence. The rules respecting new trials are less stringent in equity than they are at law, and the practice here has always been, not to consider merely whether there was evidence which would support the finding of the jury, and in that case to refuse a new trial; but the course in courts of equity has been, to consider whether, having regard to the entire subject-matter, and to the whole of the evidence given at or before the trial, and what has since become known, the Court is satisfied that full and complete justice has been done between the parties, and that no further investigation is necessary for the purpose of attaining that end; and unless it is so satisfied, the Court requires that the matter shall be again tested by an examination before a jury, with such directions and modifications as it may consider desirable for the fair, thorough and impartial sifting of the whole matter.

The evidence now before the Court consists of three distinct sets: first, that which was given in the Court of Probate, when the paper in question was propounded as the will of Samuel Swinfen; secondly, the evidence given in this cause; and, thirdly, the evidence given at the trial of the issue. It would uselessly occupy the public time to discuss all this evidence; to note, compare and contrast the repetitions, the resemblances, and the contradictions which occur in various parts of this testimony, or to detail the various impressions produced on my mind by the perusal and consideration of the evidence of each witness. All that it is necessary or proper now to do, is to explain distinctly my view, and the grounds for the conclusion at which I have arrived. The general outline of the case is this:—An old man of eighty years of age, of declining health, loses his only son by a sudden and unexpected attack of illness. Three weeks afterwards he made a will, giving his landed estate and mansion, and all the chattels and personal property connected with it to the widow of his son, and three weeks after he has so done he dies. The will is attested by the solicitor, who was sent for to prepare it, by the medical gentleman who habitually attended the old man, and by his brother.

They all depose to his sanity, and competency to make a will. On the other hand, one of the attesting witnesses to the will, only ten days before, sent instructions to his agent in London to take steps for the purpose of obtaining the assistance of the Court of Chancery to manage his property, stating him to be in a state of fatuity immediately after the son's death. Two ladies, one of them the wife of the physician who attested the will, the other, Mrs. Emilie Lishman, who was intimate in the family, write letters, in which they announce the son's death to the father's relations, and in them state that the old man is incompetent to understand, not merely the extent, but even the nature of his loss. A physician of eminence is brought from Birmingham to examine the state of the health of the old man four days before the document in question is signed; he repeats his visit after the intervention of a day, three days before the will is signed, and on both of these occasions he pronounces the old man to be wholly incompetent to make a will. On the day on which the will is signed, the sister-in-law of the old man, the mother of the heir-at-law, comes to the house to see him, but she does not obtain access to him. It is obvious that such a case requires a careful and jealous sifting; and after this has been done it may well be that not merely a jury, but any person, however much accustomed to consider, weigh and compare the effect of opposing testimony, may hesitate long before they come to a conclusion.

In the first place, in all these cases I lay out of consideration as far as possible the propriety of the disposition made by the testator. I am apprehensive that, in such cases, it does happen, perhaps not unfrequently, where the evidence is nicely balanced, that the jury are swayed by their opinion of whether the will contained such a disposition of the testator's property as it was fit that he should make. Unfortunately, this consideration can never be wholly excluded, because in cases of unsoundness of mind the will itself may disclose tokens of a perverted intellect, but even in these cases the contents of a will are a very dangerous ground to rest upon, even when connected with other testimony; but in cases where there is no unsoundness of mind, but rather an absence of mind, and the only question is, whether the deceased person knew what he was doing, the contents of the will can rarely be brought to throw light on that subject. Accordingly, in this case I wholly and totally disregard the circumstance that the document purporting to be a will, and signed by this infirm old man, simply restored his son's widow to the position in which she was before the son's death, and in which she would have been in had the dates of the deaths of the father and son been transposed. I look exclusively at the testimony of the state of mind of the alleged testator. If he was competent to make a will, his intentions, however much they may be disapproved of, must be carried into effect. If he was not competent, the contents of the will being such as he would have made if he could, and such as others might have wished him to have made, will not make it valid. If, as expressed in argument, the will was concocted, it cannot stand, although it was for a laudable purpose. I have also kept in view that the burthen of proof lies on the defendant, who sets up the will; and I consider, first, how the alleged will is supported, and I look at the testimony of the witnesses who attested the will. If the case were confined to their testimony, nothing could be clearer or more convincing. Mr. Simpson, a legal practitioner of long standing and great respectability in the city of Lichfield, swears positively to the competency of the old man to give instructions on the 6th of July, and to his competency to understand it on the 7th, and to the fact that he did understand it and did sign it with a full and accurate knowledge of its contents. Dr. Rowley, a medical gentleman of advanced age and high character, swears positively to the same effect. Mr. Charles Swinfen, the half-brother of the old man, who with his wife were residing in the house, gives exactly the same evidence. There is no hesitation or doubt on this point: they all three swear positively to the same fact. After considering this case in every way, I am unable to suggest or imagine a theory which can enable any Court to get over this testimony short of imputing wilful and corrupt perjury to these three gentlemen. It could not be mistake, it could not be negligence; they knew that S. Swinfen was very old, that he was in a state of failing health, and that his mind and memory were less vigorous than they had been; they had one and all abundant opportunities of knowing whether the old man was or was not competent to make the will; and if he was not, they must have united together to concoct a spurious document, for the purpose of transferring the Swinfen estates from the heir-at-law to the widow of the son. I look for the motives which could have induced these three gentlemen to unite in so disgraceful a combination. I find literally none. Pecuniary interest not only is not alleged, but the absence of it is proved. Indeed, so far as C. Swinfen is concerned, he lost thereby his share, whatever it might be, as one of the next-of-kin of the old man, of the personal property in and about Swinfen Hall.

The only possible suggestion of the motive that has occurred to me is a feeling of compassion for the widow of the son. It may possibly be suggested that they might think that the sudden decease of the son, which had produced so great a change in the prospect and condition of his widow, ought to be repaired, and that it would be but fair if they were to do for her what the old man, if he had been competent, would, in their opinion, most assuredly have done. But even if this were so, it is wholly inadequate as a motive to account for such a transaction. Three respectable gentlemen do not combine together to commit what is little short of forgery, and support it by perjury for the purpose of redressing those calamities which the sudden and unforeseen death of a near relative may inflict on some one of their friends or acquaintances. But it does not stop here. They could not have been the only persons engaged in this conspiracy. Mrs. Patience Swinfen, the defendant, Mrs. Charles Swinfen, the sister-in-law, who would derive no advantage from it, and the nurse, Mrs. Taylor, must all have combined with the solicitor, the doctor and the brother to commit this fraud. It goes a step still beyond this, for on the assumption of such a combination the conduct of all the persons engaged is wholly inconsistent with any idea of reason or sense. If the conduct of these three gentlemen is referable to a plan to concoct a will for the old man and to obtain his unconscious signature to the document, it is impossible to conceive a more bungling performance, or a case in which greater care was taken to provide for their own detection, for they were active in obtaining testimony to refute their own assertions. On the assumption that a plan was formed to concoct the will for the old man, nothing could have been more simple than to have kept every one away from him but the persons engaged in the transaction, and those who had been in the habit of seeing him, viz., Mr. Simpson, Dr. Rowley, Mrs. Patience Swinfen, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Swinfen, and the nurse, Mrs. Taylor, who waited upon him. If they had done this, the thing was accomplished beyond the possibility of discovery. The old man had not once, for eight or nine months, left his bed-room in consequence of the accident which occurred as he was going up stairs in November 1853, and of his bodily infirmity; it is the common case of both sides that when he began to keep his room he was in the full possession of his faculties. It could have created no suspicion if no other persons had been allowed to see him, so in the ordinary and natural course of events he would have seen no one, and no one would have come to him. But if these three gentlemen were cognizant of the infirm state of his intellect, and that he was in a state of fatuity, if they intended to make a will for him, the sending for Dr. Evans was an act of positive insanity. If the old man was fatuous, they must have seen it; they must have known from the high character of Dr. Evans that he would be privy to no fraud and to no irregular transaction. I consider, therefore, the sending for Dr. Evans to be a badge of the bona fides of the conduct of these persons. On this supposition, also, why did Mr. Simpson scruple about preparing the will on the 5th of July and not on the 6th? But adopt the opposite supposition, on the assumption that they really believed the testator to be competent to make a will, though of feeble and even of a decaying mind, the whole matter is clear and consistent. It is important to keep carefully in view the two modes of looking at this case,—the only two in which it can be regarded by the plaintiff, the heir-at-law, whether Samuel Swinfen was in a state of complete fatuity evident to any one who had fair opportunities of observing him; in which case the conduct of the three attesting witnesses is a gross fraud, as Samuel Swinfen was in such a state of mind that fair, honest and reasonable persons might well hesitate about his competency, in which case the Court must consider and weigh who had the best opportunities of forming an accurate judgment on this subject. It is, no doubt, to be observed that the sending for Dr. Evans to test the mental capacity of the old man is a proof that they or that some one or more of them had a doubt on the subject, and wished to be fortified by his opinion; but this circumstance is not a sufficient reason for rejecting their clear and distinct evidence on the competency of the old man, because if it comes to a balance of opinion between the three attesting witnesses and Dr. Evans alone, the Court must necessarily give the greater weight to the greater number, who had more frequent opportunities of seeing the testator. The case in favour of the will, as derived from the evidence, is not that the testator was not enfeebled in mind as well as in body, but the question is whether it was to such an extent as to render him incompetent to make a will. These gentlemen swear positively that he was competent on the 6th and 7th of July; is their testimony to be rejected because Dr. Evans swears as positively that he was not competent on the 3rd and 4th of July? I fully believe the testimony of both. I believe that the old man was competent to give instructions for a will on the 6th of July, and on the 7th that he did so, and that he signed the will, knowing and approving of its contents. I also believe that this is not inconsistent with his having been incompetent to do so on the 3rd and 4th of that month. It is unnecessary to have recourse to any doctrine of lucid intervals to reconcile this testimony. Lucid intervals undoubtedly only apply to cases of insanity; here there were no delusions. The infirmity insisted upon is decay of mind, and this, judging from the evidence, no doubt existed to some extent, and I believe that it was gradually getting worse; but it is not the fact that in such a case of the gradual decay of the intellect, the sufferer is always less competent to remember or to think on each succeeding day than he was on the preceding day, and that this process goes on regularly and constantly without any alteration. If it were so, it would be wholly at variance with our experience of all other conditions of the human intellect. The variation in the power of the intellect and the vigour of the mental faculties between one day and another is a matter which every one is conscious of to some extent, and these seem to depend on causes not readily perceptible or ascertainable.

In persons in perfect health, the mind and the power of perception are more rapid at one time than another. The power of recalling names, dates, events, passages of authors formerly committed to memory, is occasionally more active and acute at some times than at others, even in persons in health; but still more so in cases of persons in ill health. It certainly would be a new fact if it could be established that in advanced old age, or in any of the stages of disease, the mind of the sufferer were not one day competent to do or remember what on another day it would fail in accomplishing. In fact, the evidence in this case, if it is believed, exactly proves this fact in the case of the testator. Mr. Simpson states that, on conversing with him on the 5th of July, he did not think the testator was in a competent state to give instructions for his will, and he refused to prepare any will in consequence; but on the 6th he considered him competent, and accordingly he obtained the instructions. He prepared the will and obtained the execution of it on the following day. I repeat, that the conduct of Mr. Simpson in so acting is evidence of his bona fides. Certainly, if the state of Mr. Swinfen on the 3rd and 4th of July was that of complete and perfect fatuity it would not be possible to believe that, on the 6th and 7th, he could have been competent to make a will, and, after a careful consideration of Dr. Evans's evidence, I think that he was convinced that the state of the old man was that of complete and perfect fatuity, or nearly approaching it; but I think that he must, if such was his opinion, have come to an erroneous conclusion. I know not that, in a mere question of testing the capacity of a decaying intellect to do any particular act, a medical man would more than another man be competent to form a correct opinion. Some previous acquaintance with the person examined would seem to be necessary in coming to an accurate conclusion in such a matter, where any question exists at all. It may well be that the habits and disposition of a man may tend to produce a belief that he is in a state of fatuity, when in truth he is not so. If a man remains perfectly silent to all questions put to him it may be very difficult to ascertain whether this arises from an incapacity to understand the questions put to him or to a sulky determination to answer nothing. Even the answers given to questions put may be tinged with the same disposition, and bear the appearance of foolish or senseless words when intended only to signify a surly dislike to be questioned. I think it may well be that Dr. Evans, or any other physician of eminence, might be mistaken as to the capacity of a man whom he had visited two days consecutively for the first time in his life, even though the visits had lasted much longer than Dr. Evans states his to have continued. But I think it impossible to believe that a person in daily attendance on an old man should be deceived as to this point, and I think it difficult to believe that any one well known to him and who visited him daily for a considerable time should be mistaken on this subject. The nature of the subject necessarily makes the evidence as to incapacity much less trustworthy than the evidence as to capacity. A physician who visits a patient several times may say, with perfect truth, I never saw a sign of intellect about him, and therefore I infer that he had none; still, he may be mistaken, though he speaks perfect truth. But, on the other hand, if a person visits a patient and swears that he made rational answers to questions, and gave clear and distinct marks of his capacity, he cannot be mistaken, he must be perjured if his evidence be erroneous. It is the distinction between proving a negative in opposition to an affirmative: the one may speak perfect truth, and yet be mistaken; the other cannot be mistaken, he must be perjured if his testimony be not correct. I have, therefore, come to the conclusion that the evidence of the three attesting witnesses and of Dr. Evans is not inconsistent, having regard to the nature of the subject-matter to which they depose, and I have the fullest conviction that they all conscientiously and honestly give their testimony believing it to be true. I once more refer to the distinction regarding Mr. Swinfen's competency. I think the state of Mr. Swinfen was not one of utter and complete fatuity such as to preclude all doubt or question as to his competency. That is clear from parts of Dr. Evans's testimony, for it is remarkable that, in the interview which he had with the testator, when Dr. Rowley was making some observations to Mr. Swinfen which might have had the effect of testing the extent of the capacity of the testator, Dr. Evans interposed by an observation which I construe thus: "It is not proper for you to persuade that man to make a will, or to put words into his mouth as to the persons to whom his property is to be left; it ought to be his own spontaneous, voluntary act." This, no doubt, was very right if the object had been then and there to take instructions for the will, but if the object was simply to ascertain what the testator thought or wished, or was capable of thinking or wishing, it might have been more satisfactory to have known in what way the testator would have answered the questions or suggestions of the medical man who was in the daily habit of attending him, even assuming these observations or suggestions to have been highly improper. It is not, however, necessary to pursue that subject into the channel to which it leads, because the case of the plaintiff is, not that undue persuasion was used to induce Mr. Swinfen to make the will in question, but that he was ignorant of what he was doing. The case is not one of undue influence, but is one of a concocted will, to which his unconscious signature was obtained. Regarding the evidence of the three attesting witnesses and of Dr. Evans together, if the case rested on their evidence alone, I should come to the same conclusion as the jury at law. But there is further evidence in the case, and there certainly remain some circumstances which require to be explained. First, how it was that Mr. Simpson should, on the 26th of June, have sent the instructions to Mr. Cole, his agent in London, which are now in evidence, and which describes the state of Mr. Swinfen in the manner that is there set forth. I have examined the evidence on this point, and although it is not so satisfactory as ought to be afforded, still the explanation which he gives of that circumstance must be treated as sufficient to account for it. At least, I have arrived at this conclusion, that the opinion he expressed to Mr. Cole, though inconsistent with his subsequent conduct in preparing and attesting the will and his present testimony, ought not to have weight to the extent of discrediting his present evidence in favour of the competency of Mr. Swinfen.

The next circumstances that require explanation are the letters of the two ladies, Mrs. Rowley and Mrs. Lishman, describing the state of health of old Mr. Swinfen. These, undoubtedly, shew their belief of his incapacity at the time they wrote, which was within a few days after the son's death, but the evidence satisfied me that they had but imperfect means of forming an opinion, and these letters cannot be treated as more than an exaggeration of the failing condition of old Mr. Swinfen's mind and body, and they ought not to be allowed to counterbalance the direct testimony of the six witnesses who speak positively to the contrary, I mean the three attesting witnesses, the nurse Mrs. Taylor, Mrs. Charles Swinfen, and the defendant. The defendant, undoubtedly, has a large interest in the question; her evidence must necessarily be taken with great caution; but, after reading it more than once, I see no reason for disbelieving any single word uttered by her.

The unanimous testimony of all the witnesses on all sides, so far as it has any bearing on the subject, shews perfect propriety of behaviour on her part throughout the whole transaction. She does not appear to have once asked the testator to give her the property; she took no part in obtaining the instructions; she suggested no course to be taken; she objected to none that was thought proper by Mr. Charles Swinfen, Dr. Rowley and Mr. Simpson. It is but due to her when I state that this is my impression, derived from a careful perusal of the whole evidence; and, further, that if she had thought fit to exert her influence over him she would probably have obtained still greater benefits from the testator. I think it unnecessary and undesirable to comment in detail on the evidence of all the witnesses. I have stated the general view I take of the case, and the steps leading to the conclusion I have arrived at, and the grounds on which I have based my decision. I have before doing so read carefully not only the evidence, but the elaborate summing up of the learned Judge who tried this case, who, I infer, had formed a different opinion on the whole case to that which I have arrived at. But his Lordship observed to me in his letter transmitting the notes, that he was not dissatisfied with the verdict; that it was eminently a question for the jury. And I find that the jury, after having had the advantage of observing the manner and demeanour of the witnesses who gave evidence, and notwithstanding the obvious tendency of the observations of his Lordship, had little doubt or hesitation in giving their verdict in favour of the will. I concur in that verdict, and I think it my duty to state that if, on the evidence now before me, the jury had come to an opposite conclusion, and if the defendant instead of the plaintiff were here asking for a new trial, I should not have thought myself justified in concluding the rights of the parties without a further investigation; but on the case as it now stands, and on the verdict given by the jury, I think that they have properly affirmed the capacity of the testator to make the will in question, and that this motion must be refused.

M.R. } TILLET V. THE CHARING
March 16, 17. } CROSS BRIDGE COMPANY.

Specific Performance — Uncertainty of Contract—Compensation.

A company contracted to purchase the interest of leaseholders in a piece of land for a given sum, and for the conveyance in fee of a piece of the land which they were to take under the compulsory powers of their act of parliament. The agreement contained a clause that the company were to be consulted on any buildings to be erected in the line of street, and that differences should be settled by two parties named, or their umpire. The company held the contract suspended, and after their compulsory powers expired they refused to complete the contract. Upon a bill for specific performance, —Held, that the agreement respecting the buildings was vague, and that the Court could not decree a specific performance of the contract.

Held, also, that as the agreement was uncertain, no compensation could be awarded; but as there was a concluded agreement, the Court dismissed the bill, without costs.

This bill was filed, by Alexander and John Tillett, praying that the Charing Cross Bridge Company might specifically perform an agreement they had entered into for the purchase of a plot of land, situate in the parish of St. Mary, Lambeth, in the county of Surrey, or otherwise that the contract might be rescinded, and that the company might pay the costs, and make compensation to the plaintiffs for the injury they had sustained, and that the company might in the mean time be restrained from applying to parliament for powers inconsistent with, or enabling them to contravene the contract, or to take the lands on any terms other than those of the contract.

The plaintiffs were lessees of four pieces of land, held under the Archbishop of Canterbury for ninety-nine years, from the 29th of September 1824, at the rents, for the first piece, of 85*l.*, and 3*l.* 5*s.* 6*d.* for redeemed land-tax, and for the second piece, of 5*l.*, and 5*s.* for redeemed land-tax; and a further rent for the first of 28*l.* 5*s.*, payable to John Sawyer and Earl

George Clayton, and for the second a peppercorn; and for the third piece 134*l.*, and 12*l.* for redeemed land-tax; and for the fourth piece 7*l.*, and 5*s.* for redeemed land-tax. A great number of houses had been erected upon these plots of land.

By the 12 & 13 Vict. c. li. the company were empowered to improve the approaches to the Charing Cross Bridge, on the Surrey side; and on the 15th of May 1852 they gave the plaintiffs notice that they should require, for the purposes of their act, the land on which thirty houses, which they specified, stood. This led to negotiations, and the result was as follows:—Memorandum of heads of an agreement, dated the 4th of July 1853.—The company to pay Messrs. Tillett the sum of 5,500*l.*, which enables them to pull down, for the purpose of making the street shewn by the white strip on the plan, the houses or buildings indicated. The old materials of the houses, &c. so pulled down, to be the company's. As to such houses as adjoin any of the said houses to be pulled down, the company are to shore up the same, and the exposed party-walls of the same the company are to properly cement. If such party-wall is not of the thickness of one and a half brick, the company to make it of such thickness; but if this be not necessary, by reason of Messrs. Tillett intending to build a new house adjoining, then the company are to pay in money one-half the estimated value of the work so dispensed with. The company to convey to Messrs. Tillett the freehold of the ground shewn on the plan by a red colour. As to the houses which Messrs. Tillett may build on the frontage of the new street, it is understood that both the company and themselves are equally and mutually interested in the character of the street as a respectable and attractive public thoroughfare, and the company is to be consulted on any houses proposed by Messrs. Tillett, and in case of difference between the parties on this point, Messrs. Charles Lee and Richard Withall, or their nominee, shall have power absolutely to define and decide any such question. If by reason of any legal technical difficulty the conveyance of the freehold of the red pieces on either side of the street from the company to Messrs.

Tillett can only be done by the company first taking (as under the powers of their notice to Messrs. Tillett) the whole of the property embraced in that notice, and which comprehended both the red colour on the plan and the white street between, at a gross amount of purchase-money, and then afterwards, at another agreed amount of purchase-money, selling to Messrs. Tillett as freehold the property on the red colour only; and if for such purposes we are asked the amount of those two purchase-moneys, we reply, they will be 8,500*l.* and 3,000*l.* respectively: the only importance of these amounts being, that they should shew as their difference our determined amount of 5,500*l.* as due to Messrs. Tillett.

Two other clauses provided for the payment by the company of the costs and expenses of Mr. Withall.

In the event of a sewer being constructed by the company down the street, and Messrs. Tillett using the same, or any portion, for the drainage of their houses, then Messrs. Tillett to pay for the portion so used, at the rate of two-thirds of the value thereof.

The memorandum, and also a plan, were duly signed by the agents of the plaintiffs and defendants.

The plaintiffs caused many applications to be made, requesting the defendants to complete the purchase, but without effect.

On the 30th of December 1856 the company served the plaintiffs with notice of an intention to apply to parliament to alter the bridge and approaches, so as to adapt the same to the passage of horses and carriages, and for other purposes, and that they required the property in the schedule annexed for the purposes of such alterations. Upon inquiry on behalf of the plaintiffs, the clerk of the company said, the defendants intended to abide by the contract made, but that other houses of the plaintiffs would be required for the undertaking.

The defendants, by their answer, admitted that their agent duly signed the memorandum, and also a plan of the ground; that it was not final, but merely preliminary to a more formal, perfect and complete agreement, and that it was not intended to be conclusive, as it made no provision for Messrs. Tillett paying the rent; that the agreement could not be performed, as it was vague, uncertain and incomplete; that their powers to execute the works expired on the 13th of June 1854, and that the defendants had no power to perform the agreement; that if the plaintiffs were entitled to any relief it was in damages only, but that they could not be assessed in this court; and after insisting that the plaintiffs were entitled neither to relief nor to compensation, they claimed the benefit of the objections as if they had demurred to the bill.

Mr. Lloyd and Mr. De Gex, for the plaintiffs.—The length of time since the contract was made is not relied on as a bar to the relief asked. The contract was clear and definite. Messrs. Tillett were to receive 5,500*l.* for their interest in the houses taken, with a conveyance back of a part of the land in fee, and the company were to purchase the fee simple of the whole property in the plan for 8,500*l.*, and to sell the fee of part for 3,000*l.* The notice to take the land was of itself a contract which this Court would complete upon finding the price to be paid, and it may be varied by the contract between the parties, so as to allow the company to avail themselves of the compulsory powers in their act. It was arranged that the houses to be built were to be attractive, but no house was to be built unless the parties could agree. It, therefore, introduced no uncertainty into the agreement. The agreement ought, therefore, to be performed, or compensation made for the losses the defendants had sustained by the uncertainty which had prevented the property from being let or dealt with:—

Mr. Baggallay, for the defendants.—The Court cannot perform the agreement. The bill was not filed until after the compulsory powers of the act had expired. The agreement was also incomplete and uncertain. The manner of laying out the houses on each side was not specified. The mode and style of the houses had also to be considered. In fact, nothing but preliminary heads had been arranged, that they might be embodied in a complete agreement:—

Darbey v. Whittaker, 4 Drew. 134.

Collins v. Collins, ante, 184.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—If the agreement was such that no Court could perform it, that is, assuming it was not valid or that it was void for uncertainty, in these cases no right to compensation would arise; but, assuming the agreement to be valid, but that it could not be performed in consequence of the expiration of the compulsory powers to take land, it may be a question whether compensation ought not to be awarded for any loss, inconvenience or damage that might have been sustained (1).

Mr. Lloyd, in reply.

March 17.—THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I collect from the evidence that something more was intended to make the agreement more formal and regular; but still, the memorandum must be considered as a concluded agreement, which, if there were nothing else, this Court would enforce. The Court has, in many cases, enforced the specific performance of agreements, which were so far preliminary that they were to be expanded and embodied in larger terms, and were left with the solicitor for that purpose.

Two objections are taken upon the agreement: one that the powers of the company had expired, and the other upon the vagueness of the terms of the agreement. With respect to the expiration of the powers, I am by no means clear that the case depends upon whether the powers existed, or whether they had expired at the time when the bill was filed or not. The rights of the plaintiffs would prima facie depend upon the position of the parties at the time the agreement was entered into, as it was then that the mutual liabilities were incurred. Upon looking, however, at the terms of the agreement, I do not think it can be carried into effect. There are several elements of uncertainty in the agreement, but I intend to refer to one alone; it relates to the houses, which are to be built on the frontage of the new street. It was argued that this was an essential part of the contract. Assuming that the contract is otherwise free from doubt, the houses were to be of a character and description which must be settled by Charles Lee on the one side and Richard Withall on the other, or by their nominee. Assuming it, then, to be a case of differing, and that they had not settled anything before the bill was filed, I at one time entertained some doubt whether, where the persons themselves were named, and it was not clearly shewn that they could not perform the functions which were required of them, and with which they were entrusted, and there was nothing to shew that they had repudiated them, whether this Court in that case would refuse specific performance. In the case of Gregory v. Mighell (2) an agreement was made in 1799 to grant a lease for twenty-five years at a fair and just annual rent, to be fixed by two indifferent persons, the one to be chosen by the plaintiff and the other by the defendant, with liberty to the arbitrators, in case of their differing, to choose one or more umpires. The tenant entered and remained a considerable time in possession. The bill was filed in 1811, and the Master of the Rolls decreed a specific performance of that agreement. He said the plaintiff had no other title to possess the land, and therefore his possession was prima facie to be referred to the agreement. Then he referred to the non-payment of rent, and accounts for it by the circumstance that the rent was not fixed in the manner stipulated by the agreement. He then proceeds:—"After it was known that the arbitrators had not fixed any rent, and that none of the other means provided by the agreement were resorted to, the defendant still acquiesced in the plaintiff's retaining possession of these lands. That is a case in which the failure of the arbitrators to fix the rent can never affect the agreement. It is in part performed, and the Court must find some means of completing its execution. As I have already said, the plaintiff is not to be considered as a trespasser. Some rent he must pay; the amount must be fixed in some other mode; and it seems to me that it should be ascertained by the Master without sending it to another arbitration, which might possibly end in the same way. A specific execution of this agreement must, therefore, be decreed; the Master to ascertain what, in 1799, would have been the fair rent of these premises upon a lease for twenty-one years from that year, and I do not see how I can exempt the defendant from the payment of the costs." That case does appear to go a great length, but it must be explained by the fact that the agreement was for a fair and just annual rent, to be fixed and ascertained by two indifferent persons. This question was fully considered by Sir Wm. Grant in Milnes v. Gery (3), which was an agreement for sale, the price to be ascertained by two persons, one to be appointed by either side, or by an umpire to be appointed by those two in case of disagreement. Sir Wm. Grant decreed that that agreement could not be specifically enforced; he said, "The more I have considered this case, the more I am satisfied that, independently of all other objections, there is no such agreement between the parties as can be carried into execution. The only agreement into which the defendant entered was to purchase at a price to be ascertained in a specified mode. No price having ever been fixed in that mode, the parties have not agreed upon any price. Where, then, is the complete and concluded contract which this Court is called upon to execute? The price is of the essence of a contract of sale. In this instance the parties have agreed upon a particular mode of ascertaining the price. The agreement, that the price shall be fixed in one specific manner, certainly does not afford an inference that it is wholly indifferent in what manner it is to be fixed. The Court declaring that the one shall take and the other shall give a price fixed in any other manner does not execute any agreement of theirs, but makes an agreement for them, upon a notion that it may be as advantageous as that which they made for themselves. How can a man be forced to transfer to a stranger that confidence which, upon a subject materially interesting to him, he has reposed in an individual of his own selection? No substantial difference arises from the circumstance that in this case the decision may ultimately fall to an umpire not directly nominated by the parties, as through the medium of the original nominees, they had an influence upon the choice. No one could be chosen without the concurrence of the persons in whose judgment they reciprocally confided. The case of an agreement to sell at a fair valuation is essentially different. In that case no particular means of ascertaining the value are pointed out; there is nothing, therefore, precluding the Court from adopting any means adapted to that purpose." It is upon that principle that the case of Gregory v. Mighell must be sustained. This case undoubtedly is not a question of price; but Sir Wm. Grant, I think, puts it in a way which cannot be disputed, which is, whether the matter in question is of the essence of the contract, whether it is an essential part of it; and I think that the building and the mode in which these houses are to be built is an essential part of the contract. In Milnes v. Gery it was shewn that the price could not be agreed upon between the parties in the way they had contemplated. Here it is not proved that the style in which these houses were to be built could not be determined in the mode contemplated by the parties, because there was nothing to shew that when the time arose for building the houses, these two gentlemen might not agree upon the character of the houses, or appoint a nominee to determine the question. It was argued that this Court could specifically enforce a contract which, it may afterwards turn out, is incapable of performance. Suppose it should so happen that these gentlemen will not fix the character of the houses, and will not have anything to do with the matter; the result will then be that the Court ought not to have decreed specific performance. The Court cannot decree specific performance hypothetically on an event to happen hereafter. This was illustrated by the case of Darbey v. Whittaker. There the price was to be fixed at a valuation to be made by two persons to be named, or their umpire: that is to say, to be valued "by Mr. George Knight and Mr. Lowndes, or their umpire." And on those very words it was held, that the agreement was too vague to be specifically enforced. As, therefore, I consider this provision to be an essential part of the agreement, and that it cannot be enforced with certainty, I can make no decree for the specific performance of the contract, but as I think there was a concluded agreement between the parties, I shall dismiss the bill, without costs.

DUIGNAN v. WALKER.

Injunction—Trade Restriction—Distance—Measurement.

For the purposes of an injunction not to carry on business within a fixed distance from a particular place, that distance must be measured as the crow flies, and not by the nearest practicable route.

Mr. Giffard and Mr. Karslake moved to commit the defendant for breach of an injunction which had been obtained by the plaintiff, restraining him "from practising or carrying on business as an attorney or solicitor, or clerk to an attorney or solicitor, at any place within seven miles from the plaintiff's office or place of business at Walsall, in the county of Stafford, except the town of Wolverhampton, in the same county, without the plaintiff's consent in writing first had and obtained." Since the injunction had been granted the defendant had practised as an attorney in the Dudley County Court, which the plaintiff alleged to be within seven miles, as the crow flies, from his office at Walsall, although by the nearest practicable route it was over that distance. The question was, how the distance was to be measured. They cited Lake v. Butler (1).

Mr. Roberts, for the defendant, claimed to have it measured by the road. If the parties were practically seven miles apart, it did not signify how near they were in reality.

WOOD, V.C. said that the distance must be measured in a straight line upon a horizontal plane; and the defendant not admitting that, even by this mode of measurement, the County Court of Dudley would be found to be within seven miles of the plaintiff's offices, there must be an inquiry.

WOOD, V.C. } THE CORPORATION OF LIVER-
July 20, 21. } POOL v. WRIGHT.

Clerk of the Peace—Agreement to pay by Salary in lieu of Fees—Public Policy.

A clerk of the peace appointed by the corporation of a borough under the Municipal Corporations Act, holding office during good behaviour, and having fees attached to his office, cannot enter into an agreement with the corporation to receive a salary and account for the fees, such an agreement being void on two grounds of public policy: first, because a person accepting an office of trust can make no bargain in respect of that office; and, secondly, because the law presumes that all the fees are required for the purpose of enabling him to uphold the dignity and perform properly the duties of his office.

This was a demurrer. The bill stated the passing of the Municipal Corporations Act (5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 76), whereby provision is made for granting, upon the request of the council for any borough, a separate Court of Quarter Sessions of the Peace, to be held in and for such borough, and for the appointment by such council of a fit person to be clerk of the peace during his good behaviour, the separate grant of Quarter Sessions for the borough of Liverpool, and the appointment of a

The 3rd paragraph of the bill was as follows:—"At a meeting of the council of the borough of Liverpool, held on the 13th of November 1844, with a view to appointing a successor to the office, the following resolution was passed:—"That regard being had to the duties of the clerk of the peace of this borough, it is the opinion of this council that the net emoluments of that office ought not to exceed the sum of 500*l.* per annum."

"4. At the same meeting, and after the above resolution was passed, the defendant was appointed clerk of the peace of the borough. Previous to his appointment the defendant had been fully informed of the views of the council concerning the emoluments to be derived from the office of clerk of the peace, and he accepted the office on the terms of the resolution set forth in the 3rd paragraph.

"5. The Recorder of the borough of Liverpool having held a greater number of sessions each year than was contemplated at the time of the appointment of the defendant, and the business in the office of the clerk of the peace having increased, the council of the borough agreed in the year 1848 to pay the defendant the additional sum of 160*l.* annually, besides defraying the disbursements incidental to the office, making the emoluments of the office amount to the annual sum of 660*l.*

"6. The agreement between the plaintiffs and the defendant, upon and from the time of his first appointment, was that the surplus of fees received by the defendant as clerk of the peace of the said borough, after the payment of his said salary, but, as from the time of the said increase in the salary, subject also to his retaining thereout the said disbursements incidental to the office, should be placed to the credit of the borough fund.

"7. Up to the year 1851 the costs of prosecutions were paid out of the borough fund, but in that year Government placed Liverpool on the same footing upon which other boroughs and counties had been for some time placed, and agreed to defray the costs of such prosecutions out of a sum annually voted by parliament for that purpose.

"8. In Liverpool prosecutions are conducted by the town clerk as public prosecutor, the money for the necessary disbursements being provided out of the corporate funds.

"9. These disbursements, so far as regards prosecutions at the borough sessions, comprise counsel's fees, the fees of the clerk of the peace, and payments to witnesses. The bills of costs, including these disbursements and the professional charges of the town clerk are taxed by the clerk of the peace, and after each session, up to the time when Government agreed to defray the costs of such prosecutions, the town clerk submitted to the finance committee a list of the disbursements, which included the fees of the clerk of the peace, though the same were not actually paid, being treated as a matter of account and placed to the credit of the department of the clerk of the peace in the borough fund account.

"10. When Government undertook the repayment of the costs of prosecutions it became necessary that a formal order of the Court of Quarter Sessions upon the treasurer of the borough for payment should be obtained, and the clerk of the peace objected to tax the bills of costs as formerly and to obtain the necessary order of the Court, on the ground that each of the bills included the amount of the fees of the clerk of the peace, and the order to be obtained amounted to a certificate from him that those fees had actually been paid.

"12. With the view of obtaining the orders for payment and transmitting the same to Government, the fees due to the office of clerk of the peace were paid to the defendant as from February 1852; but he has never accounted for them to the treasurer, and the amount of such fees, together with other fees received by him as clerk of the peace, has considerably exceeded the salary and disbursements."

The 13th paragraph averred that the defendant, subsequently to the agreement by Government, had received salary at the rate of 660*l.* a year, having on the 31st of August 1852 received from the treasurer 34*l.* 7*s.* 1*d.*, being nineteen days' salary due on the 28th of May 1852, and given a receipt for the same as salary, and he subsequently received fees as from February 1852, having thus received salary and fees for the same period.

14. "At the time when the payment for salary mentioned in the last paragraph was made, there was also paid to the defendant 208*l.* 4*s.* 4*d.* for salary for a period subsequent to the 28th of May 1852."

The bill prayed that the defendant might be decreed to account with the plaintiffs in respect of all monies received by him in respect of fees payable to the clerk of the peace of the borough, and of all sums received by him in respect of salary or on account of disbursements, and of all sums which would have become payable to him for salary or disbursements as from the month of December 1851, and to pay what should be found due.

Mr. Amphlett, Mr. G. M. Giffard and Mr. E. Macnaghten, in support of the demurrer, relied upon the following grounds:—First, there is no agreement alleged upon which the plaintiffs are entitled to relief; secondly, the agreement as alleged is illegal, as being against public policy; thirdly, if not illegal, it was, at all events, without consideration; and, lastly, the subsequent circumstances alleged in the bill shew that the agreement is no longer applicable, or the plaintiffs have no longer any interest in its performance. They cited the following statutes and cases:—

Harrington v. Klopogge, 2 Ball & B. 678, n.; s. c. 2 Chit. Rep. 475.

Mr. Rolt and Mr. C. Hall, in support of the bill, contended that there was nothing illegal in the agreement as alleged, there being no allegation of such a corrupt bargain as would render it void under the statute of 5 & 6 Edw. 6. The defence was dishonest; during part of the time the defendant had received fees and salary, and the plaintiffs were clearly entitled to an account—Sharp v. Taylor (1).

WOOD, V.C. (without hearing a reply).—I think this demurrer must be allowed. There is a little difficulty, no doubt, in arriving at what the agreement is; but I should be sorry to allow the demurrer on that narrow ground alone, and therefore I take the agreement to be such, in effect, as is represented in paragraph 6, namely, an agreement that upon and from the time of the appointment of this gentleman as clerk of the peace, the surplus of his fees received by him, after payment of his salary, but, as from the time of the increase in the salary mentioned in the previous paragraph, subject to his disbursements being allowed, should be paid over to the credit of the borough fund. I say it is a little difficult to arrive at that being the agreement, because the 3rd paragraph clearly states that the net emoluments of the office ought not to exceed 500*l.* per annum, which would be a matter in the hands of the town council, and they would be capable of adjusting the fees from time to time in order to arrive at that amount. Then, the 4th paragraph says, that previous to his appointment the defendant had been fully informed of the views of the council concerning the emoluments to be derived from the office of clerk of the peace, and he accepted the office on the terms of the resolution, which might well be consistent, as has been urged, with his being willing at all times to assent, as far as his assent is requisite, to any reduction in the fees, without raising any claim to compensation, so long as the amount of salary was retained at about 500*l.* a-year. It is exceedingly difficult to get at the agreement as it is stated in the bill; but if the agreement is good for anything, I suppose it is meant by the 3rd and 4th paragraphs to be for all time after the appointment, which he holds during good behaviour, the resolution being that, regard being had to his duties, it ought not to exceed 500*l.* a-year. It seems a very reasonable arrangement to come to, that when the duties have increased the salary should be increased; but it seems a sort of fluctuating agreement, very difficult for this Court to perform, being an agreement, not under seal, by a corporation with an officer who holds his office during good behaviour, that from time to time, regard being had to the increase of his duties, he should have a salary instead of fees. That is a strange sort of agreement for the Court to enforce. However, I take it in the view most favourable to the plaintiffs: that the agreement is to be taken as it is stated in paragraph 6; that he is to pay over all the surplus, after the payment of the 500*l.*; but they, out of their bounty, have made him an additional allowance of 160*l.* a-year. At all events, after keeping 660*l.*, he was to pay over the balance to the borough fund.

It seems to me that there are two plain grounds of public policy which render such an agreement illegal; and there is a third point arising from the situation of the plaintiffs, which I will consider presently, and which does not seem to me at all to improve their position, but rather to increase their difficulty. The two grounds of public policy are these. There is, first, the whole class of statutes, agreeing to a great extent with the common law in that respect, although making the common law more forcible, and giving additional penalties—a class of statutes, which say that an office of trust of this description is not an office as to which any bargain can be made. I am now dealing with the corporation as if they had nothing to do with the table of fees; I will keep that separate. I will suppose that they simply have the appointment of the clerk of the peace; that no table had been made, and that no Secretary of State was required to sanction them; in which case he takes such fees as are allowed by the county. There is a class of authorities, and that class of statutes, the only effect of which, as I said before, has been to give additional sanction by penalties, to the doctrine of the common law, by which any officer who accepts an office of trust is prohibited from making any payment in respect of such office, and any person appointing him to the office is prohibited from receiving any payment. When the statute uses the word "corrupt," I apprehend it does not depend on whether the person does it with a corrupt motive or not, or whether the person having the appointment is a public body or not; and I put in the course of the argument the case of a trustee of a charity appointing a steward of a manor at a salary, intending the surplus fees to go to the charity. It is, within the meaning of the statute, equally corrupt if any public body having the appointment to an office of this description, says, "although upon your appointment to the office you at once obtained the right to receive certain fees which are considered proper and sufficient, and not more than sufficient for the discharge of the duties of that office, you shall make over a part to me, the appointor, or to my cestui que trust, if I am a trustee." Any person doing that would have been obnoxious to these statutes, obnoxious also to the common law, and such an agreement would be an illegal agreement on that ground alone. Therefore, when a person appointing a clerk of the peace entitled to such fees makes a bargain that he shall pay over part of the fees to the person who appoints him, it does come within the purview of the statute. Mr. Hall says that he is the officer of the corporation, and they may pay him a salary if they like. But that is not so, it is quite clear. They have the appointment, but he is appointed during good behaviour; he is not appointed at a salary, and could not be appointed at a salary, as the payment is provided for distinctly by the 125th section of the act. He is to have those fees which are sanctioned by the Secretary of State; he takes by virtue of the appointment; he is entitled during good behaviour, and he is entitled to the fees allowed by the county before any table of fees had been fixed at all. Therefore, whether the fees he takes immediately on his appointment to the office are the fees he takes through the county, or the fees he takes through the medium of a table of fees appointed by the corporation, to those fees he is absolutely entitled, and with one shilling of those fees he is not entitled to part to the persons appointing him. That is the first ground of public policy.

Then there is a second ground of public policy, for which the case of Palmer v. Vaughan is the leading authority, which is this, that independently of any corrupt bargain with the appointor, nobody can deal with the fees of a person who holds an office of this description, because the law presumes, with reference to an office of trust, that he requires the payment which the law has assigned to him for the purpose of upholding the dignity and performing properly the duties of that office; and therefore it will not allow him to part with any portion of those fees either to the appointor or to anybody else. He is not allowed to charge or encumber them. That was the case of Parsons v. Thompson. Any attempt to assign any portion of the fees of his office is illegal on the ground of public policy, and held, therefore, to be void. This gentleman, when appointed, must be taken to have fees which are only the proper fees for him to receive. He takes that set of fees, and is not entitled to alienate any portion either to the appointor or to anybody else. Those two grounds alone would strike at the root of any such agreement as I have supposed to be averred upon the face of the bill, but I have felt some difficulty in finding out what the agreement is, supposing it to be as is averred in the 6th paragraph.

Now let us see whether the position of the corporation improves their legal right upon this statute. They have, besides the circumstance of their being appointors to the office, the power of fixing the fees with the consent of the Secretary of State, and they have the power of diminishing those fees; and, therefore, they, of all others, should be the last persons to wish to enter into an agreement of this sort, because they have the whole fees in their hands; and accordingly that resolution in the 3rd paragraph might be a reasonable resolution to come to, that 500*l.* a-year is enough for such an officer. All they have to do is, to adjust and vary the fees from time to time, with the consent of the Secretary of State, and to take care that he shall never get more, unless his duties so increase as to make it reasonable that he should have more; but the value of the resolution and of the communication of the resolution to any officer is this, that on applying to the Secretary of State to reduce the fees, that officer's mouth is stopped, and he cannot say they are doing him an injury in reducing those fees which were fixed at the time of this appointment, that appointment being during good behaviour. The answer would be that he was told at the time of his appointment, that 500*l.* a-year was considered sufficient, and all that the reduction does is to bring him down to that position. That might be a perfectly legitimate course, and one that might be perfectly successful, as it seems to me.

But now, taking the view assumed in the bill, in addition to the grounds of public policy arising from the corporation being the appointors to the office, who cannot, therefore, take back any of the emoluments, you have this additional fact, that there are means, considering the position they are placed in, of increasing these fees, subject, of course, to the approbation of the Secretary of State, who might or might not be acquainted with all the circumstances of the case. They have the power of imposing fees, to be paid not merely by the borough fund, but by the public generally, and when they have imposed that table of fees, which they have the power of raising or lowering, the surplus is to go into the chest of the municipality, and though they cannot levy, as Mr. Rolt says, anything on the public themselves, they cannot make the depositors of railway plans or the like contribute a farthing to the borough fund, yet they may hold out to the public that the proper amount of fees to be paid to their officer is so much, and so arrange it that they shall have 100*l.* or 200*l.* surplus, which shall go into their own fund. That makes the case rather worse instead of better. I do not say that it has happened here at all; but it is a privilege which might be very greatly abused. Take what has already happened, that the government now pay the fees for prosecutions, which did fall on the borough fund; it would be a way of enriching the borough fund at the expense of all the tax-payers throughout the country. They say the fees are much higher than they need be; we do not think the clerk of the peace wants more than 660*l.* a year, but we will tell the world that the clerk of the peace wants 6,000*l.* a year, and we will tell Her Majesty's Government that prosecutions ought to be paid for at such a rate, and we will put the extra amount into the purse of the corporation. How can that be consistent with any principle of public policy? This is not the case of illegality which is raised by the demurrer. The question of illegality raised by the demurrer is the general question of public policy, whether any clerk of the peace holding office during good behaviour, having fees attached to his office, can alienate any of those fees to any human being, or whether it is consistent with the acts of parliament that he can alienate them to the persons who appoint him. But there is an additional ground here suggested, why in the particular case before me, this corporation having the power to shift the table of fees, it would be singularly objectionable and more than usually obnoxious to the objection on the ground of public policy, that persons so situated should have this power. There was a case suggested which I could understand, which was this. Supposing, though it is contrary to the facts stated on the bill, that all the fees payable to the clerk of the peace were payable out of the borough fund, and that he had no other fees to receive, then, no doubt, there might not be so much ground for objection in saying, we are content to pay you in the shape of fees, and under a table of fees these particular sums, but, in reality, we shall only pay you a salary because it would be reduced to a mere matter of book-keeping. The best answer to that is, that it is not any such thing. If it were, the course would be to sweep away the table of fees and pay the salary. I could understand an act of parliament saying, as has been done with regard to many officers of this court, we think it right that the public shall pay a certain amount of fees still, and that the officers shall account for them; but until an act of parliament is passed for that purpose it is quite plain that a municipal corporation has no power to deal with a fund in that way, and even if the whole fees happened to be paid out of the borough fund, which they are not, I question whether, within the authority of the act of parliament, they could enter into this arrangement; but as the thing stands at present there are none paid out of the borough fund, because, in reality, the Government pays the bulk, and then there are the other fees.

The only remaining point is, with reference to the thirteenth and fourteenth paragraphs. First, it is said, the clerk of the peace has the fees in his hands, and therefore he ought to account for them, on the principle of Sharp v. Taylor. But that is not so. The principle of public policy, which says that the fees are inalienable, prevents your accounting for the fees. If the defendant had executed a solemn deed assigning his fees, still the law says he cannot part with them; they are necessary for the dignity of his office, and he must hold them whatever may be the consequences. That is as regards the fees. As regards the salary, it might possibly be alleged that there was some degree of injustice in his holding both the salary and the fees. Whether that might be recovered under all the circumstances of the case might be a question. If the plaintiffs wish to amend their bill for the purpose of trying that, I have not the least objection. It is clear that upon this bill they could not succeed, on account of the Statute of Limitations, because the only payment of salary is alleged thus: that on the 31st of August 1852 the defendant received 34*l.* 7*s.* 1*d.* for salary due to the 28th of May 1852, and at the time when the payment for salary was made, that is August 1852, he received a sum of 208*l.* 4*s.* 4*d.* That being more than six years ago, of course it could not be dealt with upon this bill. If the plaintiffs think it worth while to amend upon that point, of course I shall give them leave to amend. As to some observations of Mr. Rolt, with respect to the honesty of this defence, I am bound to say, in justice to the defendant, that where there is a clear objection as there is in point of law to the bill, the defendant is justified in raising the question, and in getting rid of the suit by raising the short point. The question of propriety or impropriety of conduct hardly comes into consideration on demurrer. It is a simple question on the point of law; nothing else is raised, and nothing else can be raised. He wishes to put an end to a suit which may become harassing, and which can end in no result, and I cannot tell on demurrer what the nature of the defence may be. The demurrer will be allowed, with liberty to amend.

STUART, V.C. } HANDLEY v. DAVIS AND Feb. 9. } ANOTHER.

Trustees' Relief Act, 1847—Payment of Legacy into Court—Costs.

Where the trustees of a legacy, given for the benefit of a lady for life, with limitations over, one of such trustees being also the residuary legatee under the will, refused to comply with the request of the tenant for life, that they would pay the legacy into court under the provisions of the Trustees' Relief Act, 1847, although she offered to pay the costs of the proceedings for that purpose, and she consequently instituted a suit and obtained an order for payment of the fund into court, the costs of the suit were directed to be paid out of the residue.

This was a suit to have transferred into court a sum of 10,000*l.*, and the stocks, funds and securities in which the same had been invested, the plaintiffs, the Hon. Caroline Handley and her second son, an infant, claiming to be entitled thereto under the will of George Trafford Heald, deceased.

By the will in question, the testator gave all his real and personal estate to Daniel Davis and Henry Daniel Davis, upon trust to convert the same into money, and out of the money so produced to pay his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses and legacies, and invest the residue in government or real securities. He then directed his trustees, in the first place, to set apart the sum of 10,000*l.*, or the securities on which the same should have been invested, and stand possessed thereof upon trust for the said Hon. Caroline Handley, during her life, and after her death upon trust for her said second son, living at her decease, in case he should attain twenty-one, with other limitations over in favour of her children. The testator then gave the residue of his property to the said Henry Daniel Davis.

After the decease of the testator the said trustees set apart and invested a sum of 10,000*l.* out of his residuary estate, pursuant to the direction contained in the will.

Subsequently, and in May 1858, the plaintiff, the Hon. Caroline Handley, through her solicitor, requested the said trustees to pay the said trust fund of 10,000*l.* into court, under the provisions of the Trustees' Relief Act of 1847, and offered to pay their costs of so doing.

To this request the trustees declined to accede, alleging that the sum was already invested pursuant to the trusts of the will; that they saw no reason for paying the fund into court; and they declined to take a proceeding, the effect of which would be to divest them of a trust which they wished to execute. The bill in this suit was, consequently, filed against the said trustees as defendants.

The case now came on to be heard upon motion for decree.

Mr. Malins and Mr. Nalder, for the plaintiffs, asked for an order in conformity with the prayer of the bill, that the sum of 10,000*l.* might be paid into court, free from all charges of investment; that the same when paid in might be duly invested, and the interest of such investment paid according to the directions of the will; and that the defendants might be ordered to pay the costs of the suit.

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Martindale, for the defendants, admitted that the plaintiffs were entitled to have the fund paid into court, and they withdrew a passage in the answer of the defendants, averring the suit to be unnecessary and improper. They submitted, however, that inasmuch as the Trustees' Relief Act of 1847 was not compulsory in its terms upon the trustees, but only empowered them to discharge themselves of their trust, if they thought fit, by payment of the fund into court, they ought not to be made to bear the costs of the present suit.

Mr. Malins, in reply, submitted that though the Trustees' Relief Act was not compulsory upon the trustees, yet, as it afforded a cheaper mode of getting the fund secured in court, the trustees, by refusing to adopt that course when requested so to do by the plaintiff, and putting her to the more expensive course of instituting a suit to obtain a transfer into court, her right to which they admitted to be unquestionable, ought to be made to pay the costs of the suit. One of them, H. D. Davis, the residuary legatee, was a professional man, and must have been well aware that this question of costs would be raised.

STUART, V.C. said that upon the question of costs, the fact of the trustees having declined to have recourse to that power which the legislature had given to them, was, to his mind, most important. The whole argument, on behalf of the trustees and executors, turned upon the act of parliament not being compulsory; but that had very little to do with the question as to who was to bear the costs of the suit, when a cheaper and more expeditious mode of proceeding was open to the trustees. Soon after the passing of the Legacy Act of 1797, empowering executors to pay into court a legacy given to an infant, in order that it might be secured for the benefit of the infant, the attention of the Master of the Rolls of that time was called to the effect which the discretionary power given to the executors by that act would have upon the costs of a suit to have a legacy secured. In the case of Whopham v. Wingfield (1), the Master of the Rolls said, "For the future I shall not give the costs in such a case, for, since the late Legacy Act (2), the executor has nothing to do but, under that act, to pay the legacy into court, and then he has done; and the infant, when of age, may petition for it. That ought to be known, as it will save great expense and prevent the hardship to residuary legatees." By the hardship thus alluded to was meant the hardship upon residuary legatees of their being obliged to bear the costs, as they must have borne them, of the ordinary suit by a legatee who was desirous of having his legacy appropriated and secured under the jurisdiction of the Court. The principle stated by the Master of the Rolls, in Whopham v. Wingfield, applied entirely to the present case. In the present case the costs of the suit must, according to the usual course, be borne by the residuary legatee. The costs of every suit to invest and secure a legacy must be borne by the residuary legatee, unless the assets turned out to have been so dealt with as to make it impossible to find a residue. Speaking generally, the costs of a suit of this kind must come out of the general residue of the estate. The residuary legatee, who was here the trustee and executor himself, had wilfully refused to have recourse to the cheaper mode of proceeding, and had wilfully driven the legatees to a longer and more expensive course. That alone would have a very great influence upon the discretion of the Court in deciding the question of costs. He was of opinion, therefore, that the case was one in which, both upon the ordinary principle of the Court and upon its own particular circumstances, the costs must be borne by the general estate.

(1) 4 Vea. 630.

(2) 36 Geo. 3. c. 52. s. 32.

KINDERSLEY, V.C. In re THE WRYSGAN
March 5. SLATE QUARRYING COMPANY, ex parte
 HUMBY.

Company — Winding up — Contributory — Transferee of Shares.

Upon the winding up of a company, carried on upon the cost-book principle, it appeared, by their deed, that shares in the company would pass by the delivery of the certificates; but no shareholder was entitled to a dividend unless his name was entered in the share register-book. A shareholder, who had transferred his shares, but whose transferee had not been registered, was held to be liable as a contributory of the company.

The above company was established upon the cost-book principle. In May 1857 a winding-up order was made, under the acts of 1848 and 1849. By the company's deed it was, amongst other things, provided, that the delivery of shares should be a sufficient transfer; that the managing directors and purser should keep a share register-book, and enter therein the names of the shareholders, and the number of the shares held by them; and that the holders of shares might, on application to the purser, require their shares to be registered upon giving one day's previous notice of their intention. It was also provided, that the delivery of the certificates of shares should be a sufficient transfer, but that no holder of shares should be entitled to dividends until the transfer should have been registered; and that after the purser should have made an entry in the register of the name of the party to whom any shares should have been transferred, the interest of the former registered shareholder should cease, and he or she should be thereby freed from all liability.

It appeared that James Humby was a registered holder of certificates for 260 shares, which he handed over to Mr. Manuel, a broker, and at the same time gave notice to the purser, Mr. Wilkinson, of his having done so; but did not inform him of the name of the person to whom they were transferred. A letter was then written to Mr. Humby by the purser, requesting the name of the transferee; and Mr. Humby wrote in answer that he could not inform him of the name. A question was now raised, upon an adjourned summons from chambers, as to the liability of Mr. Humby to be placed upon the list of contributories.

Mr. Baily and Mr. De Gex, for the official manager, contended that Mr. Humby's name had been properly placed upon the list of contributories. He had been registered as the holder of these 260 shares; and although he had transferred them to Mr. Manuel, that transfer had never been registered, and until that was done Mr. Humby remained liable.

Mr. Glasse and Mr. W. D. Lewis appeared for Mr. Humby, and submitted that, under the provisions of the society's deed, the transfer of shares was sufficient to entitle Mr. Manuel to be registered, and Mr. Humby could enforce the registry against Mr. Manuel. The transfer was complete without registry, although the transferee could not obtain the dividends without having his name registered; but Mr. Humby had transferred all his rights to Mr. Manuel, who was now the only person liable to the company.

The following cases were cited:—

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—The various phases of absurdity which these cases present are without number, and it is a marvel how any man in his senses can risk his money by becoming a member of these companies. The provisions of this company are somewhat peculiar. It professes to proceed on the cost-book principle, and the certificates of shares pass as scrip, and any man who gets possession of them may obtain registration; but the question is, whether Mr. Humby, who was a registered shareholder, has discharged himself from liability to the company by merely transferring the shares, though the name of the transferee has not been registered. It appears clearly that the holder of the certificates has the property in the shares; and though it is not provided that he shall not become a shareholder until he is registered, still that effect is clearly implied, because he is entitled to no dividend until his name is entered in the register-book. One of the clauses of the deed provides that when the entry is made in the register, then the interest of the former shareholder ceases, and he is freed from all liability. Nothing can be more explicit than that provision; but the natural inference is, that until the name of the transferee is registered the former holder remains liable; and there is nothing in the deed or in law which can make his liability cease until the fresh registry is effected. It is unnecessary to provide that the party shall continue a shareholder until the act is done upon which alone the liability passes to another party. It has been argued that a contract must be implied on the part of Manuel to obtain registration; but neither party ever dreamed of such an obligation, and the shares passed in the same manner from hand to hand until the bubble burst. There was no intention on the part of Humby to compel Manuel to register; and suppose Manuel had passed the shares to another person, there could have been no object in Manuel being registered. The whole question, however, appears to me to be concluded by what passed between Mr. Humby and the purser of the company, which clearly proves that Humby did not intend to take any steps to get Manuel to register his name. He thought he had done all that was necessary to get rid of his shares, when, in fact, he had done no such thing. His name must therefore be put upon the list of contributories. The costs of the official manager will come out of the estate.

M.R. } YESCOMBE v. LANDOR.
May 5, 31. }

Judgment—Charge on Lands under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110.—Tenant for Life—Impounding Interim Rents.

The 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. declares that a judgment at law shall not be enforced for a given period, but a Court of equity will in the mean time restrain trustees from paying to the debtor, a tenant for life, the income arising from the property affected until the charge can be enforced.

*A judgment creditor of a tenant for life of real estate sued out an elegit, but was unable to obtain payment of his demand, as the estates were vested in trustees. Upon a bill by the judgment creditor, asking for the aid of this Court to obtain satisfaction of his demand,—Held, that he was entitled to an injunction to restrain the trustees from paying the rents and profits of the estates to the tenant for life until the plaintiffs were in a position to obtain the benefit of the judgment.*

The bill in this case was filed, by the Rev. Morris Yescombe and Mary Jane, his wife, against Walter Landor, Robert Landor and Walter Savage Landor, praying for a declaration that a judgment obtained by them against Walter Savage Landor was a valid charge upon his life interest in certain estates, called "Ipsley Court," situate in the county of Worcester, and the Llantonny estate, in the county of Monmouth. It also prayed the aid of the Court in obtaining the benefit of an elegit sued out, and that the trustees might be restrained from paying the rents to him.

The plaintiffs, in an action for libel, obtained a judgment against Walter Savage Landor for 1,362*l.*; it was entered up on the 31st of January 1859, and registered on the 7th of February following.

The bill alleged that Walter Savage Landor had gone to Italy to avoid payment, and that the plaintiffs had sued out an elegit upon the judgment; but that they had been unable to execute it in consequence of the defendant not having any lands vested in him at law; but that the plaintiffs had recently discovered that the estates called Ipsley Court and Llantonny, the former alone producing about 1,200*l.* a year, were vested in Walter and Robert Landor, upon trust to pay the rents and profits to Walter Savage Landor for life, with remainders over.

The plaintiffs gave a notice of motion that the trustees might be restrained from paying the rents to Walter Savage Landor. The trustees demurred to the bill for want of equity.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. C. Barber, in support of the demurrer.—The estate is equitable; a bill therefore will not lie to enforce an elegit. The 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. ss. 13, 14. would, no doubt, after the lapse of a year, give an equitable charge; but in the mean time the plaintiffs had no right to come into this court to enforce their judgment. The provision in the statute was for the year equal to a covenant for quiet enjoyment.—

Waters v. Taylor, 2 Ves. & B. 299.

The Derbyshire and Staffordshire Railway Company v. Bainbrigge, 15 Beav. 146.

Mr. Follett and Mr. Southgate, for the plaintiffs.—The property which was ultimately to be made available was a life estate; the tenant for life had a right to the rents from year to year. Did the statute 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. intend that he should receive all the rents, without any reference to the ultimate rights of the judgment creditor? The act contained nothing which prevented the Court from protecting the rights of any party who had or might have an interest in the estate. The plaintiffs, therefore, had a clear right to ask the Court to restrain the trustees of this estate from paying over the rents which, through the tenant for life, were charged with the payment of this debt. A judgment creditor was entitled to an order restraining the payment of the dividends of stock to a debtor who was tenant for life—Watts v. Jefferyes (1). An elegit having been sued out, the title of the judgment creditor against the real estate was complete; but his power of suing was restrained for six months in respect of stock, and for twelve months in respect of land. The Court, however, would assist him in dealing with his legal rights.—

But though the judgment creditor was restrained from immediately having the benefit of his charge, still the Court would prevent the property from being deteriorated or wasted; it would not allow a house subject to such a charge to be pulled down. It would also interfere when there was an expiring interest—as, for instance, long annuities which expire next year—if it did not, a judgment creditor would get nothing. The 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. was a remedial statute, given in lieu of the right to take the creditor in execution. The plaintiffs were told that they must take under the statute; but they were not told how the Statute of Frauds (29 Car. 2. c. 3.) required the execution of the elegit. The sheriff, however, was not in possession, and the act did not put him in possession; the creditor was merely left to bring an ejectment.—

The plaintiff stated his inability to get relief at law, and he asked the aid of the Court. The 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125. s. 61. gave further benefits to judgment creditors; it empowered them to attach an equitable debt in the hands of trustees. The relief was analogous to that given by the Statute of Frauds. The bill, therefore, was sustainable: were it not so, W. S. Landor would have power to avoid payment of the debt.—

Mr. Palmer, in reply.—The charge is a cumulative security upon real estate, but there are no means of reaching stock or funds except by a charging order, and whether legal or equitable it must be executed in this court. Can the plaintiffs do anything equivalent to taking possession? There was no charge upon the present rents. There was no allegation that the elegit could not be executed: on the contrary, it was clear that it could be executed at law, and the plaintiffs have no defence against the demurrer. By means of the sheriff, the plaintiff could have got possession of the estates by virtue of the Statute of Frauds, 29 Car. 2. c. 3. s. 10. It was said that in all cases of trust relief must be obtained in this court, but no such case had been cited, and the statute last mentioned negatived the allegation.—

May 31.—The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.
—The decision in Watts v. Jefferyes was made upon a sum of stock, but it equally applies to land. The distinction insisted on between stock and land was that the one can be dissipated, while the other cannot; that distinction, it was said, is recognized and provided for by the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. s. 15, through a distringas. No similar provision was mentioned as to land: that cannot be parted with to any one, since the register becomes notice. I reserved my judgment to consider this point; the result is, that I think the supposed distinction between stock and land is not to be found in the act, and cannot be justified on principle. Where the debtor is entitled to an absolute interest, whether in stock or land, the creditor cannot affect the income during the six months or the year, as the case may be; but where the interest is for life, the subject-matter charged consists of the income only, and it is constantly decaying. In Watts v. Jefferyes, Lord Truro said, "It is clear the judgment debtor would not be entitled to any benefit from the stock after service of notice of the order, even during the six months allowed for redemption; and I think it is equally clear that the debtor is not entitled to intermeddle with the dividends, and especially as the charging order is to have the same effect as a charge made by the debtor himself; and it is obvious that if the debtor had charged the dividends he could not be entitled to receive them after such charge, although by the terms or effect of the instrument the party entitled to the benefit of the charge might be restrained from enforcing it during six months. If the respondent's interpretation of the statute is correct, the security of the creditor would be very different when the debtor is entitled to the dividends from what it is when such debtor is entitled to the stock. No part of the security upon the stock could be diminished; but if the dividends which should accrue during the six months might be received by the debtor, the security of the judgment creditor would be diminished pro tanto, and it might constitute the whole interest of the debtor. The correct construction of the proviso seems to be, that although no steps can be taken to enforce immediate payment of the debt by realizing the security, yet that the judgment creditor may in the mean time, by force of the order, prevent the security given him by the statute from being defeated or diminished pro tanto, by stopping payment to the debtor of part of his security. When the debtor is entitled to the dividends only, the payment of any part of such dividends to him is, in fact, equivalent to a transfer of part of the capital when he is entitled to the capital." This applies, in principle, equally to land. It is true that in the case suggested of a mortgage of a life interest, with a proviso against entry for twelve months, the Court will allow the mortgagor to receive the rents, but that depends on the terms of the contract. The question here is, not what is the contract, but what construction is to be put on the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110? The statute is silent as to the dividends of stock, and yet when the subject of the charge was a life interest, Lord Truro held, that the debtor could not take the intermediate dividends; the subject-matter is the rent of an equitable life interest in real estate. There can be no practicable charge on rents which have been paid to the debtor. The statute says there is to be a charge. It also says that the creditor is not to proceed to get the benefit of the charge until after a year. If the debtor were to die within the year the creditor would get nothing, although the act gives him an express charge, unless the Court was to interfere to stop the payment of the rents. If the debtor had an estate of inheritance, the Court would interfere to prevent the destruction by pulling down a house or the like. But the case of a life interest is stronger, because the inheritance could not be absolutely destroyed, while the receipt of the income would enable the debtor if he died within the year to dissipate the whole subject of the charge. I am, therefore, of opinion that the judgment creditor is entitled to have the rents impounded in the hands of the trustees until he is in a position to institute proceedings to obtain the benefit of the charge under the statute. The demurrer must be overruled, and the injunction granted to restrain the trustees from paying the rents to the judgment debtor.

July 16.

In re THE ROYAL BRITISH BANK, ex parte MIXER.

Fraud.*

Under a supplemental charter a banking company, being empowered to issue new shares, a fraudulent report of the company's affairs was made by the directors, and adopted at a general meeting of the shareholders. In June 1856 M., a customer of the bank, took twelve of these new shares, executed the deed, and received the share certificates. In the next return to the Stamp Office his name was not inserted as a shareholder, and in the monthly balance-sheet the sum paid by him for the shares was treated as a debt from the bank. In his pass-book he was credited with interest at 4l. per cent. upon the sum he had paid on account of the shares. M. also attended two meetings of shareholders. In September 1856 the bank stopped payment, all the new shares not having been issued, and the affairs of the company were afterwards ordered to be wound up:—Held, that M. was a contributory in respect of the twelve shares, and was not entitled to claim as a creditor in respect of the deposit paid for his shares.

This case, involving a question similar to that in Brockwell's case (1) and Ex parte Nicol (2), came on to be heard upon two points: viz., first, whether Mr. Mixer was properly a contributory in respect of twelve shares taken by him under the supplemental charter of the Royal British Bank; and, secondly, whether he was entitled to claim as a creditor for the sums paid by him by way of deposit upon taking those shares.

Mr. Giffard and Mr. Field, for Mr. Mixer, contended, first, that the shares taken under the supplemental charter were conditional only, provided the full amount intended to be raised under it was so raised. The issue of the shares under this charter was never completed; and the sums paid in respect of those issued were treated as loans to the bank at interest until the entire issue should be completed. The issue to Mr. Mixer was on the 13th of June 1856, when he executed the supplemental deed, and the last return to the Stamp Office of the shareholders' names previous to the stoppage of the bank was on the 28th of June, and that return did not include Mr. Mixer's name. The monthly balance-sheet, published on the 30th of June 1856, described Mr. Mixer's deposits as an amount due from the bank; and in Mr. Mixer's pass-book, he having been previously a customer of the bank, he was credited with interest on his deposit, the last entry being on the 28th of August. On the 3rd of September 1856 the bank stopped payment. Where a prospectus has been issued, representing that a definite amount is to be the capital, the persons to whom allotments of shares have been made could not be taken to have become shareholders, except upon the terms that the whole capital had been subscribed.—

According also to the terms of the charter, there could be no holding of shares unless the whole amount was paid up—7 & 8 Vict. c. 113. s. 5. As to the invalidity of the transaction, on the ground of fraud, they referred to Brockwell's case.

Mr. Glasse and Mr. W. D. Lewis, for the official manager.—The subscriptions for new capital under the supplemental charter was not conditional; each share was to have a separate existence when issued, and did not depend upon the issue of the whole number. The supplemental charter required shareholders to execute the deed, and that execution was the contract of partnership. Any objection to the charter itself was a matter between the Crown and the bank, not between the shareholders and the bank—Macbride v. Lindsay (3). At the payment of the last dividend the old shareholders, and the allottees of new shares, had equally 4l. per cent.; but previously the old shareholders had 6l. per cent. and the new 4l. per cent. These dividends had been received by Mr. Mixer, who had attended two meetings of shareholders. Mr. Mixer had certificates of his shares, which he might have sold in the market. As to the fraud practised on Mixer, the case would be governed by—

Mr. Field was heard in reply.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said, that he was of opinion that Mixer was not entitled to prove for the amount he had paid, and that he ought to remain on the list of contributories. In June 1856 he became a shareholder; he received the certificates of his shares, and he executed the deed. What had been relied on as to the supplemental charter was between the Crown and the directors, and did not affect the shareholders. It was quite clear that the construction contended for by Mr. Giffard, as to the conditional nature of the allotment, did not apply to all the sums being subscribed, but to the sums to be paid on each allotment. It would be quite monstrous to say that the allotment of particular shares should depend upon what happened between the directors and other persons. It was then said that there was fraud. No doubt, there was gross fraud; and his Lordship had no doubt that it was through that fraud that Mixer was induced to take the shares. But if this were the fraud of the company, he could not rescind the contract. Where there was a contract tainted with fraud, it was not necessarily void; but the party defrauded might repudiate it, if he did it on the discovery of the fraud, and parties could be placed in the same position in which they were before. In this case Mr. Mixer acted on the contract; he executed the deed, received dividends on his shares, which, although called interest, was, in some sense, a benefit. He had the certificates of his shares, which he had a right to sell. He attended meetings of the shareholders, and thus declared that he was a shareholder; and even after the bankruptcy he did not repudiate the contract, but in a letter to the directors stated that he was not well used. His name must, therefore, be placed on the list of contributories.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE said, that Mr. Mixer was manifestly a contributory, and not a creditor of the company.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER said, that his only doubt had been as to the payment of interest; but it appeared to be plain that Mixer was to have interest until the full amount of the shares was paid up.

KINDERSLEY, V.C. } MOODIE v. BANNISTER.
Feb. 15.

Statute of Limitations—Acknowledgment of Debt.

A bond was executed in 1821, and the obligee having claimed against the estate of the surety in the bond more than twenty years after the debt, it was held, that an acknowledgment of the debt, in the answer of the executrix of the surety, was sufficient to take the case out of the Statute of Limitations.

This case came on upon an adjourned summons from chambers.

On the 30th of November 1821 a bond was executed, by which John Bannister and John William Bannister became jointly and severally bound to George Heasley in the sum of 600*l.*, to repay to the said G. Heasley the sum of 299*l.* on the 30th of November 1824, with interest in the mean time at the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum. The above sum was paid to J. W. Bannister, the said J. Bannister, his father, having joined in the bond by way of surety for his son. J. Bannister died in the year 1825, and J. W. Bannister died in 1829. The money secured by the bond remained unpaid, and no interest had been received by the obligee since the 20th of February 1827.

Under the will of J. Bannister, the father, Esther Bannister was appointed executrix. A suit was instituted for the administration of the estate of J. W. Bannister in the year 1839; and in this suit the bond was proved, but no portion of the debt was recovered.

A suit was also instituted to administer the estate of J. Bannister, the father, under which the claim was now made in respect of the bond debt and interest from the time of the last payment. The defence set up to this claim was, that the debt was barred by the Statute of Limitations.

The claimant, however, rested his case upon the admissions made by Esther Bannister in certain letters written by her to the obligee, and in her answer filed in this suit.

The admissions relied upon were as follows.—A letter, written by Esther Bannister to G. Heasley, dated the 2nd of August 1826, in the following words:—

"Dear Sir,—My brother John has informed me that his late father and himself, some years since, became bound to you for the sum of 300*l.* and interest to secure that sum advanced by you for a friend of my mother's. I therefore think it right to inform you that, if neither my brother's friend nor himself attend to this engagement, I, as my father's executrix, will not neglect it."

Another letter, by Esther Bannister to Mr. G. Heasley, dated the 7th of February 1852, was as follows:—

"Dear Sir,—I have this day heard from Messrs. Bolton, who inform me that the suit you mention is for the administration of my late father's estate, and under it you will have an opportunity of proving your debt at the proper time."

The answer of Miss Bannister in this suit contained the following passage:—

"I say the only debt of the testator (John Bannister) which remains unpaid is a debt of 299*l.*, with a considerable arrear of interest, owing to G. Heasley on the testator's bond, and such debt has not hitherto been paid, because the testator was a party to the said bond as surety only for J. W. Bannister, who died in 1829."

G. Heasley carried in his claim before the Chief Clerk, who decided against the claim on the ground that it was barred by the Statute of Limitations.

The question was then adjourned into court for argument, as to whether the above admissions were sufficient to take the case out of the statute.

Mr. Dickinson appeared in support of the claim, and contended that the admissions in the letters and the answer of Miss Bannister were sufficient to revive the debt, and to take the case out of the Statute of Limitations. He referred to the following statutes and authorities:—

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—There is no dispute but that the claimant is a creditor unless he is barred by the Statute of Limitations. That statute was set up by the plaintiff in chambers, and the question is, whether it is a good bar. Although the executrix has not set up the statute, it is clear that the residuary legatee is not precluded from doing so. It is admitted that more than twenty years have elapsed since the bond became payable. The letters written in 1826 and 1852 are neither of them a sufficient acknowledgment of the debt. If a man demands a debt, the merely saying "Prove your debt" does not amount to an acknowledgment. Upon the answer, as far as terms can go, nothing can be imagined more distinct, but the question, whether such acknowledgment comes within the statute, depends upon the construction of the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42. s. 5. The 3rd section of the 21 Jac. 1. c. 16.

does not, in terms, exclude debts on bond. The word "acknowledgment," however, is not used; but the Courts have held, that, where not only the original contract—whether by bill of exchange or otherwise—is relied upon, but also some subsequent act, that must be such an act or acknowledgment as would, according to the language, be a cause of action, which must have arisen within six years. That which amounts expressly or impliedly to a promise to pay amounts to a cause of action; and therefore, if a promise to pay is a cause of action, and if that is made within six years, it is protected by the statute. An acknowledgment of the existence of a debt is not necessarily either a contract or a promise to pay, and there can only be a cause of action where there is a promise to pay. It might or it might not amount to such promise, although it may be a perfect acknowledgment of the existence of the debt. Suppose A. claims a debt, and the debtor tells his wife or son or friend that he owes it, how could that amount to a promise to pay to the claimant, although, under some circumstances, such an acknowledgment might amount to a promise? The Courts, indeed, have gone so far as to decide that an acknowledgment of a debt does amount to a promise to pay, and is therefore a good cause of action; but that is now, happily, altered. It is not necessary to go into the cases; there is no dispute upon them. Then, as to Lord Tenterden's Act (9 Geo. 4. c. 14). The 1st section requires the acknowledgment to be in writing, the act being framed with a view to the state of the law then existing; and, with respect to simple contract debts, it declares that such acknowledgment must be in writing, signed by the party chargeable thereby; the effect being, that whereas, previously, a mere parol or verbal acknowledgment might amount to a promise to pay, and therefore a cause of action, it must in future be in writing. With respect to specialty debts, a bond creditor can claim his debt forty or a hundred years after it has been incurred, there being no bar in time. Courts of law, however, not only with respect to debts but other matters, have held the doctrine of presumption after a certain lapse of time, and a jury has been directed, after twenty years, to presume payment. This, however, is capable of being rebutted by evidence. It is a necessary consequence, that any evidence of acknowledgment by the debtor was sufficient, for he could not ask the Court or jury to presume payment when he had, by writing or otherwise, acknowledged the debt, and therefore, evidence of acknowledgment even to third persons, was admitted, but that did not necessarily amount to a cause of action. Then, as to the two statutes, 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42. and 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 27. The purport of the first statute is, in the 3rd section, in very nearly the same words as the statute of James, to make the bar apply to specialty debts, twenty years being substituted for six years. This would have put specialty debts on the same footing as simple contract debts (except the limitation of twenty years) if it had not been for the 5th section, which relates to matters not within the operation of the statute of James. This section, for the first time, contained the word "acknowledgment," which does not occur in the statute of James. On what acknowledgment is here meant the whole question for decision turns. Is it any acknowledgment, whether amounting to a promise to pay or not? This is a question of considerable importance, arising for the first time, and, except in one case where it was not decided, the authorities do not touch the question, otherwise I would have abstained from forming a judgment. With regard to what the legislature intended by the word "acknowledgment," the purport of the Statute of Limitations must be looked at. It is not to enable a bond fide debtor to escape payment, but to protect a person who, from lapse of time, may have lost the evidence and vouchers necessary to prove such payment. The 5th section, having provided for acknowledgment generally, does not provide that it shall be made by the party liable to pay to the party making the claim for payment, but by the person liable or his agent. Having regard to the object of this statute, the legislature could not have intended the word "acknowledgment" to mean a promise to pay and a cause of action; if it had it would have said so, and would not have introduced this section. The effect of this section, according to the language, is, that any acknowledgment in writing will be sufficient, and will prevent the setting up of the statute. This interpretation is in the interests of moral justice, and it is naturally just that a man who has acknowledged a debt, although twenty years should have elapsed, should not be able to set up the statute, and the legislature framed this clause to meet the case. So far as to the technical view of the statute of 1833. Lord Tenterden's Act of 1828 was passed only with respect to the statute of James, and did not require any particular terms of acknowledgment to the party making the claim, leaving the effect of it just where it stood under that statute. There are no decisions which now hold an acknowledgment to be a promise to pay and a cause of action, and it was necessary in this act (3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42.) to introduce words importing a promise to the party making the claim; but, in the same year passed the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 27, applying to real estate, in which some clauses relate to money and one to legacies, and the legislature was imposing limitations of actions, and made an exception with respect to acknowledgments by the party liable, to the party claiming payment, —unless in the mean time some part of the principal or interest shall be paid, or some acknowledgment of the right thereto shall be "given in writing, signed by the person by whom the same shall be payable or his agent, to the person entitled thereto or his agent." The 42nd section provides the same thing. This act being passed in the same year with the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42, it must be assumed to be passed for the same purpose, and whereas, in one act a writing was required, and in the other none, the conclusion must be that the legislature meant that any acknowledgment in writing is sufficient. In this case there is a statement in the answer of the executrix in the clearest terms, and entitled to the greater weight, inasmuch as it is in the exercise of a duty towards co-legatees in setting forth the debts of the testator. This is such an acknowledgment as comes within the language and principle of the 5th section, being a writing signed by the party liable, of so much (299*l.*) being due.

June 24. } DOWSON v. SOLOMON.

Practice — Chancery Amendment Act, s. 38.—Time for closing Evidence—Period of setting down a Cause.

The plaintiff obtained an order for a subpoena to hear judgment, and set down the cause for hearing after the time for closing the evidence in chief had expired, but before the time allowed for cross-examining affidavit witnesses. The defendant moved to set aside the order for a subpoena, and to strike the cause out of the Registrar's list, on the ground of irregularity:—Held, that the plaintiff's proceedings were regular, and that the cause might be set down for hearing before the period for closing the cross-examination of witnesses.

This suit was instituted, on the 2nd of March, to enforce the specific performance of a contract to purchase a house at Dulwich; the defendant, by his answer, submitting that he ought to be allowed compensation for damage which had been occasioned by damp while the house was unoccupied, and for not having been able to obtain possession. The suit proceeded, and the time for taking evidence expired on the 27th of April, but was extended, by order, to the 11th of May; and the time for cross-examination of witnesses upon affidavit was extended to the 8th of June. The period for cross-examination was subsequently enlarged a second time to the 6th of July. On the 10th of June the plaintiff obtained an order for a subpoena to hear judgment, which was served upon the defendant; and the cause was set down for hearing. The defendant now moved to set aside the subpoena, on the ground of irregularity, and to strike the cause out of the Registrar's list of causes.

Mr. Bazalgette and Mr. C. Hall, in support of the motion, contended that the plaintiff was not entitled to have the cause set down for hearing until the time for taking evidence had closed; and that time would not expire, under the new practice, until the cross-examination of all the witnesses had concluded. They cited—

Jenkyn v. Vaughan, 24 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 495; s. c. 3 Drew. 20.

Ellis v. King, 4 Madd. 126.

Langley v. Fisher, 5 Beav. 588; s. c.

12 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 72.

And the following Orders:—

May 8, 1845, Order 16, Rule 44.

August 7, 1852, Order 32.

January 13, 1855, Order 5.

15 & 16 Vict. c. 86. s. 38.

Mr. Baily and Mr. Forster, contra, submitted that, under the present practice, the subpœna to hear judgment might be issued upon the close of the evidence in chief, and contemporaneously with the continuance of the cross-examination. This was the practice always adopted in the office of the Clerks of Records and Writs; and the question was, whether this practice was now to be altered.

KINDERSLEY, V.C. — This is a most miserable and worthless motion, and one that is calculated to do no good whatever to the party moving. If the motion is granted the only result would be, to make the plaintiff pay a certain additional amount of costs to the defendant's solicitor. The application is for an order to set aside a subpœna to hear judgment, and to strike the cause out of the Registrar's book and the cause list. The motion for that purpose is made by the defendant, part of whose case, as set up by his answer, is, that he claims compensation for damage done by damp to the house he has contracted to purchase, and for being delayed in obtaining possession of it. That is substantially the defendant's case. The act of the plaintiff in endeavouring to bring the cause to a hearing appears to me to be for the benefit of the defendant, as it may facilitate his getting possession of the house. Still, if the order for the subpœna be irregular, and if it has been issued contrary to the existing practice of the Court, the motion must be dealt with on that footing. Now, what are the facts of the case? The bill having been filed on the 2nd of March, and the time for taking the evidence being about to expire on the 27th of April, that time was extended by order to the 11th of May. The time for cross-examining the affidavit witnesses was enlarged, first, to the 8th of June, and then to the 6th of July. On the 10th of June, however, the plaintiff obtained the subpœna to hear judgment, served it on the defendant, and set the cause down for hearing. The subpœna, therefore, was obtained two days after the time when, but for the order for enlarging it to the 6th of July, the period for cross-examining the affidavit witnesses would have expired; and a month after the time for closing the evidence in chief. It was contended, by the defendant, in support of the motion, that this was irregular and contrary to the practice of the Court; because, at the time the subpœna issued, the cross-examination of the affidavit witnesses was proceeding. The other side say that it is not irregular; that the practice is for the Clerk of Records and Writs to certify when the cause is in a fit state for hearing, and for the Registrar to set it down for hearing on that certificate. Now, assuming that to be the practice, the question is, whether it is wrong; that is, whether it is contrary to the provisions of the Chancery Practice Amendment Act (15 & 16 Vict. c. 86), and the Orders made in pursuance of that act. If the practice is wrong, it must be corrected. The old practice before that act was this:—A time was fixed for passing publication, as it was called—when witnesses were examined, but rarely cross-examined—and there was no distinction between the time for examination in chief and cross-examination. The examination and cross-examination of witnesses were included in the same period. The Chancery Practice Amendment Act introduced a totally different practice, which was this:—That witnesses may now be examined on their affidavits at the hearing of the cause; and such evidence is good evidence. But that examination carries with it the right of cross-examination, and that cross-examination may be a viva voce one, in open court. That right is a most convenient one. At the same time witnesses may be examined and cross-examined, before an examiner of the court, as before the act, with this difference—that the examination and cross-examination, instead of being, as it formerly was, secret, is now open and public. When the examination and cross-examination is upon affidavits, the new practice has necessarily fixed a time within which the affidavits shall be filed in the first place, and a separate time within which the witnesses swearing the affidavits shall be cross-examined on them. Where there are no affidavits introduced, and the witnesses are examined orally, before the Examiner or in court, the cross-examination follows immediately, then and there. The effect of the Chancery Practice Amendment Act, s. 38, and of the 32nd of the Orders of the 7th of August 1852, and of the 5th of the Orders of the 13th of January 1855, is this:—There are two periods mentioned in the act: the one, in which the evidence on both sides, whether taken orally or upon affidavit, is to be closed within such time or times, after issue joined, as should be prescribed by any order of the Lord Chancellor under that act, the Court, however, having power to enlarge the same as it may see fit; the other—and which is referred to in the latter part of the clause—is, that, after the preceding period, affidavit witnesses may, notwithstanding such closing of the evidence, as previously stated, be orally cross-examined and re-examined. These are the two periods mentioned in the act. The time for closing the evidence, then, does not include the period during which any witness may be cross-examined, but it is only that period which ends with the commencement of the time for the cross-examination or re-examination of affidavit witnesses; that is, in other words, the evidence closes at the end of the first period referred to in the act, beyond which no evidence, whether oral or by affidavit, is receivable without the leave of the Court. Now, it appears to me that, assuming the practice to be, as stated by the plaintiff's counsel in this case, viz. that the subpœna to hear judgment is ordinarily issued contemporaneously with the second period, such practice is a good and wholesome one. It is intended to prevent the parties from unnecessarily dawdling over the conduct of the cause. A case was referred to in the argument, in which it was said that I had myself taken a different view of the practice in question. If I did so, and if I should now think I was wrong in so doing, I should have no hesitation in correcting that view. But when I look at the case of Jenkyn v. Vaughan, it is not at all similar to the present.

It was an application to dismiss a bill for want of prosecution; the motion for that purpose being made after the closing of the evidence, but preceding the time during which there was a right to cross-examine affidavit witnesses. I thought that application to dismiss a bill, under such circumstances, so monstrous, that I refused the motion. But it is clear that that case is quite different from the present. I must say, I think the practice as stated by the plaintiff's counsel is not irregular, and that the subpœna was not irregularly issued; and therefore that the plaintiff's proceedings have been correct.

Mr. Murray, the Record and Writ Clerk, subsequently stated to his Honour that the practice in their office was as stated by the plaintiff's counsel, and produced certain written reasons for the adoption of such a practice.

KINDERSLEY, V.C. said, the reasons appeared to him to be very sound, and, under the circumstances, he should refuse the motion, with costs.

Patent—Time—Computation—16 Vict. c. 5. s. 2.

In computing time under the 16 Vict. c. 5, avoiding letters patent, on failure in payment of stamp duties, held, that the day of the date is excluded, and that the three years do not expire until twelve o'clock at night of the anniversary of the day on which the letters patent were granted.

The bill in this suit was filed to restrain the infringement of a patent granted on the 26th of February 1855. The 50*l.* stamp duty was paid on the 26th of February 1858, and the question raised was, whether the three years allowed for the payment of the duty had not then expired.

The 16 Vict. c. 5. s. 2. enacts, that "all letters patent for inventions, to be granted under the provisions of the Patent Law Amendment Act, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 83), except in the cases provided for in the 4th section of the act, shall be made subject to the condition that the same shall be void, and that the powers and privileges thereby granted shall cease and determine at the expiration of three years and seven years respectively from the date thereof, unless there be paid, before the expiration of the said three years and seven years respectively, the stamp duties in the schedule to this act annexed, expressed to be payable before the expiration of the third year and of the seventh year respectively; and such letters patent, or a duplicate thereof, shall be stamped with proper stamps, shewing the payment of such respective stamp duties, and shall, when stamped, be produced before the expiration of such three years and seven years respectively, at the office of the Commissioners, and a certificate of the production of such letters patent or duplicate so stamped, specifying the date of such production, shall be indorsed by the clerk of the Commissioners on the letters patent or duplicate, and a like certificate shall be indorsed upon the warrant for such letters patent, filed in the said office."

The schedule referred to in the act was as follows:—On the letters patent, or a duplicate thereof, before the expiration of the third year, 50*l*.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. C. Ellis, for the plaintiff.—The time for paying the 50*l*. did not expire until twelve o'clock of the 26th of February 1858.

Mr. J. H. Palmer, for the defendant.—The three years were completed on the 25th of February 1858; the patent then became void—Russell v. Ledsam (1).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—If the language of the act had been from the day of the date thereof, the three years would not have begun to run until the following day, but it has been pointed out by the Court, that in fact "the date thereof" and "the day of the date thereof" are synonymous, and that when a certain time is to begin to run from a particular date, the term begins to run from the day following. Therefore, the three years beginning to run from the day following the date of the patent, the three years would not expire until twelve o'clock p.m. of the anniversary of the day on which the letters patent were granted. These letters patent were granted on the 26th of February 1855, they would, therefore, not expire until twelve o'clock on the night of the 26th of February 1858. In Russell v. Ledsam the plea alleged that the letters patent were granted after the expiration of the term of fourteen years granted by the original letters patent. The question was, whether the fourteen years mentioned in the first letters patent, which were granted on the 26th of February 1825, expired on the 26th of February 1839. The letters patent were clearly not granted for fourteen years and a day, and the question was, whether the day of the date of the letters patent was included, and it was held that it was. Parke, B., in his judgment, says, "The next question arises on a point reserved at the trial on the evidence in support of the seventh plea. That plea was that the second or renewed letters patent were granted after the expiration of the term of fourteen years granted by the first letters patent; the replication took issue on that allegation, and the proof was, that the original letters patent were dated on the 26th of February 1825, and the second on the 26th of February 1839; and the question is, whether the day of the date of the first letters patent was inclusive or exclusive. The usual course in recent times has been to construe the day exclusively whenever anything was to be done in a certain time after a given event or date; and, consequently, the time for enrolling a specification within the six months, given by the proviso, is reckoned exclusively of the day of the date; and many other instances are collected in Webb v. Fairmaner (2) and Young v. Higgon (3). But in this case the question is, when the term given by the patent commences; and the same rule would apply as to the commencement of a term, which, if it is to run from the date of the lease, includes the day of the date." Parke, B., in that case, draws the very distinction which makes the patent

(2) 3 Mee. & W. 473; s.c. 7 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 140.

(3) 6 Ibid. 49; s.c. 8 Dowl. P.C. 212; 9 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 29.

good in this case. The 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 83. s. 4, authorizing the grant of a further extension of the patent, provides, "that no such extension shall be granted if the application by petition shall not be made and prosecuted with effect before the expiration of the term originally granted in such letters patent." Consequently, the extension of the patent was granted after the expiration of the fourteen years, because the fourteen years granted by the original letters patent included the day of the date. But when a thing is to be done from the day of the date it means "from and after the day of the date." The above case, therefore, conclusively establishes that payment on the 26th of February was good, and that the patent is subsisting, and the plaintiff is entitled to the injunction he prays for.

Insurance on Life—Right to Policy—Debtor and Creditor.

A mortgagee, by way of collateral security for his mortgage debt, insured in his own name the life of his debtor, the latter paying the premiums upon the policy. The debtor afterwards took the benefit of the Insolvent Debtors Act, obtained the ordinary vesting order, and, having put in his schedule, in which the mortgage debt was specified, and the policy, as one of the securities for payment of such debt, obtained his discharge. The debtor, after surviving the mortgagee, died, and the insurance company paid the amount due upon the policy to the personal representatives of the mortgagee, who, after retaining thereout the amount of their debt and costs, paid the balance into court. The balance being claimed by the assignee in insolvency of the debtor, on the one hand, and by his personal representatives on the other, — Held, that the title of the assignee in insolvency was to be preferred.

In 1829 Walker, the mortgagee of certain lands, for 3,600*l.*, being the amount of a debt due to him from Storie, the mortgagor, by way of collateral security, effected, in his own name, a policy of insurance for that amount upon the life of Storie. The premiums upon this policy were paid by Storie. In 1851 Storie took the benefit of the Insolvent Debtors Act, and having obtained the usual vesting order and filed his schedule, in which was inserted the debt secured by the policy, and the policy, as one of the securities for payment of such debt, was discharged. Upon the death, subsequently, of Storie, who survived Walker, the insurance company paid the sum of 4,600*l.*, being the amount then due upon the policy, to the representatives of Walker; who, having retained thereout the amount of their debt and interest, paid the balance, amounting to 402*l.*, into court.

This sum was claimed, on the one hand, by the personal representatives of Storie, and on the other by his assignees in the insolvency.

Mr. Lorence Bird, in support of a petition presented by Storie's representatives, asked for payment to them of the fund in court, on the ground that the policy and the fund secured by it, did not belong to the insolvent, but to the creditor or mortgagee, at the date of his discharge, and, therefore, according to the provision of the Insolvent Debtors Act, could not pass to his assignee.

Mr. Caldecott, for the assignees in insolvency, referred to Godsall v. Boldero (1), as governing this case.

Mr. Lorence Bird, in reply, referred to Dalby v. the India and London Insurance Company, 15 Com. B. Rep. 365; s. c. 24 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 2; and as overruling Godsall v. Boldero.

STUART, V.C. held, that the title of the assignee in insolvency was to be preferred:—the fact that the policy of insurance was inserted in the schedule of the insolvent, as one of the securities for payment of the debt, being of itself sufficient to shew that the other creditors under the insolvency had an interest in the fund.

KINDERSLEY, V.C. }
April 16. } RUDGE v. WEEDON.

Practice—Married Woman—Protection Order—Chancery Amendment Act.

A married woman obtained a protection order from a magistrate, under the provisions of the Divorce Act, on the ground of desertion. A suit was then instituted against her as a feme sole. The protection order was afterwards discharged, on application by the husband, who proved there had been no desertion on his part. The plaintiff in the suit then obtained a supplemental order as of course, under the Chancery Amendment Act, to bring the husband before the Court:—Held, that the protection order was void ab initio, and there having been no "change or transmission of interest or liability" the supplemental order was wrong, and must be discharged.

This suit was instituted for the administration of the estate of William Weedon. The plaintiffs were two infants, the residuary legatees of the testator, who sued by their next friend, Robert Harris, and the defendant was Elizabeth Rudge, who was also a residuary legatee. It appeared that previously to the institution of the suit Elizabeth Rudge had obtained a protection order, under the Divorce and Matrimonial Act, 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, from Mr. Elliott, the magistrate of the Lambeth Police Court, upon an allegation that she had been deserted seventeen years ago by her husband, George Bickerton Rudge; and in consequence of this order having been obtained, Mrs. Rudge was made a defendant to the above suit as a feme sole under the 21st section of the Divorce Act, by which it is enacted, that a married woman who has obtained a protection order shall, during the continuance thereof, be and be deemed to have been during such desertion in the like position in all respects with regard to property and contracts, and suing and being sued, as she would be under that act if she had obtained a decree of judicial separation. Mrs. Rudge, in pursuance of the magistrate's order, had also obtained leave from this Court to put in a separate answer as a feme sole. Subsequently, however, G. B. Rudge, upon having notice of the magistrate's order, applied that it might be discharged on the ground that he never had deserted his wife, and this fact having been proved to the satisfaction of the magistrate the protection order was discharged.

An application was then made by the plaintiffs, at the Rolls, for the common supplemental order in the suit, for the purpose of making G. B. Rudge a party defendant to the suit, inasmuch as Elizabeth Rudge, his wife, could no longer be sued as a feme sole, and that order was made as of course under the 52nd section of the Chancery Amendment Act, 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86.

A motion was now made on behalf of the defendant, G. B. Rudge, to discharge the supplemental order as being irregular and improper.

Another suit had been instituted in this matter, by another next friend to the infant plaintiffs, for the same object as the first suit, but to which G. B. Rudge had been added as a co-defendant, and a motion was now made on behalf of Robert Harris, the next friend of the plaintiffs in the first suit, that all further proceedings in the second suit might be stayed, on the ground that being for precisely the same object as the first suit it was unnecessary.

Mr. Giffard and Mr. Simpson, who appeared in support of the first motion, contended that the supplemental order was irregular, inasmuch as there had been no change or transmission of interest or liability in this case, as provided for by the 52nd section of the Chancery Amendment Act. The magistrate's order was, in fact, void ab initio, and matters were therefore left in statu quo. The defendant, Mrs. Rudge, was a married woman from the first, and continued to be a married woman notwithstanding that a mistaken order had been made, and therefore her husband was a necessary party from the commencement of the suit.

Mr. Baily and Mr. Rogers, contra, submitted, that while the magistrate's order remained in force the plaintiff could not do otherwise than treat Mrs. Rudge as a feme sole. It must be assumed that the protection order was right, and under the terms of the Divorce Act the plaintiff was bound to frame the suit as he had, and make the wife the sole defendant. When the order was discharged a new right accrued, and it was then competent for the plaintiff to bring the husband before the Court by a supplemental order under the Chancery Amendment Act.

Mr. Glasse and Mr. Baggallay appeared upon the motion to stay proceedings in the second suit.

Edwards v. Bailey, 19 Beav. 457; s. c.

23 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 872.

Cartwright v. Shepherd, 20 Ibid. 122.

Pickford v. Brown, 1 Kay & J. 643.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—The question in this case turns entirely upon a technicality, and is very unsatisfactory to decide, because it will involve the parties in expense without advancing the suit at all. I speak of the motion to discharge the order in the nature of a supplemental order, the question on which turns upon the construction to be put upon the 52nd section of the Chancery Amendment Act. My duty is not to do otherwise in construing an act of parliament than to put a fair and natural construction on the words, and not to distort the language in order to give it a more extensive construction or confer a benefit upon a particular party. Now, this is a case in which Mrs. Rudge, a married woman, is made a defendant by a person who has an interest in the character of residuary legatee, Mrs. Rudge being also a residuary legatee, or, at least, having an interest in the residue, and she is made a defendant without her husband, the suit being for the administration of the estate. As it turns out, her husband ought to have been a party with her unless that rule has been altered by the 21st section of the Divorce Act, which makes a special exception in particular cases. It appears that before the suit was instituted a magistrate made an order, giving her protection, on the ground that she had been deserted by her husband. The effect of such an order is to make her so entirely a feme sole that she may sue and be sued as such. That is different from the case of a married woman who has a separate estate, for the act of parliament says she may sue and be sued without him, and it has been determined that he need not and ought not to be a party to a suit. The suit then was rightly constituted at the time, and the plaintiff had no choice in the matter. A decree was taken with nothing special in it, but it turned out that the order for protection was wrong, since there had been in fact no desertion, and accordingly the order was discharged, on the ground of its having been wrong ab initio. That order, then, except so far as there is anything special in the Divorce Act, stands in no higher position than an order made by any Court of Justice which is afterwards discharged by another branch of that Court as being wrong; and unless there is something to give it a different effect the whole of that order is swept away. Now, it appears to me that there is nothing in the act of parliament to give it any different effect. By the act 21 & 22 Vict. c. 108. s. 8. it is enacted—"That in every case in which a wife shall under this act, or under the said act, 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, have obtained an order to protect her earnings or property, or a decree for a judicial separation, such order or decree shall, until reversed or discharged, so far as necessary for the protection of any person or corporation who shall deal with the wife, be deemed valid and effectual; and no discharge, variation or reversal of such order or decree shall prejudice or affect any rights or remedies which any person would have had in case the same had not been so reversed, varied or discharged in respect of any debts, contracts or acts of the wife incurred, entered into, or done between the times of the making such order or decree and of the discharge, variation or reversal thereof." So that the effect of the amending statute is, that if, pending that order, the wife has contracted any debt or entered into any contract, or done any act as a feme sole, there is to be no alteration, but otherwise the act gives no validity to her acts. Now, the plaintiff found himself in this position

—he had got his decree against a married woman, treating her as a feme sole, and the husband was not before the Court. It is clear now that the husband ought to have been a party to the suit, and that the decree as it stands is defective. Therefore, the plaintiff obtains an order according to the 52nd section of the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86. in the nature of a supplemental decree. I cannot find any fault with him, but the question is, whether that order is valid as being regular and proper. It appears to me that it is strictly irregular and improper, and I can come to no other conclusion. The 52nd section of the Amendment Act is this—"That upon any suit becoming abated by death, marriage or otherwise, or defective by reason of some change or transmission of interest or liability, it shall not be necessary to exhibit any bill of revivor or supplemental bill in order to obtain the usual order to revive such suit, or the usual or necessary decree or order to carry on the proceedings; but an order to the effect of the usual order to revive, or of the usual supplemental decree, may be obtained as of course upon an allegation of the abatement of such suit or of the same having become defective, and of the change or transmission of interest or liability." Now, has this suit become defective by reason of any change or transmission of interest or liability? If there has been none, then this order is not valid. The magistrate's order has, in fact, been swept away, and the matter stands upon the same footing as any discharged order of a Court. There has been no transmission of interest, and there is nothing changed. Edwards v. Batley and Cartwright v. Shephard were cases in which an actual party to a suit had died, and it was decided that there the act did apply. In Pickford v. Brown there was the birth of a child, that is to say, a change of interest; but here there is no change of interest. Mr. Rudge's rights are now just what they were when the decree was made; although, by the erroneous decision of a magistrate, there was an order of protection against him. It is just as if there had been a decree of the Ecclesiastical Court under the old forms declaring a marriage null and void. As long as that decision stood the marriage was null and void; and if pending that decision there had been a suit against the wife, the husband would not have been a party. But, suppose afterwards that decision had been set aside, would she not have been a married woman ab initio? The marriage still existed; they did not become married, for they were married throughout; and it appears to me that Mrs. Rudge was never in this case a feme sole from the beginning. For these reasons it appears to me that I must come to the conclusion that there has been here no change or transmission of interest, and therefore the case does not come within the terms of the 52nd section of the act. The supplemental order must, consequently, be discharged, with costs.

With respect to the second motion, there must be a reference to chambers to inquire which of the two suits will be most for the benefit of the infants.

Banker—Customer's Balances—Security —Future Advances.

A customer kept three accounts with his bankers, the whole of which were overdrawn. Upon their applying for further security he executed a deed-poll, which recited the intention to give security and charge certain estates already mortgaged with the payment of the "three several sums of money which shall or may be found due, on the balance of the several accounts, for principal, interest, commission and other usual and lawful bankers' charges, not exceeding the aggregate sum of 3,000l." He subsequently executed a deed of assignment for the benefit of his creditors. The real estate charged by the deed-poll was sold by the mortgagee, and after paying all incumbrances a balance remained, which was claimed by the bankers and by the trustees of the creditors' deed:—Held, upon a petition of the bankers, that the security did not include the floating balance.

Daniel Charles Meadows carried on the business of a solicitor, in partnership with Cooper Charles Brooke, at Woodbridge, in the county of Suffolk ; he was a customer of Messrs. Alexander & Co., who were bankers both at Ipswich and Woodbridge, and kept three accounts with them :—a private account, a partnership account, and a trust account.

In January 1857 the whole of these accounts were overdrawn, to the aggregate amount of 2,974*l.* 6*s.* 3*d.* The bankers applied for further security.

On the 12th of January 1857 Mr. Meadows executed a deed-poll, which, after reciting that Mr. Meadows (who had adopted the name of "De Medewe"), and also his partner, C. C. Brooke, had, each of them, for many years kept their banking accounts with Frederick Alexander & Co., and that Ann Lucock and D. C. Meadows, as executors of William John Lucock, deceased, had also kept their executorship banking account with Messrs. Alexander & Co., and that the bankers having required security for the balances due, Mr. Meadows had, subject to existing incumbrances, agreed to charge his estate thereafter mentioned with the payment of the balance of all the three several accounts to the aggregate sum of 3,000*l.* as thereafter mentioned, and that Messrs. Meadows & Brooke had also agreed to execute a joint and several bond for further securing the balance of their banking account ; and that Ann Lucock had agreed to deposit with F. Alexander the title-deeds relating to certain hereditaments at Grunnersburg belonging to her, and with D. C. Meadows, to execute a joint and several bond for further securing the balance of their executorship account : it was then witnessed, that D. C. Meadows "doth hereby subject and charge all his estate called 'Witnesham Hall,' with the payment to F. Alexander, his executors, administrators or assigns, of the three several sums of money which shall or may be found due on the balance of the said several accounts for principal, interest, commission and other usual and lawful bankers' charges, not exceeding in the whole the aggregate sum of 3,000*l.* (but subject to the existing mortgages and the principal and interest monies thereby respectively secured)." And D. C. Meadows, covenanted for himself, his heirs,

"I will, within three months after demand, pay unto F. Alexander, his executors, administrators or assigns, such several sums as may be due on the several banking accounts 'as aforesaid,' not exceeding in the whole the aggregate sum of 3,000*l.*, without any deduction whatsoever."

By a bond of even date, Mr. Meadows and Ann Lucock, as executors of W. J. Lucock, executed a bond to Messrs. Alexander, conditioned to be void on payment of such sum or sums of money "as now are or which shall from time to time be or become due and owing on the said executorship bankers' account, not exceeding the sum of 3,000*l.*"

On the 20th of April 1858 Mr. Meadows assigned the estate comprised in Messrs. Alexander & Co.'s security to trustees for the benefit of his creditors. Messrs. Alexander & Co. obtained a judgment against Mr. Meadows for 2,234*l.* 9*s.* 3*d.*

The first mortgagee sold Witnesham Hall, and, after the payment of all incumbrances, there remained a balance upon the purchase-money of 2,499*l.* 11*s.* 2*d.* This sum was claimed by Messrs. Alexander & Co., and also by the trustees of the creditors' deed. It was accordingly paid into court under the Trustees' Relief Act.

Messrs. Alexander continued to make advances to Mr. Meadows after the deed of the 12th of January 1857, and a balance of 2,800*l.*, chiefly consisting of such advances, remained due to them on the three accounts.

They now presented this petition, claiming a right to recover the balance due out of the funds in court, on the ground that the deed of January 1857 was a security not for the balance then actually due only, but also for the floating balances, to the extent of 3,000*l.*

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Prendergast, for the petitioners.—The intention of the parties was expressed in the recitals. The deed-poll was not the only security to be given; the debtors were to execute bonds; these, by express words, extended to future balances. The petitioners were also judgment creditors, and by these several securities they were entitled to have their balances paid out of the fund in court—

Walker v. Hardman, 4 Cl. & F. 258; s. c. 11 Bligh, N.S. 229.

Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Lewin, for the trustees of the creditors' deed.—The security taken by Messrs. Alexander & Co. was nothing more than a charge for the amount which Mr. Meadows covenanted to pay. It was annihilated by the judgment which had been obtained, and it could not extend to the future balances. The creditors' trustees in this case were in the position of purchasers without notice.—

Jones v. Williams, 24 Beav. 47.

Mr. Eddis, for the mortgagee, who paid the fund into court.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I cannot consider this deed as a security for future balances. There might not be much uncertainty in the amount due upon a banking account at any particular time, still, it would not be definitely ascertained until the interest and other usual charges were added. Until that was done the balance could not be struck. The operative part of the deed, taken in connexion with the recitals, shews that the balance then due was referred to, but that was to be ascertained at a future time. The recitals alone could not have been sufficient to lead to the conclusion which the bankers contend for. They expressly refer to what is "hereinafter mentioned." It was argued that the intention of the parties, as expressed in the recitals, was to execute bonds, and that the bond subsequently executed extended to future balances; but the operative words of the deed-poll giving the charge fell far short of carrying the construction of the deed to that extent. They were "shall or may be found due on the balance of the said several accounts." The words in the bond being, "such sums of money as now are or which shall from time to time be or become due and owing on the said account." The apparent intention of the parties, as expressed in the deed, was to secure the balance then due, but which was to be ascertained at a future time. The covenant in the deed referred to the former part of the instrument by the words "as aforesaid," and it did not extend the construction beyond the operative part of the deed.

The costs incurred by trustees in paying money into court under the Trustees' Relief Act, and also the costs of their appearing on paying it out, are subject to taxation.

The petitioner was entitled to a fund which had been paid into court under the Trustees' Relief Act. The original sum was 164*l.* 7*s.* 3*d.*, which had become payable to the estate of a testator on the happening of a contingency. The trustees paid this amount into court, after deducting 39*l.* "for costs in taking the opinion of counsel relative to the said sum, and in and about transferring the balance into court." The petitioner now asked for payment of the amount, and for a taxation of the costs.

Mr. W. Morris, for the petitioner.

Mr. Hallett, for the trustees, applied for the costs of their appearing on this petition.

Mr. W. Morris asked that the order to tax might be extended to the costs incurred by the trustees in paying the money into court.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS directed the fund to be paid to the petitioner, and ordered the costs to be taxed, including those incurred by the trustees in paying the money into court, and also that they should give credit for the 39*l.* which they had retained.

In re THE WRYSGAN
SLATE QUARRYING COMPANY, ex parte
BIRCH.

Relinquishment of Shares—Duties of Purser.*

A shareholder in a company, carried on upon the cost-book principle, relinquished his shares upon paying his pro rata portion of the liabilities of the company. All the formalities required for the relinquishment of such shares were regularly complied with and entered in the books of the company, and the correspondence was conducted with the purser, who fixed the amount to be paid by the shareholder without the sanction of the managing committee:—Held, that, the purser being the authorized officer of the company to conduct such transactions, the shareholder was exempted from liability in respect of any excess of power on the part of the purser; and upon the winding up of the company it was ordered that such shareholder should not be placed upon the list of contributories.

Upon the winding up of the above-named company a question was raised as to the liability of the Rev. E. Birch, and Marianne, his wife, to be placed upon the list of contributories. The case came on upon adjourned summons from chambers.

It appeared that the company was carried on upon the cost-book principle, and it was provided by their deed that the purser, who was also called the managing director, was to take charge of the offices of the company, with the assistance of a clerk; that he was to keep the books, papers, documents and accounts, conduct the correspondence, give notice of dividends, defend actions, and receive notices of withdrawal of the shareholders, who, upon such withdrawal, were to pay a pro rata share of the debts and liabilities of the company. It was also provided, that the affairs of the company should be managed by a committee of not less than three, and not more than ten directors, and that such committee, subject to the control of a general meeting, should carry on the affairs of the company.

It appeared from the evidence that, in October 1853, Mr. and Mrs. Birch had each of them taken 100 original and 50 preference shares in the company. In the early part of the year 1857 the company had become embarrassed, and Mr. Birch, who resided at Windlesham, in Surrey, was sued by certain creditors in the County Court of Caernarvon, where the mines were situate. Mr. Birch immediately took steps, by the advice of his solicitor, to withdraw from the company, and a formal notice of the relinquishment of their shares was forwarded by Mr. and Mrs. Birch to Mr. Wilkinson, the purser of the company. Mr. Wilkinson thereupon fixed the sum of 6s. 6d. per share as the amount to be paid by Mr. and Mrs. Birch for their pro rata portion of the liabilities. This sum was duly paid, and the shares were relinquished; and upon reference to the cost-book and other documents it appeared that the whole of the transaction had been regularly entered, and all the forms required by the company with reference to the withdrawal had been strictly complied with.

It also appeared that 1,400 other shareholders had withdrawn from the company about the same period; but in the case of these persons the sum of 8s. per share had been paid as the pro rata share of the liabilities of the company.

The company was subsequently declared to be insolvent, and a winding-up order was obtained; and the questions now raised were, whether the purser had a right to settle the pro rata share to be paid by each shareholder upon his withdrawal, and whether the amount so fixed by him in the case of Mr. and Mrs. Birch was the proper amount to be borne by them.

Mr. Baily and Mr. De Gex appeared for the official manager, and contended that the pro rata share of the liabilities ought to have been fixed by the managing committee, and that the purser had no power of himself to assess the amount. No shareholder could be exonerated until the managing committee had sanctioned the withdrawal of a shareholder; the purser was a mere officer of the company, and the arbitrary fixing by him of a certain sum as the pro rata share of the liabilities could not make the transaction binding. Then, as to the correctness of the amount, it was clear that the 6s. 6d. could not be the full share, since the other shareholders who had withdrawn at the same time had paid 8s. per share. At any rate, the two amounts could not both be correct. Under these circumstances, as the purser had evidently acted ultra vires, Mr. and Mrs. Birch could not be considered to have legally relinquished their shares; and their names must consequently be put upon the list of contributories. They cited—

Mr. Giffard and Mr. Pontifex, who appeared for Mr. and Mrs. Birch, were not called upon to address the Court.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—I cannot see how any human dealings are to go on if these parties are to be held liable. It is impossible to conceive anything more strict and fair than the whole proceedings on the part of Mr. and Mrs. Birch. The real question is, whether, as between these two persons on the one hand, and the whole body of contributories on the other, there is sufficient to acquit them of liability in respect of those shares which they held up to the month of April 1857. It appears by the regulations of the company that the purser was the proper person to conduct the correspondence as between the managing committee and the shareholders; and it is manifest that such must be the course of proceeding in a company, for how could a shareholder know anything about the transactions except through the proper officer appointed to conduct the correspondence? He could not be aware of what took place from time to time in the board-room, and he could only communicate with the committee through the purser. I will assume that Mr. Birch was cognizant of the difficulties existing on the part of the company by the fact, that he had been sued by some of the creditors, and that knowledge led him very naturally to wish to withdraw from the concern, if it could be legally done, and knowing that the rules of the company gave him power to withdraw upon certain conditions, he did all that was required of him for that purpose. It is alleged that he did not, in fact, pay the pro rata share of the liabilities, because he only paid the amount fixed by the purser, which was not the full amount; but whether this was so or not, he had no means of proving, and at the present time he cannot even ascertain the correct amount of the liabilities by reference to the books, because he has no right to any access to the books unless he admits his liability as a contributory. If this argument were to prevail, any shareholder who might have regularly retired could be called upon, after the lapse of several years, to prove a thing he has no means of ascertaining. It appears to me, therefore, that the clause must receive this modification, that the company can only act through the purser in respect to the matters in question. Mr. Birch was resident at Windlesham, the mine was situate in Wales, and the office was in London, and the only person Mr. Birch could deal with was the purser, and if the purser or the directors failed in their duty, that is no reason why Mr. Birch should suffer. Under these circumstances, the names of Mr. and Mrs. Birch cannot be placed on the list of contributories. Their costs, and the costs of the official manager, must come out of the estate.

May 11, 12. } WILSON v. KEATING.

Vendor and Purchaser — Contract — Trustee — Misrepresentation — Liability — Principal and Agent.

If a party executes a deed as principal he at once takes the property and makes himself liable for the purchase-money, and he will not be heard to say that no contract existed with the vendor, or that his execution was obtained upon the representation of a third party that the purchase-money was paid, and that he took the property in the character of trustee only.

The Newcastle Commercial Banking Company was established under the 7 Geo. 4. c. 46. They carried on business at Newcastle-upon-Tyne under a deed of settlement dated the 10th of February 1837.

John Sadleir, in 1853, contemplated the amalgamation of several northern joint-stock banks and the formation of one large banking company.

On the 6th of October 1855 William Walker, who was the managing director of the Newcastle Commercial Banking Company, undertook within seven days from the 26th of October instant, that he would procure to be transferred to James Sadleir, Farmery John Law and Richard Hartley Kennedy, or their nominees, not less than 4,000 shares in the bank, and also that the present directors of the company would do such acts as might be requisite to transfer and vest in Messrs. Sadleir, Law and Kennedy, or their nominees, the management and direction of the company and vacate their respective offices; and Messrs. Sadleir, Law and Kennedy agreed to purchase or find purchasers for as many shares as should be offered to them within six months at the price of 5*l.* per share, to be paid within twelve months from the execution of the respective transfers, with interest at 5*l.* per cent. per annum.

By a subsequent agreement, dated the 5th of November 1855, it was agreed that the certificates of all shares taken by Messrs. Sadleir, Law and Kennedy should be deposited with W. Walker until the purchase-money for the shares was paid, either by them or by the other individuals for whom they acted and to whom the shares might be transferred, and that they should not deal with any of such shares, or mortgage or sell them, until the purchase-money for the same had been paid, and that W. Walker should hold the certificates of the shares until paid for, for himself and others, as unpaid vendors.

The bill alleged that the defendant, Robert Keating, was one of the persons for whom Messrs. Sadleir, Law and Kennedy acted, and that on the 20th of November 1855 R. Keating agreed to purchase from the plaintiff 105 shares for 525*l.*, upon the terms of the agreement, and that on the same day a deed of transfer was executed, and subsequently registered in the books of the company, by which it was witnessed that, in consideration of 525*l.* therein stated to have been paid to R. Wilson by R. Keating, who acknowledged to have received the same and thereby released the defendant therefrom, he, R. Wilson, transferred the 105 shares and all dividends then due and to become due thereon, unto the defendant, his executors, administrators and assigns, subject to the provisions of the deed of settlement, which the defendant thereby covenanted to observe and perform.

Notwithstanding the acknowledgment of the receipt and release in the deed, the purchase-money for the shares was not paid, and the certificates were deposited with W. Walker to secure the 525*l.* and interest, which was still due to the plaintiff.

On the 12th of March 1857 the plaintiff, under the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act (12 & 13 Vict. c. 106), issued a writ of summons against the defendant, as being a trader having privilege of parliament, to recover the 525*l.* and interest. The defendant deposited 700*l.* with the London and County Bank, in the names of Messrs. Mawe and Harwood, and on the 30th of May 1857 Coleridge, J. ordered it to remain in the bank to abide the event of the action.

The plaintiff finding he was estopped from denying the statement in the deed of transfer respecting the consideration money and the acknowledgment of the receipt and the release therefrom, and that he could not proceed with the action, filed this bill, praying for a specific performance of the agreement, and that the defendant might be restrained from requiring the plaintiff to proceed in or to discontinue the action, and from in any way determining the same, and from requiring the repayment of the 700*l.* until the determination of this suit, and that it might be retained in the bank to abide the result of this suit.

In consequence of the agreement of the 6th of October 1855 the assets of the Newcastle bank were transferred to London, and on the 20th of August 1856 it stopped payment and the shares lost all value.

The defendant, by his answer, said—“Some time in November 1855 John Sadleir told me that he had made arrangements for purchasing the Newcastle Bank, and that he had put some shares in my name. I told him that I could not take them as I had no money to pay for them; upon which he replied, that was not what he meant, but I was to act as trustee for him, and that I should incur no responsibility in so doing, as the shares were already paid for; that he produced one or two deeds of transfer and shewed me the recital thereon, that the purchase-money for the shares had been paid, which I read; and he asked me to sign the deeds, which I did on the faith of the recital that the shares were paid for; but when I signed the deeds I had no idea of taking any beneficial interest under the deeds, and I have never claimed any such beneficial interest, and I considered that the shares transferred to me were to be held by me merely as trustee for John Sadleir, and that I should incur no responsibility in respect of them. The said John Sadleir, at the same time I executed the deeds also informed me that I had been appointed a director of the company and that he wished me to accept the office. After I had signed the deeds John Sadleir took them away with him, and I have never seen them since.” He then said that he had the fullest confidence in the word and integrity of John Sadleir and that he was not undeceived till after his death, on the 17th of February 1856, by his own hand. “Except as regards the fact of my having signed the deeds of transfer, the circumstances under which I signed them and the representations made to me by John Sadleir as aforesaid, I was wholly ignorant of the facts and circumstances hereinbefore stated until some time after the death of John Sadleir, and some of the facts and circumstances I have only discovered since the filing of this bill, and the first time that I heard of there being any agreement for the purchase of the shares in the Newcastle Bank between Messrs. James Sadleir, Law and Kennedy was some time after the death of John Sadleir, when Mr. O'Shea, the manager of the Newcastle Bank, told me that they had agreed to purchase the shares, and that they were to give 5*l.* a share for them, and that they were to be allowed a year to pay for them. I never gave any authority directly or indirectly to Messrs. James Sadleir, Law and Kennedy, or any or either of them, to purchase or negotiate on my behalf for the purchase of any shares in the Newcastle company with any shareholder in the said company.”

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. A. G. Marten, for the plaintiff.—The defendant was the purchaser from the plaintiff of some shares in the Newcastle Bank; he accepted the transfer and executed the deed, but he refuses to pay the purchase-money. The deed contains the usual acknowledgment of the receipt of the purchase-money, but neither that nor the release is any ground for withholding payment of the money, when it is not even pretended to have been paid.

Mr. Selwyn and Mr. H. Stevens.—There was no contract existing between the plaintiff and the defendant. It was true the defendant had agreed to become a trustee for John Sadleir of the property purchased; but that created no liability upon the defendant in respect of the shares. If the plaintiff had any claim it was at law; he could not ask the Court to enforce the deed, and at the same time ask it to reject facts apparent on the face of it. The transfer was accepted by the defendant on the faith that the shares were paid for, and not with any idea that he was to pay for them. The defendant was willing to re-transfer the shares.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—By the deed of transfer, which has been executed, the plaintiff, in consideration of 5*l.* a share, transfers 105 shares in a joint-stock banking company to the defendant. The deed is executed by both parties; the purchase-money was not paid at the time, and the vendor now files a bill to obtain payment. Were that all, it would be a matter of course. The deed recites that the money was paid, and the plaintiff by his signature admits the fact, but in this court parties may always shew that the recital was not true, and that the money was not paid. It has been argued, on behalf of the defendant, that there was no contract to purchase, but the argument rests upon a fallacy. The contract to purchase is not distinct from the deed. There may be, and there often is, a contract distinct from the deed. If the deed is in accordance with the contract it is absorbed by the deed; but if the deed does not carry the contract into effect then various equities may arise. In ordinary cases a separate contract need not be prepared; the whole transaction may be carried out by the deed. This usually recites that a contract has been made, but it is immaterial whether any previous agreement existed or not, as the deed constitutes the contract between the parties. The conveyance vests the property in the purchaser, and it gives the vendor a right to receive the purchase-money; and if it is not paid, he is entitled in this court to ask that payment may be enforced. The plaintiff has filed this bill for the performance of the contract, and the defence is, "You cannot refuse to abide by the deed, and at the same time seek to enforce it; but if you accept the deed proceed upon it at law: it estops neither the plaintiff from denying payment, nor the defendant from denying that there was any contract." In practice all sales for joint-stock companies are made through a broker; there is no previous contract; the parties who buy and sell know nothing of each other. The objection that there was no existing contract would apply as well to a sale of shares as a sale of lands, and it is wholly untenable against a vendor who is asking for his purchase-money. It was also objected that W. Walker was not the agent of the defendant. If that is supposed to be material, I think he was not, but at the same time I do not see how it can be material. The defendant actually executes the deed, and it is wholly immaterial whether he had any agent or not in the preliminary agreement. I assume that Mr. Walker made no misrepresentation to the defendant, and that no grounds exist for setting the deed aside either for misrepresentation, fraud, or even mistake; if they existed, it was the duty of the defendant to have brought them forward. The party, then, who resists the performance of what he has undertaken to do must shew the grounds of his refusal; these the defendant has stated in his answer, but can his conversation with J. Sadleir exonerate him from the consequence of having executed the deed? It is certain that J. Sadleir was not the agent of the plaintiff, who knew nothing about him, and no agent of the plaintiff made any false representation to the defendant. The plaintiff merely executed the deed, and delivered it to his agent to be presented to the defendant to be executed by him. I do not doubt the accuracy of the defendant's statement. J. Sadleir said, "You are not to pay for these shares; I have already paid for them. You are to hold them really for me, and you are to undertake the whole matter for me." Thereupon the defendant said, "I cannot pay for them." To which J. Sadleir replied, "They are already paid for." The defendant, however, was himself bound to see that the shares were paid for; he had executed the deed, and he was bound to know that he had legally made himself liable to pay for the shares if they were not already paid for; and unless he had an acknowledgment from the plaintiff, or some agent of the plaintiff, that he had received the money, the mere statement of another party that he had paid would not exonerate the defendant from his liability to the plaintiff. The question then is, which of two innocent parties is to bear the loss occasioned by the fraud of J. Sadleir? The false representations were made by J. Sadleir to the defendant; it was between them alone. How is the plaintiff to blame for the false representations made by J. Sadleir which deceived the defendant? As between innocent parties, the person who is induced by the false representations of another to enter into an engagement must be answerable and bear the loss; it was he who incurred the liability upon those engagements. I disregard all the statements respecting the previous arrangements, by which it is alleged, I dare say truly, that three persons, who were puppets in the hands of J. Sadleir, contracted with W. Walker to take 4,000 shares in the bank: but that does not in the slightest affect the plaintiff, except so far as, being one of the shareholders in the bank, he may have ratified that transaction; but that did not affect his right to sell his shares, or disentitle him to the purchase-money. It has been said in argument that the defendant was willing to give back those shares, but now they are not only worth nothing, but they are a burthen. At the time of the sale, the shares were, no doubt, of some value, and might have been sold to somebody, but now it is impossible to place the parties in the position they were in prior to the transaction. It was suggested that the case must be tested by the fact, whether the plaintiff could have filed a bill within a twelvemonth; but that affords no test. He certainly could have filed a bill and have claimed a performance of the whole contract; but if the plaintiff's agent when he handed the deed over for execution by the purchaser told him, "You shall not be called upon to pay the purchase-money for twelve months," then, undoubtedly, the purchaser, having executed the deed upon the faith of such a statement, would be entitled to the benefit of that agreement; and even if the deed had been executed upon the faith of a parol statement, still the defendant would have been entitled to the benefit of it; and, consequently, if a bill had been filed within twelve months, the defendant would have been entitled to say, "The statement made by your agent was, that the purchase-money was not to be paid for twelve months." But that does not alter the nature of the engagement constituted by the execution of the deed: that remains the same. The whole case rests upon the operation of the deed; it is not pretended that it was obtained by fraud on the part of the plaintiff, or upon any statement which can affect him. The defendant, therefore, is bound to perform the obligations contained in the deed, one of which is to pay the purchase-money. The purchase-money has not been paid; the defendant, therefore, must pay it, and the plaintiff is entitled to a decree, with costs.

July 16.—Upon appeal to the Lord Chancellor and the Lords Justices, the decision was affirmed.

1858.* SUNKEN VESSELS RECO-
June 28. VERY COMPANY (LIMIT-ED).

Winding up—Contributory—Conditional Application and Conditional Acceptance of Shares.

W, the partner of a firm, applied for shares in a joint-stock company, on condition that the firm should be employed to supply chains and other things manufactured by them, which the company would require in their business. The company was ordered to be wound up in bankruptcy, under the provisions of the statute 19 & 20 Vict. c. 47. (the Joint-Stock Companies Act, 1856), and one of the Commissioners placed the name of W. on the list of contributories; but, upon appeal, the order was reversed.

This was a petition of appeal from a decision of the late Mr. Commissioner Stevenson, of the Liverpool District Court of Bankruptcy, placing the name of Mr. Henry Wood upon the list of contributories of the Sunken Vessels Recovery Company (limited).

This company was incorporated on the 22nd of November 1856, under the provisions of the statute 19 & 20 Vict. c. 47. (the Joint-Stock Companies Act, 1856), and adopted the terms of association comprised in Table B. of the schedule to that act—at least so far as concerned the application for and taking of shares. The objects of the association were the raising and recovering of sunken ships and their cargoes, the capital being 60,000*l.* in 6,000 shares of 10*l.* each.

Mr. Wood was, in 1857, in the trade or business of chain cable manufacturer, in partnership with others, under the firm of "Henry Wood & Co." Capt. Smith was the manager of the company, and between these two gentlemen the following correspondence (stated partly in substance and partly in the words used), all dated in 1857, took place, the same being not only the foundation, but the whole substance of this case.

* This case was omitted in the volume for 1858, the reporter considering that a state of circumstances so peculiar was not likely to arise again. As, however, the case has been cited in Ex parte Wollaston (ante, p. 721), it is deemed better now to insert it.

Jan. 6.

Letter from Mr. Wood, in the name of his firm, to the manager, "hoping that my firm shall receive in due time orders for what the company shall require in our way of business."

Jan. 12.

Answer of the manager of the company, requesting the firm of Wood & Co. to take 100 shares.

Jan. 15.

From Wood & Co. to the manager.—"Sir, we have your favour of the 12th inst. In reply it is rather out of our line to take shares, but, should we do so, may we expect the orders for the chains and anchors required? Of course it would be our part to shew that the quality of our manufactures is first class. We are now about to make the chains for the Liverpool new landing stage."

Jan. 16.

The manager to Wood & Co.—"I beg to acknowledge the receipt of yours of the 15th, and to say that when I wrote to you I had in view your obtaining the order for the chains, anchors, &c. As everything relating to the construction and equipment of the vessels, &c. will have to be under my superintendence, it may be considered as a mutual arrangement only depending on your engagement to supply everything in your way of the first material. If you will please to send me the form of application for shares you can do so, subject to your supplying the various materials in your manufacture that may be required for our purposes."

Jan. 23.

Wood & Co. to the manager.—"Sir, we return your prospectus filled up in application for 100 shares to our principal, but as there specified we do so on the condition named in our previous letters of the 5th (mistake for the 6th) and 15th inst., that we have the supplying of chains and anchors, and such goods as we manufacture that may be required for the operations. Of course the quality of the articles is to be first class, and the prices moderate."

Enclosure.

"To the Directors of the Sunken Vessels Recovery Company (limited).—Gentlemen, I request you to allot me 100 shares in the above company, and I undertake to accept the same or any less number that may be allotted to me, and to execute the memorandum and articles of association of the said company, and to pay the deposit and calls. Your obedient servant, Henry Wood, iron-merchants, 4, Grove Piazzas, Liverpool, Jan. 15, 1857, upon condition named in my firm's (Henry Wood & Co.) letters to Capt. Smith of January the 5th (mistake for 6th) and 15th."

March 12.

Letter from the manager to Mr. Wood, stating that the directors had allotted to him 100 shares.

March 17.

Wood & Co. to the directors.—"Gentlemen, we have received your allotment letter 100 shares, under date the 12th inst. Having made application for them, and arranged with Capt. Smith that it should be on condition that we should have the supplying of the chains and anchors, and such other goods which we manufacture, as may be required by the company, before paying any deposit we are desirous of an undertaking to that effect."

May 20.

The Secretary to Wood & Co.—"I find that a letter of yours, dated in March last, respecting the shares allotted to you on the 12th of that month has not been answered, owing to the resignation of the late secretary, and I now beg to inform you that, at a board meeting held on the 18th of March, a minute was recorded to the effect that, provided your chains, &c. are approved after the usual test and rendered at the market price on terms similar to those of the general trade, you will be dealt with by the board. I shall, therefore, have much pleasure in receiving your letter of allotment, with the banker's receipt for payments of the deposit on your shares, in order that it may be exchanged for the share certificates bearing the seal of the company."

June 4.

Wood & Co. to the secretary, in substance, as follows:—"The conditions you name are rather vague, and, on the part of the company, engage nothing. On the other hand, it is not our desire to require such engagement from them as would be unreasonable. We expect merely that on our taking the shares we shall have the supplying of the chains, anchors and other manufactures of ours that may be required, of the required quality and description, and at fair prices for such. It appears to us that there is now a good opportunity of arranging the point, in a manner satisfactory to both parties. You have contracted for the first vessels for the use of the company, send us specifications of the chains, &c. required for them, and we shall be happy to submit tenders for their supply, and propose that, if we get the tender, we shall take the shares. It may be that the required quantity of chains, &c. is so small (for the first vessel) that we may have to stipulate we are to have the orders for outfits for future vessels for a certain number of years at same prices, with such advance or decline as there might be in the price of iron."

Messrs. Wood & Co. were never asked to supply the company with goods, and Mr. Wood was not called upon to sign the articles of association or to pay deposits on the shares; but the company entered his name on the list of shareholders, and returned his name to the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies.

In this state of circumstances, on the 16th of April 1858, an order was made for winding up the company under the before-named act and the Amendment Act of 1857, and on the 27th of the same month Mr. Commissioner Stevenson placed Mr. Wood's name on the list of contributories.

The present petition prayed that Mr. Wood's name might be removed, and the list of shareholders might be rectified by striking out his name.

For the appellant it was insisted that he never accepted the shares in writing as required by the form in Table B. of the Joint-Stock Companies Act of 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 47); that there never was any binding contract to take the shares, the whole being conditional, conditional in offer and conditional as to assent or acceptance of the offer; and whether (as the Bench had suggested) the condition was legal or illegal, it did not differ in any material respect from an agreement to perform works and supply articles of manufacture, and accept payment of the amount due in shares in the company. Such would be the effect if the transaction were legal, and if the Court considered it to be illegal the difficulty would be obviated, for the condition was one precedent to the taking of the shares. Moreover, by the 19th section of the act, no person could be a contributory unless he has both accepted shares, which this gentleman never did, unconditionally, and his name is on the share register, which latter fact only is present in this case.

For the official liquidator it was argued that the bargain was that if the company wanted articles of the appellant's manufacture they would buy of his firm; but it so happened that they wanted none, and therefore did not buy, so that no breach of condition had taken place. In the last letter written by Wood & Co., the shares are treated as taken, and in the former letter, namely, that of the 23rd of January, there was an undertaking to accept, but to this was added an illegal qualification, and, in such circumstances, the Court would enforce the legal part, namely, the acceptance, and reject the illegal part, namely, the qualification, and confirm the decision of the Commissioner.

Mr. Willcock and Mr. Roxburgh, for the appellant.

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Woodroffe, for the official liquidator.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—The condition expressed in Mr. Wood's letter of application of the 23rd of January, whether legal or illegal, corrupt or not corrupt, was, in my judgment, a condition precedent. It appears to me that the terms of that condition were never with sufficient distinctness acceded to by the company, and that the name, therefore, of this gentleman ought not to be on the list of contributories.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—I think that a condition was attached not only to the offer to take the shares, but also to the acceptance of them, and that there was no acceptance, except subject to the condition upon the terms of which the offer to take the shares was made. I do not find that the condition was accepted by the company, for the minute of the 18th of March is merely to the effect that the appellant should be dealt with by the board; whereas, what he intended to stipulate for was, that the company should take from him all the cables and anchors that should be wanted. I am of opinion, therefore, that there was no effectual acceptance of these shares, and that the name of the appellant ought to be removed from the list of contributories.

KINDERSLEY, V.C. } HOLROYD v. HOL-
May 1. } ROYD.

Partnership Property—Really or Personally.

Where land is purchased by partners out of the partnership assets, and used for the purposes of the business, it is to be considered as personally, both as between the partners themselves and as between the heir and personal representatives of a deceased partner.

Henry Holroyd and Richard Holroyd carried on the business of sizers at Colne, in Lancashire, under articles of partnership; and in the year 1855 they purchased certain copyhold property, which was conveyed to them as tenants in common. Upon this property the two partners erected a size-house and other buildings, in which the business of the partnership was carried on. H. Holroyd then died, and this suit was instituted to administer his estate; and a summons was taken out by Jane Holroyd, the administratrix of H. Holroyd, to confirm a sale of the copyhold property forming part of the real estate of the partnership; and a question was raised between the heir-at-law and the next-of-kin of H. Holroyd, whether the proceeds of the sale were to be considered as realty or personally.

The case now came on upon adjourned summons. An affidavit had been made in the suit by R. Holroyd, to the effect that the property was purchased, and the size-house and buildings were erected, with money forming part of the partnership assets, and during the continuance of the partnership.

Mr. Kay, for the administratrix, contended that the copyhold property must be considered as personal estate, and must go to the next-of-kin of the intestate. The rule was, that all partnership property purchased out of the partnership assets, and used for the purposes of the trade, must be considered as personal estate. When the partnership was dissolved by the death of H. Holroyd, this copyhold property was sold for the purpose of winding up the affairs and dividing the residue as money.

Mr. Jessel, for the purchaser, supported the same argument as that used by the administratrix.

Mr. Hughes, for the heir-at-law, submitted that the authorities were by no means conclusive upon the subject, and there had been much difference of opinion among the Judges. It was in evidence, moreover, in this case that the intestate was in the habit of purchasing property of this nature for his own purposes, and not for the partnership; and it was fair to assume that the property in question was so purchased by him.

The following authorities were referred to:—

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—It appears that the copyhold property in question was conveyed to the partners as tenants in common in fee, and the question now is, not only as between the partners themselves, but between the heir and personal representative of the deceased partner, whether that property is to be considered as realty or personalty. In the case of Darby v. Darby the points differed from those now raised; but I had fully to consider the authorities on the subject, and the result of them appeared to me to be this:—in Thornton v. Dixon, Lord Thurlow said he had always understood that where partners bought lands for the purpose of a partnership concern, it was to be considered part of the partnership fund, and consequently must be considered as personalty, and distributable as such; but the case having come on before him again, he altered his opinion, and said this: “That had the agreement been between two or more partners, that the mills (that is, the property in question) should be valued and sold,”—if there had been an express agreement to that effect,—“it would have converted them into personalty of the partnership; but that he considered the agreement in that case was not sufficient to vary the nature of the property; and, therefore, after the dissolution of the partnership, one partner having died, the property would result according to its respective nature, the real as real, and the personal as personal estate.” Sir W. Grant had the question before him in two different cases, in the case of Bell v. Phyn and Balmain v. Shore, and in both those cases he decided on the authority of Lord Thurlow’s decision in Thornton v. Dixon. Lord Eldon had the question raised before him in several cases, and expressed an unmistakeable opinion that where property is purchased by partners carrying on a trade out of the partnership assets, for the purpose of the business, it is not only partnership property, but because it is so, it is also personalty to all intents and purposes, not only as between the partners themselves, but as between the heir and personal representative. Lord Eldon’s opinion is a host in itself, but Sir J. Leach decided in the same way, even more distinctly; and Sir Launcelot Shadwell, in Houghton v. Houghton, though at first his mind seemed to vacillate, took the same view of the principle. Even supposing that the language in Phillips v. Phillips is too unreserved, which, however,

I do not think is the case, the preponderating weight of opinion is in favour of property like this being considered as personalty. The argument that the intestate bought this copyhold, as he did other property, for his own benefit, is met by the fact of its having been conveyed to him and his partner as tenants in common, and that premises were erected on it, and the business carried on there. It appears to me to be a clear case within the principle; and having once come to the conclusion that it was partnership property, it must follow also that it is to be dealt with as personalty. In the common case of a devise of land to trustees to sell and divide the money between different persons, there, if one dies, and the land remains unsold, still it is considered as personalty, because, for the purpose of working out the right which each party may insist upon, there must be a sale, although no doubt all parties may agree to keep it unsold. There is no reason why the same principle should not be applicable to partnership, and it is certainly more convenient to consider it altogether as personalty than as personalty for one purpose and realty for others. In this case it is clearly personalty.

 July 19. } GARDNER v. GARDNER.

Baron and Feme—Separate Estate.

A legacy of 1,000l. bequeathed to the separate use of a married woman was paid to her, she and her husband both joining in a release to the executors. The money was then allowed to get into the hands of the husband, who paid it to his own bankers, and mixed it with his own money, and employed it in his own business and in the family expenditure. This continued nearly twenty years, when the husband died. There was no evidence to shew the circumstances under which the money was paid to the husband’s banker, nor any proof of any formal assent on the part of the wife to the mode of dealing with the fund by the husband, or of any gift of the fund by her to him:—Held, notwithstanding, upon special case, that the wife’s assent to the employment and expenditure of the money by the husband must be presumed, and that she could not be allowed to claim it back from the husband's estate, as if still affected by the trust for her separate use.

In 1838, Mrs. Gardner, the wife of Thomas Gardner, received the sum of 1,009*l.* in payment of a legacy bequeathed to her by the will of a testator and interest thereon, and she executed a release to the executors of the will, such release being also executed by her husband in order to testify his privity and consent. The said sum came almost immediately afterwards to the hands of Thomas Gardner, the husband, who paid it to his own account at his banker's, and mixed it with his own money and employed it in his own business and in the family expenditure. This continued for about twenty years, when T. Gardner, the husband, died intestate. A question then arose, whether his widow, Mrs. Gardner, could claim the 1,009*l.* out of his estate, which question was now submitted for the consideration of the Court, upon a special case, filed by Mrs. Gardner, stating the facts above mentioned. There was no evidence to shew in what manner or under what circumstances the money came into the husband's hands, or was dealt with by him as above mentioned, save that the special case did not contain any statement denying that the money came to his hands, and was paid by him to his banker, and dealt with by him as above mentioned, with her knowledge and assent. There was likewise no evidence to shew whether, in assenting to the money being held by her husband, the plaintiff intended that the sum in question should be a gift to her husband, or should be held by him in trust for herself for her separate use; and the special case stated that no communication took place between them on the subject after the payment.

Mr. Archibald Smith, for the plaintiff, submitted that in the absence of any proof of a gift of the fund having been made by the plaintiff, Mrs. Gardner, to her husband, and of circumstances shewing her assent to the dealings with the fund by him stated in the special case, the Court would consider him to have all along been a trustee of the fund for her separate use.—

Rowe v. Rowe, 2 De Gex & Sm. 294; s. c. 17 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 357.

Mr. Welford, for the defendants, the next-of-kin of the testator, said the rule laid down by Lord Eldon in Rich v. Cockell, and ever since followed by the Court, undoubtedly was, that where there is a gift to a married woman to her separate use, without the intervention of a trustee, the husband becomes a trustee for her; but submitted that such trust might be destroyed by clear evidence that the wife intended to make it over to the husband. He contended that, from the circumstances of the present case, the clear inference was that the wife had assented to the mode of dealing with the fund by the husband, and had, in fact, made an absolute gift to him of such fund. He cited—Darkin v. Darkin, 17 Beav. 578; s. c. 23 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 890.

Mr. A. Smith replied.

STUART, V.C. held, that, although in this case there was no evidence to shew the circumstances under which the money was paid to the husband's banker, nor any proof of any formal assent on the part of the wife, or of any gift of the fund to her husband, yet her assent to the employment and expenditure of the money by the husband in the manner mentioned in the special case must be presumed, and that she could not now be allowed to claim it back, as if still affected by the trust for her separate use. He observed that the case was not one of gift to the husband, but it was one in which the husband, holding the money upon trust for the wife, or as she should direct, employed it for the most part in purposes for their common benefit; and the question was, whether, after all that had been done with the knowledge and assent of the wife, she was to recover the money from the husband's estate, just as if it had remained in his hands without any act of hers to put an end to the trust for her separate use. His opinion was, that the assent of the wife to the employment of the money by the husband, partly in his business and partly in expenditure for the benefit of the family, rendered it impossible for the wife, after that assent, to claim the money out of the assets of the husband. The answer, therefore, to the special case would be to that effect.

June 11. } MEDWORTH v. POPE.

Will—Devisee—Description.

A testator, who had several natural children by his housekeeper, devised real estate to each of them, by name. He then devised certain real estate "to such other child, if any, that might be born of his housekeeper in his, the testator's, lifetime, or in due time after his death," and to such child's heirs and assigns:—Held, that a child born after the date of the will took no interest under the devise.

Joseph Medworth had six children by his housekeeper, Sarah Gibson. They were all known by the name of Medworth.

By his will, dated the 18th of October 1825, he devised to his natural son John Medworth Gibson, his heirs and assigns, for ever, his house in Union Place, Wisbeach. He in like manner gave a house and premises to each of his other natural children, by name, and their respective heirs and assigns.

The testator then "devised to such other child, if any, that might be born of his housekeeper Sarah Gibson in his, the testator's, lifetime, or in due time after his death, for such child's own use and benefit, and to the said child's heirs and assigns for ever, two houses, with the appurtenances thereto belonging, being 1 and 2, Market Street, Wisbeach, aforesaid."

The testator died on the 17th of October 1827.

Edward Medworth was born of Sarah Gibson after the date of the will. He was the reputed son of the testator, and he claimed the two houses in Market Street, as the devisee under the will.

The suit was instituted by John Medworth, one of the natural children, for the administration of the testator's estate.

Mr. Follett and Mr. Welford, for the plaintiff.—The question was whether there could be a good gift to an unborn child of an unmarried woman. The will referred to his other children by the same woman.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The defendant, E. Medworth, cannot take under the words of this will. The law does not construe wills with reference to the birth of illegitimate children. A gift to future children of an unmarried woman must mean to future legitimate children. The law will not allow illegitimate children any interest with them. Illegitimate children may take, if specifically pointed out. In this case, however, I think Edward Medworth took no interest under the will (2).

KINDERSLEY, V.C. } In re MARSDEN'S
June 4. } TRUST.

Power of Appointment—Fraudulent Appointment.

A married woman, having a power of appointment in favour of any one or more of her children, appointed the whole fund to one child absolutely; and there was evidence to shew that an arrangement had been entered into, that such child should hand over one half of the fund to her father absolutely, and should give him a life interest in the other half. No notice of such arrangement was, however, given to the appointee during the life of the mother:—Held, that the execution of the appointment was in fraud of the power, and therefore void.

By an indenture of settlement, dated the 14th of October 1836, and made previously to the marriage of William John Martin and Charlotte Marsden, but not stated to be in consideration of such marriage, certain canal shares belonging to Charlotte Marsden were assigned to trustees, upon the trusts therein mentioned, for the benefit of Charlotte Marsden during her life, with power to the trustees, in case she should marry, to settle the property upon her for her separate use; and after her decease, in case she should leave any husband surviving her, upon trust during the remainder of his life to pay one-fourth part of the dividends arising from the above shares to him, or his assigns, with power for the said Charlotte Marsden at any time to revoke the trusts in favour of such husband, and subject to the said trusts in favour of her said husband, in trust for all and every, or such one or more exclusively of the others or other, of the children or child or other issue of the said Charlotte Marsden, with provision for their maintenance and education, at such age or time, or respective ages or times, and if more than one, in such parts, shares and proportions, and charged with such annual sums of money and limitations over for the benefit of the same children or issue, or some or one of them, and upon such conditions and restrictions, and in such manner as the said Charlotte Marsden, whether covert or sole, and if under coverture, notwithstanding such coverture, should by deed or will, to be attested as therein directed, appoint; and in default of such direction and appointment, in trust for all the children of the said Charlotte Marsden in manner therein mentioned, as tenants in common; and in case there should be no children of the said Charlotte Marsden, then, without prejudice to the trusts of a fourth part in favour of any husband, as she, the said Charlotte Marsden, should by deed or will appoint; and in default of appointment in trust for her next-of-kin.

On the 21st of October another deed was executed between Charlotte Marsden of the one part, and W. J. Martin of the other part, which recited that the previous deed had not been prepared in conformity with the intentions of Charlotte Marsden; and that it was her desire to have it rectified. The deed then contained certain clauses altering the deed of the 14th of October, and giving W. J. Martin the absolute interest in the canal shares in case of there being no children of the marriage then intended between them. The marriage took place on the 22nd of November 1836, and there was issue six children, the eldest of whom was Isabel Martin. By a deed-poll, dated the 24th of July 1857, Charlotte Martin (formerly Charlotte Marsden) appointed the whole of the trust property to her eldest daughter, Isabel Martin, absolutely. Charlotte Martin died intestate in August 1858, and Isabel Martin attained twenty-one on the 20th of September 1858. On attaining her majority she applied to the surviving trustee of the deed of the 14th of October for a transfer of so much of the funds as she should be entitled to, but the trustee declined to do so, and paid the whole fund into court, amounting to 5,104*l*. An affidavit was then made by the trustee to the following effect:—That Mr. and Mrs. Martin while residing at Brussels had employed Messrs. Parker & Co., solicitors, for all parties, and had consulted with them what means ought to be taken for the purpose of giving to her husband a larger beneficial interest in the property than he then had; and Mrs. Martin expressed a wish to make a will under her power in the deed of the 14th of October 1836, leaving the whole fund to her eldest daughter, upon condition that she should, upon coming of age, make over to her father one-half of such fund, and should give him a life interest in the remainder; but if this intention could not be legally carried into effect, she proposed to give her eldest daughter the whole property absolutely, and expressed an intention of giving directions to her to carry out her wishes after her death. Instructions were thereupon given to a conveyancer, and he, having a discretion to prepare a deed or will, prepared an appointment to be executed by Mrs. Martin in favour of her daughter absolutely, but appended an opinion thereto that Mrs. Martin ought to have a separate solicitor to advise with her upon the subject, and that notice should be given to the surviving trustee. The appointment was executed, and after Mrs. Martin's death a correspondence took place between the parties, which led to this petition being presented by Isabel Martin, stating that the petitioner was ignorant until after her mother's death of the execution of the appointment by her; and that no bargain or agreement was entered into on her part with reference to the funds appointed to her, and praying that the money might be paid out of court to her.

The petition was opposed by the younger children of the marriage, on the ground that there was the secret understanding above mentioned with respect to the funds; and that the appointment was, therefore, a fraud upon the power and void.

Mr. Shapter and Mr. H. G. Bagshawe, for the petitioner, contended that no fraud upon the power had been shewn to exist. Whatever intention Mrs. Martin might have had to benefit her husband, it was evidently never communicated to the daughter; and the appointment was, therefore, valid, and the petitioner was entitled to the fund.

Mr. Baily and Mr. Cracknall, contra, submitted that the evidence was sufficient to vitiate the appointment. Mrs. Martin, no doubt, intended to give her husband, if possible, a larger share in the property than was sanctioned by the terms of the power; and, having expressed that intention, she went on to state that if it could not legally be done, the appointment was to be made absolutely in favour of her daughter, and no one could fail to see that a fraud upon the power was contemplated by the parties.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—The question in this case is, whether the execution of a power of appointment is to be defeated on the ground that it is what is commonly called a fraud upon the power? The petitioner is the person in whose favour the power has been exercised, and she insists that the appointment is good. On the other side, it is said to be a fraud upon the power, having regard to the circumstances of the case, which are by no means common. Upon the face of the instrument, the power is well executed; and the question is, whether the circumstances which took place prior to its execution are sufficient to shew that a fraud upon the power was intended. This power is, in point of form, a trust, to be exercised by a certain person in favour of certain objects of the trust. These powers occur in a great many forms: one is, at the discretion of the donee with a view to accomplish some purpose for the benefit of other persons;

and in such cases the persons to take under the power are, in a great majority of instances, the persons who would take in default of appointment; but, on the failure of these, there are often ulterior objects. I mention this because it may be one thing to do an act which turns out to be to the prejudice of the persons who take, if there are no immediate objects of the power, and another thing to do an act which is to defeat the immediate objects of it. Now the purpose of such a power as this is to provide for the children of the marriage, or rather of the lady; but, at the same time, to preserve to the parent such powers as will keep the children under the control of the parent. The power is intended to enable the parent, when the children come into existence, to distribute and deal with the property in such a manner as will be best for the objects of the power. Now I need hardly say that the same rules which are applicable to discretionary trusts generically must be applicable to every species of them. As you cannot enter into a man's mind and so conjecture what were his motives, unless there are some acts from which we can draw a legitimate inference as to his motives, whenever there is a discretionary trust, and that discretion is exercised either improperly or corruptly—unless you can shew to the Court that such was the case, the Court will not control the exercise of the discretion. You may have a suspicion that the power has been exercised from a particular motive; but if it is a mere suspicion, and not a matter of clear, judicial inference, you must leave it as you find it. When, however, we find that trustees have a discretionary trust, and it is proved to the satisfaction of the judicial mind that the exercise has been either corrupt or for purposes which have the effect of defeating, instead of carrying into effect the trusts, then the Court will not uphold that exercise of the power. Now this is not a general, but a special, power; and as to a special power, whether exclusive or with power to appoint among the children generally, if the donee of such a power attempt to exercise it in plain terms in favour of a person who is not an object of the power, that is no proper exercise of the power—it is no exercise of it at all. If a person having a power to appoint to A. appoints to B, that is, of course, void. But when the donee exercises the power so that upon the face of the instrument it is not entirely within the scope of the power—that is to say, not in favour of the objects of the power alone—then arises the question whether it is a fraud upon the power—whether it was exercised under such circumstances that the Court will say the appointment ought not to be sustained. If a power be honestly exercised, the Court will not control its exercise, though it may be exercised capriciously or under a prejudice for a particular child. Now, in this case it is clearly proved that, for two years before this instrument was executed, Mr. and Mrs. Martin had had the settlement under discussion. And why? Because it excluded the husband from that interest which he usually has under a marriage settlement of this kind. Mrs. Martin regretted that it was so; and I will assume that nothing could be more right than the feeling she has entertained on the subject. They seem to have said, "We have now five children, the eldest will be twenty-one in a little more than twelve months; suppose an appointment is made to her entirely under a condition that she shall hand over one-half to the husband, and give him a life interest in the other half; and as to the other five children, they will have nothing." I do not blame them for having this idea in their minds; they were not aware of the moral rule which exists in courts of equity, as to the exercise of powers. This was never communicated to the daughter till after the death of Mrs. Martin. She was in a bad state of health, and it was arranged that Mr. Martin should go over from Brussels to England and consult their legal adviser. He, of course, advised that what they wished could not be done. Then the husband suggested that, still, the appointment might be made to the daughter absolutely. He then intended to communicate to her what had been the object of the appointment, and that if she thought fit she might give him the benefit contemplated; which I will assume was a very legitimate design. This was not an appointment made because the daughter was going to be married, or anything of that kind; but the whole purpose was for the benefit of Mr. Martin. There was no concealment about it; but there was clear evidence of what was the design of Mr. Martin and also of Mrs. Martin: viz. that it was her intention to exercise the power, if possible, in such a manner as to defeat the real purpose of the power. The exercise of the power by Mrs. Martin in the mode suggested was an exercise that defeated the interests of the real objects of it. I am satisfied that this case comes within what is called a fraud upon the power, without imputing any bad motives to the parties; but it is clearly contrary to the scope of the power. In some of the cases it has been a bargain under which the donee of the power was to derive a benefit—that is something more than a moral fraud—but there is nothing of the kind here. It is not necessary that the appointee should be aware of the appointment; Wellesley v. Mornington shews that. Nor is it necessary for the purpose of constituting fraud that the object of the donee should be to benefit himself alone, because, if he wishes to benefit another person not the object of the power, it is just the same. I do not think it is necessary that an appointee should be aware of the intention, but it is necessary that the motives at the time of the execution should be matter of proof. I must, therefore, decide that the execution of this appointment is void as being in fraud of the power, and the petition cannot be granted.

WOOD, V.C. { THE NORTH LONDON RAIL-
July 6. { WAY COMPANY v. THE METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS.

Metropolis Local Management Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120. ss. 135, 150, 151, 152.)
—Powers of the Metropolitan Board of Works—Purchase of Land.

The powers conferred upon the Metropolitan Board of Works by the 135th section of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, of carrying their sewers and works into, through or under any lands, making compensation for any damage done thereby, may be exercised without purchasing such lands, or any easement in them; and the 150th, 151st and 152nd sections of the act, enabling them to purchase any land, or any right or easement in or over any land which they may deem necessary or expedient for the formation or protection of their works, are not to be read as restricting such exercise of those powers.

In the construction of powers conferred by act of parliament upon public bodies, acting for the public benefit alone, the intention of the legislature is not to be measured by the more guarded powers given to public companies established for trading purposes.

On the 24th of December 1858 the defendants, the Metropolitan Board of Works, in pursuance of the Metropolis Local Management Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120.) and of the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 104, served upon the plaintiffs a notice in writing that they required to purchase, and intended to take for the purpose of the embankment forming a portion of the main drainage works authorized by the last-mentioned act, and also for the purpose of constructing the other works in connexion therewith, certain lands and hereditaments belonging to the plaintiffs, and delineated on a plan annexed to the notice. By this plan it appeared that the sewer and works intended to be constructed must necessarily pass through a portion of the plaintiffs' land other than that which the board had given notice to purchase; and, in fact, it was intended to carry on the works through such additional land by means of a tunnel. The defendants claimed to construct their sewer through this portion of the plaintiffs' land without purchasing the same, or any interest therein.

The bill prayed that the defendants might be restrained from constructing their sewer and works through, or from entering upon or using any land of the plaintiffs not comprised in the notice of the 24th of December 1858, until, in conformity with the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, in that behalf, they should have given to the plaintiffs notice of their intention to purchase and take the same land, and should have deposited in the Bank of England such sum as should, in the mode prescribed by the last-mentioned act, be determined to be the value of the plaintiffs' interest in the same land, and should have also given to the plaintiffs such bond as, in that behalf, is by the said act directed to be given.

Sir Hugh Cairns and Mr. Edgar Rodwell now moved for an injunction in the terms of the prayer, and contended that the large powers conferred by the 135th section of the Metropolis Local Management Act were not intended to be exercised without purchasing the land, or at all events the easement, and that the section must be read in connexion with the 150th, 151st and 152nd sections of the same act, giving power to make such purchases.

Mr. Oster appeared for an adjoining landowner.

Mr. Rolt and Mr. Charles Hall opposed the motion on behalf of the defendants.

In addition to the above-mentioned sections of the act, the Public Health Act, 1848, (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63.) ss. 45, 46, 144, the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 112. and Oldaker v. Hunt (1) were referred to.

Mr. Rodwell was heard in reply.

WOOD, V.C.—This act must be considered upon the strict construction of its clauses; and if they should appear to be in any degree doubtful, then the scope, frame and object of the whole act must be taken into consideration, as in construing any other instrument; and for that purpose I do not think it immaterial to refer back to a view of the scope and frame of the clauses which are contained in similar acts, as far as they may be of any assistance, although I doubt whether it would be necessary to have recourse to any such assistance in construing this particular act. The 135th section is in truth the one which creates the greatest difficulty on the part of the plaintiffs, and Sir Hugh Cairns felt this difficulty in the outset, and therefore, in endeavouring to get out of it, he invited me to consider the improbability of the legislature conferring such large powers upon this body, seeing how careful it has been upon all occasions in which railway and the like companies have been authorized to take lands compulsorily for the particular purposes of their undertaking, to guard and protect the interests of the landlord. In such a state of the argument, it was a perfectly legitimate course on the part of the defendants to say, that the measure of the intention of the legislature with regard to those acts which deal with private companies is not to be applied at all to an act of this description, which is an act for an entirely different purpose; not being for the purpose of conferring a benefit upon a certain company, upon the condition and consideration of that company providing public accommodation in return; but an act solely intended for the public benefit, and vesting certain powers in the Commissioners for the general benefit of the whole community.

Now, the powers conferred by the 135th section certainly are very large, and are given unfettered by any condition whatever, save the condition of making compensation for any damage done; that is to say, power is given to the three corporations who are constituted by the act, namely, to the vestry board, the district board and the Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers; but the present section in particular is confined to the Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers, giving them the power of making any sewers, with the "walls, defences, banks, outlets, sluices, flaps, penstocks, gullies, grates, works and things thereunto belonging." The interpretation clause has no definition of the word "works," but I take it from the section itself—they have power to make these sewers and works within the limits of the metropolis or beyond, "or through, or under any cellar or vault under the carriageway or pavement of any street, and into, through, or under any lands whatsoever within or beyond the said limits, making compensation for any damage done thereby, as hereinafter provided; and all sewers and works from time to time made by the said board shall vest in them." The only limit provided with reference to the power is, that they are to make compensation for any damage done thereby. No doubt, it is a very large power; and it is a very legitimate argument on the part of the plaintiffs to urge that,—seeing so large a power is given they might even drive the sewer itself through the middle of a cellar, or so near the surface as, in combination with the 204th section, to prevent any building upon building land and the compensation being only that dam age is to be paid for, and no limit being set down in this section by which they are bound to give any previous notice, or to take any previous steps whatever,—it is a perfectly legitimate argument to say you would expect to find some clause which should in some way or other limit this construction; and if you can find such a clause, the Court must apply it and limit the power accordingly. And then the difficulty is of finding such a clause. Now, the mode in which the plaintiffs proceed to fulfil the task is by pointing to the 150th section, by which the Commissioners are enabled, though not in any way compelled, “to take on lease for such term as they may think fit any land, or any right or easement in or over any land which they may deem necessary or expedient for the formation or protection of any works which they are authorized to execute under this act.” That is to say, having a previous power of driving the works in the way I have described, under any property whatsoever, they have here a power, which is given also to the district board and to the vestry board, if they think fit so to do, to take any land which they deem necessary “for the formation or protection of the works, and also for the erection and formation of such offices and other buildings, yards, stations or places for deposit,” and other things, going a good deal beyond the works themselves, if they think fit; and many other matters are particularly mentioned in that section. Then the argument upon that would, of course, be, (and there is some shew of reason in it, until the matter comes to be explained by the other sections of the act, and I was myself struck with it at the first outset), that when you find so large a power is given in the 135th section, and simply the duty of making compensation for damage and no other duty imposed, the Court might be led to the construction that, the Metropolitan Board having the power given to them of making purchases if they deem it necessary for the formation of the works, as the sewer cannot be made without taking the land, they must find it necessary, for the purpose of making their works, to take this land, and therefore, of course, it will be deemed by them necessary to take it: that this is a clause to enable them to do so, and in that case, as the 151st section points out, the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, apply, with the exception of “the provisions of that act with respect to the recovery of forfeitures, penalties and costs.” Then comes a very important section in the construction of this act, the 152nd, which says that, “The provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act with respect to the purchase and taking of lands otherwise than by agreement, shall not be incorporated with this act, save for enabling the Metropolitan Board of Works to take land, or any right or easement in or over land, for the purpose of making any sewers or works for preventing the sewage, or any part of the sewage, within the metropolis from passing into the Thames in or near the metropolis, or otherwise for the purpose of the sewerage or draining of the metropolis.” So that you have a two-fold restriction: first, a restriction which says that the vestry board and the district board shall have no compulsory powers whatever of making a single sewer; for if I am to apply the powers which I find given to these boards in the same way as I am asked to apply and construe, on the part of the plaintiffs, the 135th section with regard to the Metropolitan Board, then there would not be in them any power whatever of doing it compulsorily, which you find exists in the Metropolitan Board; and the second limitation, which is not important in this suit, would be, that the power of the Metropolitan Board is to be confined to the sewage works which are entrusted to them. However much one might be tempted by the argument that the 150th section was intended to point out a course of procedure with reference to taking any land necessary for making the sewer, and therefore that the 151st and 152nd sections would immediately apply to it the whole of the Lands Clauses Act for the purpose of making the sewer, which might be done without any great injustice, inasmuch as, after all, the sewer would be carried on as soon as notice was given, under the 153rd section, and the money paid into court or a bond given in the usual way if they wanted to take immediate possession,—still, I must look back to the rest of the act, and see whether, upon a reasonable construction of the whole act, I ought so to apply the 150th, 151st and 152nd sections as to impose a restriction (for that is what I am asked to do) upon those very general powers conferred by the 135th section, those general powers being subjected to a certain restriction which mentions nothing else by which they are to be limited, except the mere fact that compensation is to be paid for damage done.

Now, when I come to construe the whole act, I must look back to the other sections, and there I find that what the Metropolitan Board of Works are to do with regard to the main arterial system, if we may call it so, the vestry boards are to do for the parish, and the district boards are to do for certain districts. The legislature, at all events, has considered them absolutely necessary and proper works which it has desired to have done, and has empowered and authorized the vestry and district board to do; but to say that it shall be limited to carrying on a system of sewage which can be carried on only by the consent of every individual person through whose land any sewers are to be made, is absurd; and I do not hesitate to say that such a construction would nullify every power of making a sewer conferred upon a vestry or district board. Every man knows that if, in dealing with a work of this description, persons have the power of stopping the work, not a sewer could be made by a vestry or a district board under the powers of this act. I take it that that would in itself be so great an absurdity that it would lead one strongly to the conclusion immediately that the 150th and 151st sections were inserted for some other purpose, and not for the purpose of restricting the 135th. I am bound to say also that, at the first opening of the case, I was a little struck with this, that it seemed somewhat remarkable that the legislature should think it necessary to give these powers to the Metropolitan Board of Works, which, by the 135th section, it is supposed to have given them without any such proceeding under the Lands Clauses Act at all. But, at the same time, it does appear to me that if you can find any other interpretation with reference to the conferring of those powers, the observation is so forcible—I now confine myself to this act entirely—as to the effect it must necessarily have upon the construction of the powers vested in the vestry and district boards, that the construction contended for by the plaintiffs ought not to be adopted, unless I find myself driven necessarily to it.

Now it seems to me that there is a good reason for inserting these compulsory powers, because these are gentlemen acting for the public benefit, having no private interest whatever, and, therefore, persons in whom the legislature has thought it right to vest a certain power, if they think fit, of proceeding to buy, when they feel they are destroying the property which they are passing through by means of their sewer; they may say, we will take it compulsorily and pay for it out and out, for a twofold reason: first, it was thought that there would not be any great deal of feeling in a public body—which was an argument pressed upon me—exercising to the utmost severity the powers intrusted to them; and, secondly, even in the severe exercise of their duty, if it is looked upon in such a view, they may find it much better for the public, whose money they are dealing with, to buy a property out and out, which it may be said they are injuring, than to go to a jury to assess the damage done, inasmuch as a jury might be induced to give a much larger sum than probably the whole property might be acquired for if bought out and out. One sees, therefore, there are reasons why it might be desirable that the Metropolitan Commissioners should have this particular power. Then also, one finds it goes not only to the work of making the sewer, but of preventing the sewage of any part of the metropolis from passing into the Thames or otherwise. That again may be another purpose for which they may be empowered to make purchases which it might be desirable for them to make, instead of merely making the sewer itself on making compensation for damages. I find, therefore, there are reasons which may be given for that, and I am not driven to the construction that it is necessary to be imposed as a limit upon the 135th section.

I have been up to the present moment dealing with the act alone; but there are other arguments perfectly legitimate in a case of this kind. I am referred to other acts of parliament, to see how the legislature has guarded in other cases. In railway cases large powers are given to the companies, which are always coupled with this, "subject to the provisions contained in this act, or in any act incorporated herewith." This is the very thing missing in the 135th section. It is only "subject to making compensation for any damage done herein." Then, if you look to an act of parliament made in pari materia exactly, you do find a whole series of clauses verbatim similar in the general Commissioners of Sewers Act (2), which existed before this body was established, giving powers of this description, under which nobody ever supposed they could be arrested at any period in the progress of their work, by anybody saying they should not make a sewer through his land. We have the fact of those powers existing for a long time; we have the fact of an immense body of sewage being complete under the powers of the act, (and there are here clauses exactly similar to those in every respect), and they also had the power of contracting, if they thought fit, by agreement, for the purchase of land. When you find that to be the case, and find the highway surveyor, whose powers, by-the-bye, I have a right in every sense to look at, because they are incorporated in one of the clauses, and when you find also the Board of Health having powers in exactly a similar form, and that the whole scheme of the sewage, therefore, must be entirely stopped if such a construction is to be put upon this act of parliament as I am pressed to adopt, namely, that I am to tie the 150th and following sections to the 135th in such a way as to limit powers, which do not appear to be limited, I apprehend, when you come to such a mass of legislation, all having one effect and bearing one way, that it is perfectly conclusive that the only construction that can be given to these powers is, that they are given for some purposes which are desirable to be added to all the powers hitherto possessed.

It was remarked, by Mr. Rodwell, in reply, that it was not intended by this act to limit, but to extend the general powers; and he added that, that being the case, more control was to be imposed as to how they should be exercised; and I say that, finding that this limit would be a limit of the serious character I have described, by which any individual, if so minded, might, as regards the district and vestry boards, stop the sewers altogether, and as regards the other board, if it were put into a course of action the delay would be most serious, I have no hesitation in coming to the clear conclusion, that the effect of the 135th section is such as the defendants contend for, and not that which is contended for on behalf of the plaintiffs. The true key to the act is that express limit with regard to the vestry and district boards as contrasted with the powers given to the metropolitan board for their particular purposes; and if I wanted an additional assistance in construing this, which I do not, it is to be found in this last act (3), in which the powers have been extended to property perhaps more valuable than any that can be suggested, viz. wharfs upon the banks of the Thames; and I have no hesitation in saying I cannot grant this motion. At present I shall make the costs costs in the cause.

March 22. } HENDERSON v. ATKINS.

Trust, Breach of—Statute of Limitations.

By a will, dated in 1761, a trust was created in favour of a certain class of the testator's relations, nearly all of whom were paid their proportions. The surviving executor and trustee of the testator had the remainder of the funds standing in his name at his death, and by his will he recognized the existence of the trust and directed that it should devolve upon his nephew. Administration de bonis non was granted in 1822 to the surviving executor's estate, and subsequently to another person in 1826, when the remaining trust fund was mixed up with such administrator's personal estate and applied in the purchase of real estate. A bill was filed by a person claiming part of the legacy under the original testator's will, charging a breach of trust by the surviving executor, and that his real and personal estate were liable to make good the amount:—Held, upon demurrer to the bill, that the real estate could not be charged with the legacy; that there was an implied trust created by the will, but the right of the claimants having accrued more than twenty years since, their claim was barred by the Statute of Limitations.

The bill in this suit stated that Frazer Honeywood, being seised of considerable real and freehold estate, by his will, dated the 24th of May 1757, devised his real estate to Sir John Honeywood, Abraham Atkins, Clarke Wilshawe and Edwin Martin, and their heirs, upon certain trusts, appointing them executors. By a codicil, dated the 14th of August 1761, he gave to his trustees 20,000*l.*, upon this special trust, that his said executors, and the survivors and survivor of them, his executors and administrators, should distribute the whole of the said sum, with the interest and improvements, to and amongst such of his relatives by consanguinity, and not by marriage, who should not appear to his said executors to be worth, each person, more than 2,000*l.*, and who within two years next after his decease should apply, or being minors cause application to be made, to his executors to participate in the legacy, such distribution to be made at such times and in such proportions as his executors should in their discretion judge to be most proper, and having due regard to the nearness of such relations to him, and to their situations, ages, abilities and professions and families, according to their circumstances, not to be confined to any particular degree of kindred. The testator then directed the 20,000*l.* to be invested in stock, and there was a general discretionary power as to the evidence upon which distribution should be made, with a gift of the residue to John Honeywood. The testator died in January 1764, the will and codicil being proved by his executors. 456 claimants came in to participate in the legacy, and in 1767 a bill was filed by three claimants named Bennett against the executors for an account of the legacy of 20,000*l.*, and to establish the will, when, by a decree, dated the 20th of February 1767, it was declared that the bequest was good, and a reference to the Master was ordered, who was to make a separate report as to those not entitled to the legacy. On the 12th of December 1769 the Master made his report, and after distribution of a great portion of the legacy, but before any further report, the suit abated by deaths of parties, and no complete distribution took place of the legacy, but the residue was distributed as part of the estate of Atkins Edwin Martin, who had taken the surname of Atkins. The bill then stated that the legacy had increased by investment to 23,000*l.*, and what remained unappropriated amounted to a considerable sum. Abraham Atkins was the surviving executor of the will, and he made his will, dated the 12th of July 1791 and died in 1792. The will having been proved by his executors, administration with the will annexed was granted to Atkins E. M. Atkins on the 4th of September 1822. On the 14th of November 1826, after the death of Atkins E. M. Atkins, a similar grant was made to John Cook and Joseph Cook, who were also the executors of the will of Atkins E. M. Atkins, proved on the 14th of March 1826. One of the claimants to a share of the legacy of 20,000*l.* was Patrick Henderson, since dead, who was a relative of the testator entitled to participate in the legacy, and his claim was allowed by the Master in the suit of Bennett v. Honeywood. Administration to the estate of Patrick Henderson was granted to the plaintiff, who thereby became his legal personal representative, and, as such, entitled to his share in the legacy and accumulations. The bill then stated that the dividends of the legacy being invested, distribution was made from time to time to claimants found entitled in the suit, and among others, of a sum of 25*l.* to Margaret Henderson, the then representative of Patrick Henderson, but for temporary relief and as only a part of his share. After such payments there remained a clear sum of 2,550*l.* 4*l.* per cent. Bank annuities, which came to the hands of Abraham Atkins as surviving executor and trustee of Frazer Honeywood, which he did not apply under the will, but retained in his own hands, as evidence whereof the plaintiffs charged that his will, dated the 12th of July 1791, contained this passage—"And whereas, as surviving trustee under the will of Frazer Honywood, Esq., there remains some trusts to be performed respecting the sum of 20,000*l.* given by him to his poor relations, which sum hath been all paid and applied except a sum of [here followed a blank]: now I do declare it to be my will that the said trusts, if the same have not been fully performed by me, shall devolve on my nephew, Edwin Martin Atkins, to whom I give full power to perform the same."

The bill further stated that in January 1783 Abraham Atkins wrongfully transferred 300*l.* to one P. Cherry, who was not entitled to it, and the sum of 2,250*l.*, which was the sum referred to in Abraham Atkins's will, was transferred from the name of Abraham Atkins into the name of E. M. Atkins, as his representative, and that he mixed the said sum of stock with his own monies; and that on the 17th of June 1830 it was found by his executors John Cook and Joseph Cook mixed with his personal estate, and applied by them as such. The bill charged that Abraham Atkins, Atkins E. M. Atkins and John Cook and Joseph Cook had applied the dividends of the 2,250*l.* to their own use, and as part of the personal estate of Atkins E. M. Atkins; that no further claim had been made to the legacy of 20,000*l.* since the payment of the 25*l.* to Margaret Henderson; and that the plaintiffs were entitled to the 2,550*l.*, the residue thereof come to the hands of Abraham Atkins. The bill then charged that Abraham Atkins was a trustee of the 2,550*l.*, and that Atkins E. M. Atkins was a trustee of the 2,250*l.*, for the persons entitled to participate in the legacy; and that the assets of Abraham Atkins were liable for the 300*l.* so improperly parted with to P. Cherry; and that the estate of Atkins E. M. Atkins was liable at his death to pay the 2,250*l.* stock and the dividends received by him, or his representatives. That Abraham Atkins died possessed of considerable real and personal estate, which he devised and bequeathed, by his will, to his children, with remainder to his nephew, Edwin Martin Atkins, with remainder to Atkins E. M. Atkins, son of Edwin Martin, for life, with remainders over, with remainder to his own right heirs, and the said Edwin Martin was Abraham Atkins's heir-at-law. That Abraham Atkins died without issue. That Atkins E. M. Atkins made his will, dated the 26th of November 1818, whereby he devised and bequeathed his real and personal estates (except estates vested in him in trust) to John Cook and Joseph Cook, upon trust to convert, pay debts and legacies, and invest the residue of the funds in the purchase of lands, and stand possessed of the same in trust for his children, in such proportions, &c. as the said John Cook and Joseph Cook should appoint, and in default, in trust for his children at twenty-one or marriage. That Atkins E. M. Atkins died in May 1825, leaving nine children surviving. That administration de bonis non to the estate of Abraham Atkins was granted to John Cook and Joseph Cook, limited to the lives of the sisters of Atkins E. M. Atkins. The bill then referred to a suit of Atkins v. Cook, to administer the estate of Atkins E. M. Atkins, in which John Cook and Joseph Cook, under the direction of the Court, brought up certain of the intermediate life interests (thirty in number) left by the will of Abraham Atkins, and three only of those who had not sold their life estates were now living, and two had died without having sold such interests. The bill then stated certain appointments by John Cook and Joseph Cook, under the direction of the Court, in favour of the children of Atkins E. M. Atkins in the suit of Atkins v. Cook; and a certain appointment to Edwin Martin Atkins of all the real and personal estate of Atkins E. M. Atkins; also the death of Joseph Cook, leaving Maria Cook his legal personal representative; and charged that John Cook and Joseph Cook had received the greater part of the real and personal estate of Atkins E. M. Atkins, which comprised a large part of the real and personal estate devised by the will of Abraham Atkins. That the appointees under the will of Atkins E. M. Atkins had direct notice of the plaintiffs' claim, and positive knowledge that the sum of 2,550*l.* stock and 2,250*l.* stock were part of the trust fund of 20,000*l.*; and also of the breach of trust of Abraham Atkins and Atkins E. M. Atkins, and that he had mixed it with his own monies, and died leaving it so mixed. That, whether the appointees had or had not such knowledge, the trust funds of 300*l.* and 2,250*l.* were a charge upon the real and personal estate appointed under the will of Atkins E. M. Atkins, and were payable thereout? The bill prayed that an account might be taken of the dividends received by Abraham Atkins in respect of the 2,550*l.* stock, and of the dividends received by Atkins E. M. Atkins upon the 2,250*l.* stock, and also received by Joseph Cook upon the 2,250*l.*, and by them applied as part of his personal estate; and of any assets of the estates of Abraham Atkins and Atkins E. M. Atkins unapplied in the hands of John Cook and Maria Cook; for a declaration that the dividends, with unpaid interest, of the 300*l.* and 2,250*l.* stock formed part of the trust legacy of 20,000*l.*; and that the sums of 300*l.* and 2,250*l.* were a charge upon the estates which were liable to pay the same, both principal and accumulations; and for a sale, and payment to the plaintiffs, and to such other persons, if any, as should be found to have claims upon the legacy.

Two general demurrers were put in to this bill for want of equity and parties.

Mr. Baily, Mr. Glasse, Mr. Wickens and Mr. Prior appeared in support of the demurrer; and—

Mr. Green and Mr. Drewry, for the plaintiffs.

The principal points raised are fully stated in the judgment.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—The principal point in the case is this. The plaintiffs say that they are entitled to proceed against the real and personal estates both of Abraham Atkins and also of Atkins Atkins; and being so entitled, they find some of those real estates—and indeed they say they find some of the personal estate at least of Atkins Atkins—in the hands of some one or other of those defendants who are the demurring parties—the first four defendants on the record. Now, the allegations in the bill seem to me—taking them of course to be true—to shew this state of circumstances: that Abraham Atkins was the surviving executor and trustee under the will of Mr. Honynwood, and that Abraham Atkins had standing in his name at the time of his death 2,250*l.* stock, being the residue of the amount of stock which had been purchased with a legacy of 20,000*l.*, which, by the will of Mr. Honynwood, was given to these four executors, upon trust, to divide the funds at their discretion among the testator's relations. I need not go into the details of Mr. Honynwood's will, but the fund was to be divided amongst his relations. This sum of 2,250*l.* was the remainder of that large sum of stock, all the rest having been applied according to the trusts of the will, except a sum of 300*l.*, which it is said that Abraham Atkins had in his lifetime sold out of that stock, and paid to a person named Cherry, which is alleged to be an improper payment, and, therefore, the allegations amount to this, that Abraham Atkins had been guilty of a breach of trust; for such it would amount to according to this statement with regard to the 300*l.* stock. It was then said that he had standing in his name in the books of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England 2,250*l.* stock, which was trust-money. Moreover, it appears that Abraham Atkins, by a passage in his will, recognized the existence of a certain trust under the will of Mr. Honynwood, not specifying at all the fund to which that trust attached, but acknowledging only the existence of a trust; that is the effect of the language of the clause. Edwin Martin was the father of Atkins Atkins. That was the state of things at the death of Abraham Atkins. Now, with regard to the 2,250*l.* which remained standing in the name of Abraham Atkins at his death, he seems to have done, according to the allegation, nothing whatever improper. There seems to have been no impropriety in his having the fund transferred into his own name from the name of himself and the deceased trustees. He was the sole trustee of it; and, therefore, it appears to me that he was not guilty of any breach of trust or impropriety with regard to that sum of stock. He left it in the condition in which he ought to have left it; but, according to the allegation, he was guilty of a breach of trust with respect to 300*l.* of the fund. That I must now take to be true. What was the effect of his being guilty of that breach of trust? What liability can it attach upon him with reference to the different portions of his property, apart from the lapse of time which has occurred, and apart from the devolutions of interest which have taken place? What would have been the effect of it, supposing, within a year or some short period after Abraham Atkins's death, a bill had been filed for the purpose of having the trust executed, and making his estate liable for the breach of trust? Abraham Atkins died in 1792. At that time, as we know, a simple contract debt of any person dying seised of real estate did not affect that estate in the smallest degree. Of course it might have been recovered from his personal estate; but his real estate—I mean in the absence of any charge in the will—remained untouched. Indeed it went to this extent, that a man might owe 100,000*l.* of debts, leaving 100,000*l.* worth of property in the shape of real estate, and not one of his creditors would get paid. That was the evil cured by the act which passed in recent times. Then there is a suggestion that this will of Abraham Atkins does in fact contain that which amounts to a charge upon his real estate; and the clause to which I have referred is said to amount to that. But it seems to me to amount to no such thing. The only effect of this clause is, not to create a charge upon the real estate, or any estate at all; for it does not profess to have that object, nor could it have that object, but merely to recognize the existence of an unperformed trust relating to a certain sum of money, of which a certain portion not specified was all that remained; and directing that that trust should be executed by his nephew Edwin Martin. Therefore it appears to me that the real estate of Abraham Atkins cannot be affected by the state of things which existed at his death, and that his real estate passed to the devisee without any liability to make good that debt. Now, his real estate, it appears, he devised, in default of any children of his own—and he had none—to Edwin Martin, for life, with remainder to Atkins Edwin Martin Atkins—in fact to him whom I will call Atkins Atkins—for life, and with divers estates in reversion, with remainder to his own right heirs. And it appears from another passage in the will, that these life estates under the will of Abraham Atkins were no less than thirty. They seem to be given in classes; they descended to such a class, and so on, and there were no less than thirty of these persons who under this limitation took life-estates. The stock remained standing in the name of Abraham Atkins—I mean the stock representing the residue of this trust fund—long after his death; but according to the statement in the bill, the executors of Abraham Atkins from time to time received the dividends of the stock, and, I think, paid over these dividends to the Messrs. Cook. Thirty years, or thereabouts, after the death of Abraham Atkins, his executors having all died, administration de bonis non to his estate, with his will annexed, was granted to Atkins Atkins. That was in 1822; and then Atkins Atkins, finding this sum of stock standing in the name of Abraham Atkins, and being entitled to the personal estate of Abraham Atkins—I mean entitled to the interest—and being now the legal personal representative of Abraham Atkins, and finding that the executors of Abraham Atkins had, as the bill alleges they had, from time to time received all the dividends of the stock, and applied them as if they were part of the personal estate of Abraham Atkins; he seems to have arrived at the conclusion—whether rightly or wrongly, is not material to the present question—that this was part of the personal estate of Abraham Atkins, which he was entitled to appropriate, and which he did appropriate to his own use. Now, I apprehend that, subject to any question which might then have arisen with regard to the Statute of Limitations, if it had then passed, or with regard to the lapse of time in this court with respect to delay in making a claim, if a bill had been filed against Atkins Atkins after he got the transfer of that stock, that bill would have been successful; that is to say, Atkins Atkins would have been made liable for that stock as a trustee of the fund. He was not the express trustee; but there would have been a trust when he had become the legal personal representative of Abraham Atkins, and had got the trust fund in his hands.

Atkins Atkins then being the trustee, and having got this fund, but apparently not knowing that he was a trustee of it, by his will (which was dated in 1818) bequeathed his real estate and all his personal estate to John Cook and Joseph George Cook, upon trust out of the personal estate only (not the real estate) to pay the debts of Atkins Atkins; and then they were to stand possessed of the real and personal estate, upon trust for all and every the testator's children, for such estate, and in such shares and proportions, and so on, as the Messrs. Cook, from time to time, in their discretion, should appoint. The Messrs. Cook were the executors of Atkins Atkins, but they were not the executors of Abraham Atkins, because Atkins Atkins was only the administrator de bonis non of Abraham Atkins. It appears to me clear that, as there was no charge in the will of Abraham Atkins of his debts upon his real estates, so, in this will of Atkins Atkins, there is no charge of his debts upon his real estate. His real estate, as it appears, constituted part of the estate of Abraham Atkins, which he acquired in the manner stated in his will, viz., from his sisters, to whom the estates were devised. But he also acquired other real estates, irrespective of the real estates which were derived from Abraham Atkins. There is, then, this question: what estate of Atkins Atkins is liable to make good the trust-fund for which he was responsible? What is there to make his real estate liable? There is nothing to make Atkins Atkins's real estate liable, beyond what there was to make the real estate of Abraham Atkins liable. Nothing more whatever, for the statute to which I have referred as applicable had not then passed. His personal estate undoubtedly was liable; but his real estate, it is plain to me, clearly was not. And no person taking any portion of his real estate was, any more than any person taking a portion of Abraham's estate would have been, liable in that respect to make good any deficiency. The right, then, of the plaintiffs, so far as they have a right, is to pursue the personal estate of Atkins Atkins; and, of course, if some of the personal estate of Atkins Atkins had been converted into real estate, that real estate, not because it is real estate, but because it represents part of the personal estate of Atkins Atkins, may be liable.

Now it appears, although I may assume that it is more accident than design in the bill that has brought this about, that a suit was instituted, called Atkins v. Cook, for the purpose of administering the real and personal estates of Atkins Atkins. There was a trust in the will of Atkins Atkins to lay out his personal estate, and nothing else:—not to lay out the rents and profits of the real estate, but to lay out his personal estate in the purchase of real estate, and that real estate, together with his original real estate, was to be applied in the way I have mentioned among his children, according to the discretion of the Messrs. Cook. The bill contained a statement that, by orders made in the suit of Atkins v. Cook, monies were from time to time laid out by the Messrs. Cook in purchasing the life-interests to which certain persons were entitled in property belonging to Abraham Atkins. It was contended that those monies so laid out were part of the personal estate of Atkins Atkins, and that, therefore, those life-interests so purchased represented part of the personal estate of Atkins Atkins. It was said that there had been appropriated to some of those four demurring parties sums of money charged upon the estates of Abraham Atkins, which included the life-estates thus purchased with the personal estate of Atkins Atkins, and which, therefore, constituted part of his personal estate; and, therefore, that there had been appropriated to these demurring parties, in effect, sums of money charged upon the personal estate, or a portion of the personal estate, of Atkins Atkins. Now, no doubt that is a very ingenious suggestion. It is somewhat fine; but I think that, subject to certain observations to which the matter is open, the thing can be traced in the manner suggested. But it is open to these difficulties—and they are difficulties which are connected with the observations always arising upon a demurrer and all pleadings—that the pleadings are to be taken most adversely to the pleader. I mean to say, if there be statements in the bill which are not clear, which are ambiguous, and which may admit of a different interpretation or of different views, the construction to be put upon the bill must be that which is most adverse to the plaintiff whose bill it is, and in the same way in the case of a defendant's plea or answer. Now, in the first place, these purchases are not alleged to have been made out of the personal estate of Atkins Atkins. It is left to inference, and certainly I quite agree that the inference is strong; but the matter stands thus according to the allegation. The allegation is, that the trusts of Atkins Atkins's will were to lay out his personal estate in the purchase of real estate. Secondly, there is the allegation that there was a suit instituted against the Cooks to administer his real estates; and then it is alleged, and therefore I take it to be true, that by orders in that suit the Cooks were ordered to lay out, and did lay out, monies—not saying what monies—in the purchase of real estate; that is, not in the purchase of fee-simple estates in the ordinary way, but purchasing life-interests in a property already subject to the trusts of Atkins Atkins's will, namely, property which had come to him. That is a subject of strong inference; but probably—I do not say it must have been, but probably—it was part of the personal estate of Atkins Atkins that was so laid out. Still, it is the duty of the pleader to state the facts clearly if he intends to rely upon them, and to allege the facts distinctly. I do not believe he intended to rely upon them when the bill was filed; but if he intended to rely upon them at all, he ought to have distinctly stated them. I confess it does appear to me that I ought not to assume that these monies were part of the personal estate. They might have been. I admit it is most probable they were personal estate, but they might have been, as was suggested, part of the rents and profits of the real estate of Atkins Atkins. But although the rents and profits of the real estate were not directed by the will to be laid out, still the same persons were entitled to the rents and profits who were entitled to the corpus of the estate, real and personal; and, therefore, if there had been money in court not arising from personal estate, but arising exclusively from the rents and profits, the Court might, with perfect propriety, have ordered the application of those rents and profits in lieu of personal estate, not got in, to be applied in the purchase of real estate. I am not at all saying it is a probable thing, it is only a possible thing. The Court probably would say that it was personal estate of Atkins Atkins. But that is not alleged. The whole argument rests upon this, that those purchases were made before the appointments to these parties which are relied upon, I think about the year 1835. Those appointments were made to William Atkins, Martin Atkins, and to Mr. Everett, the one in October 1844 and the other in August 1853. Now here again I think it is extremely probable that the purchases were made before those appointments. But what is there to shew me that? They may have been made last year, and the whole rests upon that; because, if they were made subsequent to the appointments, then the sums which are appointed are not charged upon the property, which represents the personal estate. Then, again, the pleader ought to have pleaded it; if he intended to rely upon it, he ought to have alleged it specifically.

Then there is a third matter, upon which I do not feel the case is so strong. I mean, it is not alleged that these tenants for life whose interests were purchased are alive. I must confess, if it turned upon that, and I decided in favour of the plaintiffs—not on the hearing of the cause, but on the demurrer—if a single one of them had been alive when the appointments were made—it appears to me that that would be sufficient; and even now there is no physical impossibility in their being still alive. It is a long period of sixty-seven years from 1792 to 1859, but still it is possible, especially as the tenants for life were persons who are described in classes, that some of them might have been a year old at the time of the making of the testator's will, and I think so far as relates to that I cannot assume that not one of them is living at this moment. But still it appears to me that, in order to establish the proposition contended for by the argument of the plaintiffs' counsel, namely, that part of the personal estate of Atkins Atkins has in some shape or form been appointed to or for the benefit of some of these demurring parties, there is nothing stronger than assumption; there is not any actual, positive and distinct allegation in the bill to that effect. Upon these grounds which I have mentioned, irrespective of any others, it appears to me the result is, that there is nothing in the bill to shew that the parties who are now demurring hold any property other than that which is real estate; and, as I have said, I see no grounds for coming to the conclusion, that any real estate, either that of Abraham Atkins or that of Atkins Atkins, is liable to any portion of the demand, however the claim may be in other respects well founded. On that ground I certainly think that I ought to allow the demurrer; but I think I should also allow the plaintiffs to amend their bill, not making the demurrer final. It may be that, if this matter were more looked into and more accurately stated, and means were properly furnished to counsel, there might be a case made out which would justify the claim against these defendants.

Then I must consider another ground of demurrer, which appears to me the most important ground of all, which is, the question that arises from lapse of time, and the argument upon that. Now it is quite clear that one of these parties who are demurring had appointed to them either real estate or money charged upon real estate, and the object is to make them liable. I am not now looking at the general question whether others may be liable, or whether there are persons now entitled to the personal estate of Atkins Atkins, and whether they would be liable: I do not touch that question. The question is, whether the real estate, or interest in real estate, of the parties who are now demurring, is liable? By the 24th section of the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 27, the time of limitation is fixed by reference to the time of legal limitations, that is, the time of limitations as to suits in equity is fixed by reference to the time with regard to actions at law. The 24th section enacts, "That no person claiming any land or rent in equity shall bring any suit to recover the same, but within the period during which by virtue of the provisions hereinbefore contained he might have made an entry or distress, or brought an action to recover the same respectively, if he had been entitled at law to such estate, interest or right in or to the same as he shall claim therein in equity."

By reference back to the 2nd section, it is enacted, that "no person shall make an entry or distress, or bring an action to recover any land or rent, but within twenty years next after the time at which the right to make such entry or distress, or to bring such action, shall have first accrued to some person through whom he claims; or, if such right shall not have accrued to any person through whom he claims, then within twenty years next after the time at which the right to make such entry or distress, or to bring such action, shall have first accrued to the person making or bringing the same." Then if we refer to the 40th section, which relates to charges and legacies—that section says, "that no action or suit, or other proceeding, shall be brought to recover any sum of money secured by any mortgage, judgment or lien, or otherwise charged upon or payable out of any land or rent, at law or in equity, or any legacy, but within twenty years next after a present right to receive the same shall have accrued to some person capable of giving a discharge for or release of the same, unless in the mean time some part of the principal money, or some interest thereon, shall have been paid." Now it is quite clear that the right of these parties—I mean of the present plaintiffs and any other persons, if there be any, having a similar interest to them under this trust—accrued much more than twenty years ago. Their right, in fact, accrued at least as far back as the year 1792, and, I suppose, earlier than that. But their right at all events cannot be carried to a later period than the time, taking it at the very latest, when Atkins Atkins took possession of this stock, which was in the year 1825 or thereabouts—that is, much more than twenty years ago. Then how is it that these plaintiffs can be entitled, after waiting so long without making any claim, to come upon the interest which has been appointed to the defendants under Atkins Atkins's will? It was said that they are entitled to come because there is a trust; that this is not the case of a common debt, which indeed might be barred, but one of a trust. I admit that, undoubtedly, so far as relates to Atkins Atkins, he had an estate, that is, he had in his hands the very property—I cannot call it estate, but the very property—which was the subject of a trust; and it appears to me, as between Atkins Atkins and these claimants, supposing them to be the parties entitled to the benefit of the trust, that there is a trust. There is a trust created by the trusts of Honynwood's will, "and the trustees and the survivors and survivor of them, and the executors and administrators of such survivor." Undoubtedly, too, at the time when Atkins Atkins died he was the administrator de bonis non of Abraham Atkins, the surviving trustee under Honynwood's will, and he had in his hands the trust fund which was to be administered. It appears to me, therefore, that there was a trust. But then the trust attaches upon the property which is the subject of a trust; that is, the 2,250*l.*, or whatever the sum of stock was that was in his hands, and any dividends that might have accrued. So far as relates to the breach of trust in misapplying it, that constitutes a debt. But it is said he had the identical trust fund, and that the trust was express. Now, what says the 25th clause of the same statute with regard to express trusts? "That when any land or rent shall be vested in a trustee upon any express trust, the right of the cestui que trust, or any person claiming through him, to bring a suit against the trustee or any person claiming through him, to recover such land or rent, shall be deemed to have first accrued according to the meaning of this act at, and not before, the time at which such land or rent shall have been conveyed to a purchaser for valuable consideration, and shall then be deemed to have accrued only as against such purchaser and any person claiming through him." Then, it was said, this very trust stock being mixed up with the personal estate of Atkins Atkins, and his personal estate having been, as it was also said, applied in purchasing these life-interests, we must consider that the identical trust stock is represented, in fact, by that which has been appointed to these demurring defendants. Now it appears to me that this is not the case. There is clearly no express trust as between these demurring defendants. Even if these life-interests were purchased with that trust stock, there is no express trust between these persons and the cestuis que trust claiming the benefit of the trusts of Honynwood's will. Therefore, it appears to me that the time is not prevented running by this 25th clause, which relates to express trusts; and consequently, as to this express trust, so far as relates to the demurring defendants, the statute is a complete bar—that is, that the time which has elapsed is a complete bar by virtue of the statute: and upon that ground the demurrer must be allowed. Therefore, as I have said, if there were any miscarriage in the statement, the correction of which would have been material, I should not refuse liberty to amend. If it turned upon merely the first part of the case, irrespective of the statute, I should give leave to amend; but it does not appear to me that any amendment consistent with truth can be made which will prevent what appears to me the complete bar of the statute so far as the defendants are concerned. I must, therefore, simply allow the demurrer.

M.R. } THE BANK OF LONDON v.
June 6, 7, 30. } TYRRELL.

Principal and Agent—Sale by Agent to Principal.

A solicitor acting for an embryo banking company agreed with R. for the purchase from C. of a large building and adjoining premises suitable for the company; R, through the solicitor, induced the company to purchase the building at a large increased price, which was divided between R. and the solicitor. The company took possession, and adapted the building to the purposes of a bank, and obtained a trade reputation. They subsequently discovered the circumstances under which the sale of the building had been made to them; and, upon a bill by the company stating that they could not relinquish the building, and that the adjoining premises would greatly facilitate their business,—Held, that the purchase by the solicitor was made as agent and for the benefit of the company; that the company was entitled to the profits made by the solicitor; and that the solicitor was a trustee for the company of the interest taken by him in the premises adjoining the building.

The bill in this suit was filed, by the Bank of London, a company incorporated by letters patent, and carrying on business in Threadneedle Street, in the City of London, against Timothy Tyrrell, Edward Rudston Read, Sir John Villiers Shelley, John Griffith Frith, Sir Henry Mugeridge and Charles Joyce, the last four being trustees for the company. It prayed for an account of the profits made by Messrs. Tyrrell and Read upon the sale to the company of certain freehold premises known as the "Hall of Commerce," in Threadneedle Street; and it further prayed that they might convey to the company some adjoining premises, being No. 8, New Broad Street, which they had purchased at the same time with the Hall of Commerce.

The facts are stated in the judgment.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Speed, for Timothy Tyrrell.—When Mr. Tyrrell purchased the property no agency to buy on behalf of the company existed; he never was at any time a holder of the property for the company. The company at no time could have taken the benefit of the original title, even assuming he was the agent for the company, and they cannot fasten a fiduciary title upon him, as not even a constructive agency to buy existed. There was no rule of equity that a solicitor could not buy from or sell to a client, and no case existed in which a solicitor had been required to give up the profit he had made from an estate.—

Driscoll v. Bromley, 1 Jur. 238.

Mr. Follett and Mr. Martindale, for Edward Rudston Read.

[The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—A sufficient case has not been made against Mr. Read; but do you think you can persuade me to give him the costs?]

Mr. Follett.—If the bill had asked to set aside the contract, not a word could be said against the relief; but Mr. Read was asked, in effect, to give back the profits arising from his speculations, and in addition to that, to give up property in respect of which no contract existed. The bill alleged that Messrs. Tyrrell and Read concocted a scheme for disposing of the property to the bank at a profit; but Mr. Read denied the existence of fraud in the transaction. He had, however, omitted to name T. Tyrrell as one of the parties interested in the estate, and litigation arose in consequence.

[The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—He has committed what is equivalent to perjury, and yet asks for costs. It is painful to have to observe upon facts which shock the moral feelings. I have to listen to many things upon which the least said is best, but when under circumstances like the present costs are asked for, it is different.]

Mr. Follett.—I can add nothing upon that view of the case.

The Solicitor General, in reply.

June 30.—The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The principal object of this suit is to make Mr. Tyrrell account for and repay the profits of a transaction in which he is said to have acted as the agent of the plaintiffs, and which were derived solely in consequence of his filling that character. The fact, or rather the extent, of the agency is disputed. There is little or no dispute about the principal facts of the case.

Shortly before the date of the transaction in question Louisa Campbell was the mortgagee from Mr. Moxhay, who was then dead, of premises in the city of London, having a frontage of upwards of ninety feet in Threadneedle Street and extending backwards about 140 feet, on one side to Old Broad Street, in which there was a frontage of 21 feet, and on the other side to Cushion Court. The largest and most valuable part of this property was the "Hall of Commerce." The amount due to Louisa Campbell on her mortgage was about 40,000*l.* The executors of Mr. Moxhay, being unable to discharge the mortgage, were compelled to allow Mrs. Campbell to foreclose the mortgaged property by a suit in equity. On the 20th of September 1854 she contracted to sell the whole property for 49,200*l.* to four persons, who bought on behalf of themselves and five other persons, on which occasion a deposit of 1,000*l.* was paid to her. These nine parties were interested in tenths, the defendant E. R. Read having two-tenths, and the other eight one-tenth each. E. R. Read contributed 200*l.* and each of the others 100*l.* towards the deposit. The purchase was speculative, the purchasers expecting to dispose of the property again at an increased price. In December 1854 Louisa Campbell was induced to extend the time for completing the purchase until June 1855. In January 1855 Mr. Scott, the present secretary of the bank, and Mr. Tyrrell projected a company, which resulted in the establishment of the Bank of London. Preliminary meetings were held, and on the 19th of January Sir John V. Shelley was applied to by Mr. Tyrrell to become a director and chairman of the company if it should be formed; he consented, and on the 5th of February he was requested to name other directors. On the 9th of February advertisements were issued of the formation of the company. On the 13th of February the first meeting of directors took place. Mr. Scott was appointed secretary and Mr. Tyrrell and his partners, Messrs. Paine and Layton, were appointed solicitors of the bank. About a week previously to this meeting E. R. Read had become the sole owner of the property purchased from Louisa Campbell by buying up the shares of the other eight co-adventurers, for a sum of 150*l.* each. Immediately afterwards, E. R. Read made proposals to the company to sell to them that portion of the property known as the Hall of Commerce. After some negotiation upon the price a contract was finally entered into on the 5th of May 1855, by which the plaintiffs agreed to give E. R. Read the sum of 64,500*l.* On the 11th of August following the purchase was completed. Out of the purchase-money 48,410*l.* 4*s.* 2*d.* was paid to Louisa Campbell, the amount then due to her on her purchase-money, and the residue (subject to a deduction of about 7,000*l.* to abide the result of a claim) was paid to E. R. Read. This 7,000*l.* was paid, or was to be paid, to Mr. Tyrrell, who was no party to the contract or conveyance, and whose interest in the property was at that time wholly unknown to the plaintiffs. This fact they discovered at the end of April 1857, and they filed this bill in the December following. They contend that Mr. Tyrrell is not merely liable to account for the money so received by him, but also for the interest he has in that portion of the property bought from Louisa Campbell, which still remains unsold, that is, unsold by E. R. Read. Their right to this relief is rested on the evidence, which shews the dealings which existed between Messrs. Read and Tyrrell, respecting this property, and the relation in which the latter stood to the company.

On the 5th or 6th of February an interview took place between Messrs. Read and Tyrrell, in the course of which, it appears from the evidence given by Mr. Tyrrell, in cross-examination, in a cause of Lacy v. Read, which is made evidence in this cause, that the following subjects were discussed between them, namely, the formation of the company, the necessity of its having a place of business and the eligibility of the Hall of Commerce for that purpose. What passed on the same day between Messrs. Read and Tyrrell is set forth in the sixth paragraph of Mr. Tyrrell's answer. "On the 6th of February 1855 the defendant E. R. Read called and informed me of the particulars of the aforesaid agreements of the 20th of September and the 23rd of December 1854, and he also informed me that the agreements had been entered into as a speculation, and that several of the persons with whom he was associated therein had not any means, and that the management of it had been very unsatisfactory to him, and that he had determined either to buy the shares of all his co-speculators or to sell his own, and that he had consequently offered to them either to buy or sell, at some price per share, the amount of which I do not now remember. He also stated that his co-speculators appeared to be afraid of their responsibility under the agreements, but that he considered the property might be made a good investment, provided money were spent upon it. I had long known the property, and I believed it to be of a value far exceeding the amount agreed to be paid to Louisa Campbell. But as past experience had proved that the large hall was too extensive for profitable occupation, I concurred in a suggestion made by E. R. Read that it might be advantageously converted into counting-houses. The defendant E. R. Read then proposed that I should join him in the speculation, if he should become the purchaser of the shares of his co-speculators, and I agreed so to do, if he procured the shares of his co-speculators at a reasonable price, and to carry out the scheme of converting the large room into counting-houses, and by the purchase of adjoining ground on the Cushion Court side of it, and fronting Broad Street, to lay into one large plot the frontage in Broad Street. Either at the same meeting or on the said 6th of February, or on the following morning, E. R. Read shewed me certain plans and estimates of his suggested alterations in the large room or hall, which had been made by a surveyor or architect named Wood, of which plans I entirely approved." On the 7th of February E. R. Read entered into the arrangement with his co-adventurers. On the following day (the 8th) Messrs. Read and Tyrrell again met, and then entered into a verbal agreement, which was not reduced into writing until the 10th of March. It was as follows:—"8th day of February 1855. Between E. R. Read, of Austin Friars, and Timothy Tyrrell, of Guildhall Yard, London. Whereas E. R. Read became the purchaser of the hereditaments mentioned in the agreement hereinafter specified, upon the terms and conditions therein stated; and whereas the purchase, though made in the name of E. R. Read, was made on the joint account of himself and T. Tyrrell, except as to the part coloured green on the plan to the said agreement, which is to belong to E. R. Read exclusively: now, it is agreed, first, that the purchase, except as aforesaid, was so made on a joint account as tenants in common; secondly, that the purchase-money, namely, 1,200*l.*, as appears by the agreement, and 300*l.*, together with the costs provided to be paid by the agreement, be borne and paid as follows: two fifth parts thereof respectively by E. R. Read, and three fifth parts thereof by T. Tyrrell; but all further costs and expenditure to be paid or contributed by them in equal moieties; thirdly, that if, in selling the property, it shall be deemed advisable to include the excepted part so coloured green as aforesaid, E. R. Read shall be entitled to the value thereof, over and above his half of the purchase-money for the residue; fourthly, that neither party shall sell or otherwise dispose of his share or interest in the property, without the consent in writing of the other of them; fifthly, that if, in the management of the property, the alterations, repairs, sale, lease, or other dealings with the same, any difference of opinion shall arise between the parties, the same shall be from time to time referred to the award and arbitrament of John Horatio Lloyd; and in the event of his decease, or declining or neglecting to act, then to the award and arbitrament of such person or persons from time to time as the Senior Master of the Queen's Bench for the time, on the request of either party, shall appoint, and the submission shall and may be made a rule of any of the Courts at Westminster on the application of either party." On the 9th of February E. R. Read wrote to T. Tyrrell, in answer to a communication from him, stating that the price of the Hall of Commerce was 102,000*l.* T. Tyrrell asked a fortnight before returning any answer, which was assented to. It was not till the 19th of March that the question of the sale was brought formally before the directors; but on that day T. Tyrrell, as the solicitor of the company, charged the plaintiffs in his bill of costs for an attendance on E. R. Read with reference to the sale of this property. The negotiation proceeded. All the communications on the subject by E. R. Read were addressed by him to T. Tyrrell, and T. Tyrrell communicated to the company, through Mr. Scott, the secretary. On the 2nd of April the Bank passed a resolution appointing T. Tyrrell their agent to negotiate the matter of the purchase with E. R. Read, but limiting the price to 60,000*l.* The negotiation continued, and finally, on the 3rd of May 1855, at a meeting of the directors, the report of Mr. Paine, on behalf of the firm of Messrs. Tyrrell, Paine & Co., and that of Mr. Scott were laid before the directors with a draft agreement. On the 5th of May an agreement, in writing, between E. R. Read of the one part, and the directors of the other part, was duly executed, by which they agreed to become the purchasers of the Hall of Commerce, at the sum of 64,500*l.*, conditionally on the bank obtaining a charter of incorporation. This charter was obtained on the 13th of July 1855, and the agreement for purchase was carried into effect by an indenture bearing date the 11th of August 1855, between Louisa Campbell of the first part, E. R. Read of the second part, and the directors of the company of the third part, and in consideration of 48,410*l.* 4*s.* 2*d.* paid to Louisa Campbell, the amount then due to her under the contract for sale, and of 16,089*l.* 11*s.* 10*d.* paid to E. R. Read, making together the sum of 64,500*l.* the premises comprised in the agreement of the 5th of May were duly conveyed to the directors of the company in fee. Up to this time no suspicion of the interest of T. Tyrrell seems to have been entertained by any one, not even his partners; but it came to the knowledge of the plaintiffs in the following manner: on hearing of the sale to the company, Mr. Read's eight co-adventurers became dissatisfied with the arrangement entered into by them of the 7th of February 1855, and insisted on their right to participate in the profit, and three of them, before the completion of the purchase, gave notice of their claim to Messrs. Tyrrell & Co., the company's solicitors, for and on behalf of the company. In consequence of this notice, it was agreed between Mr. Read and the company that the company should accept the conveyance from Louisa Campbell and E. R. Read, as already mentioned, provided the sum of 14,500*l.* was invested in Exchequer bills and set aside to abide the determination of the claim, of which notice had been given, and this was accordingly done. In December 1855 three of the original speculators filed their bill in the suit of Davis v. Read to enforce their right. That suit was compromised in November 1856, by payment of 1,050*l.* to them, together with their costs of the suit. Shortly afterwards, two other co-adventurers filed a similar bill against E. R. Read, entitled Lacy v. Read, which was also compromised on payment of 666*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* and the costs of the suit. But in the course of that suit, and on the 29th of April 1857, Mr. Tyrrell, in a cross-examination by the plaintiffs, stated the particulars of his interest in the property under the agreement entered into by him with E. R. Read. The result was the institution of this suit in December following. On the first question, namely, of agency, I think it must be taken that Mr. Tyrrell acted as agent of the company. Throughout the proceedings E. R. Read communicates with T. Tyrrell for sale, not to him, but to the company about to be formed; he communicates with him, therefore, as a person who either possesses or was about to possess such relation towards the company then in the course of formation as enabled him to deal with the subject on behalf of that body. T. Tyrrell adopts this character, in which E. R. Read addresses him throughout the transaction in question, and in that character T. Tyrrell communicates to the secretary of the company the proposals made by Mr. Read. The circumstance that the company was not formed even provisionally until the 13th of February, that it was not till the 20th of April that the number of persons required by law to enable them to obtain a charter had executed the deed of settlement; and that it was not till the 13th of July that the company obtained its charter, are all facts which neither destroy nor weaken T. Tyrrell's character of agent towards the body of persons engaged in forming, and who afterwards formed, the company. He was the self-constituted solicitor of the company before its complete formation; he was recognized as such when it was formed, and his claim upon the company for work and labour done on behalf of the company extends to a period earlier than its complete formation. The relation between them must be considered as commencing from that period at which he claimed a right to charge them with the remuneration due to him for services done on their behalf; and which right was admitted and sanctioned by the company, and was paid for accordingly. The general bill of costs against the company contains a general item amounting to twenty guineas, which is solely applicable to the month of January. The first regular items within any distinguishing date begin on the 13th of February. The particular bill of costs for the business relating to this purchase begins on the 19th of March. The general bill is thus entitled: "Messrs. Tyrrell, Paine & Layton, solicitors. Bill of costs, charges and expenses in and about the formation, and preliminary to the application for, and including the grant of letters patent to the Bank of London, pursuant to statute 7 & 8 Vict. c. 118. January and February." The first item is, "For very numerous attendances during these two months upon, and correspondence with Sir John V. Shelley, Mr. Scott, Mr. Alderman Muggeridge, Mr. W. Layton and other parties, proposing to establish a new joint-stock bank, and advice and conferences from time to time thereon; attending various other gentlemen, who, it was proposed, should act as directors; drawing and settling prospectuses previous to the meeting, at which it was determined to establish a bank under the name of the Bank of London, and that Mr. Scott should act as secretary thereto, 21l." This item relates to the month of January only, for although the words "January and February" are put, that is solely applicable to the month of January. Then there are two items, the dates of which I do not know.

The next item is put "13," which I assume to be the 13th of February. If it is the month of January, it only makes the case still more strong. At all events, it cannot be later than the 13th of February, and the earlier items must relate to the month of January. The bill for this particular transaction is this:—"The Bank of London to Messrs. Tyrrell, Paine & Layton, in relation to the negotiations for the purchase of the bank premises, 19th of March. Attending upon Mr. Read on his proposing to us the Hall of Commerce for the bank. Discussing the terms and correspondence with that gentleman, and attending the secretary thereon, 13s. 4d." Then it goes on to various items, which are of a similar character. It is contended on behalf of Mr. Tyrrell that he could not be the agent for that which had no existence; and that as the company had no directors, and had not even held any meeting, or even had a nominal existence before the 13th of February, he could not be their agent on the 8th of February, when he became interested in this property. To this objection there are two answers. In fact there was no binding agreement between Messrs. Tyrrell and Read before the 10th of March; but even if this were otherwise, I am not disposed to concur in the argument of the defendant. One person may be made the agent of another by acts done ex post facto. If a person professes to act as the agent of A. without any authority for so doing, A. may, by recognizing him as his agent and sanctioning and adopting his acts done in that assumed character, constitute that person his agent for the time when he professed to act in that character, although he did so then without authority. It is therefore established that the relation of solicitor and client, not only existed between Tyrrell and the company, but as Mr. Tyrrell was adopted as the solicitor or agent of the company, he must be considered as having been the agent of the company in all matters in which he professed to act as such agent; that is, in all matters relating to the company which was afterwards formed, and consequently in all matters in which E. R. Read dealt with him as such agent, and in which he acted towards E. R. Read in that assumed character. The fixing of this period of time is material. Mr. Tyrrell's duties, therefore, in his character of agent, and his liabilities as such, date from the time when he first acted in any matters relating to the company, and in this view it becomes comparatively immaterial that on the 2nd of April he was, by a resolution passed and entered in the books of the company, specially appointed their agent to negotiate this purchase, and that Mr. Tyrrell acquiesced in this resolution and acted under it. Under these circumstances, it was admitted, on behalf Mr. Tyrrell, that if the company had desired to set aside the transaction the sale could not stand, and they do not dispute the right of the plaintiffs to restore to Mr. Tyrrell the interest he may have in the property which they purchased from Mr. Read, and their right to receive back again so much of the price they paid as may be attributable to that interest; but they contend that the right of the plaintiffs is limited to this relief, that they must either adopt or repudiate the transaction altogether; and there can be no question that this, in ordinary cases of sale by an agent to his principal, is the equity to which the principal is entitled; at least it is so where the parties can be replaced in the same situation they were in before the sale took place. In many cases, however, this is impossible. It is so in the present case. Not merely have the plaintiffs set up their place of business on the premises purchased before they had notice of the defendant's interest, not only have they expended considerable sums of money in adapting the building to their own purposes, but the equity which they have against Mr. Tyrrell does not necessarily extend itself to Mr. E. R. Read, and certainly not to Louisa Campbell, between whom and themselves no such relation of principal and agent existed, and the latter of whom was entirely ignorant of the whole transaction. What relief, then, can the plaintiffs have against their agent, Mr. Tyrrell, in such circumstances? The defendant says, none at all, and The Great Luxembourg Railway Company v. Magnay (1) is cited to support it. The circumstances there existing and an illustration in the judgment are relied on, as establishing that if that case be law, the plaintiffs' equity is confined to the undoing of the transaction, as far as it can be undone, and that if the plaintiffs decline this relief, they can have nothing. I adhere to the view taken in that case, but there is a wide distinction between it and the present case. In that case the company sought to set aside the purchase of the concession made by the Belgian Government; it had been made to the defendant, who was afterwards appointed chairman of the company. The company, at his instance, bought this concession, being ignorant that he was the original concessionnaire. Upon the discovery of that fact they filed a bill impeaching the transaction. After the suit was instituted they assumed to be and acted as the owners of the concession, and sold it to a stranger for value. I held that they had adopted the transaction with full knowledge of the circumstances, and that they had thus rendered it impossible for them to give to the defendant what he had a right to require. There was, when the bill was filed, no difficulty in replacing the parties in the situation in which they were when the contract was entered into; but the subsequent acts of the plaintiffs had rendered this impossible. If in this case the property had belonged exclusively to Mr. Tyrrell, and if, after acquiring a knowledge of that fact, the company had sold the property or had altered it to suit their business, and made it such that it could not be restored to the defendant, I should then hold that their relief was barred. Similar observations apply to the illustration in the judgment in the case cited, and which, if repeated and commented upon, step by step, will conveniently illustrate both my meaning in that case and the conclusion in the present. The case suggested was, if the company purchasing apparently from a stranger an estate required for their business which really belonged to their agent, on discovery of that fact their equity would be to set aside the whole transaction, or to adopt it; and if after knowledge of that fact they either had parted with the property, or had so used or appropriated the property as to make it impossible to return it, they would have lost their right to relief. Take it one step further, and suppose that the company had appropriated and used the property in such a way as to make it impossible to return it, while they were in total ignorance that it had been the property of their agent. In that case the view expressed was that the relief to which the company would be entitled as against the agent would be limited to the recovery of what, if anything, had been paid by the company over and above the full value of the property. But both of these cases proceed upon the assumption that the property purchased by the principal had originally been the property of the agent, either before he became such agent, or, if acquired since, that it had been so acquired in no character connected with or springing out of his agency; and accordingly this was as the matter stood in The Great Luxembourg Railway Company v. Magnay. The defendant there had not obtained the concession by reason of his being the agent or chairman of the company, or in any way by reason of advantages derived from his being connected with it. It was not necessary, therefore, in that case to pursue the case further. But in the case under consideration it becomes necessary to consider the next step, and to suppose that the agent, knowing the peculiar eligibility of the estate for the purposes of the company, and while he was agent, and for the purpose of selling it at an advanced price to his principal, had himself become the purchaser of the estate, and that in ignorance of this circumstance the company had purchased the estate from one whom they supposed to be a stranger, while, in fact, the agent was the real owner, and was entitled to and received the whole of the purchase-money paid by the principal. In such a state of things a new equity arises. It is not then a question about setting aside the transaction, neither is it a question of what is or what was the value of the property; but the question then is, whether the agent has not by means of his agency acquired this property for the purpose of making a profit out of it by a re-sale to his principal, and whether, if he succeeds in his object, he can keep that advantage to himself. If it were the case of iron or sugar bought by the agent and re-sold to the principal, the agent cannot keep the profit, why should he be better entitled to do so in the case of the purchase of an estate? The same principles apply to both cases, and the profit to be derived from land so acquired and so re-sold is not to be retained by the agent any more than the profit to be derived from sugar, iron or any other commodity, provided it be well established that the profit made arises from the character of agent, and springs out of his employment as such. It is in this last view of the case that it becomes material to ascertain the time when Mr. Tyrrell first became the agent of the company, for if his interest in the property had been acquired a year previously, or if it had been acquired by devise, or descent at any time, the question on this point would have been concluded. The next question, therefore, to be considered is, whether the acquisition of his interest in the property from Mr. Read sprang out of and was attributable to Mr. Tyrrell's character as agent of the company. On this point an examination of the evidence brings the following conclusions:—That there was no binding agreement between Messrs. Tyrrell and Read before the 10th of March: the parol agreement was binding upon no one, for that if the company had not been formed the agreement of the 8th of February would never have been made a binding one; that the success which Mr. Scott and Mr. Tyrrell met with in the preliminary steps for founding this company was such as to lead them to the well-founded belief that the company would be shortly formed and successfully established; that this belief was imparted by Mr. Tyrrell to E. R. Read on the 5th or 6th of February; that in consequence Mr. Read made the arrangements of the 7th of February for purchasing the shares of his co-adventurers, and that, in consequence, he and Mr. Tyrrell entered into the parol agreement of the 8th of February, which was reduced into writing and made binding on them by the agreement executed on the 10th of March. I look in vain for any motive explanatory of these transactions, and the accompanying facts, except the desire to make use of Mr. Tyrrell's position with reference to the company, to induce the plaintiffs to purchase the Hall of Commerce. The property was of value; the plaintiffs also did not give more for it than it was well worth to them; but it must be nevertheless borne in mind that property of this description is an object of acquisition to but a very limited number of competitors. The number of persons who require such a building for their own business is very small, and that number is much diminished when confined to those amongst them who have the means sufficient to enable them to make the purchase. In fact, the purchasers, unless for the purpose of speculation, are reduced almost exclusively to a public company. The difficulty of disposing of such a species of property at anything like its real value is established beyond question by the facts stated. For some years the representatives of the mortgagor were unable to raise the 40,000*l.* lent on mortgage of the whole property; they were compelled to let it be foreclosed. The mortgagee seems for some time to have been unable to dispose of it, and it was then only by speculators, who bought to sell again, and who, unless they could dispose of it to a public company, would, as seemed highly probable, gain little or nothing by their adventure. The opportunity of sale to a public company occurs but rarely. Here was an opportunity such as might not occur again for a considerable time. It was of the greatest importance to seize the opportunity and make the most of it. This is the key to the dealings between Messrs. Read and Tyrrell. Except for the advantages to be derived from Mr. Tyrrell's position, what motive can be assigned for Mr. Read voluntarily relinquishing nearly one-half of the profit to be derived from the increased price of the property? It would be contrary to every principle of human nature to suppose that he meant to make a valuable present to Tyrrell without receiving any equivalent for it. E. R. Read's motive was to convert T. Tyrrell, one of the founders of the company, the solicitor and confidential adviser of the company, into a zealous partizan, instead of an indifferent or a hostile adviser. What other principle can explain the compact entered into between Messrs. Tyrrell and Read, that the whole of their dealings should be kept secret? A compact which Mr. Read considered himself bound in honour to keep, although at the expense of a statutory declaration, and of evidence on oath, both at variance with the truth. The reason is obvious why the concealment from the company of Mr. Tyrrell's interest was considered essential for the attainment of the object. If the company had known that Mr. Tyrrell was to derive a pecuniary advantage from the sale, they certainly would have distrusted and rejected his advice, and they possibly would have closed the negotiation for purchase with Mr. Read altogether. These are the circumstances that convince me that the dealings between Messrs. Tyrrell and Read sprang out of the peculiar position the former held towards the company, and that but for this he would have obtained from Mr. Read no interest whatever in the property. To the argument, therefore, that the interest was acquired by Mr. Tyrrell before the company was formed, I attach but little weight. It was acquired with a view to the company then in the course of formation, and the interest was acquired by reason of the influence which, if the company was formed, Mr. Tyrrell, as one of the original founders, must necessarily possess over the directors, the greater part of whom must have been either named or approved of by him, in conjunction with Mr. Scott and their first nominees. I am of opinion, therefore, that the share of the purchase-money received by Mr. Tyrrell over and above the sum expended by him must be treated as profits derived by him from his dealings, in his character of agent for the company, with Mr. Read, and that he must account for this to the company. The next question is, how far do these profits extend? The plaintiffs say, that if the principles contended for prevail, the share which Mr. Tyrrell takes as tenant in common, in the unsold portion of the property purchased from Louisa Campbell, must also be regarded as property derived by him from the transaction. On this part of the case I have some hesitation. It may be contended, that all that the company can obtain is, that they should have the property at the price at which Mr. Tyrrell might have obtained it for them, if he had no interest in the matter, and if he had exerted himself to the best of his ability to obtain it from them for that price. So regarding it, I doubt certainly whether it would have been obtained from E. R. Read at a less sum than that which he received for it; but I cannot safely found my decision on this, which is mere matter of speculation. I consider that the profit which Mr. Tyrrell derived from his position as agent was the profit he derived from his dealings with Mr. Read, and this profit is the net value of the interest he takes in the hereditaments purchased from Louisa Campbell. The plaintiffs might with propriety, acting in a liberal spirit, disclaim all interest in the unsold portion of the property; but if they insist upon it, they are entitled to a declaration that Mr. Tyrrell is a trustee for them of that interest in the unsold portion of the premises which he takes under the agreement of the 10th of March 1855, and which bears date the 8th of February of that year. The costs must follow the event. I disposed of the case against E. R. Read at the hearing: further consideration confirms the conclusion. There is no principle to justify any relief against him. He dealt with the company as a stranger, and between him and the company no other relation exists; but it is equally impossible, seeing how he has acted in the course of the dealings, to give him any costs. Against him, therefore, the bill will be dismissed.

KINDERSLEY, V.C. } NORTHEN v. CARNEGIE.
May 5, 9. }

Settlement — Estate pur autre Vie — General and Special Occupant — Resulting Trust — Occupant of Incorporeal Hereditaments.

If an estate is given to A. simply during the life of B, and A. dies before B, any person getting possession of the land after the death of A. will be entitled to hold it as the general occupant; but if an estate is limited to A. and his heirs during the life of B. a general occupant is not permitted, but the heir will take as special occupant, and not by descent.

Semble — If an estate is given to A. and his executors and administrators during the life of B, and A. dies first, the executor would be capable of taking the estate as special occupant. In the case of an incorporeal hereditament limited to A. simpliciter pur autre vie, an executor or administrator may be a special occupant, but there can be no general occupant.

If A, having an estate to himself, his heirs and assigns, during the life of B, conveys the legal interest to trustees, their executors, administrators and assigns, and the trustees die in the lifetime of the cestui que vie, the executors of the trustees will be special occupants, and A. will have no interest in the legal estate.

If A, tenant pur autre vie, parts with the beneficial interest contingently, and the contingency does not happen, then there will be a resulting trust in favour of A. of the interest which he has not effectually parted with.

This suit was instituted for the purpose of having a construction put upon a settlement, and for a declaration as to the rights of the parties interested.

By a settlement, dated the 4th of February 1812, reciting a lease dated the 9th of January 1788, from the Bishop of Lichfield, granting to Vernon Cotton, his heirs and assigns, the prebendary of Eccleshall, excepting the parsonage, lands, tenements, &c., to hold to Vernon Cotton, his heirs and assigns, during the lives of Mary Ann Northen, Elizabeth Cotton, and Abraham Barlow, and the lives of the survivors and survivor, subject to certain payments to the bishop and vicar; and after reciting that the said Vernon Cotton, being willing and desirous to promote his said children in the world as much as possible during his lifetime, had proposed and agreed to make the assignment thereafter contained, and to which they had consented and agreed; it was witnessed that, in consideration of natural love and affection, the said Vernon Cotton assigned to John Cotton and John Harris, their executors, administrators or assigns, the said prebend, messuages, &c., to hold to them during the lives of the said Mary Ann Northen, Elizabeth Cotton, and Abraham Barlow, and the life of the survivor, as to the messuages, &c. of the said prebend, to such uses as Vernon Cotton should by deed or will appoint, and subject thereto to the use of Vernon Cotton for life, in case their lives should so long live, and after his decease to pay the rents to such persons as after declared; and as to the tithes and other emoluments upon trust to pay one-third of the rents to Francis Hicken Northen and Mary Ann his wife, or any after-taken husband of Mary Ann Northen, and for the life of the survivor, and after the death of the survivor to pay such one-third equally to the younger children of Francis Hicken Northen and Mary Ann his wife, or any after-taken husband who should be living at her death, and if there should be one only younger child, or one child, to pay the same to such one or only younger child, his executors, administrators or assigns respectively at twenty-one or marriage. There were then trusts as to the remaining two-thirds in favour of Elizabeth Cotton and Harriett Cotton in the same terms.

The settlement then proceeded as follows:—"But in case any one or more of them, the said Mary Ann the wife of Francis Northen, Elizabeth Cotton and Harriett Cotton, shall happen to die without leaving children or child as aforesaid, then the part, share or proportion of her or them so dying shall go and be paid or assigned and transferred, in equal shares, to the survivors or survivor of them, in such manner as the parts or shares, or part or share of the parents or parent are or is directed to be paid, assigned or transferred. And it was provided that, in case the said Mary Ann, the wife of the said Francis Northen, Elizabeth Cotton, and Harriett Cotton, or any of them, should die leaving one or more sons, the eldest of such sons and such only son should be reckoned the eldest child, or if they or any of them should die leaving daughters only, then the eldest of such daughters should not be reckoned as one of the younger children, and should be excluded from all benefit to arise under the trust aforesaid."

Vernon Cotton made his will, dated the 12th of January 1813, attested so as to pass real estates, and thereby devised to the trustees of the last-recited indenture, the property subject to his appointment, upon the same trusts as were thereby declared, or such of them as should be capable of taking effect at his decease, and appointed his three sons-in-law executors. Vernon Cotton died on the 12th of April 1817, leaving his three daughters, Mary Ann,

Elizabeth and Harriett, his co-heiresses, him surviving.

Mary Ann Northen had no son, but four daughters, Harriett Elizabeth, Frances Hicken, Mary Ann, and Ellen.

Harriett Elizabeth married the Rev. Henry Turton, and had issue Francis William Turton and other children, and died in 1834, in the lifetime of her mother, leaving Francis William Turton her heir-at-law.

Mary Ann Northen died in 1841.

Frances Hicken Northen was still unmarried.

Mary Ann married Edward Wilson, and both she and her husband died in 1858, she having survived her husband and died intestate, leaving John Wilson Wilson her heir-at-law.

Ellen married Sir Edward Harry Vaughan Colt.

Harriett Cotton married twice: first John Bagshawe, and had two daughters, Harriett Bagshawe and Rose Bagshawe; secondly, Henry Stephens Belcombe, by whom she had six children, four died in her lifetime unmarried, and the two younger, Mariana Percy Belcombe and the Rev. Francis Belcombe, were still living. Harriett Belcombe died in March 1849, and her husband in December 1856, leaving Francis Edward Belcombe his heir-at-law.

In December 1852 Harriett Bagshawe died, unmarried and intestate.

Rose Bagshawe made her will, dated the 22nd of November 1855, giving all her property to Swynfen Thomas Carnegie for his absolute use and benefit. Rose Bagshawe died on the 23rd of June 1856.

Elizabeth Cotton married William Meeke, who changed his name to Taylor, survived her sisters, and died in November 1853, without issue.

William Taylor died in October 1855, and at the death of Elizabeth Taylor the co-heirs of Vernon Cotton were Francis William Turton, Frances Hicken Northen, Mary Ann Wilson, Ellen Colt and Francis Edward Belcombe.

The following questions were raised upon the construction of the settlement of the 4th of February 1812, whether Francis Edward Belcombe was entitled as one of the younger children of Harriett Belcombe at her death, and whether upon the death of Elizabeth Bewley Taylor without issue, her third part either became subject in equal moieties to the like trusts as were then subsisting concerning the other two-thirds, or whether, being undisposed of, it became vested by special occupancy in Francis William Turton, Frances Hicken Northen, Ellen Colt, Mary Ann Wilson, and Francis Edward Belcombe as co-heirs-at-law of Vernon Cotton. Swynfen Thomas Carnegie, Mariana Percy Belcombe, and Francis Edward Belcombe, also raised questions with respect to the proper distribution of the shares in the trust premises given to Harriett Belcombe and her children, and a moiety of the share given to Elizabeth Bewley Taylor and her children. Francis E. Belcombe, Francis W. Turton and Frances H. Northen contended, that no greater interest than a life interest was given to the grandchildren of Vernon Cotton, and the ulterior interest in the trust premises was undisposed of.

The Vice Chancellor, in his judgment, referred to the principal questions and arguments in the case.

Mr. Baily and Mr. Hobhouse, appeared for the plaintiffs.

Mr. Glasse and Mr. F. White, for the defendant Carnegie; and

Mr. Shapter, Mr. J. J. Lewis, Mr. Bury and Mr. Broderick, for other defendants.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—This is a case somewhat out of the ordinary routine of cases which come before this Court; for it involves questions and raises disputes concerning principles certainly not often the subject of consideration here. It appears to me that, although there is considerable room for discussion and argument in the matter, and although the case has had that discussion, and the Court has had the advantage of hearing the arguments of counsel upon it, the matter results in what I think does not admit of any very serious doubt. The facts of the case are simple enough. Mr. Vernon Cotton had three daughters; and, on the 4th of February 1812, he executed a voluntary settlement for the purpose of settling upon those daughters and their families certain property of a peculiar character. That property consisted of what is commonly called prebendal property, that is, ecclesiastical property, which was held by him under a grant from the Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry, by which grant the bishop granted to Mr. Cotton a certain prebend with its appurtenances. Those appurtenances consisted partly of tithes and partly of messuages and lands. They were granted, together with a property called Eccleshall, to hold to him, his heirs and assigns, during the lives of the persons named, cestuis que vie, and the life of the survivor of them, paying certain rent. That was the property which Mr. Cotton determined to settle by the instrument of the 4th of February 1812. The only recital contained in that deed, from which we can collect the intention of the settlor on any point whatever, is a recital which, after referring to the grant to him of this prebendal property, states as follows:—"And whereas the said Vernon Cotton, being willing and desirous to promote his said children in the world as much as possible during his lifetime, hath proposed and agreed to make such assignment as is hereinafter contained, on their entering into the covenants hereinafter also contained, and to which they have consented and agreed." Now, of course, very little, if anything, can be derived as to the intention from that recital. But Mr. Cotton having vested in him this property, pur autre vie, and it being limited to him, his heirs and assigns, for the lives and life of the cestuis que vie, and the survivor of them, the first consideration that presents itself (about which, I apprehend, there can be only one question involving any difficulty) is this—what was his interest in it with reference to this point? Supposing he had died, leaving the cestuis que vie, to whom would that property have gone? It was limited to him, and his heirs and assigns. Now, the general doctrine with regard to estates pur autre vie is simple enough, and is pretty well known; at the same time it involves a very abstruse law, when you come to apply it to certain specific cases. With regard to the lands, I think there is no question, so far as this, that if the lands are given to A. simply during the life of B, and A. dies during the life of B, at common law anybody—at least subject to the question of the effect of the statutes—who got possession of that land after the death of A. would be entitled to hold it against all comers, and would be called the general occupant. But if, as in the present case, the land was limited to A. and his heirs during the life of B, a general occupant is not permitted; nobody has a right to take possession of it as a general occupant; but the heir takes it. But how does he take it? And this is a point on which I think it is quite right that the Court should adhere to strict principles, and should not get rid of those principles by using inaccurate language. The point is this—that an heir can take by descent an estate of inheritance only; and it is a most inaccurate expression to talk of a descendible freehold. When I say it is inaccurate, I know the expression is very frequently used, and provided you take care not to involve a dereliction from principle in using the expression, there is no objection to it; but the danger in using the expression is, that it does, or may, involve a departure from principle. The heir general takes by descent an estate of inheritance only in fee simple, and the heir in tail takes by descent an estate of inheritance in fee tail only. Then in what character is it that, if the limitations be to a man and his heirs during the life of another, the heir takes it? He takes it, no doubt, because he is heir; that is to say, he takes it because he sustains the character of heir. But does he take it by descent? Not in the least. He does not take it by descent. He takes it in the character which the law calls for convenience that of the special occupant; that is to say, in the character of the party designated and pointed out by the settlor or testator, as the case may be, to take the property on the event happening of the grantee dying in the lifetime of the cestui que vie. And I think it most essential to maintain this principle, that the heir in such a case takes not by descent, but merely as the person pointed out to take as special occupant, and in that character only. I do not think there is any reason to doubt about that, except this, that the expression "descendible freehold" is an expression with which we have all been familiar. It has been frequently used, but I think it is Lord Eldon, in the case of Ripley v. Waterworth, who points out that it is an inaccurate expression, and that the heir does not in such a case take by descent at all. The freehold does not descend to him. He does not take quà heir. It is true he could not take it if he were not heir, because it is directed that the heir shall take it; but he does not take it quà heir, as an heir takes by descent. Then comes another question regarding lands. Supposing lands are limited, not to A. and his heirs during the life of the cestui que vie, but to A, his executors and administrators, during the life of the cestui que vie. This question has been raised, and has caused a great deal of difference of opinion. I believe that Judges of great eminence are ranged on both sides. I believe that dicta in different cases may be found on both sides. The question is this, supposing the gift to be to A. and his executors and administrators during the life of B, if A. dies during the life of B, does the executor take it, or is it a case in which anybody may take it as general occupant? Is it the same thing, in short, as if it had been simply a gift to A. during the life of B, without saying anything about heirs and executors at all? Some have held that the executor cannot take as special occupant; others have held that he can. The reasons assigned (I am now speaking, without occupying time unnecessarily by referring to a number of authorities)—the main, if not the only reasons why it is contended that the executors shall not take as special occupants in such cases, are these:—it is said the executor is merely to take the personal estate; the executor is not to take the realty; he is not to take freehold property; then how can the executor take land? I confess I think that that reason is founded upon a complete misapprehension. It is founded upon the same misapprehension as has given rise to the expression “a descendible freehold,” when the heir is mentioned. When the gift is to A. and his heirs during the life of another, as I have said, the heir does not take it by descent as heir; and so when the gift is to one and his executors during the life of another, if the executor is to take it, the executor will take it, not in his character of executor—that is, not by devolution from the testator upon him as executor, but he will take it, as the person named by the grantor, as the special occupant.

And why not? He is taking it not because he is executor, taking an estate from his testator; but he is taking it in the same kind of way as, if you used the expression “descendible freehold,” the heir must be considered to take that estate. That is, the heir does not take that estate by descent from his ancestor, but as special occupant, so the executor takes the estate not by devolution on him in the ordinary course, but as special occupant. Therefore, I confess, I do not see the force of that reason. There is another reason, which I think is dwelt upon by Lord Redesdale, in a case where he suggests this difficulty. Now, although I need not say that any difficulty coming from such a Judge as Lord Redesdale deserves the utmost respect and deference, I must venture to observe, that I cannot see the force of the difficulty. While I have no doubt that his views are better than mine, I am bound honestly to express my own opinion. He says, that if the limitation be to one and his executors and administrators during the life of the cestui que vie, there is this difficulty in saying that if A. dies during the life of the cestui que vie, his executor or administrator can take it by special occupancy. For he says, there must be some interval; neither the executor nor the administrator can take it instantly on the death of the grantee, because some little time must elapse before you can ascertain whether the executor will become executor. He is not bound to become executor, whereas the heir cannot help being heir—he may not take the estate, but he cannot help being the heir. The executor, however, may choose to say, “I will not be executor.” And so in the case of an administrator, some time must elapse before there is an administrator, as an administrator can only be appointed by the Ecclesiastical Court, or now by the Court of Probate. I cannot see the force of that reasoning; I see no more difficulty or objection to the view I take than to this case, which may commonly occur, and in which there has never been felt to be any difficulty. Supposing a man, by his will, devises all his estates to his own executors and administrators, not naming them, but devising the estates to his executors or administrators on certain trusts. Of course, there is just the same difficulty there. Some little time must elapse before you determine whether the executor will take them; and, in the case of an administrator, before the administrator is appointed. But there has never been the least doubt as to that being perfectly valid. So if he were to give it to the executors or administrators apart from any trust, there being then no executor or administrator—where is the difficulty? I do not see the difficulty. It is raised, however, by Lord Redesdale, and his difficulty, I have no doubt, is a sound and serious difficulty. But is that a reason why an executor or administrator ought not to be regarded as being capable of being a special occupant? Now, that is a question which it does not appear to be necessary for me to determine for the purpose of deciding the case before me. At the same time I think I should not be wrong in stating that if it were necessary to determine that question, in the conflict of opinions entertained on the subject, my own opinion is, that it would be highly advantageous to hold that it is competent to an executor or administrator to take as special occupant. In other words, that if lands be limited to an individual and his executors during the life of the cestui que vie, the executor, in the event of the grantee dying in the life of the cestui que vie, should be capable of taking as special occupant; and I do not know, I confess, how to get over the difficulty which would exist if the law is not to be so laid down. I think it is very common for conveyancers in settlements (it used to be, in my own personal recollection, most common) to make the limitation to the trustees to preserve contingent remainders and their heirs during the life of the tenant for life. But sometimes a difficulty arose about finding the heir, or the heir was an infant; and so the practice began to prevail (and, I believe, still prevails, whether universally or not I have not now sufficient experience in the practice of conveyancers to know)—but the practice arose of limiting the estate to the executors of the trustees to preserve. Now, what would be the effect if it were to be held that executors could not take as special occupants? Supposing both the trustees died in the lifetime of the tenant for life, where has the estate to preserve contingent remainders gone? I must own it would be fraught, to my mind, with very serious danger if it should be held that an executor or administrator cannot take as special occupant. But, however, as I have said, I think, for the mere purpose of determining the present question, it is not necessary that I should express a conclusive opinion upon that point.

Then this question has arisen, whether, if the property which is the subject of the limitation pur autre vie, instead of being lands, be an incorporeal hereditament (such as a rent or tithes, or other incorporeal hereditament), can there, in the case of such a property, be a special occupant, or any occupant at all? There are dicta which would lead one to the supposition that, in the opinion of some parties, it is impossible to have either a general occupant or a special occupant of property lying in grant—that is, of an incorporeal hereditament. Now I believe the effect of the authorities is clear—and I confess upon this I do not feel any doubt at all—that though it is perfectly true that if an incorporeal hereditament be limited to A. simpliciter during the life of B, and A. dies in the life of B, there can be no general occupant of that incorporeal hereditament, as there may be a general occupant of a corporeal hereditament, that is, of lands; there is nothing at all to prevent there being a special occupant of such an incorporeal hereditament. It seems quite unnecessary, for any purpose either of convenience or of adherence to general principles, to hold otherwise. When you consider the reason why there cannot be an occupant, I think it is clear that it means there cannot be a general occupant. The reason is only applicable to the case of a general, and not to the case of a special, occupant. The reason is—without going very minutely into it—substantially this, if a party, in defending himself against a real action, had to plead, he must either have pleaded a right in himself and his ancestors (which, of course, a general occupant could not do, as he does not derive his estate from any ancestor of his at all), or else the party must have pleaded what is technically called a que estate, that is, quorum status the person whose estate he has. And in order to shew that he had the estate of another person, he must have shewn that he had got that estate. If it were an estate which could only be passed by deed as an incorporeal hereditament could only be passed, and could not pass by mere livery, then, inasmuch as he was merely in as general occupant and not by virtue of any deed to shew, he could not plead in a que estate. I believe it will be found that that species of doctrine—whether I have enunciated it with complete accuracy or fullness or not—is the sort of technical reasoning founded on the old feudal doctrines, and is the reason upon which the proposition that there cannot be a general occupant is based. But that reason does not apply in the smallest degree to a special occupant. A special occupant cannot plead the gift of an estate to himself or his ancestors; but he can plead in a que estate, because he can produce the deed which made him special occupant—that is, which made the limitation to him and his heirs, or his executors, as the case may be. Therefore, I do not feel the smallest doubt that there may be a special occupancy of an incorporeal hereditament. And, moreover, I should say, if it were necessary to decide the question—which I do not think it is—that an executor or administrator may be—that is, that it ought to be the decision of the law finally, that an executor or administrator may be a special occupant of a corporeal hereditament. If that be so, I think that an executor or administrator may be special occupant of an incorporeal hereditament. Now, as I have said, it is of very little importance to decide—I mean for the purpose of this case—whether an executor or administrator can be a special occupant either of corporeal or incorporeal hereditaments. If, indeed, both the trustees to whom Mr. Cotton conveyed had died, living the cestuis que vie, inasmuch as he granted it to those trustees and their executors and administrators—if the executors and administrators could not be special occupants, what must be the consequence? Suppose some general occupant seized the estate, I think there would be considerable difficulty. I do not say what the effect would be. You would have to contend that that general occupant was converted into a trustee for the daughters of Mr. Cotton. It is not necessary to go into the details of the question, but very serious difficulty would arise in so holding; and the only reason why I mention it is, that I do not feel it right to pass over any question which has been the subject of argument, without expressing an opinion upon it. In point of fact, the trustees are dead; all the cestuis que vie are dead, and a new lease of the property has been granted to Mr. Northen, Mr. Bewdley Taylor and Mr. Belcombe, their heirs and assigns; and therefore the question does not arise.

tion by the original grant was to Mr. Cotton, his heirs and assigns, and he conveyed to the trustees, their executors, administrators and assigns. I do not think there has been any substantial controversy on the effect of that. I have not the smallest doubt that Mr. Cotton then parted with his whole interest, so far I mean as the legal estate is concerned, and the effect then was simply this—that if matters had still remained in that position—if there were special occupants, the special occupants would be the executors of the trustees. In short, the event of the trustees dying in the lifetime of the cestuis que vie would give no interest to Mr. Cotton in the legal estate. Then the remaining question with regard to one portion of the property which is now the subject of controversy is this. The gift of the beneficial interest was in this form: the trustees were to hold the property (subject to a question to which I shall advert presently) in trust as to one equal third part to pay the rents, issues or profits to Mr. and Mrs. Northen and to any after-taken husband of Mrs. Northen, who was one of the settlor's daughters, during their lives and the life of the survivor of them: "and from and after the decease of such survivor, to pay the same unto and equally amongst all the younger children of the said Mary Ann by the said Francis Northen, or any after-taken husband as should be living at the time of the decease of the said Mary Ann; or if only one younger child, or one child only, upon trust to pay the same to such one younger or only child, their, his or her respective executors, administrators and assigns, respectively at the age of twenty-one years, or day of marriage." That is as to the first third. Then, as I understand, although it is not very fully set out in the bill, the limitation as to the second is to Elizabeth, precisely in the same language; and the remaining third is limited for the benefit of Harriett Cotton, the third daughter, and her husband and children, precisely in the same terms. Now, of course, in creating that trust, as to two at least of the daughters who at that time were unmarried, I mean Elizabeth and Harriett, it was contingent whether they would have any children, and therefore the settlor, as to those two-thirds at least (I do not know how it stood with regard to Mrs. Northen, whether she had then any children or not—I assume she had), but as to Elizabeth, the beneficial gift, the equitable interest, was to her for her life, to any husband she might have for his life, and for the life of the survivor, and then the gift was to children if there should be any. There were none. Of course that was a contingent gift; therefore the settlor had only parted with the beneficial interest contingently on there being children to take; and if there were no children, what was the effect of it? The effect of it unquestionably was, that, so far as he had not parted with it, it remained in himself. It was what is called a resulting trust. But we must not be led into the supposition that a resulting trust is anything more than merely what remains in a man, of the interest which he has not effectually parted with. A resulting trust does not create a new interest when the events turn up in a certain way, but it is simply this: a man parts with his interest in property only contingently; the contingency does not arise on which it was to be parted with, and therefore it remains in him, precisely as it was before the creation of the trust. That appears to be founded on well-known and plain principles. It is not necessary to advert at length to the authorities on a doctrine so clear as that of resulting trust or resulting uses. Where the estate to serve the uses is given to the trustees, but the use is not parted with, it results back and remains in the grantor. In either case it is simply that he retains in himself a certain portion, be it the whole estate or a portion of the estate; he retains in himself a certain interest which he has never parted with at all. I may just advert to one case, to shew that the principle is beyond all controversy. Lomas v. Wright was decided by Sir John Leach, the Master of the Rolls (I happen to recollect it because I was counsel in it). It was a very peculiar case; but Sir John Leach begins his judgment in this way: "If in a grant or devise," because of course it makes no difference whether it is by grant or devise, "if in a grant or devise there be a limitation in fee, which is wholly void, no estate passes, and the use remains in the grantor or results to the heir of the testator. So, if the void limitation be not of the fee, but of a partial interest only, as an estate for life, the use of such partial interest in like manner remains in the grantor or results to the heir of the testator." In short, it is hardly necessary to cite any case for a proposition which is so elementary as that. Then, in this case Mr. Cotton had parted with the whole legal interest. That I conceive is clear. The whole legal interest was out of him; but if he had not parted with any portion of the beneficial interest, whether it were that he had not parted with it at all, even contingently, or had parted with it contingently, and the contingency had never arisen, in either event it would remain where it was. Now the one-third share which was intended for Elizabeth has by reason of her death in the year 1853, leaving no issue, come to be disposed of, and then these questions arise. Is it parted with? First, it is said it is parted with, because it goes to the survivors by the very terms of the deed. I did not think it necessary to call on the counsel for the other parties to argue that question. I am of opinion, upon the argument that was addressed to me, that I cannot determine that the word "survivors" is to be read "others." The events were, that both the sisters died before the third, therefore they were not in the strict sense survivors. But, assuming the question to be whether I can read that word "others,"—no doubt there are many cases in which the word "survivors" has been read "others"—I think the present doctrine is—though I cannot help thinking it would be much more convenient if there were a greater disposition to read the words "survivors" as "others" than there is—the doctrine is, that you must use that term in its ordinary and primary sense, unless you are satisfied that there is something in the will or the instrument which uses the term, that prevents your using it in the primary sense, and requires the application of the secondary meaning to it. It appears to me that in this case, so far from there being any ground which leads to the conclusion that the settlor must have meant to use that term in the sense of "others," the very language used raises a strong indication of a different intention. It is not a case where the gift was to an unascertained class, which might consist of a single individual or of two individuals, or of three, or of more than three; but it is applied to three persons nominatim. The "survivors or survivor" spoken of, must be the "survivors or survivor" of those three persons when either of them dies without leaving issue. Now, if it was meant to use the words "survivors or survivor" in the sense of "others or other," you ought only to use the plural; because it was not certain whether there would only be one other, as in the case of a gift to a family of children. For example, there might be only two; then, if one died, there might be one survivor. But where there are three persons actually named, if one dies leaving no issue, there must be two others. But the language here used, putting aside the difficulty I will mention presently, is this:—"In case any one or more of them, Mary Ann, Elizabeth and Harriett, shall happen to die without leaving children or child as aforesaid, then the part, share, or proportion of her or them so dying shall go and be paid or assigned or transferred in equal shares to the survivors or survivor." It ought to be only "to the survivors"; there must be the two in the sense of the word "others." The use of those words in the plural and in the singular leads me to the supposition that what was in the contemplation of the parties executing the settlement was, that it was to apply to this contingency—that when one died leaving no children, there would be two surviving, in which case you would have the word "survivors" applicable; or there might be only one surviving, in which case you would have the word "survivor" applicable. But it never was meant to apply to the case where one died without leaving any issue, but both the others had already pre-deceased her. Besides that, there is a difficulty in the language which is used. It seems to me that the framer of this instrument in giving (to his clerk probably) instructions to copy in some form, gave him a wrong form, and you have a form applicable to a totally different state of matters. The language is this: "In case any one or more of them, the said Mary Ann, the wife of the said Francis Northen, Elizabeth Cotton and Harriett Cotton, shall happen to die without leaving children or child as aforesaid, then the part, share or proportion of her or them so dying shall go and be paid or assigned and transferred in equal shares to the survivors or survivor of them, in such manner as the parts or shares, or part or share, of the parents or parent are or is directed to be paid or assigned and transferred." He got a clause of survivorship from some instrument, a will or instrument providing for future children, and put in those words, substituting children for parents. It appears to me that in the first place there is nothing on which I can found the conclusion that the intention was to use the words "survivors or survivor" in any than their simple and ordinary and primary sense. Instead of that, I think I find to a certain extent—I do not say it is conclusive—an indication of a contrary intention. Then if "survivors" cannot mean others—in other words, if the families of Mary Ann and of Harriett cannot take the share of Elizabeth under the term "survivors or survivor,"—it is, in effect, undisposed of. Then it appears to me that the plain principle must be applied. It remains in Mr. Vernon Cotton just as the estate which he had at the time when he was making this grant. But how had he that? He had it in such a manner as that, if he had died in the lifetime of the cestui que vie, it would have gone to his heir as special occupant. I think, therefore, that I must hold that the share of Elizabeth goes to the co-heiresses. The three co-heiresses would be Mary Ann, Elizabeth and Harriett. The share of Elizabeth would of course go to her, and, if she died without issue, would go to her sisters as co-heiresses. I understand that that is not in controversy. Of course the co-heiresses will take that share between them.

[The Vice Chancellor then adverted at some length to the question above referred to—being the claim of Mr. Francis Belcombe not to be excluded by the terms of the instrument from taking a share in the third share of Harriett, and after holding that Mr. Belcombe was of necessity excluded by the intention of the parties from taking any such share, which was divisible among the daughters of Harriett, continued as follows :]—

It was also contended that the younger children under this limitation take only for their respective lives; and the case of Doe v. Robinson has been cited, and another authority or two upon the subject, for the purpose of shewing this. No doubt they establish this proposition, that if a man having an estate vested in him during the life of a cestui que vie devises those lands to B. without saying his heirs, executors, or anybody else—the question is, does the testator intend to give his whole interest to B, or does he only intend to give it to B. for B.'s life? In Doe v. Robinson there were no words of inheritance—no words importing that it was to go to executors or administrators; but the property was simply given as a gift to B. There the whole question was, what did the testator intend? And Mr. Justice Bayley pronounced the decision of the Court, saying :—“ If he had a fee-simple estate, and he had so given it to A. without more, what are you to suppose he intended? Only to give him a life estate.” Therefore it was held that he gave, and only meant to give an estate for his life; and that because there were no words of inheritance. If, however, you can find from the other parts of the will that he meant to give A. more than merely an estate for his life, you can give it to him, although you have not the words “ heirs and executors.” If you can find from the context of the will that the testator meant to give him all the estate that the testator had pur autre vie, he would take it by virtue of the intention of the testator expressed in his will; but where not only you find that he has not used those words of limitation which would shew his intention, but you cannot find any such intention in the other parts of the will, what are you to say? That he did not intend it for more than his life. What have you here? And does that apply to the present case? This is not a case where either by the will or by the deed, Mr. Cotton was simply giving A. these lands which he held, without any words either of inheritance or devolution. It is a case in which, having of course the whole legal and equitable estate in himself, he first of all (as it is admitted on all sides) parts with the whole legal interest—but for what purpose? For the purpose of creating beneficial interests in that property, of which he had parted with the legal interest to the trustees. And then, not satisfied with expressing that, after the deaths of his children their children are to take simpliciter, he goes on to declare that they are to leave it to them and their executors and administrators. It is said, yes, but he ought to have said, “ during the life of the cestui que vie,” and because he has not said that, therefore no interest can pass. I do not think that the case of Doe v. Robinson, and other cases cited, really apply to this case at all. Here I have the most unquestionable indication of the settlor's intention, and the question is, what is the meaning of the settlement? The father is saying, “ My object is to make a provision for my children in my lifetime.” What does he mean by making a provision for those children? Making a provision for them, not only during their lives, but for their families after them; and he shews that that is his intention, for in carrying out the settlement he only gives life interests to his children; but then, as any father would, he considers that if he is providing for them, having parted with the whole legal interest, the question would be, did he mean to part with only a beneficial interest during the lives of his own children and the lives of the children's children, and then reserve an interest to himself? I apprehend it is quite plain what the intention is, and that the words limiting the interest to the executors and administrators shew that the testator meant that the trustees were to continue to pay the rents and profits arising from the property after the deaths of the children's children, to the executors or administrators of those children. It appears to me, therefore, that their representatives are entitled to the shares which they held so long as they lived.

 March 17, 26. } SHORE v. SHORE.

Administration of Estate—Tenant for Life and Remainderman—Receiver.

A testator left the whole of his personally to his son absolutely, and his real estate to his son for life, with remainder to his grandson. His debts were to be paid out of his personally, and then out of his realty in aid of the personally. The debts consisted principally of money borrowed in order to make advances to his son, who was a banker. The son kept down the interest upon the debts out of the income of his life estate in the realty for eleven years, and then the bank failed. A dividend was subsequently paid, which was sufficient to satisfy a large portion of the debts:—Held, that the tenant for life was not entitled to be recouped out of the real estate for any sums which he had paid in keeping down the interest upon the debts.

A receiver having been appointed both of the real and personal estate, it was held, that the expenses of such receiver must be borne by the tenant for life.

This suit was instituted for the administration of the estate of Samuel Shore, and for enforcing the trusts of his will. The cause came on for hearing in January 1857, and is reported 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 386.

The case was now heard upon further directions.

The testator, by his will, dated the 6th of August 1836, bequeathed his personal estate, subject to the payment of his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, to his son, Offley Shore; he then gave five legacies of 10,000*l.* each to his five daughters, which he charged upon his real estate; he then devised all his real estate to his son Offley Shore and others, upon trust to raise by sale or mortgage of a competent part thereof so much money as would be sufficient to pay the above-mentioned legacies to his daughters, and also so many of his debts as his personal estate might be insufficient to discharge. He then directed that in case any surplus should remain from such sale or mortgage as aforesaid, his trustees should invest such surplus, and stand possessed thereof upon the same trusts as were in his will declared concerning the real estates remaining unsold, and which were by his said will subjected to the payment of his debts. The first trust of the unsold real estates was for Offley Shore for life, without impeachment of waste, with remainder over, for the benefit of the plaintiff, who was his eldest son; and the testator appointed Offley Shore his sole executor.

The testator died in November 1836, and his will was duly proved by Offley Shore in April 1837.

Offley Shore was a banker at Sheffield, and had borrowed from the testator on behalf of the bank several large sums of money, which the testator himself raised by mortgage and otherwise for the purpose. Offley Shore, as tenant for life of the real estate, kept down the interest upon the testator's mortgage and other debts out of the rents of the real estate, until the 16th of January 1843, when the bank in which Offley Shore was a partner, became bankrupt. On the 11th of May 1843 a receiver was appointed of the rents and profits of the testator's real estate, and the receiver was also directed to proceed to get in the outstanding personal estate. It was then found that the chief part of such personal estate consisted of the debt due from Offley Shore's bank, amounting to 75,000*l.* In March 1844 a petition was presented to the Court of Bankruptcy for leave to prove for the above sum against the bankrupts, and a dividend of above 30,000*l.* was declared upon the debt. On the 5th of April 1847 a decree was made for the sale of the testator's real estate, or of so much thereof as should be necessary to supply any deficiency that might, on settling the accounts, be found to exist in the personally. Portions of the real estate were accordingly sold, and the whole of the debts due from the testator, and the legacies charged upon his real estate were then paid out of the monies arising from the sale of the realty and personally in the hands of the receiver. Until this payment had been made the whole income of the real estate had been absorbed in keeping down the interest; and the question now raised was, whether some portion of the produce of the real estate ought not to be treated as applicable to recoup the tenant for life the interest so paid by him out of his life estate.

Mr. Glasse and Mr. Osborne, for the plaintiff, the tenant in remainder, submitted that the corpus of the personalty ought to be applied in payment of the capital, and not the interest of the debts, and no part of the realty could be applied to recoup the tenant for life what he had paid. The personalty did not, in fact, belong to the bankrupt until the debts were paid; the surplus only belonged to him. Offley Shore was, in fact, the principal debtor, and it was owing to his failure to pay the debts, that there had been the loss of interest, and he could not now claim any equity in his own favour.

Mr. Baily and Mr. H. G. Bagshawe appeared for the assignees of the tenant for life, and contended that the remainderman was not entitled to take the whole of the produce of the real estate, because the tenant for life had lost all the income, which, in fact, he had paid towards keeping down the interest on the debts, and thus relieving the realty. If the personal estate had been got in, it would have been applicable in the first place to pay the interest and then the corpus of the debts, which would have reduced the amount of the debts as well as the interest, and the tenant for life would have had some portion of the interest on the real estate.

Coote v. Lord Milltown, 1 Jo. & Lat. 501.

Sitwell v. Bernard, 6 Ves. 520.

Entwistle v. Markland, Ibid. 528, n.

March 26.—KINDERSLEY, V.C.—The bankruptcy of Offley Shore has given rise to many difficult questions, upon which there is very little direct authority. By the bankruptcy all interest was stopped from running upon the debt due from the firm. If the estate of the bankrupt had been sufficient to pay the debt in full, and there had been a surplus, then there would have been interest also on the debt, but this was not the case. The first dividend upon the debt having been received, it now becomes a question how far and in what way the Court can interfere with respect to the administration of the personal estate in order to work out the equities as between the tenant for life and the remainderman of the real estate. The argument that, in point of fact, the tenant for life is the principal debtor, whose failure has occasioned the loss of the interest on the debts which ought to have relieved his life interest in the realty, would appear at first sight to be irresistible; and if the matter merely rested on that, it would be impossible for me to hold that he would have any right to derive a benefit from his own default. Offley Shore is not only tenant for life himself, but he is the sole executor; and it is the fault of the executor that the debts were not got in. As executor he was bound to get in the personal estate; but, in fact, I am precluded from deciding on this ground from what took place when the cause was before the Court on a previous occasion. It was then insisted that Offley Shore had laid out large sums of money in lasting improvements, which should be borne by the tenant in remainder; and a claim was made on that account for a sum of 14,000*l.* as against the corpus of the estate. On the other hand, there was a claim against Offley Shore as defaulter, and that his life estate in the realty should be applied in discharge of debts, and an arrangement was made that the one claim should be set off against the other. After that arrangement, it would be a violation of the spirit of the order then made in abstract honour and equity, that Offley Shore should be put upon the same footing as if he was a simple executor. Where personal estate is given to one for life, with remainder over, the common equity administered daily as to charges by mortgage and otherwise, is that the income pays interest on the debts, and the corpus pays the capital; and so in real estate liable to debts in aid of personalty where there is a tenant for life and remainderman, the life estate pays the interest, and the remainder pays the capital. But in this case the personalty is given absolutely, and the realty is given to one for life, with remainder over; and the question is, whether the Court will interfere in case the personalty is insufficient to pay the debts, in order to work out the equities between the tenant for life and remainderman, with respect to the mode in which the personalty has been applied? As a general rule, in ordinary cases where the Court is called upon to determine the question it will, although the personal estate is given to one absolutely, administer it in such a manner as to make the income of the personalty pay the interest of the debts, and the corpus of the personalty the principal, because by that means you ascertain how much of the deficiency of the personalty falls on the tenant for life, and how much on the remainderman.

Now we come to the real question in this case. In 1847, that is, eleven years after the death of the testator and four years after the bankruptcy, a dividend was paid, and by that means a portion of the personal estate was got in; and the question is whether, under these circumstances, the whole of that sum is to be applied exclusively in payment of debts. If that amount had been producing income, the income would have gone to pay the interest, and it is said that if it is now applied in payment of the principal of the debts, the tenant for life will get no benefit. The remainderman says it is corpus, and, as such, should be applied in payment of the principal of the debts. It has been contended that there being debts carrying interest, and the bankrupts having now paid a certain sum on account of debts owing to the estate, that money should be applied, first, in repaying to the tenant for life all that he has paid for interest on the debts, and after payment of all the interest, in payment of the capital. No doubt as between debtor and creditor, if A. owes B. a debt consisting partly of interest and partly of principal, and B. receives part payment, he has a right to say he will consider this to be in payment of interest, and not of capital. But here the question is between tenant for life and remainderman; and it is obvious that this contention of the tenant for life is in direct violation of the principle, that the Court will in administering the personalty apply the income in payment of interest and the corpus in payment of capital; and therefore it is impossible to maintain it.

The question then that remains is, whether the 30,000*l.* is to be treated as applicable altogether in discharge of the debts, or am I in any way to apportion it?—whether there is any equity for apportionment, and if so, how it is to be apportioned? Is there to be a pro rata apportionment? No doubt, if it were a case in which the general principles of equity required some such administration, the Court would find its way to do it. In the ordinary case, where personal estate is given to one for life with remainder over, by reason of difficulty in getting in the personalty, or from some other cause, it often becomes necessary to apply some apportioning principle of equity for the purpose of determining how to work out the intention of the testator as to the income the tenant for life should enjoy. In many cases, if you give to the tenant for life the whole income which has accrued, you give him more than he ought to have; for the property may be bearing what may be called an abnormal interest. On the other hand, some property may not be bearing interest at all. In such cases the Court will, in order to work out the intention of the testator, apply some principle to ascertain what is to be regarded as the income of the tenant for life. It is often very difficult to apply that principle, and the point has given rise to many differences of opinion. In Coote v. Lord Milltown, Lord St. Leonards adverted to the necessity of resorting to equity in some particular cases, and there are other cases, such as Sitwell v. Bernard, where the question has been discussed. In order to see how far the principle of those cases can be applied, we must look to the circumstances. During the interval between the testator's death and the bankruptcy everything was done that ought to have been done, except getting in the corpus of the personal estate and paying off the debts; but the interest on the debts due from the estate was kept down by Offley Shore. When the bankruptcy occurred, part of the personal estate which had been bearing interest ceased to do so; and until the bankruptcy it was quite unnecessary to apply the principle.

Suppose a case where personal estate is given to one for life, with remainder over, and after six or seven years a portion of the personal estate becomes suddenly unproductive, would the tenant for life be entitled to say that, although there was no necessity to resort to the equity at the testator's death, yet, when there was personal estate got in, which was entirely corpus, he was entitled to have some of that corpus as part of his income? No case has ever occurred in which the tenant for life has been held entitled to have that made good out of the corpus, and no such claim could be maintained. There is, no doubt, in this case some hardship, but I cannot apply to it any such principle as that which has been contended for. Suppose the converse of the case, and part of the personal estate had been in the hands of bankers, yielding regular interest, which had been received by the tenant for life; if suddenly the corpus of the debt was lost, it would be impossible that the remainderman could come upon the income which has been received by the tenant for life. Upon full consideration of the case, I must decide against the assignees of the tenant for life.

There remains but one other question, which is, whether the receiver's poundage should come out of the rents and profits, i. e. out of the life interest, or be in some way apportioned. It is contended on the part of the tenant for life that it is for the benefit of the remainderman, as well as for the tenant for life, that the receiver was appointed. And the same question has been raised with regard to the expenses of passing the receiver's accounts. It is said it was for the benefit of both parties, and that the costs should be apportioned between the parties. I cannot say that there is not a certain plausibility in the contention; but such a claim was never made before; and it may be answered in this way, that if it becomes necessary to have a receiver, the estate for life is inherently subject to it, and it is the right of the remainderman to have the receiver and to have the ordinary expenses of such appointment paid out of the life estate.

COLLINS v. BURTON.

Voluntary Settlement by an uncertificated Bankrupt—Right of Creditor subsequent to the Bankruptcy to sue—Costs.

P. B., in 1840, became bankrupt, and did not obtain his certificate, and in 1849 had a grant of leasehold property made to him by the Crown. In the same year he settled that property on his sons and his daughters (then unmarried), and their children, but declared no trust in favour of their husbands. The daughters afterwards married, and one of them had children. C. C. was a simple contract creditor of P. B., on a debt subsequent both to the bankruptcy and the settlement, and he filed a bill on behalf of himself and all other unsatisfied creditors of P. B., against the assignees, the trustees of the voluntary settlement, the sons of P. B., and the two daughters and their husbands, and the infant children of one of them, to set aside the settlement. One of the Vice Chancellors made a decree in the plaintiff's favour, but considered that the husbands had no present interest, and that the wives and children were mere volunteers. On appeal to the Lords Justices,—Held, that the plaintiff had no right to sue, he having no judgment, and not being in process of obtaining any, and their Lordships dismissed the bill, with costs, both of the appeal and of the original hearing.

This was an appeal from a decision of Vice Chancellor Stuart, by which he had made a decree in the plaintiff's favour. The facts of the case were, that Philip Barnes (who carried on the business of builder at Norwich) was, on the 5th of December 1829, declared bankrupt, and on the 9th of March 1830 obtained his certificate, but no dividend was ever declared, the debts being 1,500*l.* In March 1840 he was discharged under the Act for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors from debts to the amount of 5,000*l.*, and on the 25th of the same month he was again declared bankrupt, and Mr. Graham was appointed official assignee. On the 10th of August his last examination was adjourned sine die, and he never obtained his certificate. The debts proved were 1,000*l.*

On the 14th of May 1842 he was again discharged from prison, under the Insolvent Debtors Act, his debts amounting to 4,900*l*. In this state of circumstances he became entitled to parcels of building ground at Hastings, for a term of ninety-nine years from the 5th of July 1849, under a grant from the Crown, to himself, his executors, administrators and assigns, dated the 31st of December 1849.

By indenture dated the 12th of September 1850, made between Philip Barnes of the first part, Harriet Ann Barnes and Elizabeth Sedley Barnes of the second part, and Philip Edward Barnes and Robert Mace of the third part, in consideration of natural love and affection for his children, Philip Barnes assigned to Philip Edward Barnes and Robert Mace, their executors, administrators and assigns, the parcels of land comprised in the Crown lease for the residue of the term of ninety-nine years, upon certain trusts in favour of his daughters, the said Harriet Ann Barnes and Elizabeth Sedley Barnes, and their respective children, and of his sons Philip Edward Barnes, Robert Barnes and John Henry Barnes, but no trusts were declared in favour of the husbands of his daughters. Harriet Ann Barnes intermarried with Mr. Taylor on the 22nd of November 1851, and Elizabeth Sedley Barnes intermarried with Mr. Sargeant on the 10th of July 1852.

Two or three years after the date of the settlement Philip Barnes became indebted to Charles Collins in a sum of money by simple contract, and he filed the present bill on behalf of himself and other unsatisfied creditors of Philip Barnes, whose debts had been incurred since the date of the second bankruptcy, praying for a declaration that they were entitled to be paid out of the property comprised in the indenture of the 12th of September 1850; that the property might be sold, and the proceeds administered; also that, if necessary, the indenture of settlement might be declared void as against the assignees under the second bankruptcy, and also against the plaintiff and the other subsequent creditors; and for a receiver of the rents and profits, and an injunction against the trustees of the settlement. The defendants were Burton, the creditors' assignee, and Graham, the official assignee under the second bankruptcy; the trustees of the settlement; the sons of Philip Barnes; and the two daughters, Mrs. Taylor and Mrs. Sargeant, and their husbands, and the infant children of Mr. and Mrs. Taylor.

When the case was heard, before Vice Chancellor Stuart, on the 9th of June, in making a decree in the plaintiff's favour, his Honour referred to the arguments urged in the case, in delivering the following judgment:—"The case is not only clear, but gross. Barnes was an uncertificated bankrupt, and he had also taken the benefit of the Insolvent Debtors Act, his creditors getting nothing, and to this day having got nothing. In this state of circumstances he acquires valuable property under an agreement with the Crown. Having acquired this property, he settles part of it upon two of his daughters and their children. The question is, as to the rights of these two daughters and their children, and the two husbands whom these two daughters have married since they acquired their rights under the voluntary settlement—what rights these persons have against the assignees of the bankrupt and the plaintiff and his other creditors; and I am clearly of opinion they have none. It has been suggested that they were purchasers for valuable consideration. It is impossible that the daughters and their children can have been purchasers for valuable consideration; but it is said that their husbands married them on the faith of the settlement being valid, and that they, therefore, were purchasers for valuable consideration. That is the way Mr. Osborne puts it, because the husbands contracted a marriage on the faith of this being a valid settlement. If the husbands were now in possession of any part of the property, they might possibly, upon the authority of some of the cases, say they were purchasers for valuable consideration. It is not necessary to enter upon that, because the husbands have no present interest; the wives and children, who were mere volunteers, are volunteers still. One can hardly conceive any possible ground upon which the defence in this case can be founded, unless it be that topic which was insisted on very much by Mr. Osborne, that the present plaintiff has no right to sue. That involves a question of a very different kind—a question of some interest and importance. The plaintiff was a mere simple contract creditor, and was not a creditor at the date of this voluntary settlement. It is well settled as the doctrine of this Court, that, in order to set aside a settlement as a fraud against creditors, the person who complains must be a person who was a creditor at the time, and whose interests and rights were interrupted by the effect of the settlement. The present defendants say, with perfect truth, that he was not a creditor at the time, and it was asked upon what ground there can be cause to set aside this voluntary settlement? But that is not the whole argument in this case. There are before the Court the assignees of the bankrupt, and the right of the assignees to set aside the settlement, and to have this property applied to pay the debts of the bankrupt is perfectly clear. The right of the plaintiff in consequence of the bankruptcy, upon the doctrine on which Tucker v. Hernaman (1) was decided, is, that out of assets acquired by the bankrupt since his bankruptcy, his creditors have a right to be paid. It is very true, if the bankruptcy had not intervened, they would have had great difficulty in establishing their claim. But the bankruptcy having intervened, and the assignees being before the Court, and the plaintiff having a primary right to payment, though in a sense not a primary right to sue, the plaintiff is in the position of a person coming here to recover property which is held by the assignees in trust for him and the other creditors. This is a case in which the right to sue is plain and cannot be disputed. The primary right to sue is in the assignees, and the primary right to payment is in the plaintiff. I am, therefore, of opinion that I must declare that this settlement, as against the creditors of the bankrupt and the plaintiff, is fraudulent and void, and must be set aside; and that the property included in it ought to be sold. I give no costs against the defendants, who are innocent parties. The accounts of the creditors and the rest can be arranged at chambers. I can give the trustees no costs."

From this decision the parties interested under the settlement appealed.

The case was argued at considerable length, but the questions are so fully discussed in the judgment that further reference to them here is unnecessary.

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Jolliffe, for the plaintiff, supported the decree.

Mr. Osborne, for the appellants.

Mr. Malins and Mr. Southgate, for the assignees.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE. — Mr. Jolliffe has very properly conceded, reasonably and unavoidably conceded, that if there had not been any bankruptcy, and no passing through the Insolvent Court, on the part of Philip Barnes, the present bill could not have been maintained; because it is by a general simple contract creditor of Barnes's, on behalf of himself and other simple contract creditors, the plaintiff not alleging that he has obtained any judgment, decree or order, or that he is in the process or course of obtaining any. The question is, whether the bankruptcy—for we need only look to that—the second bankruptcy, makes any difference. There were two bankruptcies and two insolvencies. There was a certificate made under the first bankruptcy; the question is, whether the second bankruptcy makes any difference. The bankrupt is uncertificated under it, and incurred debts afterwards, and amongst the debts so incurred was the debt of the present plaintiff; and he suggests that the assignees under the second bankruptcy owe him a duty—the duty of pursuing the settled property, of which it is the object of this suit to defeat the settlement, for the purpose of enabling payment to be made to him. Now, I do not see that any such duty exists. In the first place, the property is so circumstanced, is of such a particular description, that the assignees are not bound to take it; they are entitled, if they will, to reject it. But still more, the case made by the bill is one of a title to have this property applied to the payment of those creditors, of whom the plaintiff is one, adversely to the assignees, in the sense of being paramount to them. I cannot conceive, therefore, that the assignees owe, on the statements of this bill, this plaintiff any duty whatever; at all events, such a duty as would enable the plaintiff, by reason of its non-performance, to associate those who claim under the impeached settlement with them as co-defendants, as joining in effect and substance in a breach of trust. There can be no such case. With regard to the substantial merits of the case—what is it? The bankrupt incurs a simple contract debt whilst he is uncertificated; but before he has done so, two or three years before he has incurred this debt, though after the bankruptcy, he has settled certain property. Prima facie, a creditor whose debt originated after the settlement, can have no right to complain of it, even independently of the difficulty of the general creditor of a living man not having obtained a judgment, decree or order seeking to make his property available to it. Generally speaking, a creditor cannot complain of an act done by the debtor with respect to his property, except for the purpose of obtaining the execution before the debt accrues. There may be special and particular circumstances which may enable a creditor to complain of an act done before his debt accrued, but there are no such special or particular circumstances here; and I am at a loss to see any ground, direct or indirect—any ground, primary or secondary—upon which the present plaintiff is entitled, upon the allegations in this bill, even assuming for the purpose of the argument the truth of every one of them, to sue those who claim under the settlement. Whether he has a right to sue the assignees is, in truth, an immaterial question of which we need not dispose, because the assignees are friendly to him, and co-operate with him, and there is no dispute between them. I am of opinion that, if every word in this bill were proved, it would not sustain this suit. I think there are many words which, although proved, do not assist the plaintiff's case.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—I am of the same opinion. There is nothing to entitle the plaintiff to any personal rights which are asked by virtue of the debt which is due to him, or any judgment which this plaintiff may have obtained. He is suing here on behalf of himself and all the other creditors in bankruptcy, not founding himself on any judgment that he has recovered in the bankruptcy. What is the state of the case? This is a bill by persons who claim adversely to the assignees and whose title is adverse to the assignees against persons who also claim an adverse title to the assignees. I confess I have never heard of such a bill being maintained in this court. It is attempted to maintain it on the ground that the assignees are trustees for subsequent creditors, and that the settlement trustees are trustees for the assignees. Those positions fail on both points. Whether in this court they might not maintain a bill by subsequent creditors for a right to sue in the name of the assignees, that is not the question before us. But clearly, till this Court has made its decree constituting and declaring the priority of the subsequent creditors over the creditors under the bankruptcy, the assignees are not trustees for the subsequent creditors; and equally clearly the trustees of the settlement are not trustees for the assignees until the Court has set aside the settlement. Both positions, therefore, on which the plaintiff seeks to maintain this bill altogether fail, and this bill must be dismissed, and I think dismissed with costs, except as against the assignees, of the hearing originally, and upon the appeal.

Mr. Jolliffe.—The plaintiff appears before your Lordships in the performance of his bounden duty to support the decree made in his favour, and your Lordships will scarcely so far depart from the ordinary practice of the Court in such circumstances as to make him pay the costs, although you differ from the learned Judge in the court below.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—Yes; the tendency of modern decisions has been more and more that way; and in the Judicial Committee it has now become the general rule, unless something is said expressly to the contrary; I also believe it has been done here more and more of late years. The opposite practice has been given up in the Judicial Committee for the last ten years, and even more.

March 19. } DAY v. DAY.

Administration of Estate—Calls upon Railway Shares.

A testator, by his will, gave (after the death of his wife) any shares in railways, mines or other undertakings that might belong to him at his decease, to his second son, and in case of his death without issue the same to revert to his two other children. The testator was possessed of railway shares upon which, after his death, calls were made. The calls were paid by his widow, as executrix, and the company had power to make further calls. The residue was not sufficient to meet these calls. The Court directed a sale of the shares by the executrix, who was to retain the sums already paid by her for calls, and to invest the residue in consols, the dividends of which were to be paid to her for life; without prejudice to the question out of what fund the calls already paid were ultimately to be borne.

This suit was instituted for the administration of the estate of Edward H. Day, the plaintiff being his widow, Mary Day, and the defendants the children and grandchildren of the testator interested under the will. A question was now raised upon an adjourned summons from chambers, as to the payment of calls upon certain railway shares comprised in the bequests of the will. The testator, by his will, dated the 18th of July 1856, directed his debts to be paid by his executors. He then gave to his wife his freehold, leasehold and other property for her life, and after her decease he gave, devised and bequeathed a freehold house, specifically mentioned, to his eldest son, Edwin Day, and his lawful heirs. To his second son, Horace, and his lawful heirs, the testator gave and bequeathed his leasehold house at Brixton, and to him he also gave any shares in railways, mines or other undertakings that might belong to him at his decease, and in case of the death of his said son without lawful issue, what he devised to him was to revert to his eldest son Edwin and his daughter Ellen, and their respective lawful issue, in equal shares. To his daughter Ellen and her lawful issue he gave and bequeathed certain houses therein mentioned, and the residue of all money, furniture and other property not specified in his will. The testator appointed three persons his executors, who renounced the trust; and letters of administration, with the will annexed, were granted to the plaintiff, the widow of the testator.

The testator died on the 4th of June 1858, leaving his three children mentioned in the will, surviving.

The testator, at the time of his decease, was possessed of or entitled to certain real and personal estate, including a number of railway shares, in various companies, of considerable value, and amounting to more than sufficient for the payment of all his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses.

After his decease two calls were made upon some of the railway shares, which were paid by the plaintiff, amounting respectively to the sums of 70*l.* and 175*l.*, and the railway company had power to make further calls, to the extent of 2*l.* 10*s.* per share, every three months. Upon the accounts in the suit being taken before the chief clerk, a question was raised out of what fund the calls were to be paid, or whether they were to be sold by the administratrix.

Mr. Walford appeared on behalf of the plaintiff, and submitted that the railway shares ought to be sold, and that the calls already paid by the widow should be repaid to her. There were three classes of cases where the Court had directed a sale of property either belonging to infants or subject to trusts, for the purpose of raising a fund to satisfy particular payments: first, for the purpose of paying fines upon renewal of leases; secondly, for paying costs of a suit; and, thirdly, for paying premiums upon policies of insurance. The principal authorities in support of this construction, were—

KINDERSLEY, V.C. said he thought the Court had power to direct a sale of the shares, and that it was the most desirable course to be taken under the circumstances. An order was accordingly made that the plaintiff, as the administratrix of the testator, should be at liberty to sell the railway shares referred to in the summons, and out of the monies arising from such sale, to pay all the costs and expenses attending such sale, and then to retain thereout the sums of 70*l.* and 175*l.* paid by her for calls on the said shares, as appeared by her affidavits and to invest the residue of such purchase-monies in the 3*l.* per cent. consols. in the name of the Accountant General, in trust in this cause, the dividends to be received by the plaintiff from time to time until further order; this order to be without prejudice to the question by whom, out of what fund or property, or in what manner the calls so paid by the plaintiff ought ultimately to be borne.

Will—“Eldest Male Lineal Descendant”—Primogeniture or Age.

A testator (who at the time of making his will had three sons living), after devising estates to trustees, and directing accumulations, &c., appointed a time at which the estates were to be divided into three portions, and one was to be conveyed to the “eldest male lineal descendant” then living of the testator’s eldest son. At the appointed time two persons were living who filled the character of “male lineal descendant.” One was a youth who was eldest in point of primogeniture: the other, his uncle, who was eldest in point of age:—Held, that, under the words of the will, the former was entitled to have the estate conveyed to him.

This was an appeal from the Court of Chancery; and the question was, whether, according to the true construction of the will of Peter Thellusson, who died on the 21st of July 1797, the appellant, who was born on the 10th of December 1801, and was the only surviving son of Peter Isaac, first Lord Rendlesham, the testator’s eldest son, answered the description of the “eldest male lineal descendant” of the testator’s son Peter Isaac, or whether the respondent, Lord Rendlesham, who was born on the 9th of February 1840, and was the only son of the appellant’s elder brother Frederick, third Lord Rendlesham, answered that description.

The testator, Peter Thellusson, devised all his real estates to trustees, upon trusts, and gave the residue of his personal estate to the same trustees, upon trust to invest the same in the purchase of real estate of inheritance upon the same trusts. These trusts were, in substance, to accumulate the rents and profits during the lives of his three sons, Peter Isaac, George Woodford, and Charles, and of their sons, and the issue of such sons of the testator’s three sons living at or born in due time after his death, and after the death of the survivor of such several persons to make an equal partition of the trust premises; and he directed that the whole thereof should be divided into three lots of equal value, or as near thereto as possible; and that one of such allotments should be conveyed to the "eldest male lineal descendant" then living of his eldest son, Peter Isaac Thellusson, in tail male, with remainder to the second, third, fourth, and all and every other male lineal descendant or descendants then living (who should be incapable of taking as heir in tail male of any of the persons to whom a prior estate was thereby directed to be limited) of his son Peter Isaac Thellusson, successively in tail male, with remainder in equal moieties to the eldest and every other male lineal descendant or descendants of his sons George Woodford Thellusson and Charles Thellusson; that another of such lots should be conveyed to the use of the eldest male lineal descendant of George Woodford Thellusson, with like remainders over; and that the third and remaining lot should be conveyed to the use of the eldest male lineal descendant of Charles Thellusson, in like manner.

Charles Thellusson the younger, a son of the testator's youngest son Charles, was the last survivor of the testator's sons, and of such of their sons as were living at or born in due time after his death. He died on the 5th of February 1856, and, there not having been any issue of such sons of the testator's sons living at or born in due time after the testator's death, the period for partition then arrived, but in consequence of the failure of male lineal descendants of George Woodford Thellusson, the testator's second son, the trust property became divisible into two lots only, the first of which was, by the direction of the testator's will, to be conveyed to the "eldest male lineal descendant" of the testator's eldest son, Peter Isaac Thellusson, the other to the "eldest male lineal descendant" of the testator's youngest son, Charles Thellusson.

The appellant claimed, as eldest male lineal descendant of the said Peter Isaac Thellusson, to be entitled to have one of the lots conveyed to him.

The respondent, Lord Rendlesham, on the other hand, contended that, though he was younger than the appellant in age, he was the eldest male descendant of the said Peter Isaac Thellusson, according to the true construction of the testator's will, as being son of the appellant's elder brother, and therefore older in blood.

There was a clause in the will, regulating the presentation to the advowsons, which were in the gift of the testator. As this clause was referred to in argument, as affording an illustration which might assist in arriving at the testator's real meaning in the phrase "eldest male lineal descendant," it is here inserted.

"And with respect to the said advowson, and any other advowson, right of patronage and presentation belonging to any other estate that may hereafter be purchased by my said trustees, or the survivors or survivor of them, or any future trustees or trustee to be appointed as hereinbefore mentioned, I order and direct that my said trustees do and shall, when and as the same shall respectively be or become void or vacant, present a fit and proper person thereto, who shall for that purpose be nominated by one of my said sons in rotation, the eldest having the first nomination, and the like nomination to be made by the eldest male lineal descendant of my said three sons respectively, in the order and rotation aforesaid, if he be capable by law of making such nomination when the church becomes vacant, or in due time afterwards; otherwise the eldest male lineal descendant of the next brother is to present to such living; and in case it shall so happen that when such living or livings shall respectively become void, or in due time afterwards, no male lineal descendant of any of my said sons shall be capable of presenting thereto, I direct my said trustees, or the survivors or survivor of them, or such future trustees or trustee for the time being, to present to such living or livings respectively."

When the case came before the Master of the Rolls, his Honour intimated an opinion that the question had, in fact, been already decided by the Lord Chancellor and by this House in the various suits which had already been instituted with relation to this will; and that unless he was to overrule the decision in Oddie v. Woodford (1), which he felt he had no authority to do, he must act upon and be bound by it. His Honour therefore made a decree, declaring that Baron Rendlesham was the person who, at the time of the decease of Charles Thellusson, answered the description in the will contained of the "eldest male lineal descendant" of the testator's eldest son (2).

This was an appeal against that decree.

The case was twice argued: in July 1858 and in February 1859, and on both occasions, in the presence of the Judges.

Sir R. Bethell and Mr. Selwyn, for the appellant, contended that the words of the will must receive their ordinary meaning; and that "eldest," therefore, must be treated as first in age of those lineal male descendants who were living at the time when the division of the property was to take place. This was plainly the intention of the testator in the advowson clause, and must be taken to have been his intention throughout. They cited and commented on the following authorities:—

The Solicitor General (Sir H. Cairns) was heard for the next-of-kin, to contend that this provision of the will was void for uncertainty. He cited Gooch v. Gooch (3).

Mr. G. L. Russell, Mr. Faber, Mr. Bromehead, Mr. Renshaw, Mr. Young, Mr. Macnaghten and Mr. Chapman Barber appeared for other parties.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (who, though presiding, had taken no part in the hearing, as he had been, while at the bar, counsel in the cause) put the following questions to the Judges:—

First, whether the devise by the testator of his lands, tenements and hereditaments, after the decease of the several persons during whose lives the rents and profits of the same are directed to be accumulated (if it had been a devise of legal estates) to the eldest male lineal descendant then living of Peter Isaac Thellusson, George Woodford Thellusson, and Charles Thellusson respectively, in tail male, is capable of an intelligible construction, or is void for uncertainty?

Secondly, if at the time directed by the testator for the division of the estate into three lots, and for conveyances to be made thereof, Peter Isaac Thellusson had had three sons, all of whom were dead, and the eldest of the three sons had left a son under age, and the second son had left a son of twenty-one years of age, and the third son had left a son of thirty years of age, and supposing it had been a devise of legal estates, which of the sons of the three sons would have been entitled to one of the lots?

April 16, 1859.—BYLES, J.—My Lords, it would savour of presumption in me to apologize to your Lordships for the brevity of my replies to the questions propounded by your Lordships to the Judges; but lest I should be thought guilty of disrespect, or want of duty to the House, I may perhaps be pardoned for stating, that almost immediately on the conclusion of the arguments I was compelled to leave town for the Northern Circuit, from which I have but just returned, and only received your Lordships' summons at a late hour yesterday afternoon.

In answer to the first question, and for the reasons given in answer to the second, I am of opinion that the devise is capable of an intelligible construction, and is not void for uncertainty.

(3) 3 De Gex, M. & G. 366; s. c. 21 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 238; 22 Ibid. 1089; 14 Beav. 565.

In answer to the second question, I am of opinion that the words "eldest male lineal descendant then living" indicate the person who at the period of distribution should answer the description of heir male of the body.

The learned counsel for the appellant contend, that they indicate the one of all the descendants in the male line who should be the most advanced in years. Call, they say, all the male lineal descendants into a room, and choose the eldest person there. He is the eldest male lineal descendant in the popular and obvious sense of those words. A plain unlettered man, they add, would think this the natural and obvious construction of the words; and the question is, not what construction a lawyer would give to the words, but what a plain man, such as the testator, would understand by them.

But here seems to me to lurk the capital fallacy in the appellant's argument. In what language is this will written? Is it written in popular and colloquial English, or is it written in the technical, I had almost said the scientific, language of the law? It is not necessary to look beyond the four corners of the instrument to see that it is conceived in language strictly and eminently technical, that it is penned by a lawyer, that it is addressed to lawyers, and intended to be understood by lawyers in a legal and technical sense.

It may be, and no doubt was the fact, that the testator was not a lawyer; but, if so, he must have retained a lawyer, and in that case the true question is not so much, What did the testator mean? as, What did the penman whom he retained to express his intentions mean? A testator who retains a conveyancing counsel to draw his will, disposing of large property, with various and complicated provisions, has a very obscure, cloudy, and imperfect conception of the details of the instrument; but his counsel has a very clear and perfect one; and the testator is bound by the intention of his counsel, to be collected from the will. His counsel is, as it were, his translator, and the formal existing translation of the testator's instructions into technical language is the only will. It is the language of a lawyer addressed to lawyers. Its technical sense is its strict primary acceptance.

It seems to me, therefore, that the question is, not what an unlettered layman meant, or what an unlettered layman would understand by this devise, but what a lawyer meant and what a lawyer would understand.

Now, could any lawyer, looking at the will, deem it probable that the testator, or his counsel, in founding a family, meant, (without any clear indication of such an intention) to disregard the ordinary course of limitation when indicating the first taker, though he religiously adhered to that course in the subsequent limitations; and not only so, but that, instead of the ordinary and usual course, he should substitute a novel, gratuitous, capricious, and unreasonable one; that he meant that the estate should go, first, perhaps, to a very distant descendant, then to a very near one, and then, perhaps, to an intermediate one?

No doubt, if the language of the devise clearly indicates an intention so capricious and unreasonable, that intention must prevail. But surely, when one considers that this is a will framed by a lawyer, and addressed to lawyers, the intention must appear very plainly. Now, does the language indicate such an intention?

What is the meaning of the word "eldest" in the phrase "eldest male lineal descendant"? The word eldest may have different meanings, but its meaning here is most satisfactorily ascertained, if it can be collected from the will itself; and it seems to me, not only that it can be collected, but that it is clearly shewn by the will itself. The word "eldest" is correlative to the words "second, third, and fourth," and the words "second, third, and fourth" are the correlatives of the word "eldest." If so, then the word "eldest" means first, and the phrase "eldest male lineal descendant" means "first male lineal descendant." Now, if the words had been "first male lineal descendant," at least the appellant's interpretation regarding the personal age of the individual could have found no place.

But, besides this, in the strict propriety of the English language, the word "eldest," (though its etymology be the same,) is not synonymous with the word "oldest"; for the word "eldest" does not necessarily or even primarily import eldest in personal age. According to Dr. Johnson, its primary meaning is "oldest, that has the right of primogeniture," and its secondary meaning is, "the person that has lived most years"; and surely this primary sense of the word is as agreeable to the context as any other. Therefore it should seem that the word "eldest," here taken in its strict and primary acceptance, means "eldest" in the order of primogeniture, not eldest in personal age.

But even supposing the word "eldest" to be synonymous with oldest, it is by no means clear that it is to be taken out of its place, and read with the word "descendant," as if it immediately preceded that substantive, and qualified it, and it only. On the contrary, it may well and more naturally be considered as part of a compound adjective, composed of the three words, eldest, male and lineal. So read, it qualifies the word lineal, as well as the word descendant, denoting no less the oldest line than the oldest descendant in that line.

It has been objected, that if the penman of the will had meant heir male of the body he would have said so. But the formulæ using this term which have been presented to your Lordships are far more circumlocutory and less compendious than the testator's expression, and perhaps at the time the will was drawn the use of the word heir was not deemed preferable for safety and perspicuity, it being the testator's intention to create estates by purchase.

The parenthesis which excludes from the right to a conveyance the heirs in tail male of the donees in tail male is a precaution quite consistent with this construction, for without that precaution the trustees might have been called on to execute conveyances granting estates by purchase in remainder to a multitude of persons, who, looking to the possible future cases of forfeiture by the ancestor, or debts of the ancestor, and fines levied, might deem it advantageous to have an estate tail in remainder by purchase as well as an estate tail by inheritance.

The clause relating to the right of presentation seems to me to fortify this construction. Lord Eldon seems to have thought that it contemplated a supposed disability from infancy. If so, then the testator seems to speak of an infant as eldest male lineal descendant, though in the next line there be a male lineal descendant of full age.

For these and other reasons of minor importance it seems to me, even if the case were not affected by any authority, that the construction for which the respondents contend is obviously and clearly the true construction.

But the authorities to which your Lordships' attention has already been directed seem to me to lead to the same conclusion.

WATSON, B.—My Lords, in answer to the first question submitted to the Judges, I am of opinion that the devise is not void for uncertainty, but capable of an intelligible construction. The construction of wills and of all written documents is by law vested in the Judges, who are bound to put a construction and interpret the true meaning of all words in the English language used in any written document. Much doubt and difficulty often occur in ascertaining the proper meaning of words; but whatever doubt or difficulty occurs, the Court or Judge is to ascertain and determine the sense in which particular words or phrases are used. It is not because there is much obscurity or difference of opinion in the construction of a will that therefore it is void. In this particular case I think that the devise in question is perfectly intelligible. Indeed I consider that the objection on the ground of uncertainty is determined by the case of Thellusson v. Woodford (4).

(4) 4 Vcs. 227, 326.

In answer to the second question submitted to the Judges, I am of opinion that the son of the eldest of the three sons, as mentioned in the question, would be entitled to one of the lots. The scheme and object of the will are unusual. It is to create an accumulation of a large property, and then to divide the fund into three shares, to be distributed equally between the three sons of the testator at the termination of the accumulation upon the death of the last life. The plan was eccentric; but the will, framed for the purpose of effectuating it, does not betray any eccentricity, but elaborately works out that object. The clause on which this question turns abounds with legal phraseology, and contains all the legal terms used for the limitation of estates. The conveyance is to be made of one allotment "to the eldest male lineal descendant then living" of Peter Thellusson. Looking at these words, it is difficult to think that the testator meant the eldest in point of age. The words "eldest descendant," or "eldest male descendant," might, if the rest of the will supported it, bear such a construction. But effect must be given to the word "lineal"; and, taking the words "eldest male lineal descendant," I think it means the descendant who takes in the ordinary line of descent. It is worthy to be observed, that in no part of the will are the words "male descendant" or "eldest male descendant" used without the word "lineal."

The remainder to the second, third, fourth, "and all and every other male descendant or descendants then living, successively in tail male," is most important, in this view. Hence it would appear that the testator used the word "eldest" as synonymous with the word "first," and it would then be read "first male lineal descendant," and would render the sense intelligible.

It has been urged that these words might be read, the second in point of age, and the third in point of age. But there is nothing in this or in any other part of the will to shew that the words of number were used in any other than in their ordinary sense, and as they are commonly used in limitations in deeds and wills. It is to be observed that the testator limited estates in tail male in his lineal descendants, and in the devise over he designates the extinction of such estates as "failure of male lineal descendants." In fact, the testator's object was, that there should be, as near as could be, estates tail male in each lot in his three sons.

My Lords, I do not think the advowson clause throws any light on the case. Although the precise point has never been directly decided, although in Thellusson v. Woodford, and Oddie v. Woodford, it was not necessary to decide this, the main question on the will, yet we have the opinions of Mr. Justice Buller and Lord Eldon on the points now in question, and which are entitled to the greatest possible consideration.

For these reasons, and for the reasons and opinions expressed by those great lawyers, I have come to the conclusion that the son of the eldest son mentioned in the second question would be entitled to this lot.

BRAMWELL, B.—My Lords, in this case, as in others of a similar description, the question is, what intention has the testator expressed by the words he has used; in effect, what is the meaning of those words, that is, the natural and primary meaning?

Now I do not agree with Sir Richard Bethell, that this will is to be construed without reference to legal learning, for the will was drawn by one who undoubtedly had a knowledge of the craft. But I agree that the case ought to be considered without any prepossession, professional or otherwise, arising out of the ordinary practice of preferring the person who would be heir male to all others. Indeed the scheme of the will makes any other disposition quite as probable. I take that to have been, to found three families, owners of large property; and for that purpose to postpone the period of enjoyment as far as possible, the testator having no care or concern for any individual in particular, so that the more uncertain he made the person who was to take, the more likely he made it that its enjoyment would not be anticipated, and so the larger would be the property to descend. But I think this argument in itself of the smallest value, and worthless, when it is borne in mind that the uncertainty would have been still greater had he named the youngest male lineal descendant as taker. And a consideration of at least equal force points the other way, viz., one or more of his descendants might acquire (as is the case) a title. If the testator thought of this, he probably would have wished the fortune to go with it. But perhaps this did not occur to him; perhaps he did not wish the two to go together. This is mere speculation.

The words themselves then must be construed. They are, "eldest male lineal descendant." The person or thing named is a descendant. The other words are used to indicate a quality or qualities which he must possess. Now "male lineal" has been construed to mean as though it were one word, signifying "male in a line of males." With this construction I entirely agree; and I agree that it may be read as though it were a compound word, "male line." It remains to construe the word "eldest." It may seem a very simple mode, but I cannot help considering the case thus:—"eldest" is an adjective; it describes a quality; it must belong to some substantive. What substantive is there in this sentence? One only, "descendant"; with that then it ought to agree. It is true that if "male lineal" is read "male line"

another substantive is introduced; but it is used adjectively to describe a quality, and surely it is not a reasonable construction, when there is a substantive in a phrase ready for an adjective to agree with, to hold that the adjective, instead of agreeing with it, agrees with a substantive, produced out of another adjective, and itself used adjectively. The phrase seems to me like this, "a strong iron bridge"; that means a strong bridge made of iron, not a bridge made of strong iron; and the meaning would be the same if the phrase were a "strong iron-made bridge," the words "iron made" being connected, like "male line," and containing in like way a substantive. I have been asked, Suppose a man said he went over a "Scotch iron bridge," what would he mean? I answer that must depend on circumstances. If, speaking in India, he said he had done it on that day, he must mean a bridge of Scotch iron; but if the conversation had been about the iron bridges of different countries, and he said that he had done it a year ago, I should understand that he meant a bridge in Scotland. It seems to me, therefore, that the natural construction of the phrase is to couple "eldest" with "descendant," and read it as though it were "eldest and male lineal descendant."

Then the primary meaning of "eldest" is oldest; most old, most aged; nor do I think any of the instances given shew that the word is used in any other sense; eldest man or descendant is the one who has existed for the greatest number of years. Eldest male line is that male line which has existed the greatest number of years. Eldest parent may mean eldest in age, or eldest quâ parent. But though, therefore, "eldest" in the phrase "eldest male line," if coupled with line, may well be said to be used in its primary sense, so also "eldest" must be so construed when coupled with "descendant." This, therefore, would go to shew that the phrase meant "that descendant in the male line who is oldest in age or years."

I understand Lord Eldon thought this to be the natural meaning of the phrase, standing by itself. Is there then anything in the context inconsistent with this? It is said that the subsequent mention of two, three, four, and other male lineal descendants shews that "eldest" is used synonymously with "first," and that first means worthiest, that is, the heir. To this I do not agree. The first word used is "eldest." I take the next word, "second," to mean second eldest, and so on. It is said, "second eldest" is not grammar; there can only be one "eldest." I do not agree in that. I suppose it would be good grammar to say, "A, B. and C are the three oldest men in the parish." If not, is it right to say "the eldest three"? No; for that supposes some division into threes. Must we then have a long periphrasis to describe the idea? Would it be wrong to say, "that Wellington and Napoleon were the greatest generals of this century"? But the objection, if well founded, vanishes by reading "second" as meaning "second in age." It is said that this is to interpolate a word there, viz., "eldest" or "age." Even if so, that is as legitimate as to turn "eldest" into "first"; but the objection is altogether unfounded. In the first place, the word is not interpolated by this construction; that is to say, it is not said the word ought to be there; it is only said that "second" is equivalent to "second eldest." But further, the respondents' construction does interpolate a word; they read the phrase "eldest male lineal descendant" as though it were "eldest male line eldest descendant," or, rather, "first male line eldest descendant." It is in vain to say that the law would add that second "eldest" for him. Perhaps so; and had the testator said he meant his "descendant in the eldest male line," probably the law would have intended that to mean "the eldest descendant"; but such an expression is not a natural one. The natural expression, if the testator had meant what the respondents say he did, supposing he had used something like the phrase in question, would have been "eldest male lineal eldest descendant." I find nothing, therefore, inconsistent with what seems to me the obvious and natural construction. So I should have thought some of the phrases suggested by the appellant's counsel more natural than the one in question to express the intention that the respondents contend for. But, on the other hand, I cannot see why, if the testator meant what the appellant says he did, he should not have said "eldest male descendant in a male line."

Is there then anything else in the will to explain this phrase? I think the parenthesis affords a clue. No doubt it may have been put in ex majori cautela, but it is to be taken to be operative, and consequently to except what otherwise would have been included. Then, but for the parenthesis, "eldest male lineal descendant," "second and third" might have included grandfather, father, son; while an uncle would have been fourth, and his son fifth. Now, it is not conceivable that the testator considered the son of an eldest son to be "second" in preference to his uncle, older than himself. How could such a son make a male line second to his father's? The respondents read the will thus:—"The first male line descendant is to take; that is, the eldest descendant of the first male line, then the second male line, that is, the eldest descendant of that line; but for my parenthesis I should mean by this the heir male of my eldest son as the first taker, and his eldest son as the second, because that is the natural meaning of second male line." But it is not the natural meaning. The testator, therefore, must have made the parenthetical exception because he had some other meaning, and not that which the respondents contend for.

Again, if eldest male lineal descendant is to be read first male lineal first descendant, the word "first" doing double duty, so second should be read "second male lineal second descendant," which cannot be.

Again, the advowson clause affords a clue to the meaning of these words. The testator, after providing for the eldest male lineal descendant in each son having successively the right of nomination, says, the trustees are to present, if "no male lineal descendant" of any of the sons shall be capable, not saying, no "eldest male lineal descendant." It would seem, therefore, that he thought that if no eldest male was capable, then no male would be. Now, the only reason, right or wrong, which could have suggested this to him, was that an infant could not present, and that if the eldest male lineal descendants were infants, all the rest must be, which could only be on the supposition that eldest meant eldest in point of age.

But I do not much rely on this. I take the phrase itself, and endeavour to find out its natural meaning, without any prepossession, professional or otherwise. I take that to be the right course. I know no better rule to be acted upon in these cases than that stated by Lord Cranworth, in Grey v. Pearson, nor a stronger illustration of its application than Trevor v. Trevor, where words used by a testator had their natural meaning given to them, though that meaning led to unusual results, which, a priori, would not be expected. It seems to me that the natural and ordinary sense of the words here used, is that which I attribute to them, and that the respondents' construction is unnatural and forced, and without sufficient reason for its being preferred. I cannot do better on this point than refer your Lordships to Lord Eldon's argument, the very elaboration and ingenuity of which to my mind makes it suspicious.

I have not referred to authorities. No question of law is involved, and the rule of construction to be applied is not doubtful.

I answer then your Lordships' second question first; viz., I think the son of the third son would have been entitled. Of course I answer the first, that I think the devise is capable of an intelligible construction, and not void for uncertainty. Nor can I say, contingently, that if my answer to the second question is not adopted, it would be so void, as I should say it must then mean what the respondents say it does. I should only think it void, if I had determined that it had one of these meanings, (as I feel sure it has,) but had no reasonable certainty which meaning it had.

My Lords, this is the opinion I have formed. I offer it with no confidence in its correctness.

Indeed, I think the nature of the case precludes a positive opinion. No legal principle is in issue, and the question cannot be decided by authority. The matter to be determined is, which of two interpretations is to be given to words that may have, though they are not the fittest to express, either meaning.

WILLES, J.—My Lords, upon the first question put to the Judges I am of opinion that the devise is capable of an intelligible construction, and is not void for uncertainty. What that construction is will appear by my answer to the second question.

Upon the second question, I am of opinion that the son of the eldest son would be entitled.

It appears to me that the expression "the eldest male lineal descendant then living" is not a mere description of the individual as descendant oldest in point of age and of the male sex. Such a construction would exclude altogether from consideration the word "lineal," or would treat it as superfluous. It is therefore a construction to be rejected, if the language used be capable of being otherwise construed, so as to give effect to the word "lineal": and the language is capable of being so construed by reading it as a description or rather definition of the individual who is to take, by reference, not merely to his personal qualities, but also to those of a line which he is to represent, viz., as "eldest male descendant of the eldest male line." So to interpret the phrase does no violence to the words used, and it is necessary so to interpret it, in order that one of those words, "lineal," should work somewhat, and be not "idle and frivolous," contrary to the maxim, verba aliquid operari debent; verba cum effectu sunt accipienda.

It can hardly be a matter of serious doubt that the words do to some extent contain a definition of the line which the individual is to represent. He is to be male of a line of males. The word "male" applies to the individual and also to the line. This is an effect of the use of the word "lineal," expanding the operation of the word "male," and causing it to apply to the line which the individual is to represent as well as to the individual himself, and so to restrict the class in which the individual is to be sought to males deriving through males.

If, then, the word "lineal" have the operation above referred to upon the preceding word "male," so as to make that word describe the line as well as the individual, it must equally have that operation upon the word "eldest" which precedes "male," and so make "eldest-male" describe the line as well as the individual. "Male" may be applied to an individual or to a line; so equally may "eldest." No peculiar elective affinity exists between the words "male" and "lineal," or the ideas which they express, to make the latter, as it were, select, and seize upon the former, and detach it from the other portion of the compound adjective "eldest-male-lineal," and so convert it alone into a description of the line in which the individual is to be sought, as well as of the individual himself, leaving the other descriptive word, "eldest," to designate only a personal quality of the individual, apart from and independent of such line. Why, then, should this limited effect be arbitrarily imposed upon the word "lineal" by an artificial construction, when the result would be to reject that which ought rather to be sought after, viz., a definition, open to no doubt, of the very individual who is to take, by reference to a known and usual mode of selection, and unnecessarily to adopt a strange mode of selection by accident, open to doubt and litigation, from amongst a crowd. I say accident, and accident, moreover, not tending to effect any intention of the testator, because there is no limit of age mentioned, and the accumulation during a minority might even advance the object apparently in view.

The only consistent mode of construction, therefore, is to give the word "lineal" equal effect upon each part of the description, "eldest male," and to hold that the conjoint effect of the words "eldest male-lineal descendant" is to express and designate the "eldest male descendant of the eldest male line."

This is an intelligible construction. It avoids the absurdity and the uncertainty of the other constructions which may be suggested; and it is sanctioned by the great authority of Lord Eldon, who, considering the case from a different point of view, gave his opinion at large upon the construction of this will, in a judgment which is, I venture to think, as conclusive, and, allowing for inaccuracies of tradition, as clearly expressed a document as I have ever had the advantage of reading—Oddie v. Woodford.

I therefore conclude in favour of the son of the eldest son.

CROMPTON, J.—My Lords, I think that the devise in question is capable of an intelligible construction, and is not void for uncertainty, and that in the event suggested in the second question the son of the eldest son, though younger in years, would take in preference to the sons of the younger brothers.

If the phrase "eldest male lineal descendant" stood alone, I should be very much inclined to think that it meant the first in male lineal descent, as I think the word "eldest" in such a disposition, and with reference to such a subject-matter, and used in such a phrase, points to the eldest in descent, and not to the "oldest" in years; but when considered as a part of one entire set of limitations to the eldest male lineal descendant, with remainder to the second, third, &c. male lineal descendant successively in tail male, it seems to me clear that the word "eldest" is used in the sense of "first," and as correlative to the words "second," "third," &c.

Suppose that the limitations now in question had begun with a devise to the second male lineal descendant, with remainder to the third, fourth, &c. successively, there could, I think, have been no doubt that the order of succession was meant by the numerical words "second," "third," &c. And it seems to me that the words "second," "third," &c. clearly shew that the word "eldest" is used, in a sense which it may well bear, as the first in succession, according to the authorities referred to at your Lordships' bar. Either it must be so construed, or else the word "eldest" must be inserted after every numeral, and it must be read second eldest, third eldest, &c.; and this appears to me to be straining the words much more than would be done by construing the word "eldest" in a sense in which it is often used in such matters, as meaning first in the order of succession. The word "eldest" being correlative to the word "second" must either be construed to be "first," so as to have the same numerical meaning as the words "second," "third," &c., or else the word "eldest" must be inserted after every numeral. And I cannot help thinking that if the testator had in his contemplation the relative age of the descendants, inter se, the words "second eldest," &c. would have been used.

The construction I adopt seems to me much more consistent with the rest of the will and with common sense than the other construction, and also more consistent with the previous determination of your Lordships' House; and it is supported by the very strong authority of most eminent Judges, who have considered this will judicially, and whose opinions in matters of this kind are entitled to the greatest weight.

The will, however justly to be disapproved of, is not an inconsistent will, or a will without certain defined objects, which are, to make the property as large as possible, by continuing the accumulation as long as the rules of law would permit, and afterwards to constitute three large family estates in the line of the testator's three sons. And every provision in the will is consistent with the intention of the estate going in the line of the three sons in the usual course of succession to landed estates.

The testator's object seems to me clearly to have been, to give an estate tail to the person who would have taken it if he could have limited the estates so as to go in the usual course of strict settlement, and as this would have prevented the provision for accumulation, he postponed the vesting of the estate tail as long as he could; but I see no reason to suppose that he had any intention that the estates should not go in the regular line of family descent. The necessity for the postponement to effect the object of accumulation seems to me sufficiently to explain the object of the testator in this respect; and, judging from the general object of the will, I should say, that the construction that eldest means first, is a much more probable one than that by which the line of succession is altogether disregarded, and the very fantastical notion introduced, of the oldest in point of years among all the descendants of each son taking in succession according to the number of their years.

It seems to me that, both in common sense and according to your Lordships' former decision, and especially when reference is had to the succeeding limitations to the sons in numerical succession, the phrase is not to be construed by searching for the descendant who is oldest, who is a male, and who is lineal; that is, the person who answers the description pointed out by each of these epithets, or else the party claiming through a female must have been entitled. He was oldest, he was a male, he was lineal, and he was a descendant. This House, however, most properly looked at the meaning of the phrase taken together as applicable to the subject-matter, and held that the expression meant in the male line of descent.

In such a phrase, "eldest" seems to me clearly to mean the eldest descendant in the eldest branch or line, and the phrase does not seem to me by any means an inapt one to express that the testator meant the eldest in that sense. And I do not think the phrase can fairly be applied to a person who is not eldest in lineal course of descent. If it were not for the doubts that have been expressed on this occasion, I should have thought it superfluous care to express by the repetition of the word "eldest" that he was to be eldest in the eldest line.

It was said, indeed, that the devise might have been to the party who should be heir male at the period of distribution. But there seems to have been quite sufficient cause for avoiding that mode of limitation, by reason of the doubts that had existed with reference to that expression. And the other modes which have been suggested at the Bar as more proper conveying modes of effecting the purpose, as far as I could follow them, certainly appeared to me very much involved in words, and of great complexity, and by no means so simple or natural a way of expressing what seems to be the intention as the one actually used.

When your Lordships' House has decided that the phrase in question relates to the course and line of descent so as to exclude males claiming through females, though male, though lineal, and though descendants, and when, on the first occasion when this will received a judicial consideration, the two learned Judges and the Lord Chancellor evidently construed the phrase as I am now doing, and when that most eminent person in matters of this kind, Lord Eldon, in coming to a decision, adopted the same construction, and acted upon it as the main ratio decidendi of the very question before him, and that decision was confirmed by this House, I own that I think the weight of authority very great in this case.

Lord Eldon appears to have taken great pains in considering the question; and I do not think his judgment entitled to the less weight from the expressions which he uses as to the case being one of difficulty. There is, moreover, great weight, I think, in the observation made by Mr. Rolt, that Lord Eldon's difficulty arose from the period of distribution being delayed until the death of certain female issue, and that he solves the doubt he had by the conclusion he arrived at with reference to the construction of the phrase now under your Lordships' consideration, and as to which he appears to me to express a clear and decided opinion on the very point now before this House.

The counsel for the appellant relied greatly upon the parenthesis in the clause in question. This appears to me in no respect to support their argument, but, if anything, to be in favour of the other view. It says, in effect, the conveyance shall be made in tail male to the eldest lineal descendant, and then there shall be remainders to the second, third, &c.; but mind, when I say remainder to the second, I do not mean you to limit the estate in remainder, exempli gratia, to the son of the party who takes the first estate, as he would take as heir in tail under the estate tail which I wish to constitute.

The parenthesis was perhaps in strictness of words necessary, supposing the construction to have no reference to the relative ages, for the son might be the second male lineal descendant after his father, the first; and therefore the testator says, the remainders are not to be made to such descendants as would take the estate tail by descent as heirs in tail; and this proviso seems to me rather to favour the case of the respondents, as if, according to their argument, the meaning is, the first, second, &c., without relation to age, it was very probable that the first and other takers might have sons, probably younger than many of their uncles, or members of the collateral branches, who would, though younger, have been the next in the line of male lineal succession.

I cannot see that the advowson clause, so much relied on by the appellant, throws any clear light on the question before your Lordships. In that clause provision is made for the nomination to the advowsons before the time for the division of the estates; and as it could not be ascertained to which of the three families the advowson would belong, and which would have the right to the particular presentation, and as the value of such right of presentation would not properly be the subject of accumulation, the testator gives it in rotation amongst his sons, and after his sons' death to the parties who should be his male lineal descendants, one representing each line, although the period for the accumulation ceasing had not arrived. It is to go in rotation amongst the three sons whom the testator may be supposed to have known to be capable of nominating; but if they are dead, then it is to go in rotation amongst the three persons who then fill the character and relation of eldest male lineal descendant, and if one of these three is incapable he loses his turn, and it goes, not to the next in order in that line, but to the representative of the second or next line. If the want of capacity is to be understood as referring to infancy only, it would seem to be rather in favour of the respondents' construction, as it would seem to suppose that the person being male lineal descendant was likely to be an infant.

But, my Lords, I confess that the construction attempted to be put upon this will appears to me to make its provisions so fantastical and absurd that your Lordships ought not to adopt it, unless forced by a most clear manifestation of the testator's intention expressed on the face of the will. The construction, as illustrated at the Bar, by supposing that all the descendants are to be put into a large room, and that the oldest in years is to be picked out, and the second oldest, and so on, seems to me to warrant the remark of Lord Eldon, that it went far to make him hold up his hands and say, "Could it be possible he meant this?" What kind of a settlement is to be made? You are to take the oldest, say an uncle of the direct male lineal descendant, being the tenth brother of the father of the real lineal descendant, and then you may jump back to a cousin or son of the fifth brother of his father; go again to an uncle, the second brother of the father; and then jump again to a remote aged cousin. Well might Lord Eldon remark on the strangeness to conveyancers of such a settlement.

We are told, indeed, that our minds are not to be in the conveyancing groove, and it is thrown out that the less we attend to the opinions of persons who have been in the habit of construing wills and marriage settlements the more likely we are to be right, and we are warned particularly against paying any respect to the extraordinary legal attainments of minds like Lord Eldon's. But, my Lords, I utterly protest against the doctrine that in construing a will of this or any other description we are to divest our minds of all conveyancing knowledge, and more especially of the knowledge which every tolerably informed person has of the mode in which property descends in this country. Not that I think that any peculiar legal knowledge is required for the construction of the clause in question, for I believe that ordinary persons reading, either in a will or deed, or a novel, that an estate was to go to a man's eldest male lineal descendant, and so on in succession to the second, third, and fourth, &c., would understand that it was to go according to the lineal course of succession, and would never fancy the meaning to be that it should go to the oldest man among the descendants. And this would, I think, be the ordinary primary common-sense meaning which a person of ordinary understanding and information would put upon the phrase.

My Lords, we have heard a great deal about taking words in their plain ordinary sense, and I quite agree to that rule, when properly understood and rightly applied; but that rule means that words are to be taken in their plain ordinary sense with reference to the subject-matter in the instrument to be construed. Taking hold of a particular word, and giving it the meaning which it most often bears, will lead into great mistakes, if we do not remember that the rule must refer to the meaning it bears with reference to the subject-matter. Construing "eldest" in a disposition like the present in the sense of oldest in years inter se appears to me to resemble the observation of the clown in the old play, who, in answer to the inquiry, "Which is the Queen's High Constable?" replies, "Why, the tallest man, to be sure"; and numerous illustrations might be given of the use of epithets generally bearing a particular meaning, which, in reference to another subject, have always what may be called in one sense a secondary or derivative meaning, but which, when applied to a particular subject-matter, can only be understood in such secondary or derivative sense.

I think, then, that with reference to such a disposition as the present, the words "eldest male lineal descendant" would be understood either in a popular or legal sense, as clearly pointing out the eldest or first in the line of male descent; and that if there could be any doubt, the way in which the remainders are limited to the second, third, fourth, &c. in succession in numerical order clearly shews that numerical succession is intended, and demonstrates that by the "eldest" is meant the first, as used in relation to the second, third, fourth, &c. immediately following; and I think that the argument in favour of this construction is not weakened, but if at all affected is strengthened, by the parenthesis, and that the clause as to advowsons does not weaken the argument in favour of the respondents' construction. I think also that, looking to the whole will, the construction by which the estate goes, as it would have done if the estate tail had commenced earlier in the course of succession, is the one in accordance with the general scope of the will. And I think that the construction according to which all the parties are to be collected, and the remainders limited according to the relative age of the descendants, and the estate is to jump about from one of the branches to another in the way proposed, is so fantastical, unheard of, and inconsistent with the clear intention of the testator to make three family estates to descend in tail male to the descendants of each of his three sons, as not to be fit to be adopted by your Lordships, without the clearest possible words incapable of any other rational construction.

For these reasons I answer your Lordships' questions by saying, that I think the devise in question capable of an intelligible construction, and not void for uncertainty; and, secondly, that in the event supposed in the second question, the son under age of the eldest of the sons of Peter Isaac Thellusson would have been entitled to one of the lots.

MARTIN, B.—Assuming the devise upon which the questions proposed by your Lordships arise not to be void for uncertainty, the point is, whether the words eldest male lineal descendant living at the death of certain persons described in the will designate the male lineal descendant then eldest in blood inheritable by descent, or the male lineal descendant then eldest in age. It was contended on behalf of the respondents, that the point has been concluded by the judgment of this House in Oddie v. Woodford. It seems to me quite clear that it was not. The litigation in Oddie v. Woodford was upon what has been called the advowson clause. One claimant was Henry Hoyle Oddie, the grandson and only male descendant of George, the testator's second son, through a daughter, who therefore combined in himself eldership both in blood and in age. The other claimant was Charles, the eldest son of the testator's third son, Charles, who also combined in himself eldership in blood and in age. It is therefore impossible that it could then have been judicially decided, and the opinion of Lord Eldon was of necessity extra-judicial.

The rule of law as to the construction of wills was agreed on at your Lordships' Bar. The cases of Scarisbrick v. Skelmersdale, Livesey v. Livesey, Towns v. Wentworth, and Grey v. Pearson, were referred to. The rule approved of and adopted in all these cases is in truth the second proposition laid down by Sir James Wigram in his Treatise; viz., "That when there is nothing in the context of a will from which it is apparent that a testator has used the words in which he has expressed himself in any other sense than their strict and primary sense, and when the words so interpreted are sensible with reference to extrinsic circumstances, it is an inflexible rule of construction that the words in the will shall be interpreted in their strict and primary sense, and in no other, although they may be capable of some popular or secondary interpretation."

No direct authority has been found, nor was one likely to be. Lord Eldon, in speaking of this will, says, "Mr. Thellusson took into his head what never entered into the head of any one before."

As regards the will itself, it seems to me to have been prepared with great care by a person well acquainted with the subject, and, therefore, of the character to which the above rule of construction ought to be strictly applied.

The expression "eldest male lineal descendant" has not been found in any will which had been the subject of judicial construction before the date of Mr. Thellusson's will, and appears to have been deliberately adopted. The words upon which the construction is to be given are repeated three times, and the expression "eldest male lineal descendant" is used in every place where it is at all applicable.

Where it first occurs, the words are words of purchase. They are a descriptio personæ; the description of an individual who is to take as purchaser an estate in tail male at a future period of time. The first question is, what is their strict and primary sense or meaning? The description is composed of a substantive and three adjectives. The meaning of the substantive "descendant" is clear. It means, as regards the first of the two parts into which the property is now to be divided (and the question is the same as to both), all who proceed from the body of Peter Isaac, the eldest son, and includes both the claimants. If authority were required for this it will be found in Crossly v. Clare. The three adjectives "eldest male lineal" have been dealt with in the argument in two ways: first, separately; and secondly, conjointly. The words "male lineal" have already received a judicial construction in this House, viz., that they describe a male through a line of males; thus far, therefore, the point is concluded. But this description also includes both claimants. They are both males through lines of males. The question now under consideration, therefore, depends upon the meaning of the word "eldest." It seems clear that its primary meaning is oldest in age; the dictionaries are generally to this effect, and the legal authorities are the same. Lord Eldon says, in Oddie v. Woodford, primâ facie it denotes age; so also the Termes de la Ley. In Lord Coke's Commentary upon the 245th section of Littleton, he states that the enitia pars, or part of the elder in coparceny, belongs to the eldest in age at the death of the ancestor, and if the eldest daughter dies in the lifetime of the parent, leaving a child, the eldest daughter living at the time of the death shall have the choice, and not the child of the eldest daughter. So also in the Case of Tanistry (5), where the question was, as to a custom that land should descend "to the eldest" and "most worthy man of the blood and name of him who died seised," it is said, that eldest means priority in point of time.

It therefore seems that the words "eldest male lineal descendant," in their strict and primary sense, taken simpliciter, and as of themselves, mean the male descendant in a line of males who was eldest in age at the appointed period of time. But it was argued that the three adjectives together meant as a descriptio personæ the individual who was then heir of the body of Peter Isaac in tail male. None of the words, however, are technical words. The word "lineal" has no peculiar meaning in the law. A meaning and construction have been already given to it by a judgment of this House. No case was cited where any such construction was ever given; and in my opinion, taken in their strict and primary sense, the above is their meaning; and it will be seen hereafter that Lord Eldon more than once states that this is their primary meaning.

It was argued that if an estate was devised to A. and his eldest male lineal descendant, it would give A. an estate in tail male. Assuming this to be the legal construction of such a devise, the words would be words of limitation, not words of purchase; and the distinction between words more strongly pointing to eldership in blood than "eldest male lineal descendant," where used as words of purchase or as words of limitation, is pointed out in Lord Coke's Commentary upon the 2nd section of Littleton, 10 b. He says, if there were two brothers, A. and B., and B. had two sons, C. and D., and died, and C. died, leaving issue, and an estate for life were made to A., remainder to his next of blood in fee, D. would take the remainder, because he was next of blood, and capable, by purchase, although the issue of C. was next of blood inheritable by descent.

The next question which arises upon the application of the above rule or canon of construction is, whether it appears from the context that the testator used the words in other than their strict and primary sense. The clause of the will consists in a direction "that the property shall be conveyed to the use of the eldest male lineal descendant then living (that is to say, living at the termination of the accumulation) of my son Peter Isaac in tail male, with remainder to the second, third, fourth, and all and every other male lineal descendant or descendants then living (who shall be incapable of taking as heir in tail male of any of the persons to whom a prior estate was thereby directed to be limited) of my said son Peter Isaac successively in tail male." These words will be found in page 27 of the joint Appendix, and certain of them, upon which much argument and reasoning were urged, are printed in a parenthesis. Whether they were so written in the will is not stated. The present question is, whether the context affords aid to either of the constructions contended for, or is equally consistent with both.

The respondents contend that the words and context together express the intention that at the appointed time an estate in tail male by purchase should be given to the male descendant of Peter Isaac, eldest in blood inheritable by descent, which limitation was to include all the descendants of this individual, born or unborn; that the second estate tail should be given to his second brother, if he had one, and so on to his other brothers, and his uncles and male cousins, descendants of Peter Isaac by seniority in blood, inheritable descent being always observed; and that it was immaterial whether the first taker was an infant, and the next a man of full age; and the alleged natural favour towards the elder in blood was urged in support of this view.

On the other hand, it was contended that the context shewed that the intention was that at the appointed time all the male descendants of Peter Isaac should be marshalled; that the eldest in age should be ascertained, and an estate in tail male conveyed to him, which was to include all his descendants, born and unborn; that the second estate in tail male should be limited to the next eldest descendant, excluding the issue of the first taker, and so on; and it was urged that this was probably the intention of the testator, he being a foreign merchant engaged in trade, and not likely to have, and, indeed, shewing by his will that he had not, any prejudice or feeling in favour of eldership in blood.

Some argument was adduced upon the word "successively"; but, according to either construction, the taking would be in succession, or one after the other. The word "successively" has no technical meaning; it generally means a numerical succession. Every succession may be described as numerical.

It was assumed, on the argument, that the words in the parenthesis are parenthetical, and it may be so; but whether they are or not, and, notwithstanding all the reasoning which has been addressed to them, it seems to me that their meaning is clear, and equally consistent with the one construction or the other. In my judgment they mean that no descendant of a purchaser shall take by purchase, and they were introduced possibly for two reasons: one, that it would be absurd to give an estate to A. and the heirs male of his body, and then an estate to his eldest son B. and the heirs male of his body; the other, that if the words second and third, &c., could be held to include the unborn child of an unborn child, it might possibly be construed to create a perpetuity, and so defeat the intention of the testator.

The remainder of the context is second, third, fourth, and all and every other male lineal descendant or descendants then living. The adjectives "second," "third," "fourth," &c., are descriptive of persons. They are descriptive of persons, in the same way as eldest is descriptive of a person. The limitation or succession does not start from the person designated the "second," but from the person designated the "eldest." The next person to take after him is the second. The present question is, second in what? The answer surely is, second in that in which the eldest, as eldest, is first; and if that be in age, the second is second in age. If it be eldest in blood inheritable by descent, second is second in blood inheritable by descent. This is the natural and usual mode and form of expression; and to have repeated the word eldest after second and third, and so on, would not have been in accordance with the ordinary way in which men express themselves, either in writing or in speaking.

I therefore think the context affords no real aid. If the words "eldest male lineal descendant then living" means eldest in blood, "second" means second eldest in blood; if they mean eldest in age, "second" means "second eldest in age"; and in my judgment, therefore, the whole question depends upon and is concluded by the meaning of the first words; but the opinion of Lord Eldon was to the contrary, and it is entitled to the greatest weight, and it would be unbecoming in any one to differ from it, except for what to his own mind are most satisfactory reasons.

I have read the judgment several times, and the leading vice (if I may be permitted to use the expression) of his opinion upon the present question is, that throughout he seems to consider it impossible that the testator could have had the intention imputed to him by the appellant. In p. 622 of the judgment, after stating what he deemed to be the highest improbability possible, he put the intention which the appellant contends the words of the will express, and states it to be an improbability still higher.

He says, indeed, that it was a state of limitation which Mr. Thellusson might by possibility contemplate, but that if he did he was the first man in the world who ever did. He never seems to me to have fairly taken into his consideration the two constructions, and applied his mind to the consideration of the true question, viz., whether the words of the will expressed the one or the other. It is sufficient to suggest this as a general observation.

I do not mean to comment at length upon the judgment, but to confine myself to the statement of Lord Eldon's opinion upon the present question, and his reasons for it. He says, in page 616, that he had not been able to satisfy himself that the word "second" means the second eldest male in the ordinary sense of the word eldest male; but so far as I can collect he gives no reason why what he himself calls the ordinary sense is to be departed from. He then says, the question will be whether, to give consistency to the whole of the description, that is, not merely to look at the general description of the first person who is to take, but at all the descriptions of all the persons who are to take, the word eldest is not to be taken as synonymous with the word "first." Now here his Lordship plainly states that the general description of the first person who was to take, viz., "eldest male lineal descendant then living," means eldest in age. He then proceeds to state his opinion, that "eldest" should be taken as synonymous with "first." Now in this I submit his Lordship departs from the true rule of construction, and from the rule as laid down by himself in this very judgment. If the word eldest means primâ facie eldest in age, the synonyme for it is not "first," but "first in age"; and he substitutes for a synonyme what is not a synonyme. He then comments upon the word "successively," upon which I have already remarked. He then says, "that brings it back again to the question, What is meant by the words 'eldest' or 'FIRST' male lineal descendant?" Now it seems to me to be contrary to principle and legitimate construction to introduce the word "first" in this way, and if a synonyme is to be introduced at all it ought to be the true one, viz., first in age. He then proceeds to state, that substituting first for eldest, first male lineal descendant means first in blood. For the reasons given, I cannot agree with him, and I think there is nothing in the context to aid in the disputed construction.

There also seems to me to be nothing in the general scope and object of the will to aid it; but I certainly think the testator did not contemplate, as was suggested by the learned counsel for the respondents, that any of the intermediate descendants should be promoted to the peerage. His expressed wish is, that his sons should continue to carry on business; and there are several other expressions in the will which clearly shew that he had no desire that they should be promoted to a rank in life above that of his own.

There was much discussion at your Lordships' bar as to what form of words or expression would probably have been used by a conveyancer to express and carry out the two different intentions imputed to the testator. I think this is a matter entitled to some weight. Suppose the testator to have given instructions to the conveyancer, that he desired that there should be conveyed to the individual who was heir in tail male of the body of Peter Isaac at the end of the accumulation an estate to him and the heirs male of the body of Peter Isaac, (which is the intention and object for which the respondents contend,) Mandeville's case would at once have suggested to any lawyer the mode of effecting and carrying it out. Mr. Fearne's book was then, as now, in the highest estimation, and in general use. At page 80 (7th ed.) he discusses and explains this case, and the limitation in it, and points out how it did effect this very supposed object and intention. It is also difficult to conceive why, if this was his intention, any remainder should have been directed at all. An estate to the heir male of the body of Peter Isaac, habendum to him and the heirs male of the body of Peter Isaac, would create an estate which would go in precisely the same course of succession, be barrable by the same means, go to the same individuals, and have the same extent and duration of continuance as all the estates, including the remainders, comprised in the direction in the will. The answer made to this at the bar was, that it was then doubtful whether the person to take by purchase as heir male of the body of Peter Isaac must not also be heir general; and Mr. Hargrave's Note to Coke Litt. 24 b. was cited. This difficulty could have been obviated by a very few words, viz., that by heir male was meant the individual who would then take an inheritance by descent.

But, on the other hand, suppose the testator to have instructed his conveyancer that what he desired was, that his property should accumulate for the longest possible period; that he meant to ignore, as it were, all his intermediate descendants; that the individuals who were to enjoy the property would be unknown to him; that he was indifferent who should enjoy it, provided they were descendants in the male line; that he disregarded their relationship to each other, and desired to act as a father to all the then living male descendants of his three sons respectively, and do, as people generally do, give the first estate to the eldest; and therefore he desired that at the end of the accumulation an estate in tail male should be conveyed to the then eldest living male descendant of Peter Isaac, and the same as to his two other sons, with remainder to the next eldest, and so on; I would ask what general words, using them in their primary, natural, and ordinary sense, could more appropriately express this intention? And this may possibly explain the parenthesis, if any explanation of it be sought for. According to the argument on behalf of the respondents, the parenthesis is idle and unnecessary, and merely expresses what was expressed before; but in the latter supposition the conveyancer might well have said to Mr. Thellusson, "Do you mean that after having limited an estate to the eldest male descendant in tail male, if his son should be older than the next collateral, that an estate in tail male is to be limited to him?" Mr. Thellusson would have naturally said, "No; that it would be absurd to do so," and then the parenthesis would be essential to express his intention.

There is a passage in the judgment of Mr. Justice Buller, in 4 Ves., p. 326, worthy of attention, upon this point. His Lordship says, "the person who settled this will did not know how to limit to an heir male by way of purchase." It never seems to have occurred to his Lordship that the testator might have directed, and the conveyancer intended, that the estate should not be so limited. In truth his Lordship begs the whole question. He conceives in his own mind what the testator meant, and then complains that the conveyancer has not expressed it. I apprehend the true legal mode of construing a will or any other written document is to ascertain from its words what it means, and give effect to the language used, unless to do so be contrary to law.

An argument was also urged upon the advowson clause. The testator directed that the trustees, upon a vacancy in a living, should present a person who should be nominated to them by one of his sons in rotation, the eldest having the first nomination, and the like nomination to be made by the eldest male lineal descendant of his three sons respectively in the order and rotation aforesaid, if he be capable by law of making such nomination, when the church became vacant, or in due time afterwards; otherwise the eldest male lineal descendant of the next brother was to present; and if it should happen that when such living became void, or in due time after, no male lineal descendant of any of the sons should be capable of presenting, then he directed that his trustees should present.

This argument is founded upon the presumption that the incapacity contemplated by the testator was one supposed to arise from infancy. Lord Eldon thought it pretty clear that the testator had the notion that infancy incapacitated (p. 606); and observing that the incapacity is confined to the descendants, excluding the sons, it seems to me that there is little doubt but that Lord Eldon's view is correct. The expression "eldest male lineal descendant" is here made use of to describe an individual (other than his three sons) living during the period of the accumulation, and the provision is made in the contemplation of that individual being an infant; now, if the testator meant by the expression "eldest male lineal descendant" what the respondents impute to him, he would naturally, in the event of the individual so designated being an infant, have directed the presentation to go to the next eldest in blood of the same stock, and not to the descendant of the next brother. But if the testator meant by that expression what the appellant imputes to him, if the eldest individual of one stock was an infant all the other descendants of the same stock would necessarily be infants also, and then the eldest male lineal descendant of the next brother would be the proper and natural person to have the presentation. But it seems to me that the latter part of the clause puts this point in a stronger light. The trustees are to present, if there be no male lineal descendant of any of the sons capable of presenting. This includes all the male descendants of all the sons, and contemplates them all being incapacitated by infancy, and seems very strongly to prove that by the expression eldest "male lineal descendants" the testator meant to designate the eldest in age.

The result is, that in my opinion the question depends upon the meaning of the word "eldest." I think there is nothing in the context which aids the disputed construction. The context is equally sensible and consistent with either. If "eldest" means eldest in age, "second" means second eldest in age; if "eldest" means eldest inheritable by descent, "second" means second inheritable by descent. The word "descendant" is plain; "lineal descendant" equally plain. It is an expression in common use. A.B. is "a lineal descendant," or "the lineal descendant," of some eminent man. It is an emphatic expression, denoting direct descent. The strict sense and the popular sense concur. The remaining word is "eldest." The appellant satisfies it in its strict and primary sense, and such meaning is sensible with reference to extrinsic circumstances. The word may be capable of a popular or secondary interpretation; but I can find nothing in the will to justify a departure from the strict and primary one, and it is for the respondents to establish it. According to Lord Coke, there are two kinds of eldership in blood, viz., next of blood inheritable by descent, and next of blood capable by purchase. The appellant is the next in blood in the latter sense, and I think the respondents fail to establish that the testator expressed in the words used by him his intention that the first purchaser should be the male lineal descendant of Peter Isaac living at the end of the period of accumulation who was then eldest in blood inheritable by descent, and this they must do to entitle them to your Lordships' judgment.

I have much considered the arguments on behalf of the respondents. However it may be disguised, they all involve either an alteration in the words of the will, as was made by Lord Eldon, or an addition to them, using the word eldest twice, or adding "of the eldest line" to the words "eldest male lineal descendant." To do either is contrary to the rule of legitimate construction.

It may be that the meaning I give these words leads to an unexpected result; but the litigant parties have the right to the application of the legal rule of construction, and the result is certainly not more contrary to the popular notion than the construction given by this House to the will in Trevor v. Trevor.

My answer to your Lordships' first question is, that the devise is not void for uncertainty; as to your second, that the son of the third son would have been entitled to one of the lots, under the circumstances stated in the question.

I have to apologize for the great length of my judgment; but knowing that some of my learned Brothers with whom I have long been in the habit of considering legal questions differ with me, I was anxious that the grounds of my opinion should be fully stated, in order that the error, if any there be, may be clearly observed.

WILLIAMS, J.—In answer to your Lordships' questions, I have to express my opinion as to the first, that the devise is not void for uncertainty, but is capable of an intelligible construction; and as to the second, that the son of the eldest of the three sons would have been entitled if the devise had been of legal estates.

In construing the expression "eldest male lineal descendant," I am of opinion that the word "eldest" does not mean eldest in point of age at the time the conveyance is to be made; but that it means first in ordinary succession in the male line.

I think there is no weight in the argument that the natural and ordinary meaning of the word "eldest" is eldest in point of age, and that it is unjustifiable to substitute such a meaning as a conveyancer or other lawyer whose mind is habituated to established rules of descent and conventional limitations of real property would be led to adopt. The will is confessedly not the natural language of the testator himself, but the professional language of the conveyancer who was employed to draw it. Surely it is difficult to maintain that in construing such a will the same sense ought to be imputed to its language as if the subject of construction were a document of an ordinary kind, framed in natural language, and treating of untechnical matters.

Looking at the will as a whole, it seems to me plain, that but for the testator's desire that the property should accumulate, his wish would have been that his three sons should share it as tenants in tail male respectively, and that the purpose of the will was to limit the estates on that principle, as far as was practicable, after the accumulation had taken place. He meant, in short, that his estates should be enjoyed in tail male respectively, but to defer the period of enjoyment; and in carrying such an intention into effect he did not mean that the ordinary succession in the male line should be disturbed. His intention that it should prevail is, in my judgment, sufficiently evidenced by the limitation to the eldest, with remainder to the second, third, fourth, "and all and every other of the male lineal descendants then living of his sons successively in tail male." In other words, I fully agree with the opinion already frequently expressed by others, that the word "eldest," being employed relatively, and opposed to the subsequent limitations to the second, third, fourth, &c., is used as synonymous with the word "first," and that as the remainder over to the second, third, fourth, &c. is not expressed to be according to seniority of age or priority of birth, or the like, the proper inference is that the testator meant to use the word "eldest" as meaning eldest in point of succession; more especially as to construe it to mean eldest in point of age might lead to a series of limitations of the most strange and improbable kind.

I do not propose to state more fully the reasons on which my opinion is founded, nor to deal with the particular arguments which have been adduced by counsel at your Lordships' bar; because, having been very recently apprised of your Lordships' wish that the opinions of the Judges should be given on this day, I have not been able to perform that task in a way which I think would do justice to myself, or render any assistance to your Lordships.

WIGHTMAN, J.—My Lords, the answer which I propose to give to the first question put by your Lordships is, that the devise by the testator, as stated in that question, is capable of an intelligible construction, and that it is not void for uncertainty. And to the second question, that in the case supposed the son of the eldest son of Peter Isaac, though under age, would have been entitled to one of the lots, in preference to the sons of the second and third sons of Peter Isaac, though of full age.

As the reasons for my answers to both the questions are in effect the same, I shall proceed to consider them together.

The questions turn upon the meaning to be attributed to the words "eldest male lineal descendant of Peter Isaac Thellusson," as used in the will.

It has been decided, and is agreed, that by the words "male lineal descendant" is meant a male descendant through a line of males, to the exclusion of a male descendant through females, and that whoever is to take is to take as a purchaser in tail male. So far the parties are agreed, but they differ as to the meaning to be attributed to the word "eldest," as used in the will, in connexion with the words "male lineal descendant." For the appellant it is contended, that it is used in the will in what is called its ordinary and primary meaning of comparative age, and not, as contended for by the respondents, in the sense of priority of descent over other male lineal descendants, or eldest according to the law of primogeniture.

Many references were made in the course of the argument to dictionaries and other books of authority, to shew that the word "eldest" might be and had been used in both senses, according to the subject in respect to which it was introduced; and the question, therefore, is, in which sense was it used in this will?

There is no doubt but that the words used in a will are to be understood as used in their ordinary sense and meaning, unless their use in such sense would not be consistent with the context of the will, or would lead to some illegality or absurdity, and they are capable of some other meaning which would be more consistent with the context, and clear of all illegality or absurdity, in which case they are to be understood as used in such other sense and meaning.

In the present case it was said for the appellant that the whole will was of so extraordinary and whimsical a character, that it might well be that the testator did mean and intend that when the period of accumulation ceased all the male lineal descendants of his son Peter Isaac should be assembled, and the oldest man amongst them selected as the object of his bounty designated by the will. The person so selected was to take in tail male, with remainder, as was contended for the appellant, to the second eldest, third eldest, and fourth eldest male lineal descendant of Peter Isaac then living (who should be incapable of taking as heir in tail male of any of the persons to whom a prior estate was directed to be limited) successively in tail male. It is difficult to give any intelligible meaning to such a construction as would add the word "eldest" in the remainder clause to the words second, third, and fourth male lineal descendants successively; but if capable of being carried into effect, as contended for by the appellant, it would or might require from time to time a re-assembling of the lines of male descendants, and on each such occasion selecting the oldest man amongst them, creating no small amount of uncertainty and confusion, which it can hardly be supposed that the testator intended, if the words used by him are capable of a different meaning.

The construction contended for by the respondents appears to me far more in accordance with the general scope and context of the will, and so much more reasonable, that I cannot but think that it is the true construction, and ought to be adopted.

The testator, of foreign extraction, having made a large fortune as a merchant in England, and having three sons, appears to have been desirous of being the founder of three great families in point of fortune, and especially of landed estate, and to that end, by his will, leaves the bulk of his fortune to trustees, to accumulate during the lives of certain classes and persons living at his death, or born in due time after, and in the mean time the annual proceeds to be laid out in the purchase of land, and when the period of accumulation ceased, the accumulated property was to be divided into three lots, one for the eldest male lineal descendant then living of his son Peter Isaac in tail male, with remainder to the second, third, fourth, and every other male lineal descendant of his son Peter Isaac then living (who should be incapable of taking as heir in tail male of any of the persons to whom a prior estate was by the will directed to be limited) successively in tail male. All the limitations are in tail male; and supposing the testator to have intended that one lot should go to the heir in tail male of his son Peter Isaac, it is not easy to suggest any form of words that would better answer that intention. To devise the lot in express words to the heir in tail would be objectionable, and the words used are certainly capable of such a construction as would fulfil the intention of the testator.

Whoever drew the will was obviously well acquainted with legal and conveyancing language and phraseology, and too much effect must not be given to the rule that the words used in wills are to be understood in that which was called their ordinary and familiar sense. In the will in question the word "eldest" is used in connexion with the words "male lineal descendant," and, placed as it is, was not, as it seems to me, intended by the person who drew the will to mean "eldest" in point of age, but eldest in lineal descent, or, in other words, of the eldest line or branch. It is a rule that the same words in different parts of a will are to be construed in the same sense, unless the general intention requires a different construction.

In the advowson clause the same words are used, in connexion, however, with other terms rendered necessary by the nature of the property which would require to be dealt with before the period of accumulation would cease. The right of presentation is given by the testator to one of his sons in rotation, the eldest having the first right, and the like right is then given to the "eldest male lineal descendant" of his three sons respectively in the order aforesaid, if he be capable by law; otherwise the eldest male lineal descendant of the next brother is to present. In this clause the testator shews that he did regard priority of line and primogeniture, for the first right is given to his eldest son, and then the like right is given to the eldest male lineal descendant of his three sons respectively, in the order aforesaid, if he be capable by law. By the words "in the order aforesaid" the testator appears to have meant that the eldest male lineal descendant of his eldest son shall have the first right, in preference to the eldest male lineal descendant of his second or third son. If this be so, and the testator has in terms in this clause preferred the male lineal descendant of his eldest son to the male lineal descendants of his second and third sons, it can hardly be that this preference should not prevail amongst the male descendants of the eldest son themselves, but that the oldest man amongst them should have the preference, and not the eldest in line.

If, then, the construction of the words "eldest male lineal descendant" in the advowson clause is that contended for by the respondents, it would seem to follow as a consequence, that the same words in the other parts of the will would have the same meaning. In an early part of the will the testator directs that his premises at Plaistow shall be sold, and says that if sold by private contract any of his three sons (a preference being given to the eldest in the choice, and in case of his refusal to the second son,) shall be at liberty to become the purchaser; that being another instance to shew that he was by no means indisposed to give a preference and advantage to primogeniture and the oldest line of descent.

That which is called the remainder clause was the subject of much comment during the argument. The words are, "remainder to the second, third, fourth, and every other male lineal descendant then living (who shall be incapable of taking as heir in tail male of any of the persons to whom a prior estate is hereby directed to be limited) of my son Peter Isaac successively in tail male." The construction put upon that clause by the respondents appears to me to be the true one, and that the word "successively" is hardly compatible with the construction that has been suggested, that the remainder is to second eldest, third eldest, and so on. The words are descriptive of those who are to take after the first taker by purchase, not as purchasers, but in ordinary succession in the male line. And the words in the parenthesis appear to me to have been introduced, it may be, ex abundanti cautela, to provide that those who took in succession under the succession clause should not take as purchasers, but by way of limitation in succession, as suggested by Lord Eldon, in the case of Oddie v. Woodford.

Many cases were cited upon the argument, to which I forbear to refer; for, as has been truly observed, the provisions of this will and the language used in it are so peculiar, that no case upon the construction to be given to other wills can at all assist in the construction of this.

The will itself has, however, come in question in two cases. In the first of these cases, reported in 1 New Reports, and 4 Vesey, jun., the general validity of the will, which was said to be void on the ground of remoteness, came in question. The case was carried to the House of Lords, and judgment given, as it had been in the courts below, in favour of the validity of the will. No objection appears to have been taken to the will upon the ground of uncertainty as to the persons who were to take under it when the period of accumulation ceased. As that objection, if it be one, might have been taken then, and was not, it may well be doubted whether it is competent for any one claiming through or under those who were parties to that suit to take it now. I am, however, of opinion that there is no uncertainty in the will as to the person who is to take at the time when the accumulation ceases, for the reasons which I have already given.

In the second of the cases in which this will was in question, reported under the name of Oddie v. Woodford, the proper construction to be given to the language of the advowson clause, and incidentally to that of the devising clause, was considered both in the Court of Chancery and in the House of Lords; and, as far as the opinions then given by Lord Eldon and the other learned persons before whom the case was heard have any bearing upon the questions proposed by your Lordships, they are decidedly in favour of the construction put upon the language of the devise by the respondents.

Upon the whole, it appears to me that, upon the most reasonable construction that can be given to the terms of the devising clause, in connexion with the other clauses and language of the will, the word "eldest" used in it as descriptive of the person who is to take a lot as a purchaser when the time of accumulation ceased does not mean the oldest man amongst his male lineal descendants, but that the testator meant and intended that the person who would be the heir-at-law of Peter Isaac in tail male should take one of the lots as purchaser by the designation of his eldest male lineal descendant.

June 9. — LORD CRANWORTH, after stating the will and the questions that had arisen upon it, said that it was plainly the testator's object, by an unprecedented accumulation, to create enormous wealth for the purpose of founding three families, but beyond that there was nothing to be discovered in the will indicating any capricious intention as to who should take the property. On the contrary, everything shewed that the testator had the ordinary rules of succession in his mind. The gift was confined to males—the persons benefited were to take in tail male only. The first choice of the estate, after the trustees should have made the division, was given to the representative of the eldest son, and to him, too, was given the first preference in presenting to the living. And the succession of the sons after the deaths was to follow the same rule. The construction contended for by the appellant would contradict the whole of this arrangement, and would postpone the estate of the present Lord Rendlesham to that of his uncle, they being the only male lineal descendants of Peter Isaac, to whom estates by purchase were limited by the will. Had there been more than two persons to take, the anomalous nature of the way in which they were to take (could the appellant's construction have been adopted) would have been more apparent. It was impossible to suppose that the testator could have intended that there should be such a shifting of the possessors of the estates as must follow the adoption of the appellant's construction. It was no answer to this objection to say, that every devisee in succession would be tenant in tail male, and so might acquire the fee, for there might happen many circumstances which would prevent him doing so, and, at all events, it was not to be supposed that the testator had created capricious limitations in the belief that their capriciousness would be rendered inoperative by the act of the first taker. On the other hand, as the testator must of course have wished that the limitations he had created should be observed, there could be little doubt that the tendency to alter limitations that were of the ordinary kind and not capricious, being less than the tendency to alter those that were capricious, would of itself suggest to him a preference for limitations of the former kind. Reading the will, therefore, with every inclination to follow the rule that words must have their ordinary meaning assigned to them, he felt no doubt that the meaning to be given to these words must be that which was the ordinary construction of such a devise, and the estate must be held to go to the person who at the specified time was heir male of the body of Peter Isaac. The words were technical—they were used technically, and they must have their ordinary technical meaning assigned to them, and taken to mean descent in the male line according to the ordinary course of law. The decision of Lord Eldon on the advowson clause was exactly in point with the construction to be put on the clause now under discussion. The word "eldest" did not mean oldest in point of age, but must be taken to mean "first," namely, the person first entitled to succeed according to the ordinary rules of descent. The decree of the Court below must therefore be affirmed.

LORD ST. LEONARDS concurred—expressing a strong opinion that the question as to the alleged uncertainty of the devise had been concluded by the decision which took place in 1825. As to the other question, what was the meaning of the words? he was of opinion that, as they were the words of a lawyer, they must receive a lawyer's construction. But in truth there was not an educated man in the country who, knowing what the ordinary modes of settlement were, would not put the same meaning upon them. It was true that "eldest," as a mere word, might have two interpretations; it might mean eldest in point of age without reference to primogeniture. But in reference to settlements, it never did mean that. This will was a settlement of real estate. And nobody could doubt that here the testator really intended the eldest son of Peter Isaac as the first tenant in tail, and so went on adopting the rule of primogeniture. The decision on the advowson clause (6) was in entire conformity with this construction, and the clause itself shewed in a very clear manner the testator's preference for primogeniture over mere age.

LORD WENSLEYDALE was of the same opinion.—The word "eldest" must here be construed as having reference to primogeniture, and he said this with the full intention of adhering to the rule laid down by Mr. Justice Burton in Warburton v. Loveland (7) and adopted in the most recent instance, in Grey v. Pearson. "Eldest" did not necessarily mean oldest in point of age, for even applied to an individual having a particular character, it had a different meaning. The eldest magistrate or officer might not mean him who had lived the greatest number of years, nor even him who had filled the office for the longest time, for it might indicate rank only, and the "eldest earl of England"

(6) 3 Myl. & Cr. 584.

(7) 1 Hadson & Brooke (Ir.), 648; s. c. 2 Dow. & Cl. 480.

would not mean him who was most advanced in years, but the eldest in point of family origin—the premier earl. Here, used as it was with other words, it meant, not the eldest in age, but the eldest in heritable blood in the male line. As to the advowson clause, if any semblance of argument of a different sort was to be deduced from that clause, it was explained by this, that the testator was manifestly labouring under the erroneous belief that an infant could not present, and so framed this clause that by the power of presentation being for the time lodged in a person legally able to make it, the presentation should not go out of the family. There was no uncertainty in the will, nor any intestacy as to any part of it.

LORD BROUGHAM would not take part in the decision as he had not heard the whole of the argument. But the decision entirely accorded with the impression existing in his mind, formed upon the hearing of that portion of the case in the hearing of which he had taken part.

Arrangement Clauses — Per-Centage under Section 54. of the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106.

A proposal for a composition was filed by a petitioning debtor under the arrangement clauses of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, and in this proposal was inserted, at the suggestion of the Court, a clause providing that the debtor's estate should be vested in the official assignee until payment of the composition. The debtor continued in possession of the estate, and at the time appointed paid the composition:—Held, that the per-centage required by the 54th section to be paid to the chief registrar's fund was, under these circumstances, payable by the debtor.

This was a petition, presented by C. Vero and J. Everett, praying the repayment to them of a sum of 39*l.* 7*s.*, the amount of per-centage payable under the 54th section of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849.

On the 26th of May 1858 Messrs. Vero & Everett presented a petition, under the arrangement clauses of the Consolidation Act, for an arrangement with their creditors under the controul of the Court. Subsequently they filed a proposal for the payment of 7*s.* 6*d.* in the pound within one month after the confirmation of the proposal, under the 216th section. This was agreed to by the creditors, and at the suggestion of the Registrar, acting for the Commissioner, a clause was inserted to provide for the vesting of the estate and effects in the official assignee until payment of the composition. No order was made for vesting the estate in the official assignee, and the petitioners remained in possession. On the payment of the amount of the composition to the official assignee, he demanded the per-centage payable to the chief registrar's account under the 54th section, such per-centage to be calculated upon the entire amount of the composition and debts payable in full. The petitioners paid this per-centage, amounting to 39*l.* 7*s.*, and now sought to have the same repaid to them.

The petition was partly heard before the Lords Justices, and afterwards brought before the Lord Chancellor.

Mr. De Gex, for the petitioners, contended that the estate had not been so vested in the official assignee as to make this per-centage payable; the 54th section requiring that the vesting should be "in manner hereinafter mentioned," and the 218th section providing that the property should vest, if required by the resolution, as fully as under a bankruptcy. Under the old law two fees of 20*l.* and 10*l.* were payable, and the fees now in question were in substitution for them. Considerable discussion arose as to those fees being payable where assignees had not been chosen, and ultimately Knight Bruce, V.C. decided that they were not—Ex parte Reynolds, re Reynolds (1). In fiscal regulations acts of parliament will be construed strictly.—

Hobson v. Neale, 17 Beav. 178.

Mr. Clement Swanston appeared for the chief registrar and accountant in bankruptcy, but was not called upon.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said that he was not desirous of charging the bankrupt's estate with more than was necessary, but he must follow the provisions of the act. It appeared to him that the object of charging the bankrupt's estate with this per-centage was not to provide for the remuneration of the Court or of the official assignee on account of the trouble incurred, but, in fact, to make a party who came to the Court for its assistance chargeable to the funds of the Court for the assistance which he derived. In the present case it was intended that there should be an arrangement between the petitioners and their creditors, under the inspection and subject to the controul of the Court. By that arrangement a composition of 7*s.* 6*d.* in the pound was proposed. But in order to effect that composition with their creditors, it was not necessary to have come to the Court at all. On a consideration of the different sections of the act, his Lordship thought that the arrangement with their creditors might have resulted in a certificate to the petitioners without this estate finding its way into the hands of the official assignee. His Lordship read the 221st section, and said that the parties here chose to make an agreement, by which it was arranged that until payment of the proposed composition the petitioners' estate and effects were to vest in the official assignee, in trust to pay the creditors and the fees to the Court, and that on such payment the estate should revert in the petitioners. Mr. De Gex had argued that, under the resolution, the property vested in the official assignee conditionally, and only for the interim between the resolution of the creditors and the payment of the composition, and that it did not vest as fully as in the case of a bankruptcy, which was requisite for the purpose of the 218th section, and therefore of the 54th section. But if the estate were vested at all in the assignee it was absolutely vested, and vested moreover for the purpose of raising money (if necessary) to pay the composition; and, certainly, if the composition were not paid the official assignee would have power to realize from the estate sufficient to satisfy the creditors. Could it then be said that the estate and effects had not vested? If they were vested in the official assignee, Mr. De Gex admitted that, under the 54th section, there arose the liability to pay the per-centage. The petition must be dismissed.

Mr. Clement Swanston asked that the petition might be dismissed with costs, but

The LORD CHANCELLOR dismissed the petition without costs.

Partnership—Assignment for Benefit of Creditors—Double Proof.

Two traders, partners, assigned the partnership property to trustees for the benefit of their creditors, after full payment to whom, the trustees were to hold the residue, upon trust to divide the same between the partners according to the deed of partnership. The partners had previously given their joint and several promissory note to their bankers for 1,500*l.* The bankers, by their public officer, executed the assignment for 2,755*l.*, which included the 1,500*l.* One of the partners afterwards became bankrupt. A suit was instituted in the Court of Chancery

*to carry into effect the trusts of the deed of assignment, and a decree for that purpose was pronounced. The bankers were admitted, under the bankruptcy, to prove against the separate estate of the bankrupt for the 1,500*l.* due on the promissory note; and the same was affirmed, on appeal.*

The technical rule against double proof does not apply where, as here, the partnership estate is not being administered in bankruptcy.

This was the petition of Mr. Thornton and others, the creditors' assignees of the estate of Mr. John Jobson, a bankrupt, praying that the decision of Mr. Commissioner Balguy, of the Birmingham District Court of Bankruptcy, might be reversed or varied. The decision of the Commissioner was a refusal to expunge a proof for 1,500*l.* The facts of the case were as follows:—

Mr. John Jobson and his brother Robert for some years before 1852 carried on the business, first at Sheffield and afterwards at Litchurch, near Derby, of stove, grate and fender manufacturers, under the style of Jobson & Co.; and Robert carried on a separate trade at Wordsley, in Staffordshire. Messrs. Jobson & Co. kept an account with the Rotherham bank at Sheffield, and on the 5th of March 1852 they gave to the bank a joint and several promissory note for 1,500*l.*, payable on demand for money due. On the 14th of January 1857 they executed to Mr. W. Brown, the manager of the bank, an assignment of their partnership property and effects for the benefit of their creditors. The trusts of this indenture were declared to be to call in and collect the property and effects thereby assigned, and as soon as conveniently might be to sell the same, and out of the monies to arise from such sale, in the first place, to pay all costs and charges; and, in the second place, when and so often as by the means aforesaid sufficient money should come to the hands of the said trustee, to pay a dividend at the rate of 4*s.* in the pound upon the debts of the several creditors, parties thereto, of the said Robert Jobson and John Jobson, as such co-partners as aforesaid, to pay and divide the same rateably among the creditors mentioned in the schedule, according to the amount of their respective debts, until the same, with interest on such of the same as carried interest at the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum, from the day of the date of the said indenture, should be fully paid and satisfied; and to divide the surplus, if any, of the said monies and premises pursuant to the terms, provisoes and conditions of the articles of partnership therein mentioned, entered into by them, the said Robert Jobson and John Jobson, as such co-partners as aforesaid. And in the same indenture was contained a proviso that that indenture or any clause, matter or thing therein contained should not extend or be construed to extend to invalidate, prejudice, or in any manner affect any mortgages, charges or other specific securities or liens which any of such creditors, parties thereto, of the said co-partnership might have upon any of the real or personal estate of or belonging to them, or any security for or in respect of all or any of the debts due and owing to such last-mentioned creditors respectively, or any bonds, notes or securities given or payable by any person by way of security for the same debts, or any of them, or any part thereof respectively; but that all such several mortgages, charges, securities, liens, and also all such bonds, bills, notes and other securities as aforesaid, should be and continue as available both at law and in equity in the hands of the several creditors, parties thereto, holding the same, to all intents and purposes as if the same indenture had never been made or executed. And it was thereby expressly agreed and declared, that the said indenture should not in anywise prejudice or affect the rights or remedies of the said several creditors, parties thereto, against the respective separate estates of the said Robert Jobson and John Jobson, for the amount of their several and respective debts, or so much thereof respectively as should not be satisfied by means of the provision thereby made. The bank, by their public officer, executed this deed as creditors for the sum of 2,755*l.* 1*s.* 11*d.* for money due. On the following day, Robert Jobson assigned his separate estate for benefit of his creditors. On the 19th of March 1858, a bill in Chancery was filed by one of the creditors of the partnership to carry into effect the deed of the 14th of January 1857, and a decree was made in the suit according to the prayer of the bill. On the 31st of March 1857, John Jobson was adjudicated bankrupt on his own petition, and the bank tendered a proof against John Jobson's separate estate for 1,500*l.*, which was admitted. In July last the assignees applied to the Commissioner to expunge the proof, but he refused the application. From this decision the assignees of John Jobson appealed.

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Clement Swanston, for the appellants, submitted that, as the Rotherham Bank were already claimants for the 1,500*l.* under the assignment of the 14th of January 1857, and were at the present time actually in course of payment under the decree of the Court of Chancery in execution of the trusts of that deed, the case was one of double proof, or in the nature of double proof, which the Court would not allow. They cited and remarked upon the following authorities:—

Mr. Swanston and Mr. De Gex were for the respondents.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—My learned Brother and myself will consider the case, and inform the respondents on a future day whether we consider it necessary that they should address the Court.

Nov. 25.—LORD JUSTICE TURNER (without hearing the respondents' counsel) said, that in this case two brothers, John and Robert Jobson, had been in business as partners, and Robert had also carried on a distinct trade at another place. The firm had kept their partnership banking account with the Rotherham bank at Sheffield, who were the respondents; and the partners, in March 1852, gave to the bank a joint and several promissory note for 1,500*l.* payable on demand. In January 1857 the partners assigned all their partnership estate and effects to the manager of the bank, upon trust for the benefit of their creditors, and the deed of assignment provided that the trustee should get in the property, and should convert it into money, and should thereout, after payment of all costs, distribute the surplus when and so often as it should amount to a sum sufficient to yield a dividend of 4*s.* in the pound amongst the creditors, parties to that deed. Any further surplus, after full payment of the creditors, was to be divided according to the terms of the deed of partnership between the brothers. The assignment also contained a proviso, that nothing therein contained should invalidate, prejudice or affect any mortgages, charges or other specific securities or liens, which any of the creditors, parties thereto, might have upon any part of the partnership property, in respect of any debts, &c. due to such creditors, or any bonds, notes or securities for the same; but that all such mortgages, &c., and all such bonds, &c., should be as available as if the said indenture had never been made or executed. And it was expressly agreed, that the indenture should not prejudice or affect the rights of the creditors against the respective separate estates of the said Robert Jobson and John Jobson. This deed was executed by the bank as creditors for 2,755*l.*, and shortly afterwards Robert Jobson assigned his separate estate for the benefit of his creditors. In March 1857 John Jobson was adjudicated bankrupt, and the Rotherham Bank were admitted to prove against his separate estate for the sum of 1,500*l.* secured by the promissory note. It was that proof that was objected to by the creditors' assignees of John Jobson's estate, and that their Lordships had to decide upon; but in his (the Lord Justice Turner's) view, the proof must be allowed to stand. The objection against it was, that, by the rule of the Court, proof against the joint estate and against the separate estate of the same bankrupt for the same debt was not allowed. His Lordship, however, said that he had heard no authority cited in which that rule had been held to apply to circumstances like those in the present case. It was hardly going too far to say that the rule in question was little else than a mere technical rule, and its foundation was this—that all the creditors of a bankrupt ought to be placed upon an equal footing in the administration of an estate under the jurisdiction in bankruptcy. Here, however, the joint estate of the partners was not being administered in bankruptcy; and any surplus of that estate was to be divided between the partners, according to the articles of their partnership. The only estate at all under administration in bankruptcy was the separate estate of John Jobson; and his Lordship thought that the technical rule referred to ought not to be extended any further, for it did not appear to him to be based upon any sound or distinct principle. The law would have given a remedy against both partners had they been solvent; and, if they were dead, there was in equity a remedy against the estates of both. The case of Ex parte Goldsmid had been relied on by the appellants; but his Lordship did not think that case in point—and even if it were in point, so far as it went, it was of but little authority, considering that the Court was divided in opinion, and that an appeal was now pending to the House of Lords. He should, therefore, prefer to rest his decision in the case rather upon the grounds which he had stated than on the authority of Ex parte Peacock and In re Plummer, which might possibly be distinguishable from the case now before the Court. The appeal must therefore be dismissed, with costs; but this would be without interference with the discretion of the learned Commissioner as to how they should be ultimately paid.

*Traders petitioned, under the 20th section of the Bankrupt Act of 1854, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 119, for adjudication against themselves, and satisfied the Commissioner that their available assets exceeded in value the sum of 150*l.* They were accordingly adju-* *dicated bankrupts; but it appearing at the certificate meeting that the assignees had not at that time actually realized that sum in cash out of the estate, the Commissioner postponed the grant of the certificate, adjourning the meeting for six months, with liberty for the bankrupts to apply when 150*l.* should be realized:—Held, upon appeal, that if it should appear, as alleged, that the assets were sufficient to satisfy the requisitions of the statute, but that the realization was only postponed for the benefit of the creditors, the bankrupts were entitled to an immediate certificate of the first class.*

This was an appeal from an order of the Commissioner of the District Court of Bankruptcy at Liverpool. From the statement of the counsel for the petitioners, it appeared that the bankrupts, William Smith Slater and Thomas Herbert, had, prior to their bankruptcy, carried on the business of timber-dealers at Birkenhead, and that on the 19th of August last they had presented a petition for adjudication against themselves, on which occasion they had proved to the Commissioner's satisfaction that their available estate amounted at that time to at least 150*l.*, the sum required by the act of parliament in that behalf; whereupon the Commissioner had adjudicated the petitioners bankrupts. The proceedings in the Bankruptcy Court had been duly prosecuted, and on the 3rd of November a sitting of the Court had been held for the purpose of granting the petitioners a certificate. On that occasion no creditor appeared to oppose the allowance of the certificate, and no objection was taken to the petitioners' conduct, either prior or subsequent to their bankruptcy; but, inasmuch as it appeared that the assignees of the petitioners' estate had not then realized 150*l.* in cash, the Commissioner adjourned the sittings for the allowance of the certificate to each of the bankrupts for six calendar months, for the purpose of enabling them to make payment of that sum, with liberty for them to apply in the mean time if 150*l.* should be paid to the official assignee, either by the realizing of the bankrupts' estate, or payment made by them, or on their behalf.

From this order of the Commissioner the bankrupts appealed.

The 20th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1854, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 119, which repeals the 93rd section of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, provides "that any trader may petition for adjudication of bankruptcy against himself; but unless he shall forthwith after filing his petition, and before adjudication of bankruptcy thereunder, make it appear to the satisfaction of the Court that his available estate is sufficient to produce the sum of 150*l.* at the least, his petition shall be dismissed."

Mr. Bardswell, in support of the appeal, contended that there was nothing in the several sections of the Bankrupt Act of 1854 which would justify the Commissioner in withholding the certificate, on the ground on which he had founded his judgment. The 93rd section of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 106.), which was repealed by the 20th section of the act of 1854, required the available estate of bankrupts petitioning for adjudication against themselves to be sufficient to pay 5*s.* in the pound. Here the bankrupts had satisfied the Commissioner that they had available assets to the amount of 150*l.*, and the representations made by them as to the value of their estate at the time of their presenting their petition for adjudication were unquestionably correct, and its value at the present time was considerably more than 150*l.*, but the assignees were unwilling to make a forced sale of the estate, as such a step would be most prejudicial to the interests of the bankrupts' creditors. Mr. Bardswell urged that, under these circumstances, the petitioners were entitled to an immediate certificate, and that, inasmuch as no opposition had been raised by any creditor, and no imputation whatever had been cast on any part of the petitioners' conduct, the certificate to be awarded them should be of the first class. Even assuming for the sake of argument, and for that alone, that the assets for any reason were not sufficient to produce 150*l.*, there were no clauses of the act of parliament applicable to such a state of circumstances; while in instances of applications for adjudication on the petition of a creditor power was given to the Court to annul an adjudication, the act being silent as to annulling when the petition was by the trader himself. All that the act said was, that if it be not proved to the satisfaction of the Commissioner that there are assets available to the extent of 150*l.*, the petition is to be dismissed; but it did not say that in such case the adjudication should be annulled. Here the petition had been entertained and the prayer granted, and the act being silent as to annulling, it was not competent to the Commissioner to adjourn the petition, as he had done in this case. The learned counsel repeated that the certificate ought to be granted, and of the first class.

It appeared by the evidence before the Commissioner, and from the testimony of Mr. Pemberton, the bankrupts' solicitor, who was examined videlicet by the Lords Justices, that the bankrupts' estate consisted principally of machinery and other trade fixtures, which might, if sold in an advantageous manner, realize more than 2,000*l.*, and which were worth as old material more than 400*l.*; and that the reason why the money had not been yet realized was solely that the assignees were unwilling to force a sale lest the property should be parted with below its value.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE said, that if their Lordships interfered at all in this case, it would be solely on the ground that at the time of presenting the petition of adjudication, at the time of adjudication, and all along, the bankrupts were really possessed of property worth more than 150*l.*, and that the postponement of realization of that amount was to be attributed to the assignees in the exercise of their judgment as to what would be most beneficial to the creditors.

Mr. De Gex, for the assignees, supported the application, observing that the assignees, both trade and official, considered the petition reasonable.

Their LORDSHIPS requested Mr. Vizard, the registrar, to communicate with the Registrar at Liverpool, and directed that if there was no other objection to the allowance of a certificate to the bankrupts, certificates of the first class should be immediately awarded to them both.

The Commissioner subsequently communicated with their Lordships, and the certificate was granted.

Trader-Debtor Summons—Admission of Debt—Irregularity—Taking Affidavit and Admission off the File of Proceedings.

A creditor, after assigning his debt, filed an affidavit of such debt (under the act 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. s. 18.), and caused the alleged debtor to be served with a demand of immediate payment, and summoned him before the Court of Bankruptcy to state whether or not he admitted the demand of the creditor. The registrar (before whom the summons was heard) declining to enter into the question whether the debt had been assigned, and requiring the alleged debtor to state whether he admitted the debt or any part thereof, the debtor filed an admission as to part of the debt and a deposition that he had a good answer to the residue of the creditor's demand:—Held, upon appeal, that the creditor was not justified in making an affidavit of debt after assignment without the concurrence of the assignor, and that the alleged debtor was entitled to have his admission and deposition taken off the file.

Semble—that a proceeding by summons of a trader debtor, if taken by the assignor and assignee of a debt jointly, would not be objectionable.

This was the petition of Mr. James Taylor, of Exeter, contractor, setting forth that Mr. William Wolland, of the same city, timber-dealer, on the 7th of December 1858, signed a demand under the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, whereby he demanded of the petitioner the sum of 445*l.* 3*s.* 10*d.*, and caused the same to be served at the office of the petitioner on the same day; that Wolland also obtained a summons from the Commissioner of the Exeter District, dated the 8th of December, but did not personally serve it, but sent a copy through his solicitor, Mr. Stogdon, to the petitioner's solicitor, Mr. Daw, on the 13th of December; that the summons required the petitioner to appear personally before the said Court on the 16th of December, in order to ascertain if he admitted the debt or any and what part thereof; that the petitioner and Wolland had had large dealings together, and the petitioner had paid large sums on account, but Wolland had never, until after the 20th of December 1858 delivered a full statement of the amount due to him; that Wolland had, by deed, dated the 23rd of September 1858, assigned to William Tombs, the manager of the West of England and South Wales District Bank at Exeter 100*l.*, part of the debt by the same deed said to be due from the petitioner; and that Wolland had by deed assigned the remainder of the debt alleged to be due from the petitioner to his (Wolland's) solicitor, John Stogdon. The petition then alleged that there were various items in Wolland's bill of charges, which he, the petitioner, disputed. And it went on to state that the petitioner, on the 15th of December, caused a summons to be issued out of the said court, directed to Wolland, requiring him to appear and produce the two assignments and all accounts between him and the petitioner and to be then and there examined, and that the summons was served personally on the same day; that he also issued and served summonses on the two assignees of the debt, of the same date and for the same purposes; that the petitioner attended at the said court on the 16th of December and had witnesses in attendance, and on his name being called by the officer of the court, his solicitor claimed the right of examining Wolland on the subject of his claim against the petitioner, but the registrar, who sat for the Commissioner, decided that the examination could not take place; that the said solicitor then proposed to examine Wolland as to his having assigned the debt, but the registrar would not allow it; and that after other claims and refusals, the registrar called on the petitioner to admit or deny the debt, whereupon the petitioner, "knowing that he owed a debt of 108*l.* 5*s.* 10*d.*, and being thus kept in ignorance of whether the debt had been assigned or not, was compelled to sign an acknowledgment that he did owe the said debt of 108*l.* 5*s.* 10*d.* to Wolland, in order to prevent being declared a bankrupt under the act of 1849, although your petitioner believes that 100*l.*, part of the same, has been assigned to the said W. Tombs and the residue to the said J. Stogdon." The petitioner stated that he was not in embarrassed circumstances, and that the only object of his summoning Wolland was to shew that various sums he had charged on account were not due, and that there was only due from the petitioner to him 108*l.* 5*s.* 10*d.*, and to ascertain the truth of the assignments having been made, and the only object of summoning Tombs and Stogdon was to ascertain whether they claimed and were entitled to receive any part of the said debt. The petition prayed that the admission of the debt of 108*l.* 5*s.* 10*d.*, signed under the pressure aforesaid, might be declared void and be cancelled, and the affidavit made by the petitioner on the 16th of December 1858 might be taken off the file and delivered up to the petitioner, and that he might be paid his costs of the proceedings at Exeter and here, and attendance of witnesses.

It has been found necessary to state the case at this length in order to make the case intelligible, but the real question in dispute was the payment of the costs in Exeter and in London.

Mr. Shapter and Mr. Karlake were for the petitioner.

Mr. Bacon, for the respondents.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—In this case there was an assignment, if not of the whole debt, of at least the greater part of the debt, and of this assignment the debtor had notice. Notwithstanding such assignment and notice, the creditor takes proceedings to make the debtor a bankrupt under the provisions of "the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849." If these proceedings had been taken in conjunction and combination with the assignee of the debt, perhaps no substantial objection could be taken to the course adopted. It is not necessary in this case so to decide; but, as at present informed, I see no reason why, — acting jointly, — an assignor and assignee of a debt may not take proceedings for the purpose of making a trader-debtor bankrupt. But here it does not appear to be the proceeding of both assignor and assignee. The West of England and South Wales Bank, to which the debt to the extent of 100*l.* was assigned, were and are entitled to treat the proceeding taken by the respondent as not affecting them. In fact, the proceeding must be regarded as taken by Mr. Wolland alone, who filed an affidavit that a debt was due to him after he had assigned that debt to Mr. Tombs as representing the bank. The admission as to the sum of 108*l.* filed by the appellant was caused by Mr. Wolland, for the alleged debtor might well have thought after Mr. Wolland's affidavit that the debt was not assigned; and I think the petitioner is entitled to have the admission and deposition taken off the file, if, indeed, that is in any respect important. The proceeding being wrong in its inception, Mr. Wolland, who gave rise to the proceeding, is in my opinion bound to pay all such costs as have been properly incurred.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—I entirely agree. The question whether the registrar was right or wrong in refusing to hear evidence whether the debt was assigned we are not required to decide. The proceedings complained of were originated by Mr. Wolland, who, after executing a formal deed of assignment to the West of England and South Wales Bank of 100*l.* of the debt due from Mr. Taylor, goes to the Bankruptcy Court and swears that this was a debt due to him from Taylor. This cannot be justified, but it has been suggested that the assignee of the debt concurred in Wolland's proceedings. If the assignee of a debt concurs in a proceeding of this nature, under which the debtor may be made bankrupt, it ought to be done plainly, in a form which would enable the debtor to say with certainty to whom he should pay the debt demanded of him. There is no pretence for saying that the proceedings in this case gave the debtor the information to which he was entitled. The respondent must therefore pay the costs fairly incurred by the appellant, but there has been a great deal that is immaterial introduced.

It was finally agreed that the respondent should pay 50*l.* for costs, unless they preferred having the costs taxed. The admission and deposition filed by the respondent to be taken off the file.

Arrangement Clauses of the Bankrupt Act, 1849 — Trader-Debtor Summons — Adjudication—Costs.

A creditor on a bill of exchange accepted by traders issued a writ for recovery of the amount on the 21st of October. On the 28th of October the debtor served him with notice that a petition for private arrangement had been filed on the 26th. The creditor then discontinued his action, but on the 30th he caused notice to be served requiring immediate payment and proceeded on a trader-debtor summons for the same amount. The traders admitted the debt, but as they failed to pay at the expiration of the time limited, they were adjudicated bankrupts. One of the Commissioners confirmed the adjudication; but, upon appeal, Held, that his decision must be reversed.

Costs, under the particular circumstances, were not given against the petitioning creditor.

This was a petition of appeal from an order of Mr. Commissioner Goulburn, affirming an adjudication under the following circumstances:—Messrs. William Arnold, sen., William Arnold, jun., and Henry Arnold were adjudicated bankrupt on the 26th of November 1858, upon the petition of one Mr. Slann, a creditor for 67*l.* 13*s.* 10*d.*, in respect of a bill of exchange, dated the 17th of July 1858, and drawn upon and accepted by the bankrupts, payable three months after date. The act of bankruptcy was non-payment after formal admission of the debt under a trader-debtor summons within the time prescribed by the 81st section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1849. It appeared that Mr. Slann, having made several unsuccessful applications for payment, caused a writ to be issued against them under the Bills of Exchange Act, 1855, on or about the 21st of October last, and on the 28th he received notice from the bankrupts' solicitors that a petition for private arrangement under the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, 1849, had been filed on the 26th, and protection granted to the bankrupts until the 26th of November following, the day appointed for the first private sitting under the arrangement. Upon receiving this notice, Mr. Slann discontinued his action, and on the 30th of October he caused particulars of demand and notice requiring immediate payment to be served upon the bankrupts. The money not being paid, an affidavit of debt, as required by the act, was filed on the 2nd of November, and on the same day a trader-debtor summons was sued out, returnable on the 10th; on that day the bankrupts attended at the Court of Bankruptcy, in obedience to the summons, and objected to answer whether or not they admitted the debt, on the ground that they had filed their petition for arrangement and obtained the protection of the Court "from all process" before any proceedings were instituted in bankruptcy in regard to this particular debt. The Commissioner, however, decided that they must answer, whereupon they filed an admission of the debt in the usual course. The debt was not "paid, secured or compounded for to the satisfaction of the creditor" within the seven days prescribed by section 81. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1849, whereby the act of bankruptcy complained of was committed on the eighth day after the filing of such admission. The petition for adjudication was filed on the 19th of November, and adjudication followed on the 26th. Notice to dispute the act of bankruptcy was given on the 30th, and the case came on for argument before the Commissioner on the 4th of December last, when his Honour affirmed the adjudication (1), but at the same time stayed the same to give the bankrupts an opportunity of appealing to the Lords Justices. Accordingly a petition of appeal was presented and answered for the 11th of December. The petition stated, amongst other things, that "the messenger of the Court of Bankruptcy is now and has been since the 26th of November, in possession of your petitioners' residence and place of business, and of all your petitioners' stock in trade, machinery and effects, and that your petitioners are in tended time, not exceeding fourteen days in the whole, as the Court shall think fit, from the service of such duplicate, to shew cause to the Court against the validity of such adjudication: and if such person shall within such time shew to the satisfaction of the Court that the petitioning creditor's debt, trading, and act of bankruptcy upon which such adjudication has been grounded, or any or either of such matters, are insufficient to support such adjudication, &c., the Court shall order such adjudication to be annulled." The ex parte adjudication was made by Mr. Commissioner Holroyd, with a knowledge of all the facts. Neither the petitioning creditor's debt, the trading, nor the act of bankruptcy, are, in fact, the subject in dispute. The question raised is quite distinct from any of them. It is whether or not a bankruptcy can go on, the bankrupt having already presented a petition for arrangement with his creditors under the superintendence and controul of the Court, and obtained protection for his person and property. It is said, on behalf of the alleged bankrupts, that the two proceedings cannot be allowed to go on together, for that they would necessarily jostle and interfere with each other; but I think that question is not properly raised by these proceedings. It is also said that there is no act of bankruptcy, because process had been staved off by the petition for arrangement and the protection of the Court, and that, therefore, the trader-debtor summons issued by the petitioning creditor in this case, and on which the act of bankruptcy is founded, is a nullity. In this view I cannot for one moment concur, and it seems to me to be at variance with the decisions of the Court of Appeal in the cases of Ex parte Walker (1) and Ex parte Dales (2). In the first of these cases Lord Justice Turner expressly declared that it was the duty of this Court to proceed to bankruptcy upon a trader-debtor summons, when an act of bankruptcy founded on such summons was complete, and the Lord Justice also clearly intimated his opinion that the protection from process granted under the statute to an arranging debtor did not apply to proceedings under a petition for adjudication of bankruptcy. In that case the only doubt entertained by the Court of Appeal was, whether the petitioning creditor had not delayed the presentation of his petition for adjudication too this respect and otherwise aggrieved by the order of the 4th of December instant, confirming the said adjudication." On the hearing of that petition, on the 20th of December, the Lords Justices made an order directing that "upon a bond (required by the statute) being executed, with two sureties, to the satisfaction of the Commissioner, the messenger should be withdrawn, and the proceedings under the bankruptcy should be stayed. In default of such bond being given, the mes-

(1) The judgment of the Commissioner was as follows:—In this case the Messrs. Arnold disputed an adjudication of bankruptcy under the 104th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1849, which allows seven days to shew cause against the validity of the adjudication. The 104th clause says, "And such person shall be allowed seven days, or such ex-

long. No such question arises in the present case, as the petition for adjudication was filed the day after the act of bankruptcy was complete. In the case of Ex parte Dales the only question was, whether the creditor who had issued the trader-debtor summons, not having acted upon the admission of the debt obtained under it as an act of bankruptcy by proceeding to an adjudication, another creditor could do so upon the same act of bankruptcy, the debtor having presented a petition for arrangement, and obtained his protection in the mean time; and this question the Court decided, without hearing the respondent's counsel. The two cases cited appear to me to be conclusive of the question I am now called upon to determine. Other cases were cited (3) on behalf of the petitioning creditor; but I confess I am unable to see their applicability to the present case. On the part of the bankrupts my attention was directed to the dates of the various proceedings, but it does not appear to me that the dates are material. The real question is, whether the filing of a petition for arrangement by an insolvent trader is to preclude a creditor who has a just debt of sufficient amount from proceeding in bankruptcy to compel an equal distribution of the debtor's assets. I cannot understand why the creditor should be restrained from following up the remedy which the law gives him, and taking proceedings in bankruptcy against him, because of the debtor's own act; and, therefore, my judgment will be to confirm the adjudication. Mr. Bagley forcibly urged upon me that the two proceedings under the arrangement clauses and the proceeding in bankruptcy were incompatible and could not be permitted to go on together, and so far I agree with him. By the adjudication of bankruptcy all the bankrupt's property is vested in the official assignee. Under the arrangement the property does not necessarily vest in the assignee. But here the property upon which the petitioners relied as the means of carrying the arrangement into effect is gone; and I think the petition for arrangement ought to be dismissed, and for this reason, because there is nothing for it to operate upon. I, therefore, propose to confirm the adjudication and dismiss the petition for arrangement.

senger to remain in possession and the appeal petition to stand over until the first petition day after the next term, and the proceedings for the then arrangement to go on." During the argument Mr. Lucas, one of the counsel for the petitioning creditor, said that the point had been adjudged by Mr. Commissioner Holroyd in a case of Ex parte Hills (2), in which he held, that

(2) Mr. Commissioner Holroyd, in giving judgment, said:—It appears to me that this adjudication of bankruptcy must stand. I think the objections which have been urged do not constitute a valid ground for upsetting it. As regards the delay which is alleged to have taken place previously to presenting the petition for adjudication, I think the legislature itself has defined what should be considered a reasonable time for presenting such petition upon an act of bankruptcy like that upon which the adjudication in this case is grounded. By the 76th section of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, it is provided that a petition for adjudication of bankruptcy against a trader who has presented a petition for arrangement with his creditors under the provisions of that act must be filed within two months after such petition for arrangement shall have been dismissed. I think the provision which I have cited amounts to a legislative declaration of what is to be deemed a reasonable time for presenting a petition for adjudication in bankruptcy in such a case as the present. I am therefore of opinion that the objection as to the delay cannot prevail. Then as to the next, and indeed the main question, it is said that the adjudication should be annulled because the bankrupt had filed a petition for arrangement with his creditors under the 211th section, and had, previously to the filing of the petition for adjudication, obtained the protection of the Court for his person and property from all process. What then is the true construction of the term "from all process"? I think the act must be construed strictly and for the benefit of the creditors, and looking at it in that view, I think the word "process" here must mean process in a suit for a party's own exclusive benefit, and that it does not extend to a proceeding like a petition for an adjudication of bankruptcy for the benefit of creditors in general, and under which, upon the adjudication, the property is affected by operation of law, and not by act of the party. I think the opinion of Lord Justice Turner, in Ex parte Walker is very important in its bearing upon this case. His Lordship says: "With respect to the meaning of the word 'process' such a construction must be put upon the act as will make it consistent. With this view the word 'process' should, I think, be construed as not applying to an adjudication of bankruptcy, even if it would be otherwise properly applicable to such a proceeding, which I doubt very much." The subsequent case of Ex parte Dales, and the practice in this court, since the case of Ex parte Walker, of receiving and acting upon a petition for adjudication notwithstanding the pendency of a petition for arrangement, and the grant of protection by the Court from all pro-

the word "process" in the 211th section of the Bankrupt Act, 1849, meant process in a suit for a party's own benefit, and did not extend to a proceeding like an adjudication in bankruptcy. The case of Ex parte Hills was where a trader filed a petition for private arrangement and obtained his protection under the same, and then a petition for adjudication was presented against him, and he was thereunder declared bankrupt: the adjudication, which was disputed, was held good. On the 14th of January 1859 the adjourned petition of appeal came on for argument, the bond having been given.

Mr. Selwyn and Mr. Bagley, for the bankrupts, said that the cases of Ex parte Walker (3) and Ex parte Dales (4), which had been relied upon by the learned Commissioner in his judgment, were very materially distinguishable from the present, inasmuch as in both those cases proceedings in bankruptcy had been commenced before the petition for private arrangement was filed. It was, therefore, very properly held in each of those cases that the bankrupt could not set aside those proceedings in bankruptcy by instituting proceedings under the private arrangement clauses of the act. The learned counsel complained of the ruinous expense to which the bankrupts had been put by the whole proceedings, and among them, by the messenger being put into possession of their property.

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Lucas, were for the petitioning creditor.

Mr. Caillard, for another creditor, took no part in the discussion, which principally related to the costs.

Mr. Selwyn was heard in reply.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—I do not at present think the orders in Ex parte Walker and Ex parte Dales were erroneously made. The order of proceeding in the present instance differs in point of time from those two cases. In the case before the Court the petition for arrangement was presented on the 26th of October, and the order founded upon it, being the first under the arrangement clauses, was made on the 28th, upon which day the petitioning creditor was informed by letter that proceedings for an arrangement had been commenced. Knowing this the creditor proceeded, and on the 30th of October, and not before, he commenced proceedings for an adjudication of bankruptcy under a trader-debtor summons. This order of the proceedings in the matter makes the present case materially different from Ex parte Walker and Ex parte Dales; and adhering as I do to the orders made in both of those cases, I adhere also to the order which has been made in the present case; and as the proposal for an arrangement has been approved and adopted by the learned Commissioner, it is now the duty of this Court to annul the bankruptcy. Upon the question of costs, however, I think that the case stands in peculiar circumstances, and I am not disposed to visit the creditor with costs, nor do I think that he ought to receive any. Therefore, bearing in mind the course taken by the learned Commissioner and the particular circumstances of the case, I am of opinion that no costs ought to be given to either side, and I must repeat the expression of my great regret at what I have heard as to the large amount of costs which has been incurred in the matter.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—I entirely concur in the view of my learned Brother. The true position of the matter is this: that while the act leaves the creditor at liberty to proceed, it leaves him to proceed at his own peril. I am not prepared to say that there may not be many cases in which a creditor who takes proceedings after a petition for arrangement has been presented, may not subject himself to the costs of annulling the bankruptcy by proceeding under a trader-debtor summons. However, I am of opinion that in the circumstances of the present case, the petitioning creditor ought not to be ordered to pay the costs. He had the power and the legal right to proceed, although, if he proceeded it must be at his own peril, and he might render himself liable to the costs; but here the learned Commissioner has upheld his right, and, although he has taken a position which might have subjected him to an order for payment of costs, I think that he should not be ordered to pay them in this instance. The result is, that the adjudication must be annulled; both parties must bear their own costs, and the deposit be returned to the Messrs. Arnold.

Practice—Office Copies of Proceeding in annulled Adjudication.

One of the Commissioners having refused to order office copies of proceedings in an adjudication which had been annulled to be furnished, in aid of a defence to an action in a foreign court, the Lords Justices, without deciding whether the Commissioner was wrong or right in his refusal, ordered the office copies to be furnished on the usual terms.

This was an appeal from the refusal of Mr. Commissioner Perry, of the Liverpool District Court of Bankruptcy, to order the delivery to the petitioner, Mr. Sybrandt's agent, of office copies of the proceedings under a bankruptcy which had been annulled with the consent of the only creditor who had proved. The affidavit in support of the petition stated, that the petitioner and the bankrupt Mr. Nevins had been partners in New Orleans. The bankrupt had afterwards traded alone in Liverpool, and after the bankruptcy the petitioner claimed a balance as due to him on the final adjustment of the partnership accounts. The assignees insisted that the balance was on the other side, and the question was submitted by the petitioner and the assignees to arbitration, the result of which was, that a debt of 1,600*l.* and upwards was awarded to be due from the bankrupt's estate to the petitioner, and a proof was intended to be made for that amount. Before, however, any proof was actually made, the bankruptcy was annulled, with the consent of the trade assignee, who was the only creditor who had proved. The petitioner, Mr. Sybrandt, and the bankrupt, Mr. Nevins, returned to America, where the latter took proceedings against the former on the subject of the accounts which had been referred to arbitration, and the petitioner, being advised that office copies of the proceedings in the bankruptcy were essential to the successful defence of the American suit, applied for such copies. Mr. Commissioner Perry held that, as the bankruptcy had been annulled, they ought not to be furnished.

Mr. De Gex, in support of the petition, relied upon the universal practice of allowing copies to be taken when it was sworn, as here, that they were required in furtherance of the ends of justice.

[LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—What jurisdiction has the Commissioner to make the order when the bankruptcy is annulled?]

Mr. De Gex.—No one has questioned the jurisdiction. The Commissioner did not rely upon want of jurisdiction, but merely said they ought not to be furnished.

[LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—The order annulling the adjudication may render all that has been done under the bankruptcy of no effect, and that may not be before the American Courts; who can tell what use will not be made of the proceedings in the American courts?]

Mr. De Gex.—The petitioner will hardly be advised not to state all the facts to the American Courts, and if he were, the other side would supply the deficiency. This Court will not presume that the American Courts will deal with the proceedings here in any manner other than in accordance with the law of England.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—The proceedings in the superior courts of America are conducted, I believe, with great regularity and precision. Their Courts observe very scrupulously the comity of nations. They will, no doubt, deal with the office copies in a way consistent with the justice of the case. Whether the Commissioner was right or wrong in his refusal we, by no means, intend to say, or to intimate any opinion on the point. I think this Court has jurisdiction to make the order, and I am disposed to make it, if the Lord Justice sees no objection.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—The copies may be furnished on the usual terms.

Jurisdiction—Authority to Registrar to make Order after the Death of a Commissioner.

A Commissioner obtained leave of absence, and the Lord Chancellor, under the powers of "the Bankruptcy Act, 1854," (17 & 18 Vict. c. 119.) appointed the registrar attached to his Court to act in his stead for two months. The Commissioner died before the two months expired:—Held, that an order made by the registrar sitting under this appointment, dated the day after the death of the Commissioner, was void.

This was an appeal from an order made by Mr. Waterfield, the Registrar of the Birmingham District Court of Bankruptcy. The facts of the case it is unnecessary to state, as they were not entered into, by reason that a preliminary objection was raised as to the jurisdiction of the registrar. The point was this: Mr. Balguy, the Commissioner of the Birmingham District, petitioned the Lord Chancellor for, and obtained, leave of absence, and his Lordship at the same time, by order, dated the 3rd of December 1857, which, after mentioning "the Bankruptcy Act, 1854," (17 & 18 Vict. c. 119,) and reciting the fact of Mr. Balguy's illness and his application that some person should be appointed in his place, proceeded thus:—"Now, upon reading the application of the said John Balguy and the medical certificate there referred to, and in pursuance of section 6. of the above act, I do hereby grant to the said John Balguy leave of absence, and do appoint Charles Waterfield, Esq., one of the registrars of the Court of Bankruptcy, acting in the county, to act as the Commissioner of the Court of Bankruptcy for the Birmingham District, in the stead of the said John Balguy, for the period of two months from this day, or until further order."

Mr. Balguy died on the 16th of December, and on the 17th the news was announced by Mr. Waterfield, in the Bankruptcy Court, and afterwards, on the same day, he made the order complained of in the above-mentioned petition of Ex parte Corles, in re Palmer, annulling the adjudication, and ordering Mr. Corles to pay the costs. That gentleman therefore appealed.

Mr. Clement Swanston stated the preliminary objection of want of jurisdiction by reason of Mr. Balguy's death (1).

(1) The 6th, 7th and 8th sections of the act are as follows:—

"6. Where a Commissioner or registrar, acting either in London or in a country district, is temporarily hindered from discharging his duty by illness or unavoidable absence, the Lord Chancellor may, if he shall so think fit, appoint a fit person, who in the case of a Commissioner shall be a serjeant or barrister-at-law of at the least seven years standing at the Bar, to act in the stead of such Commissioner or registrar as aforesaid, during his illness or unavoidable absence."

"7. Where a Commissioner or registrar acting in a country district is absent for any reasonable cause, the Lord Chancellor may, if he shall so think fit, from time to time appoint a fit person, who in the case of a Commissioner shall be a serjeant or barrister-at-law of at the least seven years standing at the Bar, to act in the stead of such Commissioner or registrar as aforesaid, during such period or periods as shall not exceed in the whole the period of two calendar months in any one period of twelve consecutive calendar months."

"8. Every serjeant, barrister, or other person who shall under this Act act in the stead of a Commissioner or registrar, or in succession to a registrar, but without a permanent appointment as registrar, may and shall, while his appointment remains in force, have, discharge and execute all the jurisdiction, rights, powers, duties and authorities belonging to the office of the Commissioner or registrar in whose stead or in succession to whom he shall for the time being act, with full validity and effect to all intents and purposes."

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Cracknall contended that as the order of the Lord Chancellor was absolute in appointing Mr. Waterfield to act as Commissioner for the space of two months, or until further order, he was justified in making the order complained of, without any reference whatever to the fact of the Commissioner being in existence or not. This was made plain by the words of the 8th section, by which it was enacted, that every person acting for a Commissioner shall, while his appointment remains in force, "have, discharge and execute all the jurisdiction, rights, powers, duties and authorities belonging to the office of the Commissioner in whose stead he shall for the time being act, with full validity and effect to all intents and purposes."

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE. — Of course, the powers of the registrar ceased immediately on the death of the Commissioner, and he had no power to make the order; and it must, consequently, be discharged.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER entirely concurred.

Mr. Cracknall then drew the attention of the Court to the fact, that Mr. Sanders, the newly-appointed Commissioner of the Bankruptcy Court, had been appointed as successor to Mr. Daniel, and if he was at the date of the order a Commissioner, Mr. Waterfield might, under his appointment, be considered as the deputy of Mr. Sanders, and so the order would be good.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—After much trouble and delay, we have at length been informed, that Mr. Sanders's patent was not sealed until the 18th of December, the day after the date of Mr. Waterfield's order, which will be accordingly discharged.

The deposit was ordered to be returned.

Joint-Stock Company—Winding-up.

*A. B., the assignee of a debt from a joint-stock company to an amount under 50*l.*, upon which judgment had been obtained and execution issued, petitioned in his own name, and as attorney of the original creditor, for a winding-up order under the Joint-Stock Companies Acts, 1856, 1857. The Commissioner dismissed the petition as the debt was under 50*l., and the petition was not presented by the legal creditor; but, upon appeal, this was reversed, the Lord Chancellor considering that there having been execution, the amount of the debt was unimportant, and that the petition was regular, it being presented in the name of the original creditor.

This was a petition, by Mr. Wright, on his own behalf, and as the attorney of creditors of the above-named company, who had assigned to him a judgment debt against the company; and the petition, which was presented under the Joint-Stock Companies Acts, 1856, 1857, prayed that the affairs of the company might be wound up.

The petition was dismissed, by Mr. Commissioner Sanders, on the ground that the debt was under 50*l.*, and that the petitioner was not the legal creditor, but only the assignee of the original creditors.

By the 67th section of the Joint-Stock Companies Act, 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 47), a company might be wound up by the Court whenever the company was unable to pay its debts. By the 68th section it was enacted, that a company should be deemed to be unable to pay its debts whenever in England or Ireland execution issued on a judgment, decree or order obtained in any court in favour of any creditor in any suit or other legal proceeding instituted by such creditor against the company, was returned unsatisfied in whole or in part by the sheriff of the county in which the registered office of the company was situate. The 69th section provided, that any application for the winding up of a company should be by petition, and there should be filed or lodged at the time when such petition was presented an affidavit verifying the same: such petition might, in cases where the company was unable to pay its debts, be presented by a creditor or a contributory, but where any other ground was alleged for winding up the company, a contributory alone was entitled to present the petition.

Mr. De Gex, in support of the petition, contended that the provisions of the act contemplated a creditor equitably entitled, and were not confined to a creditor who could sue in his own name in a court of law. The 68th section, by alluding to a "decree," clearly pointed to an equitable creditor. The petition also being presented in the name of the original creditors as well as of the attorney, obviated any objection. A judgment having been obtained, the amount of the debt became unimportant.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the Commissioner had dismissed the petition either on the ground of the amount of the debt or of the nature of the demand. In this case the petitioner was the assignee of joint creditors who had obtained judgment and issued execution, to which a return of nulla bona had been returned. With regard to the amount of the debt there could be no question, as the act did not provide that when judgment was obtained it should be for any specific amount. It was only when there was a demand of the debt it should exceed 50*l.*, and, therefore, had the original joint creditors presented this petition they would have been entitled to the order. Then the question arose, whether the assignee of the debt, who petitioned on his own behalf and as attorney of the original creditors, could be considered a creditor under the 69th section. Mr. De Gex had argued, and with a great deal of reason, that in the 69th section a creditor might be either a legal or an equitable creditor, and that the words would necessarily include the case of a person entitled to an equitable debt, that is, a debt to which he was entitled under a decree or order of the Court of Chancery. The question was, whether the assignee of the judgment was a creditor.

He was equitably entitled, but was he such a creditor as the section pointed out? Although that section included a person having a decree in his favour, there was considerable doubt whether an assignee of a debt was included, there being a legal creditor. But here the present petitioner had petitioned not only in his own name, but in the name of the original creditors, as their attorney. It was clear that the present petitioner as their attorney was entitled, among other things, to petition in their names; and, therefore, it was unnecessary to decide whether a merely equitable creditor was entitled to petition for a winding-up order. Under these circumstances, the Commissioner ought not to have dismissed the petition, as it was the petition of an assignee of creditors who was representing them, and as the act did not require the debt to amount to 50*l*.

Conditional Certificate—Salary of Public Servant—Public Policy.

*A timber measurer in a dockyard carried on the business of an eating-house keeper, which was managed by his wife. The latter business not thriving, he petitioned for an adjudication, which he obtained. He then sold the business, and handed the proceeds to the official assignee. One of the Commissioners granted him a second-class certificate, with the condition that he paid a certain part of his salary while he continued timber measurer until he had paid 7*s*. 6*d*. in the pound on the debts proved. On appeal, the Lords Justices granted an immediate unconditional certificate of the third class.*

It is against public policy that the salary of a public servant should be reduced by the application of any part for the payment of debts.

This was the petition of the bankrupt, praying that the condition annexed to his certificate might be struck out. It appeared from the petition, affidavit and deposition of the petitioner that before the filing of the petition he carried on business as an eating-house keeper in Ivy Lane, the business being conducted by his wife, and that he held the situation of measurer of timber, at a salary of 150*l*. a year, in Her Majesty's dockyard at Chatham. On the 25th of October last, finding that for the last year the business in Ivy Lane had fallen off, in consequence of credit being allowed to the customers against the wish and the remonstrance of the bankrupt, he sold the same, and petitioned the Court of Bankruptcy for an adjudication, which was pronounced on the same day. On the 10th of December he passed his last examination before Mr. Commissioner Fonblanque, and on the 5th of January 1859 he applied for his certificate to Mr. Commissioner Goulburn (who sat for Mr. Fonblanque), and he was opposed by four creditors, a butcher, a baker, a grocer and another, whose debts amounted respectively to 51*l*., 20*l*., 7*l*. and 11*l*., and the Commissioner granted a certificate, and at the close of his order said as follows:—

“ Having regard to the conformity of the bankrupt to the law relating to bankrupts, and to the conduct of the said bankrupt as a trader before as well as after his bankruptcy, it is ordered that such certificate be and the same is hereby allowed of the second class, upon condition of the said bankrupt paying annually into the hands of the official assignee, for distribution among his creditors who have proved, until they shall have been paid the sum of 7*s*. 6*d*. in the pound upon their debts, the sum of 20*l*. so long as he shall retain his situation as a timber measurer in Her Majesty's dockyard at Chatham.” The only means of the bankrupt to maintain himself, his wife and three children, of the ages of eighteen, eleven and seven, was his salary and 1*l*. a week he received for a boarder and lodger, a deaf and dumb woman. He paid the whole produce of the sale of his business to the official assignee. He had given upwards of 400*l*. for the goodwill of the business, all of which was lost. No accounts were kept, the wife not being an expert writer, keeping her accounts, when there were any, with chalk on the wall, and the business being substantially a ready-money one.

The bankrupt was examined viâd voce before the Court, and his evidence was in strict conformity with his petition and deposition; and he swore that his wife, by way of inducing him to continue the eating-house business, assured him that if he would consent, she felt sure she could extricate him from all his difficulties.

He admitted that he had not stopped the business as soon as he thought advisable, because he had not courage to do so at once against the positive wishes of his wife.

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Charles Hall supported the appeal, and cited the following cases:—

Ex parte Hammond, 6 De Gex, M. & G. 699; s. c. 24 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Bankr. 2.

Ex parte Anderton, 1 De Gex & Jo. 298; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Bankr. 54.

Mr. Selwyn appeared for the opposing creditors, namely, the before-enumerated tradesmen, and argued on the several distinctions which existed between the facts deduced by this case and those which existed in Ex parte Hammond, and expressed his trust that the Commissioner's judgment, lenient judgment as he considered it, might be upheld.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE. — The bankrupt's conduct has been imprudent, but I do not think inexcusably so; great allowance must be made. I do not think that he could be justly censured for permitting his wife to engage in business with a view of increasing their common income. He has erred probably in want of firmness in not insisting on his own opinion being followed, rather than the opinion of his wife; but so large a portion of mankind have been found liable to err in the same way that it might be thought "righteous overmuch" to blame him severely for such an error. There has not been shewn the slightest ground for impeaching the bankrupt's integrity or good intentions: it is only to be regretted that he had not displayed greater firmness. As to the question of keeping books, I am of opinion that, in a business of this description, and especially considering that it was carried on by the wife, and under the particular circumstances, and considering also the character of the transactions, a lenient view ought to be taken of the case. But at the same time, as it sufficiently appears that it ought to be attributed to the bankrupt's own want of firmness that matters proceeded as they did, it seems to me, and, I believe, also to my learned Brother, that an immediate and unconditional certificate, but one of the third class only, should be awarded. I desire it, however, to be known that the alteration of the class of the certificate does not involve the slightest imputation upon the integrity of the bankrupt. As to his qualification for continuing to hold his situation in the public service, the matter does not stand in a worse position than when it left the learned Commissioner.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER. — Generally speaking, it has not been found a prudent course to annex a condition of this kind to a bankrupt's certificate. By such a proceeding he is sent back into the trading world with power to contract new debts, but crippled in his means of liquidating them. In the present case, moreover, regard must be had to the interests of the public in having their servant's salary incumbered by a condition such as that which has been annexed to this certificate. The case is altogether one of a peculiar kind. It is not the case of a man carrying on business himself and failing, but of a person whose wife insisted on carrying on the trade, and represented to him that, if allowed to continue in it, she should be able to extricate him from all his difficulties. With reference to the class of certificate to be granted, the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act provides that where the bankruptcy has not arisen from "unavoidable losses and misfortunes" the certificate is to be of the third class; and it cannot be said that in this case the bankruptcy has arisen wholly from unavoidable losses and misfortunes; for I cannot see that the bankrupt has not had power to stop the trading at an earlier period, notwithstanding the wishes and representations of his wife. There will therefore be an order for an immediate unconditional certificate of the third class. This, however, involves no reflection upon the bankrupt's character. The bankrupt will take back his deposit of 20*l.*, and the opposing creditors will have their costs out of the estate.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE added—The bankrupt is to be at full liberty to state to his official superiors in the dockyard that the variation which we have made in the class of his certificate is not intended by us to cast any reflection whatever upon his integrity. The condition will be expunged, for it is contrary to public policy that the salaries of its servants should be reduced below that amount which the authorities consider adequate payment for the duties they have to perform.

Certificate—Offence under Clause 3. of Section 256. of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106.

A trader who had made an equitable mortgage of ships to his brother was pressed by his bankers to give them security for his overdrawn account with them. The bankers produced an agreement, already drawn, to mortgage the ships, which he executed without informing them of the equitable charge. In less than six weeks he was adjudicated bankrupt. One of the Commissioners held, that he had been guilty of "obtaining the forbearance of a debt by fraud or false pretence," within the meaning of the above-mentioned clause, and suspended his certificate for three years without protection, and then to be of the third class. On appeal, the Lords Justices ordered the certificate to be of the second class; but as there had been a departure from truth on the bankrupt's part, the decision was otherwise confirmed.

This was an appeal of the bankrupt from a decision of Mr. Commissioner Ayrton, of the Leeds District Court of Bankruptcy. Mr. John William Holderness was a timber-merchant, ship-builder and commission-agent at Hull, and became indebted to his brother, Thomas Hunter Holderness, of Liverpool, in a large sum of money, to secure which he, on the 16th of November 1857, agreed to sell to him three vessels, which were then being built upon his (Mr. J. W. Holderness's) premises at Richibuctoo, in the colony of New Brunswick, at a specified rate per ton, but it was provided that if the vessels should realize a larger sum than the money due, the surplus should be paid to him. In the following spring he had overdrawn his account with Messrs. Pease, Liddell & Co., his bankers, several thousand pounds; and on the morning of the 30th of April 1858 they requested him to call on them. This he did, and at the interview they urgently pressed him to give them some security, and they produced, already prepared, a written agreement to mortgage to them the same three vessels, to secure the banking debt due, but not exceeding 14,000*l.* He accordingly signed the agreement, without alluding to the equitable charge in favour of his brother. He stated by his affidavit that it was his intention to go to Liverpool and induce his brother to waive his claim, or at least to allow priority to the bankers, but he failed to do so. After the agreement the account went on as before, until the 10th of June 1858, when Mr. J. W. Holderness was adjudged bankrupt, and assignees were appointed, of whom Mr. Pease, the banker, was one. The bankrupt passed his last examination on the 25th of March 1859; and on the 11th of May the certificate meeting was held, when the bankrupt was opposed by Mr. Pease and the other assignees, on the ground that he had been guilty of an offence against the third clause of the 256th section of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act (12 & 13 Vict. c. 106).

The Commissioner was of opinion that the 256th section of the act, enacting that "if it shall appear that a bankrupt has committed any of the offences thereunder enumerated, the Court shall refuse to grant such certificate, or shall suspend the same for such time as it shall think fit, and shall in like manner refuse to grant the bankrupt any further protection;" one of which offences, the third, being: "if the bankrupt shall have contracted any of his debts by any manner of fraud, or by means of false pretences, or shall by any manner of fraud, or by means of false pretences, have obtained the forbearance of any of his debts by any of his creditors,"—he had no authority to do more than grant a certificate of the third class; to be suspended, however, for a period of three years, without protection in the mean time.

From this decision the bankrupt appealed. The state of the evidence in the case is fully referred to in the judgment.

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Baggallay, for the bankrupt, admitted that the fact of concealment of the prior charge in favour of his brother appeared to be a strong accusation against him; but it was quite plain from his oath, that he intended to go to Liverpool, and try to induce his brother to forego his priority; that his banking account was not increased after the date of the agreement, nor was any new debt contracted with the bankers; that, under these circumstances, the bankers were not in any worse position than they would have been if he had not executed the agreement to them, since he had been adjudicated bankrupt within six weeks after the date of that instrument. Lastly, they insisted strongly on the great impropriety of the bankers exercising such pressure as they had done, and particularly in having an instrument of security already prepared for his execution.

Mr. Selwyn and Mr. Eddis appeared for the assignees, but were not called on.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE said, it did not appear to him that the creditors, whose particular interests were now represented before the Court, had suffered in any way by what the bankrupt had done. It did not appear that there had been any important delay even, in consequence of what took place; but unfortunately, not only by what took place in April 1858, but also by what had taken place in the latter part of the preceding year, the bankers were led to believe that the bankrupt's interest in the three vessels referred to was not subject to any incumbrance whatever. However little they might have suffered, it was impossible for the Court to pass over the suppression of truth into which, under some pressure it was true, the bankrupt had allowed himself to be surprised. It would therefore be impossible to adopt a conclusion, which would be one of so bad an example, as to mitigate the sentence pronounced. Of course, the mere apprehension of a bad example would not justify the Court in maintaining a sentence which they thought there was solid ground for varying; but in the present case he feared there was not such an amount of solid ground, however painful under the circumstances it might be to come to that decision. At the same time, he did not see why the certificate, when granted, was to be of the third class only. He thought, if his learned Brother did not dissent from him, that it might be of the second class, which, however, would by no means indicate their approval of the course the bankrupt had taken.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER concurred, but added that, although he could not consent to any variation of the judgment, other than that of altering the class of certificate, he extremely disapproved of the pressure exercised upon the bankrupt by the bankers.

LORDS JUSTICES. } Ex parte FRAMPTON, in re
 Aug. 2. } FRAMPTON.

Adjudication—Agency for Bankrupt—Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, s. 104.

A person, before leaving this country, gave a general authority (but it was not proved whether verbal or written) to his uncle to act for him in the arrangement and settlement of his affairs. Soon after his departure he was adjudicated bankrupt, and the uncle instructed a solicitor to dispute the adjudication. One of the Commissioners refused to hear the solicitor on the ground that, under the 104th section of the above statute (12 & 13 Vict. c. 106), express agency was necessary. On appeal, the Lords Justices reversed the decision, and ordered "that the uncle should be allowed to appear before the Commissioner to dispute the adjudication by such solicitor as he should think fit." "Such person," mentioned in the section, does not apply only to the bankrupt himself.

This was the petition of Mr. Charles Rothsay Frampton, a bankrupt, stating that he attained the age of twenty-one in the month of February 1859; that in June following he left England to reside in Canada, where he now is; that before leaving he constituted Mr. Edward Frampton, his uncle, and who had been his guardian, his general agent to arrange and settle such of his affairs as then remained unsettled; that for this purpose he left in his uncle's hands more money than enough to settle all claims upon him, and that his departure from this country was not for the purpose of defeating or delaying his creditors; that on the 4th of July Mr. Edward Frampton received notice from the Court of Bankruptcy of the Bristol District, that the petitioner had been, on the 2nd of that month, adjudicated bankrupt; that on the 9th Messrs. Bubb, solicitors, of Cheltenham, the petitioner's solicitors, and who in this matter were expressly instructed by Mr. Edward Frampton, gave notice of intention to dispute the adjudication; that at the sitting held for that purpose, Mr. Abbott, of Bristol, agent for Messrs. Bubb, appeared to shew cause against the adjudication, alleging that Mr. Charles Rothsay Frampton was not nor had ever been a trader; that he had committed no act of bankruptcy; that a part of the debt claimed by the petitioning creditors was not legally due, and that so much of the debt, if due, was not sufficient to support an adjudication. In opposition to Mr. Abbott it was insisted that he had no express authority to appear, which objection Mr. Commissioner Hill allowed, making the following order:—"This Court doth order that the bankrupt having left this country, and gone to America, and there being no agent on his behalf entitled to appear and be heard against the adjudication, the application made on behalf of the said bankrupt to be heard in disputing the said adjudication be refused; but the advertisement to be suspended to a day to be fixed, in order to afford an opportunity for an appeal" (1). The prayer of the petition was for a reversal of this order.

The only evidence of agency was in the affidavit of Mr. Edward Frampton, who swore, "I have a general authority from my nephew, and I believe in writing, to act for him."

The 104th section of the act enacts, "that before notice of any adjudication of bankruptcy shall be given in the London Gazette, &c., a duplicate of such adjudi-

(1) The judgment of the learned Commissioner, so far as it sets forth his reasons, is as follows:—"It was argued that nothing short of express agency would suffice. First, if implied agency were sufficient, it might happen that many persons would have equal authority to make or to oppose such an application; and in such an event how, it was asked, would the Court decide as to whether the name of the bankrupt should be used to support or to defeat the adjudication? On behalf of the petitioning creditor, Mr. Clifton, the solicitor was called, who proved that he was acting for the alleged bankrupt up to the time of his departure, and this gentleman took no part in the present application on the one side or the other. The questions to be considered are, first, whether or not any implied authority will be sufficient to give applicant a locus standi. Secondly, whether a sufficient implied authority has been shewn to exist in Mr. Edward Frampton, or if not in him, then in Mr. Bubb. And, thirdly, if in Mr. Bubb, whether it has been executed in due time. The main question no doubt is, whether any authority short of express agency is sufficient, as the law now stands? That a provision which would enable the Court to admit a party in opposition to the adjudication, where the alleged bankrupt is abroad and can have no notice of proceedings in bankruptcy until after they may have deeply affected his interests, it will hardly be denied is desirable for the interests of justice. Wherever the facts, or the law upon which a decision is founded, are fairly disputable, it is a misfortune to the Court pronouncing that decision that it should be deprived of the means necessary to make its judgment conform to the truth of the facts and to sound views of the law to be applied to them. And, assuredly, no means are so important as those which are furnished by hearing both sides. But I am not to inquire what the law should be, or rather what I may think it should be, but what it now is. I must not take upon myself to supply the omissions of the legislature, even assuming that the omission of a provision to the effect which I have pointed out is unintentional. The Consolidation Act and the subsequent acts amending it, control often with great particularity the practice of this Court; and with a view of leaving as little as may be to its discretion, the Consolidation Act provides that rules and orders for its government shall be made by a body of the Commissioners, and then be subject to the Lord Chancellor. It

cation shall be served on the person adjudged bankrupt personally, or by leaving the same at the usual or last known place of abode or place of business of such person, and such person shall be allowed seven days, or such extended time, &c. as the Court shall think fit to shew cause to the Court against the validity of such adjudication," &c.

Mr. Roxburgh, for the petitioning creditors, relied on the grounds stated in the Commissioner's judgment, which he read in extenso.

Mr. Bacon was heard in reply.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—This petitioner must be taken to have been out of Europe during the whole of the time, which, for the present purposes, it is mate-would be neither right in itself, nor decorous for Judges so restricted as Commissioners in bankruptcy are, to attempt to go far beyond the letter of the acts, unless under the guidance of the rules and orders, none of which apply to the questions which I have to decide. Now, the words of the 104th section, giving the right to make this application, are limited to 'such person' as has been 'adjudged bankrupt,' and this is in conformity with the general policy of the law relating to bankrupts, which is very jealous of the interference of strangers. And although exception is made in favour of creditors, yet that is clearly because their interests are affected by the adjudication, and it would be therefore contrary to every principle of justice that they should not be heard. So far nothing favours anything resembling laxity of construction in dealing with the power here conferred on the alleged bankrupt. But the hardship of dealing with the interests of a party behind his back is insisted upon, and such an argument cannot but have great weight. Its value, however, will be lessened if it should appear that it could scarcely be but that the legislature must have contemplated the existence of this hardship, without nevertheless providing any mode by which it is to be met. The only period given to the alleged bankrupt as of right for disputing the adjudication before advertisement is seven days, and the indulgence of the Court, if indulgence should be exercised, is limited to fourteen additional days. Thus not only the bankrupt, but the Court, is kept rial to consider. During his absence he was adjudged bankrupt, and afterwards a solicitor, entitled, as I must assume, to practise in the Court of Bankruptcy, appeared on behalf of the alleged bankrupt, desiring to dispute the adjudication, which would have been a matter of course if the bankrupt himself had been present. The authority of the solicitor was, however, disputed. It was, perhaps, not a very usual thing to do, but I must assume that the petitioning creditors were entitled to raise the question. The solicitor's answer was—"I am here as agent for other solicitors in a neighbouring town, also entitled to practise in this jurisdiction, and they instruct me, under the immediate instructions of a gentleman named Frampton, of the same town, who was the guardian, and is a friend and near relation of the alleged bankrupt; not only so, but he acts under an authority, it may be written, it may be verbal, from his nephew to act for him during his absence." These facts are not disputed. In this state of circumstances, if I had been sitting as Commissioner, I should have admitted the solicitor to appear for the bankrupt and dispute the adjudiwithin very strict bounds; yet it is quite obvious that twenty-one days cannot much avail a bankrupt (if he is to exercise any will upon the subject) who is absent from the country. Is it then intended that if he have no information of the petition against him he shall forfeit his privilege, unless he has left behind him a power of attorney, so framed as to authorize an agent to protect his interests, or what the agent may consider his interests, in the event of proceedings in bankruptcy? Harsh as it may at first sight appear, I think such was the intention of the legislature, although I should be driven to the same practical conclusion, if I were to hold that the legislature has not declared its will upon this point. It appears to me that much light is thrown on the subject by the 233rd section (to which the Commissioner then at length referred). It is also worthy of remark, that the attention of the legislature has been again directed to this matter; for, by the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 119. s. 24, the twenty-one days mentioned in the section which I have just abstracted are enlarged to two calendar months. Again, the Consolidation Act has now been in force for a period of ten years. On the whole, therefore, I cannot resist the impression that it was considered by the legislature that the interests of individual debtors must give way to the interests of creditors, which are often much advanced by those powers of the act which enable the Court to place the estates of bankrupts, without much delay, under the protection of its own officers."

cation, and I think that the order now to be made ought to be to that effect.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—The words “such person” in the 104th section of the act cannot be held to apply only to the bankrupt personally; the only question, therefore, is, whether there was authority in the uncle to act for the bankrupt, and I think there was. The order we make will therefore be—“It appearing to the Lords Justices that Mr. Edward Frampton is sufficiently authorized to act as agent of the petitioner, it is ordered that Mr. Edward Frampton be at liberty, on behalf of the petitioner, by such solicitor as he may think fit, to shew cause against the validity of the adjudication; and it is ordered that the inquiry as to the validity of the adjudication be proceeded with before the Commissioner. Let the petition in all other respects stand over, with liberty to apply.”

TO THE SUBJECTS OF THE

CASES IN CHANCERY AND BANKRUPTCY,

IN THE

LAW JOURNAL REPORTS,

VOL. XXXVII.—XXVIII. NEW SERIES.

CHANCERY.

ABANDONED SUMMONS—Right to costs on. See Costs.

ACCOUNT—An alleged breach of trust having taken place (if at all) at least thirty years back, plaintiffs not, under the circumstances, entitled to an account of the settlor's personal estate. A tenant for life, without impeachment of waste, pulled down the family mansion-house, and built a better mansion in another part of the settled estate, using the old materials. It appeared that for years prior to 1819, the date of the settlement, the settlor had contemplated the abandonment of the mansion and the building of another, and that the settlement contained powers of sale and exchange, and also a power to grant building leases of the settled premises, including the site of the old mansion-house. It was held, the tenant for life was not liable to an account and inquiry as to the application of the materials of the old mansion-house. Morris v. Morris, 329

ACCOUNTANT GENERAL—a trustee of funds paid into court. See Trust and Trustee.

ACCUMULATION—Testator gave the income of all his property to his mother for her life, and after her death he gave an annuity of 100*l.* to each of his two sisters, the longer liver to have 200*l.* After the decease of his two sisters, he gave two legacies of 500*l.* each. Testator then left the whole of his property, real and personal, to trustees, to be placed out on such securities as they should think most advisable, for the benefit of his heirs; and after decease of his mother and two sisters, the amount to be invested in landed property in Scotland, which was to be strictly entailed on his nephew and his heirs lawfully begotten. It was held, the gift for the benefit of the heirs of testator was a gift of the corpus as it existed at his death, for the benefit of all those who were entitled to any of his property real or personal; that the directions in the will rendered accumulations of income necessary, which could not be done for more than twenty-one years after the death of testator, by reason of the Thellusson Act; and that the direction to invest accumulations on land in Scotland did not prevent the operation of the act. Macpherson v. Stewart, 177

— Testator devised real estates in trust for his son G. during the joint lives of himself and T, and after decease of either of them upon trust to invest and accumulate rents, &c. until 3,000*l.* sterling should have been invested, and subject thereto upon trust for G. for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail, with successive remainders over; and he directed that the stock to be purchased and the accumulations thereof should be in trust for the children of G, and for default of such issue upon such trusts as G. should by will appoint, and in default of appointment, for his next-of-kin. G. and T. survived testator seventeen years, when G. died without issue, having by will appointed the 3,000*l.* to F. D, a stranger, and the trustees invested and accumulated the rents for a period of ten years from that time, when 3,000*l.* had been invested. It was held, first, that the direction to accumulate was void, except for the period of twenty-one years from the death of testator, the 3,000*l.* not being, in the event which happened, viz., the death of G. without issue, a portion for his children, nor under the power of appointment a portion for G. himself; secondly, that F. D. was entitled to so much of the stock

as was purchased with the accumulations that took place within the twenty-one years from the death of testator, and to the interest thereon; and, thirdly, that, subject thereto, the income directed to be accumulated, with the accumulations thereon, belonged to the persons from time to time entitled to the rents and profits under the limitations in the testator's will. In re Clulow's Trusts, 696

— See Will (Williams v. Lewis).

ACQUIESCENCE—If works likely to become a nuisance are erected, and subsequently carried on without any objection, the owners of adjoining estates, who acquiesced so long as no perceptible injury was sustained, are not precluded, when injury arises, from objecting to an extension of the works, or from pursuing their legal remedy to recover damages for injury sustained by such works; and when an action has been brought, and damages recovered, this Court will not restrain the execution to obtain payment of the amount, or prevent the plaintiff in the action from taking other proceedings at law. Bankhart v. Houghton, 478

— See Company (Mathews v. the Great Northern Railway). Infant. Solicitor and Client (Gresley v. Mousley).

ADMINISTRATION OF ESTATE—If an executor administers the estate of his testator and pays over the residue so that no part can be recovered to answer a subsequent debt of the testator, he will not as against appropriated legacies be entitled to the costs of an action brought against him by the creditor, or of a proceeding necessary to establish the debt, or of any suit by him to make the appropriated legacies available for the payment of the debt. Noble v. Brett and Noble v. Hodges, 322

— Testator died indebted on bills of exchange. The creditor, before the executors proved the will, issued a writ under the Bills of Exchange Act, and, the executors not appearing, the creditor signed judgment and levied on the goods of testator in the hands of the executors, and the sheriff sold. Specialty creditors of testator afterwards took out an administration summons, and obtained a degree at the Rolls, and moved to restrain the sheriff from parting with the money arising from the sale, and that the money should be paid into court, and the same was ordered by the Master of the Rolls. Upon appeal (reversing his Honour's order) it was held, that as the money was in the hands of the sheriff at the suit of the creditor on the bills of exchange before the decree in the administration suit, the motion must be refused, with costs. Marriage v. Skiggs, 433

— A father, having given a voluntary bond to trustees, conditioned for payment after his death of a sum of money to them for the benefit of his two sons, afterwards upon the marriages of the sons, assented to such bond being settled upon trust for the benefit of said sons and their respective wives and children. The marriages having taken place upon the faith of the provision thus assented to, the trustees of the marriage settlements of the sons were entitled to claim as specialty creditors for value in a suit instituted after the father's decease for the administration of his estate. Payne v. Mortimer, 437

— In a suit for the administration of testator's real and personal estate, it was declared that the debts ought to be paid out of his real in exoneration of his personal estate; and upon a question as to the payment of the costs, it was held, they must be paid out of the personal estate. Stringer v. Harper, 643

— Charge by testator of his funeral and testamentary expenses upon a particular portion of his property specified in his will, held not sufficient to justify the Court in throwing upon that specified portion the costs of a suit for the general administration of testator's estate. Lisley v. Taylor, 686

— Testator left the whole of his personalty to his son absolutely, and his real estate to his son for life, with remainder to his grandson. His debts were to be paid out of his personalty, and then out of his realty in aid of the personalty. The debts consisted principally of money borrowed in order to make advances to his son, who was a banker. The son kept down the interest upon the debts out of the income of his life estate in the realty for eleven years, and then the bank failed. A dividend was subsequently paid, which was sufficient to satisfy a large portion of the debts. It was held, the tenant for life was not entitled to be recouped out of the real estate for any sums which he had paid in keeping down the interest upon the debts. A receiver having been appointed both of the real and personal estate, it was held, that the expenses of such receiver must be borne by the tenant for life. Shore v. Shore, 940

— Testator, by his will, gave (after the death of his wife) any shares in railways, mines or other undertaking that might belong to him at his decease, to his second son, and in case of his death without issue the same to revert to his two other children. Testator was possessed of railway shares upon which, after his death, calls were made. The calls were paid by his widow, as executrix, and the company had power to make further calls. The residue was not sufficient to meet the calls. The Court directed a sale of the shares by the executrix, who was to retain the sums already paid by her for calls, and to invest the residue in consols, the dividends of which were to be paid to her for her life, without prejudice to the question out of what fund the calls already paid were ultimately to be borne. Day v. Day, 947 ceedings (Canham v. Neale). Trust and Trustee (Fry v. Fry).

ADVOWSON. See Vendor and Purchaser (Edwards Wood v. Marjoribanks).

ALIEN COMPANY—Right to sue. See Injunction.

ANNUITY—A scheme was promoted by the East India Company for granting annuities to their civil servants who subscribed to a fund upon stated terms, which in the result proved in certain cases more favourable to the fund than to the annuitant; but it was held, that in such cases the annuitant was not entitled to a refund. Boldero v. the East India Co., 24

— Testator gave an annuity, or clear yearly rent-charge, of 300*l.* to his niece A. B, for her life; and after her decease he gave the said annuity or rent-charge unto her children equally, if more than one, share and share alike, to be applied for their maintenance until the youngest should attain twenty-one; on the happening of which event he directed the said annuity to be absolutely sold by such children, and the proceeds to be equally divided among them; and he charged the said annuity upon his real estates, which, subject to the said annuity, he devised to H. in fee. This gift held to create a rent-charge on the estates in fee simple. Mansergh v. Campbell, 61

— Testator devised certain estates in fee, subject nevertheless, and he thereby charged the same estates with the payment of an annuity of 80*l.* a year. He also devised other estates to trustees upon trust to sell and apply the proceeds arising from such sale, together with his personal estate, which he bequeathed to them, in discharge of his debts and legacies: and if any surplus should remain, testator directed the same to be paid to the then minister of a Catholic chapel, to whom he gave and bequeathed the same. This annuity of 80*l.* was held to be a charge upon the corpus of the estates; the fund for payment of debts and legacies a mixed fund; and the devise of the surplus of the proceeds arising from the sale of the property to the Catholic minister void under the Statute of Mortmain. Thornber v. Wilson, 145

— The chief clerk of one of the Vice Chancellors, in taking an account directed by the Court, certified that 1,002*l.* was due to J. P. in respect of the arrears of an annuity charged on real estate. The certificate was dated in November 1855. J. P. claimed interest on the debt from the date of the certificate being signed by the Judge, in November 1855, to the time of the hearing on further consideration, which a subsequent incumbrancer opposed; but it was held, that J. P. was not entitled as against a subsequent incumbrancer to such interest. Whether, if the claim had been against the assets of the grantor, it would have prevailed—quære. Interest on arrears of an annuity will not be given, except under special circumstances. A certificate of the chief clerk finding money due is not “an order for payment,” within the 18th section of the statute 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. Manafeld v. Ogle, 422

— Testator bequeathed all his money and securities for money to his executors upon trust to employ 400*l.* or 500*l.* in purchasing a house, and allow L. to reside therein, and have the use thereof for her separate use, and after her decease the same to go to her children (if any) equally. He further requested his said trustees to invest sufficient money in their names to produce 40*l.* per annum, and to pay the same, quarterly, to the said L, to her separate use. The Court refused, upon the petition of L, to direct the corpus of the fund to be paid to her, but declared her entitled to an annuity for her life only, and to have a sufficient fund appropriated to answer such annuity. Re Grove's Trusts, 536

— Duration of. See Legacy (Bignold v. Giles).

APPEAL—by a married woman. See Formâ Pauperis.

— for Costs. See Vendor and Purchaser (Collard v. Roe).

— within what time. See Enrolment of Decree.

APPORTIONMENT—Where a tenancy from year to year has been originally created by the owner of the fee, it is not determined by the death of a tenant for life claiming under the original lessor, and the 11 Geo. 2. c. 19. s. 15. does not therefore apply to such a case. Nor does the 4 & 5 Will. 4. c. 22. apply to rents reserved by parol. Cattley v. Arnold, 352

ARBITRATION—Arbitrators were named in a contract to determine the value of brewery premises and the plant, &c. Before entering upon the valuation they were to appoint an umpire, whose authority was to be limited to the matters in difference between the arbitrators. The arbitrators could not agree in the appointment of an umpire; and upon a summons under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, it was held, this was not an arbitration within the meaning of the act, and that the Court had no authority to appoint an umpire. Collins v. Collins, 184

— Effect of a provision in a contract for arbitration of disputes. See Contract (Scott v. the Liverpool Corporation).

ASSIGNMENT — Pension of retired government officer not assignable. Lloyd v. Eagle, 389

ATTORNEY AND SOLICITOR—An agreement between A, a certificated conveyancer, and B, an attorney, that in case A. should introduce to B. any matters of professional business for which B. would have a claim for costs, B. would allow and pay to A. certain sums of money by way of commission, is not such a permitting by the attorney of his name to be made use of upon the account or for the profit of an unqualified person, as was intended to be provided against by the 82nd section of the Attorneys and Solicitors Act (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73.), nor would such an agreement subject the parties to the penalties for common barratry; and, therefore, where a defendant, an attorney, by his answer declined to answer interrogatories founded on a statement of such an agreement, on the ground that if the facts alleged in the bill were true, he was liable to be struck off the roll, and was liable to other pains and penalties under the statutes and laws in force concerning common barratry and maintenance, it was held, that the answer was insufficient. A witness claiming to be privileged from answering, on the ground that he is not bound to criminate himself, must at all events swear that he is advised or believes that his answer will have that effect; and it is not sufficient to say that his answer would or might criminate him or tend to criminate him. Scott v. Miller, 584

— See Privileged Communication. Solicitor and Client.

— Striking off the Roll. See Trust and Trustee (Thorndike v. Hunt).

ATTORNEY GENERAL—Service on. See Evidence.

AUCTION. See Vendor and Purchaser (In re Carey's Estate Act).

BANKER—A customer kept three accounts with his bankers, the whole of which were overdrawn. Upon their applying for further security he executed a deed-poll, which recited the intention to give security and charge certain estates already mortgaged with the payment of the "three several sums of money which shall, or may be found, on the balance of the several accounts, for principal, interest, commission and other usual and lawful bankers' charges, not exceeding the aggregate sum of 3,000*l*." He subsequently executed a deed of assignment for the benefit of his creditors. The real estate charged by the deed-poll was sold by the mortgagee, and after paying all incumbrances a balance remained, which was claimed by the bankers and by the trustees of the creditors' deed. It was held, upon petition of the bankers, that the security did not include the floating balance. In re Meadows, 891

BANKRUPT—A bankrupt, after obtaining his certificate, contracted with the creditors' assignee for the purchase of his reversionary interest in a legacy to which he was entitled under the will of his father-in-law. Shortly after the agreement had been signed the reversion fell into possession. On the day named in the contract for the payment of the purchase-money the bankrupt tendered the amount to the official assignee, who refused either to receive it or to recognize the contract. Upon a petition by the purchaser, and, in the absence of fraud or proof of insufficient value, it was held that the contract was valid and ought to be completed. In re Ward's Legacy, 175

— See Voluntary Settlement.

BARON AND FINE—A married woman, whose earnings and property were protected against her husband and his creditors, by an order made under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85. s. 21, on account of his desertion of her, will be ordered the payment of a legacy given to her in general terms. In re Kingale's Trusts, 80

— A married woman, entitled to a legacy in reversion, was deserted by her husband in the year 1845. The legacy fell into possession and was paid into court under the Trustees' Relief Act. The married woman then obtained a protection order under the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Act, and upon her petition the Court ordered the money to be paid out to her. In re Rainsdon's Trust, 334

— The whole of a fund in court belonging to a married woman was settled (under the circumstances) upon herself and children, in exclusion of the assignee, for value, of her husband; though she was in receipt of a further income for life of 26*l*. a year, and was living with her husband. In re Welchman and in re the Trustees' Relief Acts, 647

— Property settled to the separate use of a married woman, without power of anticipation, cannot be applied to make good a breach of trust committed by her; and the circumstance that she herself was the settlor makes no difference. Oliver v. Carey, 685

— A legacy of 1,000*l*. bequeathed to the separate use of a married woman was paid to her, she and her husband both joining in a release to the executors. The money was then allowed to get into the hands of the husband, who paid it to his own bankers, and mixed it with his own money, and employed it in his own business and in the family expenditure. This continued nearly twenty years, when the husband died. There was no evidence to shew the circumstances under which the money was paid to the husband's banker, nor any proof of any formal assent on the part of the wife to the mode of dealing with the fund by the husband, or of any gift of the fund by her to him. It was held, notwithstanding, that the wife's assent to the employment and expenditure of the money by the husband must be presumed, and that she could not be allowed to claim it back from the husband's estate, as if still affected by the trust for her separate use. Gardner v. Gardner, 903

— See Infant. Divorce Act. Voluntary Settlement (Atkinson v. Smith and Hogarth v. Phillips). Fines and Recoveries Act. Specific Performance (Waldron v. Waldron).

BARRATRY. See Attorney and Solicitor.

BILL—Right of defendant to dismiss without costs.
Wallis v. Wallis, 441

— When a plaintiff becomes insolvent, and a vesting order is made by the Insolvent Court, this Court will, on the provisional assignee expressing his desire to prosecute the suit, make an order that he do bring himself before the Court within a time limited in the order, or that the bill be dismissed without costs. Meiklam v. Elmore, 515

— If a bill filed in this court is not duly prosecuted, it will, though the defendant has taken the benefit of the Insolvent Act, be dismissed, with costs. Lever v. Heritage, 704

BILL OF SALE—Effect of registration of. See Ship and Shipping (Orr v. Dickinson).

— Receipt not amounting to. See Sale of Goods.

BROKER—Bonds, payable to bearer, and passing by delivery only, were deposited with bankers for safe custody, and the bankers afterwards fraudulently deposited them with their brokers as a security for money advanced, and became bankrupt. It was held, that the bonds were subject to the general lien of the brokers for all money advanced by them to the bankers, and not merely for the advance made upon the security of those particular bonds. Semble—The Court will take judicial notice of the custom of brokers as part of the general custom of merchants. Jones v. Peppercorne, 158

BUILDING SOCIETY—Members of a building and investment society, which contemplates equal advantage to all, cannot borrow from the fund of investing members without returning the benefits held out to them by the rules. A period fixed for the termination of a building society expired by effluxion of time; the funds, however, were insufficient to pay investing members the sum it was by the rules calculated they ought to receive upon their shares. It was held, the borrowing members were, by their rules, entitled to have the deeds relating to property purchased by them with the borrowed money delivered up at the end of the time fixed for the termination of the society, and also to have a receipt indorsed on the deed mortgaging the property to the society, acknowledging the payment of all monies intended to be secured thereby; but as the object of the society was not complete, that all the members still continued liable to pay monthly subscriptions to the funds until they were sufficient to pay to each investing member the sum he was to receive per share if the calculations had realized the proposed objects of the society. Sparrow v. Farmer, 537

— A building society was established and the rules certified under 6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 32; the directors subsequently changed the name, and sought to convert it into a freehold land society.

They made no alteration in the rules, but they applied the funds of the society towards the payment of the purchase-money of a piece of land they contracted to purchase. It was held, that the objects of the society could not be changed, and that the rules of the original society could not be adapted to any altered purpose; that the rules did not authorize the purchase of land, and that the directors must replace the money; that the trustees were not responsible for the funds, as they only acted ministerially when they signed the cheques for payment; they were, however, refused the costs of the suit. Grimes v. Harrison, 823

CALLS—Testatrix, who held unpaid-up shares in a banking company, bequeathed them specifically by a codicil to her will. She subsequently received notice of a series of calls on days named. This was accompanied by a notice that the first call must be paid on a specified day, and a form of receipt was inclosed. Testatrix paid the first call, but died before the days named for the other calls. Similar notices were sent to her executors fourteen days before each of the other days named for payment. It was held, that the notification of the series of calls did not create a charge on the estate of the testatrix within the meaning of the company's deed of settlement, or prevent a transfer of her shares; that the liability was created by the subsequent notice to pay, and that the legatees must take the shares cum onere, and that they must reimburse the executors such calls as had been paid by the executors after the death of testatrix, with interest at 4l. per cent. The practice of a company must affect the decision of a Court in questions relating to calls and the forfeiture of shares. Executors who transfer shares in a company under a decree of the Court will be indemnified from future liability, when they have brought before the Court all the facts of the case. Addams v. Ferick, 594

— See Administration of Estate.

CANAL—By an act obtained by the Regent's Canal Company they were empowered to make and maintain an enlargement of a certain reservoir in the lines and upon the lands delineated in the plans of such enlargement, deposited with the clerk of the peace, shewing the lines, with a section shewing the levels thereof. It was held, that the sections, as well as the plans, were incorporated in the act, and prescribed a vertical as well as a lateral limit within which the works were to be kept. By act of parliament a canal company were empowered to construct a reservoir, raising the water to a certain height. If by exercising their powers to the extreme limit, the effect would have been to cover with water other lands than those the company had taken,—semble, that the landowner might compel the company to purchase these lands, if the company's compulsory powers had not expired; but that if the compulsory powers had expired, the company would be restrained by injunction. Ware v. Regent's Canal Co., 153

— The right of traverse by the public on a canal cannot be confined within the state of science as it existed when the undertaking was projected. The public may adapt the inventions and discoveries of practical science to secure a more complete and efficient enjoyment of rights conferred, but such inventions and discoveries must not interfere with or endanger the existence of the property in or over which such rights exist. A carrier claimed a right to navigate a canal with boats propelled by steam, both for carrying loads as well as for drawing barges. Upon a bill to establish the right, it was held, after experiments made by an engineer at the instance of the Court, that the plaintiff had a right to adapt modern improvements to the enjoyment of his rights, provided such improvements did not injure the canal or tend to destroy its existence. Case v. the Midland Counties Rail. Co., 727

— Right to raise embankments. See Injunction (Ware v. Regent's Canal Co.).

CARRIER. See Canal.

CHARGE. See Registration of Deeds. Will.

— ON LANDS—The 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. declares that a judgment at law shall not be enforced for a given period, but a Court of equity will in the mean time restrain trustees from paying to the debtor, a tenant for life, the income arising from the property affected until the charge can be enforced. Yescombe v. Landor, 876

CHARITY—If testator points out clearly the purposes of a charity he intends to establish, this Court cannot speculate upon whether it would be better for the community if a different application of the funds had been established, but is bound to carry them into effect, if they are not in opposition to the law of the country. Philpott v. St. George's Hospital, and Attorney General v. Philpott, 657

CLERGY—An incumbent may borrow money upon mortgage under the provisions of the act 17 Geo. 3. c. 53, for the purpose of enlarging and adding to the parsonage-house, as well as for "building, rebuilding and repairing," if such additions are considered necessary; and there is no objection to the incumbent advancing the money himself upon mortgage for such a purpose. Boyd v. Barker, 445

CLERK OF THE PEACE—A clerk of the peace appointed by the corporation of a borough under the Municipal Corporations Act, holding office during good behaviour, and having fees attached to his office, cannot enter into an agreement with the corporation to receive a salary and account for the fees, such an agreement being void on two grounds of public policy; first, because a person accepting an office of trust can make no bargain in respect of that office; and, secondly, because the law presumes that all the fees are required for the purpose of enabling him to uphold the dignity and perform properly the duties of his office. The Corporation of Liverpool v. Wright, 868

CLERK'S CERTIFICATE—A summons to vary the chief clerk's certificate is a sufficient application within the 51st Order of the 16th of October 1852; and therefore, where such summons was obtained within eight days from the filing of the certificate, although not returnable within the eight days, it was held to be in time. Wycheley v. Barnard, 562

COLONIAL LAW. See Mortmain.

COMPANY—An act of parliament enacted, that it should be lawful for any shareholder who should have paid up one-half the amount of any share or shares of the G. N. R. Company, to require each share to be converted into two half-shares, whereof the one-half which should be so fully paid up should be denominated deferred half-share, and the other half of such share should be denominated guaranteed half-share; and thenceforth in respect of each whole share so divided, the whole of the interest and dividends which would in each year have accrued should be applied in or towards payment, in the first place, of interest or dividend after the rate of 6l. per cent. per annum on the amount paid upon the half-share so denominated "guaranteed," and the remainder, if any, should alone be payable to the half-shares so denominated "deferred," provided that the company should not pay any other or greater amount of interest or dividend upon the two half-shares than was for the time being paid on each undivided share. Upon the construction of this section it was held, the holders of guaranteed half-shares were entitled to be paid their 6l. per cent. in each year, not only out of the dividends accruing in that year, but out of all subsequent dividends; and, therefore, if in any year the dividends were more than sufficient to pay 6l. per cent. on the guaranteed half-shares, the surplus must be applied in payment, in the first place, of all arrears due on those half-shares in respect of past deficiencies, before any dividend could be declared on the deferred half-shares. The holders of the guaranteed half-shares having in a former year acquiesced in the declaration of a dividend on the deferred half-shares, whilst there was an arrear of dividend due on the guaranteed half-shares, although they had precluded themselves from making any claim in respect of those particular arrears, had not thereby renounced their rights in respect of subsequent arrears. Matthews v. the Great Northern Rail. Co., 375

— The directors of a company are trustees for the shareholders; and, therefore, where directors contracted for an amalgamation of their company with another, and, without the knowledge of the shareholders, contracted for payment to themselves of sums of money as a compensation for their prospective interest in their fees, they were, upon a bill filed by a shareholder for an account, compelled to pay such monies into court. Gaskell v. Chambers, 385

— A company formed in 1837, and issuing scrip certificates transferable from party to party by delivery, is not an illegal company. In re the Mexican and South American Co., ex parte Aston, 631

— The directors of a company, in contravention of their deed of settlement, drew bills of exchange to secure a debt incurred in building a music-hall, and at the same time mortgaged the building to secure the payment of the bills of exchange. In a suit by the mortgagee for foreclosure, it was held the mortgage was valid, that the legal estate was vested in the plaintiff, and that the company could not, in this suit, dispute the power of the directors to give such security for a past debt. Scott v. Colburn, 635

— Powers of directors as to cancellation and purchase of shares. Hodgkinson v. the National Live Stock Insurance Co., 676

— E. B. and J. B. in 1854, by deed, assigned leasehold premises, and the copyright of a book on life assurance, to trustees, in consideration of a sum of 1,000*l.* and annuities to each, with a view to form a company. E. B. subscribed for 25,000 shares, and J. B. for 30,000; each paid such a sum for deposits as would leave 1,000*l.* due from each. In 1855 the directors accepted and confirmed the deed of 1854, and obtained the sanction of a general meeting to a loan to the company from another company. In 1856 H. M. B., a lawyer, became a shareholder and director. In December in the same year the directors passed a resolution, that E. B. and J. B. should be relieved from all liability in respect of 20,000 each of their shares, and that the same should be assigned to trustees for the company. These shares were originally taken to facilitate complete registration. H. M. B. early in 1858, filed a bill, on behalf of himself and all other shareholders, except the defendants, against the directors and two shareholders, to set aside this transaction. Afterwards, in April 1858, a general meeting of the shareholders was held, at which the directors were authorized to purchase these shares of E. B. and J. B. on their giving up the benefit of the deed of 1854. It was held, first, that the plaintiff must be taken to have been all along cognizant of and to have acquiesced in the proceedings complained of; secondly, that as the whole of the transactions of the company were entered in their books, he must be held to have had notice of them; and, thirdly, that whatever rights any of the shareholders, who were not precluded by knowledge and acquiescence from suing, might have, the plaintiff's bill could not be sustained, on account of his own incapacity by reason of his knowledge and his subsequent conduct; his suit being similar to one instituted by a plaintiff who had released the defendants. Burt v. the British Nation Life Assurance Association, 731

CONTRACT—A representation made by a party, not knowing that it is false, is binding upon him; and if the other party enters into a contract on the faith of its truth, the Court will set aside the same altogether, and not merely rectify it. Though the other party does not examine the books for four years during which the partnership continued, it not being his duty to do so, it will not bar him of relief on the score of negligence or acquiescence. The bringing of an action against the partners, and recovering a verdict against the survivor of them, does not prevent the deceived party from seeking relief in equity. Rawlins v. Wickham, 188

— If parties to an agreement provide for the settlement of disputes arising out of the contract by the arbitration of persons mentioned in the agreement, or to be determined when the disputes arise, this does not oust the ordinary tribunals of jurisdiction in such disputes. But if a contract provides for the determination of the contractor's claims and liabilities by the judgment of a particular person, everything depends on his decision, and until he has spoken no right arises which can be enforced either at law or in equity. Scott v. the Liverpool Corporation, 230

COPYHOLD—A copyhold estate was devised to trustees for a tenant for life, with gifts over to other persons in remainder. Upon the admission of new trustees to the copyhold estate, it was held, the fines and fees must be borne by the tenant for life and those in remainder in proportion to the value of their respective interests. Carter v. Sebrigt, 411

CORPORATION—Tolls. See Receiver.

COSTS—Where a summons, taken out at chambers, was adjourned into court, and then abandoned by the plaintiff, the defendant was held entitled to the taxed costs of such summons. Lister v. Bell, 162

— The costs of an interlocutory application and order were reserved, but by inadvertence on the final decree ordering the defendant to pay all the costs of the suit, no provision was made for these costs. The defendant enrolled the decree; but, upon the plaintiff's petition, the defendant was ordered to pay these reserved costs. Viney v. Chaplin, 164

— Decree without costs in consequence of unsupported charges of fraud in the bill. Rawlins v. Wickham, 188

— In an information filed before the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 90, 'An Act for the payment of costs in proceedings instituted on behalf of the Crown in matters relating to the revenue, and for the amendment of the procedure and practice in Crown suits in the Court of Exchequer,' the Court has no jurisdiction to order the Attorney General to pay the costs of a successful defendant: aliter, with respect to defendants made parties after the act. Attorney General v. Hammer, 511

— A solicitor has no lien for his costs upon the fund in court, which is the subject of the suit, as against other parties than his client; but he has a right to prevent his client from receiving any sum recovered by his exertions until his costs are paid. Such right, however, cannot preclude a fair compromise between the parties. Verity v. Wild, 561

— of an issue devisavit vel non are in the discretion of the Court, and, where an heir-at-law obtained an issue to try the validity of the will (which, as to personalty, had been established in the ecclesiastical court), the Court, after the verdict had been returned against the heir-at-law, directed each party to pay his own costs. Stacey v. Spratley, 563

— An order was made against the plaintiff for payment of the costs of an application for an injunction, and execution was issued upon failure of payment by the plaintiff, but no return had been made to the writ. The defendants were subsequently ordered to pay the costs of an application to dismiss the plaintiff's bill. An appeal by the plaintiff against the first decision of the Court was still pending. Defendants moved to set off their costs against those ordered to be paid by plaintiff. The motion was granted, upon defendants undertaking not to levy for more than the balance; and as defendants had not applied for a set-off when the order was made against them, no costs as to this application were given on either side. Bryon v. the Metropolitan Saloon Omnibus Co., 798

DEED—A. B, under the mistaken notion that he was, as heir-at-law of his father, entitled to shares in a joint-stock company as realty, executed a deed, by which he joined in indemnifying the directors in respect of certain advances made by them. It turned out upon inquiry that the shares were personal estate, and A. B. filed his bill to be relieved from the deed, and the Court made a decree in his favour, which decree was, upon appeal, affirmed. Broughton v. Hutt, 167

DEVISE—Testator directed that freehold premises should be given to the inhabitants of B. to found an asylum, and that his executors should call a meeting of the inhabitants to appoint a committee and trustees to carry out the same, but in the event of the said inhabitants not appointing a committee or not being willing to carry out the scheme, he willed that all his said property so given to the said asylum should belong to W. H. W. The gift to the charity being void, the devise to W. H. W. took effect. Warren v. Rudall and Hall v. Warren, 70

— Testator by his will settled estates and declared that the same should be forfeited and go over in the event of the party entitled for the time being to possession not repairing a column which he was building, but which he left incomplete at his death. Upon a bill for the administration of testator's estate, it was held, that the party entitled to possession of the estates was not liable to complete the column, and that no contract could be implied to make the testator's residuary estate liable to the expenses of completing it. Though all the questions except those relating to the column and the payment of costs had been settled by agreement between the parties, the suit remained an administration suit, and the costs were ordered to be paid out of the residuary estate of the testator. Joliffe v. Twyford, 93

— Testator, in 1834, devised a sum of money to be secured so as to raise an annuity of 2,000*l.* for his wife, "and on her decease the sum set apart for such payment to become the property of my son, G. C, so far as he shall receive the interest on the said sum during his life, and on his demise the principal to become the property of any child or children he may leave born in lawful wedlock, and in such sums as my said son shall will and direct; but in case of my son dying before his mother, then and in that case the principal sum to be divided between the children of my daughters." This son married, and had a son during the life of testator, and died before testator. It was held, by the House of Lords (Lord Cranworth and Lord Wensleydale dissentientibus), that this son was entitled to the fund, for that the whole context of the will required that "dying before his mother" must be read "dying without issue before his mother." Two appeals were presented, each set of appellants having the same interest. No costs were given. Abbott v. Middleton and Ricketts v. Carpenter, 110

— Testatrix devised all her real estate to trustees upon trust for three persons for life, with remainder to their issue in tail, "and for default of such issue, then upon trust for the right heirs of my grandfather, Sir T. S, Bart., deceased, by Mary, his second wife, also deceased, for ever." It was held, by the House of Lords, affirming the decision of Vice Chancellor Kindersley, that the ultimate limitations created an estate tail special and not a fee simple. Vernon v. Wright, 198

— Testator desired that his two sons might have the use and occupation of certain lands, they paying a stated rent, and that, in default of payment, or if they converted the arable land into tillage, they should no longer have possession thereof. It was held, that personal use and occupation was not necessary, and that they might underlet the property. Testator gave his residuary real and personal estate to trustees, upon trust, as to one-fifth, for each of testator's five children for life, and after his or her decease for his or her children which he or she should leave at his or her decease; but provided that if any child should die without leaving any child at his or her death, such share was to go to testator's other children for their lives and the issue of any then dead, as before directed; and after the death of his five children in trust for their children equally, per capita. One of testator's children died, leaving a son, who died before the last of the testator's children. It was held, the parties claiming through the son had no interest in the rents and income during the lives of the surviving children of testator; that that one-fifth was undisposed of, and that cross-remainders were not in the event which had happened to be implied. Rabbeth v. Squire, 565

— -- Testator devised his real estates to his only daughter for life; remainder to her husband for life; remainder to their second son for life, and afterwards to his first and other sons in tail; remainder to his daughter's eldest son for life; remainder to trustees to preserve contingent remainders; remainder to his second and other younger sons in tail; remainder to his eldest grand-daughter for life; remainder to trustees to preserve; remainder to her sons and daughters in tail. The will contained a shifting clause, that in case any tenant for life or in tail should become entitled to the Turton estates, then in possession of the husband of testator's daughter, the limitations in favour of such person should cease, as if he or she were dead, and the estates so limited were to go to the person next entitled in remainder, it being the testator's intention that both estates should not vest in the same person. In the events that happened, the eldest son of testator's daughter became entitled to the Turton estates, and he was the person next entitled to the devised estates, in case the shifting clause did not take effect. He had only one son. It was held, that the effect of the shifting clause was to divest him of the devised estates; that the Court would effectuate the testator's intention, that the property should go to the unborn sons of the tenant for life whose estate had so ceased; that the trustees to preserve took the estate, as the persons next in remainder, to support contingent remainders; and that the intermediate rents accruing between the time when the estate of the tenant for life ceased, and the birth of a son entitled under the limitations, belonged to the residuary devisee or heir-at-law. Lambarde v. Peach, 569

— A right to sue is a devisable interest. Gresley v. Mousley, 620

— Testator devised specific shares in an estate to several persons nominatim, to hold the same as tenants in common, and not as joint-tenants; and in the event of any of them dying before having heirs of their body, "or" making a particular disposition of his or her property, then his or her share was to go to the survivors. It was held, the devisees did not take estates tail, but estates in fee; that the gift over could only take effect on the happening of two events; that the word "or" must be read "and," although in effect it introduced a condition repugnant to the estate previously given, and made the gift over void; also, that the shares of those devisees

Three parties claimed a fund, and a other two. The defendants disclaimed, but the Court upon deciding against the plaintiff could not go on to declare the rights plaintiff ought to have brought his case before the Court, and that as he had disclaimed, the other claimants as if they were the only lit-

DIVORCE ACT—A married woman obtained a protection order from a magistrate, under the provisions of the Divorce Act, on the ground of desertion. A suit was then instituted against her as a feme sole. The protection order was afterwards discharged, on application by the husband, who proved there had been no desertion on his part.
The plaintiff in the suit then obtained a supplemental order as of course, to bring the husband before the Court. The protection order held good ab initio, and there having been no "change of transmission of interest or liability" the supplemental order was discharged (Rudge v.
Woodon, 788). But on appeal this decision was reversed, and the supplemental order was held good. Rudge v. Woodon, 889

DOMICIL—A Scotchman by birth, having property in Scotland, went to India, and remained there many years. On his return he resided five years on his property in Scotland, expending money upon such property, and considerably improving it. He then left Scotland, in consequence of unpleasant domestic events, and went to Paris, where he resided five years, purchasing expensive furniture and keeping up an establishment there.
During this time he retained domestics at his house in Scotland, and constantly gave directions by letter as to his property, and particularly as to the management of his horses and other animals there. His furniture was left in Scotland, but ready packed up for immediate removal. He died in France. It was held, his domicile was Scottish, and not French; the Court acting upon the principle that slighter evidence is required to support the conclusion that a man intends to abandon an acquired domicile and to resume his domicil of origin, than that he means to abandon his domicile of origin and to acquire a foreign domicil. Lord v. Colvin, 361

G. was born in Scotland, and went, when quite a young man, to India, where he entered into the service of the East India Company.
After being there more than twenty years, he returned to Scotland. He took a house and married in Edinburgh. He afterwards became offended with the people there, and using very strong expressions as to his intentions never to return there, he came to London. He brought his books and his property to London, and lived in London for some years, and engaged in various occupations. He then left London and went to Paris, but left his books, some ornamental furniture and other things in London, telling the persons with whom he left them to keep them until his return. He lived in Paris for some years, made his will there, made it in the English form, but described himself in it as of "Edinburgh"; and he died in Paris. It was held, he had lost his domicile of origin, which was Scotch, and had acquired, and never lost, an English
domicil. Whicker v. Hume, 396

DONATIO MORTIS CAUSA—A lady had a dressing-case and a box, both containing jewellery; the dressing-case was in her possession at the place where she died, the box was at her residence.
On her death-bed she delivered the keys to her servant, with directions to deliver both to the plaintiffs in the event of her dying. This not a donatio mortis causa. Powell v. Hellicar, 355

dridge*).

ENROLMENT OF DECREE—Although the Court is disposed to take a lenient view of circumstances which may have prevented an appeal from being prosecuted within five years, yet after that time it is desirable that the orders as to enrolment, &c., should be strictly adhered to. Wellesley v.
Wellesley, 1

On the 20th of July, 1852, a decree was made giving an infant defendant costs out of the estate, upon an undertaking not to appeal.
On the 9th of May, 1857, the infant attained twenty-one, and in May, 1859, applied for leave to enrol the decree, with a view to appeal to the House of Lords. The application was held too late, defendant having allowed two years to elapse from his attaining twenty-one before applying. Monypenny v. Dering, 503

Defendant entered a caveat against enrolment of a decree on 22nd of December. On 2nd of March he obtained an order to set down the appeal, and served the order on 23rd of April.
On 29th of March notice was given that the docket for enrolment would be presented for the Lord Chancellor's signature, unless the appeal

were lodged, and an order for setting down the same served within twenty-eight days. The appeal was set down on 29th of April, after the expiration of the twenty-eight days, and the enrolment was signed on the following day. Although to prosecute the causal with effect, according to the 4th Order of August, 1852, the appeal ought to have been set down and notice of it served within the twenty-eight days, yet, as the defendant appeared to have been misled, the enrolment was vacated on the ground of indulgence. Pearce v. Lindsay, 513

EVIDENCE—One of the partners in a firm died intestate, and in a suit for winding up the partnership affairs, a sum of money was paid into court. The intestate was also possessed of two other sums of stock, which were transferred to the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, since no next-of-kin of the intestate could be found. A claimant came forward as next-of-kin, and presented a petition in the partnership suit, claiming the money standing to the separate account of the intestate. In that suit nine affidavits were filed. The same claimant presented a petition praying for a transfer of the sums paid to the Commissioners, when nineteen affidavits were filed. On this petition the Attorney General appeared, as representing the Crown and the Commissioners. Letters of administration were then granted to the Solicitor for the Treasury, as nominee of the Crown, and a suit was instituted against him by the representatives of the first claimant, to prove his relationship to the intestate. Another claimant also came forward in this suit, by whom one affidavit was filed. The persons who made the affidavits were all dead. Upon the principle that evidence produced on a former occasion could only be made use of, in subsequent proceedings, between the same parties and upon the same issue, the nine affidavits in the partnership suit and the one affidavit in the present suit by a different claimant, were rejected, but the nineteen affidavits on the petition were admitted. The Attorney General having been served, under the 56 Geo. 3. c. 60, it was held, he must be presumed to have represented the Crown and the National Debt Commissioners and the beneficial interests of the Crown. Lawrence v. Maule, 681

— Upon a notice of motion for a decree a plaintiff may cross-examine a defendant on his answer, but other defendants may object to such cross-examination being read as evidence against them. After notice of motion for a decree witnesses in chief cannot be examined. Rheden v. Wesley, 797

EXECUTOR—Testator, who died in 1855, by his will gave all his property and the residue of his estate to three persons, upon trust, to pay various legacies; he also gave legacies of unequal amounts to each of his trustees, whom he also appointed executors. The trustees were also empowered to appoint new trustees in the place of those unable to act. Testator afterwards gave an additional legacy to one of his executors. He was illegitimate, and died without having ever been married. It was held, the undisposed-of residue did not belong to the executors, but lapsed to the Crown, and that it was unaffected by 11 Geo. 4. & 1 Will. 4. c. 40. Read v. Stedman, 481

FINES AND RECOVERIES ACT—Section 24. of 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 74. is retrospective as well as prospective; and therefore a married woman having an estate settled to her separate use by an instrument executed before the passing of the act is alone a sufficient protector of the settlement. Keer v. Brown, 477

FIXTURES—A lessee of steel and iron works assigned, by way of mortgage, the land, with the appurtenances, and also the machinery specified in the schedule, "and all engines, machinery, fixtures and things which might thereafter be fixed and fastened in or upon the said premises, whether in addition to or substitution of the several fixtures, machinery, articles and things specified in the schedule." These words were held to refer not merely to additions to existing machinery, but also to any new machinery fixed or fastened to the mill. Construction of the words "fixed and fastened," as applied to machines, their adjuncts and removable parts. Metropolitan Counties Assurance Societies v. Brown, 581

FORECLOSURE—A second mortgagee is entitled under 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, to apply in a foreclosure suit for conduct of the sale of the estate; but the Court will exercise a discretion, and refuse such application, if expense will be saved by giving the conduct of the sale to the first mortgagee. Hewitt v. Nanson, 49

— A suit having been instituted by the first mortgagee to redeem or foreclose several subsequent incumbrances, the Court made a special decree, fixing a day for any subsequent incumbrancers, to redeem or be foreclosed. Edwards v. Martin, 49

— A first mortgagee filed a bill of foreclosure, and asked for a decree. Subsequent incumbrancers asked, under 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86. s. 48, for a sale of the mortgaged estates. Plaintiff not consenting, the Court directed the subse-

who died in testator's lifetime were undisposed of, and passed to the heir-at-law. Greated v. Greated, 756

— Testator, who had several natural children by his housekeeper, devised real estate to each of them, by name. He then devised a real estate "to such other child, if any, that might be born of his housekeeper in his, testator's, lifetime, or in due time after his death," and to such child's heirs and assigns. A child born after the date of the will took no interest under the devise. Medworth v. Pope, 905

— See Legacy. Will.

DISCLAIMER—Three parties claimed a fund, and a suit was instituted by one of them against the other two: one of the co-defendants disclaimed, but contended, that the Court upon deciding against the plaintiff could not go on to declare the rights of his co-defendant. It was held, the disclaiming defendant ought to have brought his case before the Court, and that as he had disclaimed, the Court would decide the question between the two other claimants as if they were the only litigating parties. *Jolly v. Plaintiff in the suit then obtained a supplemental order as of course, to bring the husband before the Court. The protection order held void ab initio, and there having been no "change or transmission of interest or liability" the supplemental order was discharged (Rudge v. Weedon, 788). But on appeal this decision was reversed, and the supplemental order was held good. Rudge v. Weedon, 889

His furniture was left in Scotland, but ready packed up for immediate removal. He died in France. It was held, his domicile was Scotch, and not French; the Court acting upon the principle that slighter evidence is required to warrant the conclusion that a man intends to abandon an acquired domicile and to resume his domicile of origin, than that he means to abandon his domicile of origin and to acquire a foreign domicile. Lord v. Colvin, 361

— G. was born in Scotland, and went, when quite a young man, to India, where he entered into the service of the East India Company. After being there more than twenty years, he returned to Scotland. He took a house and married in Edinburgh. He afterwards became offended with the people there, and using very strong expressions as to his intentions never to return there, he came to London. He brought his books and his property to London, and lived in London for some years, and engaged in various occupations. He then left London and went to Paris, but left his books, some ornamental furniture and other things in London, telling the persons with whom he left them to keep them until his return. He lived in Paris for some years, made his will there, made it in the English form, but described himself in it as of "Edinburgh"; and he died in Paris. It was held, he had lost his domicile of origin, which was Scotch, and had acquired, and never lost, an English domicile. Whicker v. Hume, 396

DONATIO MORTIS CAUSA—A lady had a dressing-case and a box, both containing jewellery; the dressing-case was in her possession at the place where she died, the box was at her residence. On her death-bed she delivered the keys to her servant, with directions to deliver both to the plaintiffs in the event of her dying. This not a donatio mortis causa. Powell v. Hellicar, 355

ELECTION. See Legacy (Becton v. Barton). Power of Appointment (Woodbridge v. Woodbridge).

ENROLMENT OF DECREE—Although the Court is disposed to take a lenient view of circumstances which may have prevented an appeal from being prosecuted within five years, yet after that time it is desirable that the orders as to enrolment, &c., should be strictly adhered to. Wellesley v. Wellesley, 1

— On the 20th of July, 1852, a decree was made giving an infant defendant costs out of the estate, upon an undertaking not to appeal. On the 9th of May, 1857, the infant attained twenty-one, and in May, 1859, applied for leave to enrol the decree, with a view to appeal to the House of Lords. The application was held too late, defendant having allowed two years to elapse from his attaining twenty-one before applying. Monypenny v. Dering, 503

— Defendant entered a caveat against enrolment of a decree on 22nd of December. On 2nd of March he obtained an order to set down the appeal, and served the order on 23rd of April. On 29th of March notice was given that the docket for enrolment would be presented for the Lord Chancellor's signature, unless the appeal

were lodged, and an order for setting down the same served within twenty-eight days. The appeal was set down on 29th of April, after the expiration of the twenty-eight days, and the enrolment was signed on the following day. Although to prosecute the causal with effect, according to the 4th Order of August, 1852, the appeal ought to have been set down and notice of it served within the twenty-eight days, yet, as the defendant appeared to have been misled, the enrolment was vacated on the ground of indulgence. Pearce v. Lindsay, 513

EVIDENCE—One of the partners in a firm died intestate, and in a suit for winding up the partnership affairs, a sum of money was paid into court. The intestate was also possessed of two other sums of stock, which were transferred to the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, since no next-of-kin of the intestate could be found. A claimant came forward as next-of-kin, and presented a petition in the partnership suit, claiming the money standing to the separate account of the intestate. In that suit nine affidavits were filed. The same claimant presented a petition praying for a transfer of the sums paid to the Commissioners, when nineteen affidavits were filed. On this petition the Attorney General appeared, as representing the Crown and the Commissioners. Letters of administration were then granted to the Solicitor for the Treasury, as nominee of the Crown, and a suit was instituted against him by the representatives of the first claimant, to prove his relationship to the intestate. Another claimant also came forward in this suit, by whom one affidavit was filed. The persons who made the affidavits were all dead. Upon the principle that evidence produced on a former occasion could only be made use of, in subsequent proceedings, between the same parties and upon the same issue, the nine affidavits in the partnership suit and the one affidavit in the present suit by a different claimant, were rejected, but the nineteen affidavits on the petition were admitted. The Attorney General having been served, under the 56 Geo. 3. c. 60, it was held, he must be presumed to have represented the Crown and the National Debt Commissioners and the beneficial interests of the Crown. Lawrence v. Maule, 681

— Upon a notice of motion for a decree a plaintiff may cross-examine a defendant on his answer, but other defendants may object to such cross-examination being read as evidence against them. After notice of motion for a decree witnesses in chief cannot be examined. Rheden v. Wesley, 797

EXECUTOR—Testator, who died in 1855, by his will gave all his property and the residue of his estate to three persons, upon trust, to pay various legacies; he also gave legacies of unequal amounts to each of his trustees, whom he also appointed executors. The trustees were also empowered to appoint new trustees in the place of those unable to act. Testator afterwards gave an additional legacy to one of his executors. He was illegitimate, and died without having ever been married. It was held, the undisposed-of residue did not belong to the executors, but lapsed to the Crown, and that it was unaffected by 11 Geo. 4. & 1 Will. 4. c. 40. Read v. Stedman, 481

FINES AND RECOVERIES ACT — Section 24. of 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 74. is retrospective as well as prospective; and therefore a married woman having an estate settled to her separate use by an instrument executed before the passing of the act is alone a sufficient protector of the settlement. Keer v. Brown, 477

FIXTURES—A lessee of steel and iron works assigned, by way of mortgage, the land, with the appurtenances, and also the machinery specified in the schedule, "and all engines, machinery, fixtures and things which might thereafter be fixed and fastened in or upon the said premises, whether in addition to or substitution of the several fixtures, machinery, articles and things specified in the schedule." These words were held to refer not merely to additions to existing machinery, but also to any new machinery fixed or fastened to the mill. Construction of the words "fixed and fastened," as applied to machines, their adjuncts and removable parts. Metropolitan Counties Assurance Societies v. Brown, 581

FORECLOSURE—A second mortgagee is entitled under 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, to apply in a foreclosure suit for conduct of the sale of the estate; but the Court will exercise a discretion, and refuse such application, if expense will be saved by giving the conduct of the sale to the first mortgagee. Heritt v. Nanson, 49

— A suit having been instituted by the first mortgagee to redeem or foreclose several subsequent incumbrances, the Court made a special decree, fixing a day for any subsequent incumbrancers, to redeem or be foreclosed. Edwards v. Martin, 49

— A first mortgagee filed a bill of foreclosure, and asked for a decree. Subsequent incumbrancers asked, under 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86. s. 48, for a sale of the mortgaged estates. Plaintiff not consenting, the Court directed the subsequent incumbrancers to deposit a sum of 200*l.* to cover the expense of any ineffectual attempt to sell, and also directed a reserved bidding to be fixed sufficient to cover the amount due to the plaintiff, and made an order for sale of the estates within a given time, and foreclosure in default. Whitbread v. Roberts, 431

FORFEITURE—of Shares. See Winding-up Acts (Ex parte Barton).

FORMA PAUPERIS—A bill was filed, by a married woman by her next friend, to enforce payment of an annuity settled to her separate use, and at the hearing the same was dismissed. The plaintiff wished to appeal, but the next friend refused to allow his name to be used. The plaintiff applied to the Lords Justices, and filed an affidavit stating that she was unable to find any other person whose name could be substituted for the present next friend, and that she was subsisting entirely by charity; and their Lordships made an order, that she should be at liberty to present the appeal and take any other proceedings in the cause in forma pauperis without a next friend. Crouch v. Waller, 514

FRAUD. See Contract. Principal and Surety. Winding-up Acts. Sale of Goods.

FRAUDS, STATUTE OF—J. L. agreed by parol with J. W. for a conveyance of a life interest in real estate, part of which, a cottage, was in his own occupation; the terms were, that J. W. should be repaid the purchase-money and interest out of the rents, and should allow J. L. to continue to occupy the cottage. G, a witness, swore that this was the effect of the parol arrangement, but two witnesses swore that they had heard J. W. deny it. A short time after this agreement J. W. asked J. L. to execute an absolute conveyance of the same life interest to J. W.'s daughter, then an infant, which J. L. accordingly did; and J. W. entered into possession of the property, leaving the cottage in J. L.'s possession, rent free. J. W. wrote letters afterwards to G. and to J, saying that he had bought the property out and out, and offered J. L. an annuity for life if he would give up possession of the cottage. J. W., by will, devised his real estate to his daughter, and appointed B. his executor and her guardian. B. made J. L. an offer of the annuity on the same terms as J. W. had done, but the offer was refused. Thereupon B., as the next friend of J. W.'s daughter, brought an action of ejectment against J. L., who filed a bill to restrain it, alleging the parol agreement, and praying an injunction to stay the action, and a re-conveyance of the property on payment of what was due. Evidence of the parol agreement was held to be admissible notwithstanding the 29 Car. 2. c. 3, and a decree was made declaring the daughter of J. W. to be a trustee for J. L., who was entitled to redeem on payment of what was due. Lincoln v. Wright, 705

GUARDIAN—Under the Leases and Settled Estates

Act, 19 & 20 Vict. c. 120, the appointment of a guardian to infant petitioners should be made after the petition has been presented. In re Hargreave's Settled Estates, 197

INFANT—On marriage between a minor of seventeen and a widow of thirty-two possessed of 1,000*l.* in business, he covenanted by settlement to pay 1,000*l.* to a trustee, upon trust for the separate use of the lady for life, and if she should die in his lifetime, for the children of the lady by a former marriage. After the marriage the husband possessed himself of the stock of the wife's business, and carried it on till her death, seven years afterwards. The trustee demanded payment of 1,000*l.*, and on the husband refusing to pay, he filed a bill on behalf of the children of the former marriage. The husband set up as his defence that he was an infant, and that the wife knew the fact, at the time of the marriage. The evidence proved the infancy, and an assertion by the husband to the wife's solicitor that he was of age, but it also proved that the wife knew of the infancy. It was held, that the case upon the evidence must be taken as if the fact of infancy had been stated in the settlement; that the rights of the husband must, as to the ground of acquiescence, be taken to be the same as on the day after his marriage; that to deprive an infant of the privilege of infancy, more is necessary than shewing he made a false representation, for it must be proved that the party to whom it is made was deceived; and that contracts made with an infant, known to be so, are binding on those who enter into them, for infancy is a legal privilege, and not to be broken in upon on slight grounds. Nelson v. Stocker, 760

— CUSTODY OF—The Court of Chancery cannot decide upon the custody of infants simply with reference to what is most for their benefit, and cannot interfere with the rights of a father, unless he so conducts himself as to render it essential to the safety and welfare of the children in some serious and important respect, either physically, intellectually or morally, that they should be removed from his custody. In re Curtis, 458

INJUNCTION—Bill filed, by an American trading company, incorporated by the law of the State of Connecticut, in the United States of America, for an injunction to restrain defendant, a manufacturer of Birmingham, from continuing the fraudulent use, as alleged, of the trade marks of plaintiffs, and for an account of profits. Defendant, by his answer, admitted the user of the trade marks complained of, but by way of rebuttal of the charge of fraud, stated that in so using the said trade marks he had only followed a custom prevalent at Birmingham for manufacturers of goods of the kind sold by the plaintiffs to affix on the goods ordered by merchants a particular trade mark, relying on the respectability of the merchant, when known to them, for the fact that those merchants had authority to act as agents of, or by way of licence from, the person entitled to the exclusive use of the trade marks; and, further, that he had been informed that plaintiffs themselves had ordered goods to be manufactured at Birmingham, with their own trade mark upon them, for the purpose of sale in foreign countries. These statements of defendant were left uncontradicted by plaintiffs. The Court, upon motion for decree, ordered that an interim injunction, which the defendant had previously submitted to, should be continued for a year, with liberty to the plaintiffs to bring an action within that time to try their right at law; and in case of their not proceeding at law and to trial within that time, then that their bill should thereupon stand dismissed, with costs. The Collins Co. v. Reeres, 56

— Where a company having power by act of parliament to raise an embankment to a certain height exceeds that height, a neighbouring landowner is not, on account of the possibility of injury to his lands, entitled to an injunction against the company; but the right to such injunction is in the Attorney General, on behalf of the public. Ware v. Regent's Canal Co., 153

— One of the Vice Chancellors refused to decree the specific performance of a charter-party or to grant an injunction at the suit of the charterer to restrain a mortgagee of the ship, who had notice of the charter-party, from making a sale in pursuance of his power of sale contained in the mortgage-deed; but the Lords Justices, considering that where property is contracted to be used in a particular manner, and a purchaser buys that property, with notice of that contract, he is bound not to use it otherwise than in accordance with the contract, held, that plaintiff was entitled to an injunction to restrain the mortgagee from exercising his power of sale, and from interfering with the ship on her voyage, the injunction to continue till the hearing of the cause, and plaintiff undertaking to be answerable in damages. De Mattos v. Gibson, 165

— Plaintiff sold two leasehold houses, one to defendant and another to L. The conveyance to defendant contained by mistake a part of the property intended to be sold to L, but which defendant believed he was purchasing. Upon a bill filed against defendant by L. he was directed to reconvey to L. that portion which by mistake was included in the assignment to him. Defendant then brought an action at law against plaintiff, the vendor, for damages under his covenant against incumbrances. An equitable plea was put in by plaintiff, who now filed a bill for an injunction to restrain the action; but the injunction was refused. Wild v. Hillas, 170

— If one trader, by using the trade marks or labels of another trader, provokes a suit for the interference of the Court, the defendant, though he withdraws the marks or labels, and consents to a perpetual injunction, will still be liable to the costs of the suit, and if he does not pay them, or refuses to pay them, the plaintiff will be justified in setting down the cause and bringing it on for hearing. Buryess v. Hill, 356

— Upon bill filed to restrain an action at law for damages by reason of the non-performance of a covenant in a deed to pay premiums upon a policy, the Court held that, under the Common Law Procedure Act of 1854, it was optional and not compulsory upon a defendant at law to put in an equitable plea; and that if the defendant did not choose to avail himself of his right, he could not be compelled to plead an equitable defence, although the question might be more proper for the decision of a Court of law. An injunction was granted upon motion to restrain the action until the hearing. Kingsford v. Swinford, 413

— The 83rd section of the Common Law Procedure Act, giving a right to plead an equitable defence, is only permissive, and not compulsory; and a defendant at law who has not exercised his option of putting in an equitable plea may come for an injunction to restrain the action, as he might have done before that act. Gompertz v. Pooley, 484

— A plaintiff, who files a bill against parties abroad, and on an affidavit of merits obtains an injunction to stay proceedings at law, cannot, upon a sufficient answer being put in, retain the injunction upon inferences to be drawn from a previous evasive answer and the proceedings taken upon the exceptions. And though it is suggested that the bill has been amended and filed, the injunction will be dissolved. Mollett v. Encquist, 507

INSOLVENT—The surplus of an insolvent's estate left in the Insolvent Debtors Court, after payment of all the debts under the insolvency, was claimed adversely by various persons, as assignees by deed from the insolvent, and also by the provisional assignee of the Insolvent Debtors Court, representing the creditors under a second insolvency of the same insolvent. It was held, this Court, and not the Insolvent Debtors Court, was the proper tribunal for adjudicating upon such conflicting claims. Whether there is a concurrent jurisdiction in the Insolvent Debtors Court, quære. Cook v. Sturgis, 345

— A writ of ne exeat regno was obtained against a defendant upon an undertaking by plaintiff to be answerable for damages. Defendant became insolvent, and obtained his protection, under the act, and it was held the writ must be discharged upon payment of costs by defendant, and plaintiff be released from his undertaking. James v. North, 374

of E. W. was subject to a condition avoiding it on suicide, but provided that in case the policy should have been assigned to other parties for a valuable consideration six calendar months before the death of the assured, it should remain in force to the extent of the beneficial interest therein of the party to whom it should have been assigned. E. W. deposited the policy with the plaintiff. The policy was accompanied by a letter, stating that it was to be held "as security, in case of death or otherwise, for any notes of hand or bills of exchange you may have cashed for me." From that time a current account existed between the parties; the plaintiff cashed or discounted for E. W. divers bills of exchange, and frequently took renewals of them as they came due. E. W. afterwards shot himself. At that time a sum of money was due to the plaintiff by E. W. on several outstanding bills of exchange, &c. exceeding the amount payable on the policy; but none of them bore date much more than two months before the death of E. W. Upon a bill to obtain payment of the sums insured, it was held, the policy was duly assigned; that the security continued from the date of the deposit, notwithstanding the consideration for it was fluctuating; that the payment or withdrawal of the earlier bills did not necessitate a fresh deposit; and that it was, and was intended to be, a security for what was due on the current account at the death of E. W. or otherwise. Jones v. the Consolidated Investment and Assurance Co., 66

— Mortgagee, by way of collateral security for his mortgage debt, insured in his own name the life of his debtor, the latter paying the premiums upon the policy. The debtor afterwards took the benefit of the Insolvent Debtors Act, obtained the ordinary vesting order, and, having put in his schedule, in which the mortgage debt was specified, and the policy, as one of the securities for the payment of such debt, obtained his discharge. The debtor, after surviving the mortgagee, died, and the insurance company paid the amount due upon the policy to the personal representatives of the mortgagee, who, after retaining thereout the amount of their debt and costs, paid the balance into court. The balance being claimed by the assignee in insolvency of the debtor, on the one hand, and by his personal representatives on the other, held, that the title of the assignee in insolvency was to be preferred. In re Storie's Trust, 888

INTEREST OF MONEY. See Annuity (Mansfield v. Ogle).

INTERPLEADER—The mortgagees of lands in settlement, by the direction and with the concurrence of the donee of a power under the settlement, granted a lease at an annual rent to the plaintiff, who, with the assent of the mortgagees, covenanted to pay the rent to the donee of the power, unless it should be demanded by the mortgagees. The deed of settlement, as well as the power contained therein, was referred to, but its terms were not set out in the indenture of lease. The rent payable under the lease having fallen into arrear was claimed of the plaintiff both by the surviving trustee of the settlement and by the donee of the power therein. It was held, that a bill of interpleader filed against the counter claimants could not be sustained. Cook v. the Earl of Rosslyn, 833

INVESTMENT—Testator directed his trustees to invest in the funds, or on government securities "or upon the security by way of mortgage of any freehold, copyhold or leasehold hereditaments in England or Wales." This did not authorize the investment upon security of railway mortgages made in conformity with 8 & 9 Vict. c. 16. s. 38, or in Great Northern Railway Debenture Stock. Mortimore v. Mortimore, 558

ISSUES—The Chancery Amendment Act, 1858, having expressly left it to the Court to say, whether the trial of a question of fact shall take place before a jury at common law, before a jury in Chancery, or before the Court without a jury, this Court will not at present, unless both parties concur in the application, or there is some special reason for delay, expense or otherwise, direct the trial to be before itself, the confidence of either suitor in the method established by long habit being a circumstance which ought to turn the scale, especially on the first experiment of a different system being required to be made. Scoble—the legislature did not contemplate the trial of issues before the Court of Chancery as a general rule. Peters v. Rule, 246

— In cases requiring a jury under 21 & 22 Vict. c. 27, the practice of the Court in granting issues will be followed; and, therefore, before the hearing the Court will not summon a jury without the consent of the defendant. George v. Whitmore, 720

— A cause being ready for hearing upon bill and answer and affidavits, a preliminary motion was made under the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 27, that a jury might be summoned to try certain disputed questions of fact. It was held, the act was only intended to apply to cases in which, under the old practice, an issue would have been directed at the hearing. Bradley v. Berington, 799

— After the trial of an issue devisavit vel non, if the verdict given satisfies the conscience of the Court that the capacity of the testator was competent to enable him to execute a will, a new trial will not be granted, at the request of the heir-at-law, though there were discrepancies in the evidence which were not satisfactorily explained. Swinfen v. Swinfen, 849

LANDLORD AND TENANT—A tenant, under a lease which contained a covenant to repair, and leave in good repair, all buildings and erections then standing or to be erected during the term, built a farm-house, partly on the land demised and partly on the waste adjoining belonging to the lessor. On the decease of the tenant, upon a claim by the landlord for dilapidations, it was held that his acquiescence in the act of the tenant prevented his dispossessing him of the premises built on the waste, and that it must be assumed by implication that the covenant to repair extended to the whole building, and that the landlord was entitled in a suit for the administration of the tenant's estate to establish a claim for dilapidations. In re Newbery and White v. Wakley, 77

LANDS CLAUSES CONSOLIDATION ACT—A railway company, under the compulsory powers of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, took lands belonging to a corporation, which were then let on lease. The value of the reversion was alone assessed, it being understood that rents were to be paid to the corporation during the existence of the leases. Upon petition by the corporation, asking for investment of the purchase-money, it was held, the purchase was made as of property in possession, and the dividends were payable to the corporation, and ought not to be accumulated up to the falling in of the reversion. In re Hampstead Junction Rail. Co., ex parte Dean and Chapter of Westminster, 144

— Upon a petition by a tenant for life for the re-investment of purchase-money for lands taken by a railway company, the costs of the appearance of the reversioner, and of the trustees of a deed of separation between the tenant for life and her husband, must be paid out of the fund, and not by the railway company. Wilson v. Foster, in re the Lancashire and Yorkshire Rail. Co., 410

— Three houses were built upon a plot of land, a portion of which was laid out in gardens for each house; a summer-house and other detached out-houses were also built. A railway company, under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, required a portion of the gardens for the purpose of their undertaking, but they refused to purchase the whole premises. Upon bill by the freeholder, it was held, that the gardens were part of the houses to which they were attached, and that the company was bound to purchase the two houses and premises from which parts of the gardens were taken, and to make compensation for any injury sustained in respect of the third house. Cole v. West London and Crystal Palace Rail. Co., 767

LEASE—An agreement to let a farm less a stated number of acres will be supported in equity, though the lands to be excepted were not specified. The right of selection must be exercised so as not to prevent the useful and beneficial occupation of the rest of the farm; and with these declarations a decree was made for a specific performance of the agreement. Jenkins v. Green, 817

— If a farmer contracts with a rector for a lease of glebe lands, the Court will not assume that both parties had an enabling statute present in their minds, and modify the express terms of the agreement, to make it conform with the provisions of the statute. Where an agreement had been made by a rector to grant a lease of glebe lands, at a rent to be paid half-yearly, the Court will not vary the agreement in accordance with the provisions of the 5 Vict. sess. 2. c. 27, and direct the rent to be paid quarterly. A decree was made for the specific performance of a lease of glebe lands. The decree was duly enrolled; it was, however, subsequently found, that the agreement and the statute enabling incumbents to grant leases of their glebe did not conform. It was held, notwithstanding the previous proceedings, that the bill must be dismissed, but without costs. Jenkins v. Green, 820

— Glebe lands which have been usually let on lease by incumbents are not within the 5 Vict. sess. 2. c. 27. Jenkins v. Green, 822

LEASES AND SETTLED ESTATES ACT. See Guardian. Settled Estates Act.

LEGACY—Testatrix, by her will, gave all her real and personal estate to be converted into money, on trust, to pay debts, &c. and “the following legacies”; then followed a legacy of 10*l.* and a legacy of 5*l.*, and the will proceeded thus, “Also I give to my nephew G. T. the sum of 2,000*l.*, in which sum or thereabouts, he now stands indebted to me, subject nevertheless to, and I hereby charge the same with the payment of the following annuities and sums of money, that is to say, to—&c.” The will, after declaring when these legacies were to be paid, went on thus: “Provided always, and I hereby declare that I do not intend by the legacy of 2,000*l.* hereinbefore bequeathed to my said nephew G. T. to exonerate or release him from the debt which may be due from him to me at the time of my decease. But I direct that whatever sum or sums of money shall be due or owing from him to me at the time of my decease, shall be taken or considered in part or in satisfaction (as the case may be) of the said legacy or sum of 2,000*l.*, and shall be reckoned and accounted for by him accordingly." G. T. became insolvent, and was never able to satisfy the debt due to the testatrix's estate. It was held, by the Lord Chancellor and Lord Cranworth (Lord Wensleydale dissentiente), that the deficiency to meet the annuities and legacies charged on the 2,000*l.* must be made up out of the general assets. Vickers v. Pound, (H. L.) 16

— A sum of stock was bequeathed to trustees, after the decease of the survivor of two tenants for life, "to pay and apply the stock equally amongst the testator's nephews and nieces then living, or their legal personal representatives, share and share alike." There were seven nephews and nieces; four were still living; one nephew and niece had died in the lifetime of the testator: the nephew alone had left issue; another nephew survived the testator, and died in the lifetime of the surviving tenant for life, leaving issue. Upon a suit for the administration of the fund, it was held to be divisible into seven shares, and that the nephews and nieces living were each entitled to one share, and that the legal personal representatives of each nephew and niece deceased were entitled to one share each. King v. Cleaveland, 74

— A substitutionary gift to the personal representatives of a niece, one of a class, who had died in the life of testator, without issue, devolves upon her next-of-kin, and does not pass to her administrator. King v. Cleaveland, 76

— Testator, by his will, stated that he had lent his money to various persons on their respective notes of hand, and to sundry other persons, whose names and notes would be found among his papers; he then said, "Now my will is, that the monies as aforesaid be disposed of as follows"; testator then gave legacies to the amount of 9,900*l.* At his death none of the enumerated investments existed. The legacies were held to be not specific, but general. White v. Wakley, 79

— Testator gave 1,000*l.* to his sister Sarah for life, with remainder to her children; he then said, To each of my sisters, M. A. C, and B. I bequeath 500*l.*, and in case of death to either, their portions to go to the surviving sisters "above mentioned." C. died in the lifetime of the testator. It was held, that her 500*l.* survived to M. A. and B.; and that Sarah was not included in the words "the surviving sisters above mentioned." White v. Wakley, 79

— Testator, by his will, made an equal division of his real and personal estate among his children; in the course of fifteen years afterwards he made advances of large sums to some of his daughters on their marriage, and to some of his sons on establishing them in business: to others of his sons and daughters he gave trifling sums only. It was held, the small sums were intended as free gifts, but that the larger sums being for permanent advancements, were in part satisfaction of the benefits given to them by the will. If a presumption arises that payments by a testator to his children were made in satisfaction of legacies they would become entitled to under his will, it is not rebutted by their believing such payments to have been gifts, when the belief is unsupported by any testimony of the intention of the testator. Schofield v. Heap, 104

— A bequest in a will of specific chattels to H. is not revoked by a gift of the same chattels by codicil to other legatees, the last-mentioned gift appearing to be founded on the supposition that the chattels had been by the will bequeathed to C, and that the bequest had lapsed by his death. Barclay v. Maskelyne, 115

— Where a sum directed by testatrix to be set apart for an annuity was bequeathed, on death of the annuitant, to such of testatrix's nephews and nieces as should be "then" living, and the child and children of such of them as should be "then" dead, it was held, that the children of a nephew who was dead at the date of the will were entitled to participate, and that their interest vested at the death of testatrix. In re Faulding's Trusts, 217

— A residuary estate was bequeathed to trustees upon trust to permit testator's wife to receive the income for life, and also to apply such parts of the capital to her own use as she should think proper, and after her decease to apply the residue to such persons as she by will should direct. The widow used no part of the capital, but by her will she directed that the property should be distributed as directed by the will of her husband. It was held, that the widow took a life interest only in the fund, with power to apply the capital for her own benefit, and if not so disposed of, with a power to appoint it by will. Scott v. Josselyn, 297

— Testator gave a sum of 4,300*l.* consols to his executors, upon trust as to the annual dividends thereof, amounting to 129*l.*, to pay his brother and two sisters an annuity of 20*l.* each during their lives; the remainder of the said dividends he directed to be paid to his nephew during his life; and as and when the brother and two sisters should die, then the three annuities of 20*l.* were to be paid to A. B. and C, the eldest taking the first of the said annuities that should fall in, and the others in like manner by seniority. And after the decease of the survivor of A. B. and C, then the principal sum of 4,300*l.* was given to Anne Beale. It was held, the bequests to A. B. and C. were gifts of certain portions of the dividends of the capital sum of money, and not annuities; and that the personal representative of one of the three who had died was entitled to receive his annual sum of 20*l.* until the death of the survivor of the three. Bignold v. Giles, 358

— A legacy to a class not definitively fixed will be carried into effect so far as the objects can be ascertained; but blanks in a will cannot be filled up, though the testator apparently contemplated an extension of the class. Mason v. Bateson, 891

— Testator gave a portion of his personal property to trustees, to invest the same in the securities therein mentioned, and pay out of the proceeds an annuity of 5*l.* to T. P., and apply the residue of the interest, &c. towards the maintenance and education of W. C. until twenty-one, and on his attaining that age to transfer the principal of the trust-moneys charged with the said annuity of 5*l.* unto W. C. absolutely. But if W. C. should die before twenty-one, and during the life of T. P., then the trustees were to pay T. P. for life an annuity of 10*l.* in lieu of the 5*l.*, and to pay the remainder of the interest during the life of T. P., as well as the principal after her death, to a third person absolutely. T. P., the annuitant, died before W. C., but W. C. died a minor. It was held, the gift to W. C. was an absolute vested interest in him, and notwithstanding he died under twenty-one the estate was not divested, since the precise contingency of W. C. dying under twenty-one and during the life of T. P. never happened; that consequently the representatives of W. C. were entitled to the property. Potts v. Atherton, 486

— A, who was possessed of property, both in consols and in Bank stock, made a will, by which she gave to her brother (who received the income from all her property, and acted as her banker,) "everything I may be possessed of at my decease for his own life, and should he marry and have children of his own, to those children after: but should he die a bachelor, I leave the whole of my fortune now standing in the funds to Emma Slingsby, my god-daughter." The brother died a bachelor. Under this will the Bank stock did not pass to Emma Slingsby. Slingsby v. Granger, 616

— Testator gave his real and personal estate to trustees upon trust out of the income to pay an annuity of 500*l.* a year to his widow for life, or for so long as she should continue his widow, for the maintenance of herself and his children, and to invest the surplus; and after her death or marriage again, upon trust to apply such annual income for the maintenance and advancement of such of his children as should be under twenty-one; and when the youngest of his children should attain the said age, then upon trust to distribute all his property equally between his children, except so much as would secure to his wife, if she should be then alive and married again, an annuity of 100*l.* a year for life. And in case of the death of any of his children, leaving lawful issue, testator directed that the share of such child or children should go to his or her children. It was held, the share of each child became vested on attaining twenty-one, that no division was to be made until the youngest child attained twenty-one, or during the life or widowhood of testator's wife, and that the share of any child dying and leaving issue was given over to the children of such deceased child, on the death of a child before the period of distribution. the date of the above-mentioned will, testator, on the marriage of one of his daughters, settled 2,000*l.* for the benefit of herself, her husband and children. It was held, the daughter must elect whether to take under the will or the settlement. Beckton v. Barton, 673

— Under a bequest to such of testator's grandchildren as should be living at the death of a tenant for life, and the executors or administrators of such of them as should be then dead leaving any child or children living at the death of the tenant for life, it was held that the share of a grandchild, who died in the lifetime of the tenant for life, leaving a child, belonged to his estate, and was not given either to his executors beneficially, or to his next-of-kin. In re Seymour's Trusts, 765

— A legacy of stock in trust for A. B. for life, and afterwards to divide the same amongst testator's nephews and nieces, children of A. B., then living, or their legal personal representatives, share and share alike. One of testator's nieces died in his lifetime, without issue. It was held, the fund was divisible among the nephews and nieces whether surviving the tenant for life or not, and that the share of the deceased niece devolved upon her next-of-kin, and not upon her administrator. King v. Cleveland, 835

LEGACY DUTY—Testator directed his estates to be sold, and gave the dividends of one portion of the proceeds to his wife for life, and after her death he gave the capital to A. B. The second portion he gave to A. B., subject to various annuities. By an arrangement between the widow and A. B., the first portion was paid over by the executors to A. B. during the widow's life, and no sum was retained to answer the legacy duty, which would become payable on the widow's death. A. B. sold the second portion to plaintiff, and the surviving executors of the surviving executor of testator joined in the assignment for the purpose of admitting A. B.'s title to the property, and stating that they knew of no incumbrance upon it. Upon death of annuitants, the purchaser filed a bill against the executors for a transfer of the fund; and the Court held, that defendants were not entitled to retain the legacy duty payable upon the first portion of the property. Bignold v. Giles, 238

LEGITIMACY—A, a Jew, and B, a Christian woman, cohabited as man and wife for twenty-eight years, and until B.'s death. They had several children, who were brought up as Christians. They cohabited partly in England and partly in foreign parts. There was no evidence of any marriage having been solemnized, but there was general reputation that the parties were married, and proof of the registry of the baptism in England of several of the children as of A. and B. his wife, and that on a judicial proceeding the parties gave evidence on oath as "A. and B. his wife." The relatives of A. never recognized the fact of a marriage, and some of them swore that they did not know even of the reputation of marriage. A, in his will, referred to such of the children as were living as "my legatees." One of the Vice Chancellors decided that the children were entitled as legitimate children of A. and B. to a fund belonging to A.'s next-of-kin; and that the onus of proof lay upon those who sought to disturb the general reputation and presumption of marriage under the foregoing circumstances: and, on appeal, the decision was affirmed. Goodman v. Goodman, 745

LIMITATIONS, STATUTE OF—Testator, by will, gave all his real and personal property to his wife, out of which he desired that she would discharge all his legal debts and enjoy the surplus for her life; and at her decease the property was to be divided as in the will mentioned. A farm servant of testator left his wages from time to time in his master's hands, and it was agreed between them that the debt thus due should carry interest. Testator died in 1837. In a suit instituted after death of testator's widow, in 1854, for administration of his estate, the Statute of Limitations was held not to bar arrears of interest upon the sum left by the servant in testator's hands. Blower v. Blower, 181

— To a suit by a barrister to recover out of the assets of his deceased clerk fees embezzled and retained by such clerk, the Statute of Limitations cannot be set up as a defence. Teed v. Beere, 782

— A bond was executed in 1821, and the obligee having claimed against the estate of the surety in the bond more than twenty years after the debt, it was held, that an acknowledgment of the debt, in the answer of the executrix of the surety, was sufficient to take the case out of the Statute of Limitations. Moodie v. Bannister, 881

— By a will, dated in 1761, a trust was created in favour of a certain class of testator's relations, nearly all of whom were paid their proportions. The surviving executor and trustee of testator had the remainder of the funds standing in his name at his death, and by his will he recognized the existence of the trust and directed that it should devolve upon his nephew. Administration de bonis non was granted in 1822 to the surviving executor's estate, and subsequently to another person in 1825, when the remaining trust fund was mixed up with such administrator's personal estate and applied in the purchase of real estate. A bill was filed by a person claiming part of the legacy under the original testator's will, charging a breach of trust by the surviving executor, and that his real and personal estate were liable to make good the amount. It was held, upon demurrer to the bill, that the real estate could not be charged with the legacy; that there was an implied trust created by the will, but the right of the claimants having accrued more than twenty years since, their claim was barred by the Statute of Limitations. Henderson v. Atkins, 913

— See Will.

LUNATIC—A committee of a lunatic has no special lien upon the estate, after the death of the lunatic, for money expended by him on his behalf, and a purchaser having notice of the claim of the committee is no more bound to see to the application of the purchase-money than if he bought with notice of simple contract debts. Jones v. Noyes, 47

— A power for the appointment of new trustees contained in a settlement became vested in a person who had been found lunatic by inquisition. The committee of the person and estate petitioned, under the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 70, for leave to exercise the power for him, and the same was ordered. Form of order. In re Bowmer, 618

— A person having been duly found lunatic by inquisition, but before a committee of person or estate had been appointed, and before any report as to his estate had been made, having recovered his reason, and a supersedeas of the commission being ordered, the Court had no jurisdiction to order the party who sued out the inquisition to be paid his costs out of the estate. In re —, a Lunatic, 644

METROPOLIS LOCAL MANAGEMENT ACT. — The powers conferred upon the Metropolitan Board of Works by section 135. of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, of carrying their sewers and works into, through or under any lands, making compensation for any damage done thereby, may be exercised without purchasing such lands, or any easement in them; and the 150th, 151st and 152nd sections of the act, enabling them to purchase any land, or any right or easement in or over any land which they may deem necessary or expedient for the formation or protection of their works, are not to be read as restricting such exercise of those powers. In the construction of powers conferred by act of parliament upon public bodies, acting for the public benefit alone, the intention of the legislature is not to be measured by the more guarded powers given to public companies established for trading purposes. The North London Rail. Co. v. the Metropolitan Board of Works, 909

MORTGAGE—A. B. mortgaged one estate to C. D. and mortgaged another estate to E. F. He then mortgaged his equity of redemption in both estates to G. H., and notice of this was given to the two original mortgagees. The two original mortgages ultimately became vested in I. K, who filed a bill to foreclose G. H. in default of payment of all that was due. G. H. insisted that he was entitled to redeem one estate without redeeming the other; but it was held, affirming the decision of one of the Vice Chancellors, that he had no such right, and that the fact of C. D. and E. F. having had notice of the mortgage of the equity of redemption made no difference. Vint v. Padgett, 21

— A receiver of an estate was appointed, in compliance with an agreement made between a mortgagor and mortgagee. They both joined in the appointment, and gave him power of distress and entry, and the mortgagor attorned as tenant from year to year to the receiver, at a rent of 3,500*l.* The deed recited all the facts relating to the mortgage, and provided that nothing in the deed should abridge the rights of the mortgagee. The mortgagor afterwards became bankrupt, and the receiver distrained for 3,500*l.* Upon this being claimed by the mortgagee, by a party under a bill of sale, and by the assignees of the mortgagor, it was held, the powers of distress and entry were determined by the bankruptcy of the mortgagor, and that the distress was invalid inasmuch as it was executed against the goods of the mortgagor after they had vested in the assignees. If a co-defendant has an interest in the property claimed by the plaintiff upon which he intends to rely, he must upon the pleadings bring his case before the Court. If he merely disclaims, the Court will decide the case between the litigating parties, and leave the co-defendant to such other remedy as he may have. Jolly v. Arbuthnot, 274

— A receiver of an estate was appointed by a mortgagor and mortgagee. They both joined in the appointment, and gave him power of distress and entry, and the mortgagor attorned as tenant to the receiver at a rent of 3,500*l.* The deed recited all the facts relating to the mortgage, and provided that nothing in the deed should abridge the rights of the mortgagee. The mortgagor afterwards became bankrupt, and the receiver distrained for 3,500*l.* Upon this being claimed by the mortgagee, by a party under a bill of sale and by the assignees of the mortgagor, it was held, (reversing the decision of the Court below), that the validity of the distress depended upon the existence of a tenancy to the receiver; that such a tenancy was created, pursuant to the intention of all parties, by the attornment of the mortgagor to him, with the consent of the mortgagee, and that the express power of distress was not a power in gross, but annexed to the tenancy; and that the distress was valid, entitling the mortgagee to the produce of it. Jolly v. Arbuthnot, 547

— A mortgagee of an equity of redemption without notice of prior equitable charges, is entitled, even after a foreclosure bill, filed by the intervening incumbrancer, to get in the legal estate and tack his mortgage. T. E. B, by ante-nuptial settlement, covenanted to convey certain freehold hereditaments of which he was seised in fee, to trustees, upon trusts, for benefit of himself and his wife and children of the marriage. No conveyance was ever made, and T. E. B. afterwards, in fraud of the settlement, executed a mortgage of the premises, and subsequently mortgaged the equity of redemption, none of the mortgagees having notice of the trusts of the settlement. The first mortgagee having afterwards received notice of the trusts of the settlement, it was held, that, notwithstanding such notice, he was at liberty to transfer the legal estate to any person who would pay off his incumbrance, being in a different position from a dry trustee or a satisfied mortgagee. Bates v. Johnson, 509

MORTGAGOR AND MORTGAGEE—Testator directed his estates to be sold, and after decease of his wife gave 14,000*l.* out of the proceeds to different legatees, including 8,000*l.* to be divided between his four nephews, or such of them as should be living at the decease of his wife, but if the fund should not amount to 14,000*l.*, then all the legacies were to be reduced pari passu. The four nephews mortgaged their interest in the 8,000*l.*, with a power to the mortgagees to sell upon non-payment of the money, subject to such special conditions as they should think proper. The money not being paid, the mortgagees sold the property by auction, as a sum payable out of the residue, but without stating that it was liable to abatement, and one condition of sale was, that if the vendors should be unwilling or unable to satisfy any requisitions made by the purchaser, they should be at liberty to rescind the sale. It was held, this condition was not depreciatory; that the mortgagees were justified in selling under such a restriction; and that the omission to state in the particulars that the 8,000*l.* was subject to abatement was not a misstatement calculated to mislead the purchaser. Faulkner v. the Equitable Reversionary Interest Society, 132

MORTMAIN—Testator in his will gave property to trustees, to appropriate the same as they in their “uncontrolled discretion should think proper, for the benefit, advancement and propagation of education and learning in every part of the world.” The will was held valid, and that there was a valid bequest of a charitable nature which was not void for uncertainty. Testator had lands in New South Wales, which were to form part of the property given to trustees for the purposes of the charity. It was held, these lands would pass, and that the Mortmain Act was not applicable to New South Wales. Whicker v. Hume, 396

— A bequest for charitable purposes of shares in a railway company, which, at testator's death, had granted a lease of its railway property and undertaking for 999 years to another railway company at a fixed rent, and with an option of purchasing on notice, is not void under the Statute of Mortmain. Linley v. Taylor, 686

MUNICIPAL CORPORATION — Defendants were holders of two mortgages made by the corporation of Brecon, upon their land. One was made before the Municipal Corporation Act, and the other subsequently. This latter mortgage comprised in addition lands acquired under the Market House Act. Defendants brought an action to obtain payment of the money due on both mortgages. The corporation then paid into court the sum due on the mortgage made before the Municipal Corporation Act. Defendants, plaintiffs in the action, took this money out of court and proceeded with the action upon the second mortgage, and obtained a judgment. Defendants refused to reconvey the lands or deliver up the title-deeds in the first mortgage; and upon a bill by the corporation, it was held, the first mortgage was satisfied before any judgment was obtained, and that no right to tack had arisen, and that defendants must reconvey the lands and deliver up the title-deeds to the corporation. The Mayor, &c. of Brecon v. Seymour, 606

PARTNERS—Plaintiff filed a bill for dissolution of a partnership entered into with the defendant, and moved for a receiver. A question was raised upon the evidence as to the conduct of the parties, and as to whether there was any term fixed for the expiration of the partnership. It was held, that these questions must be decided at the hearing, and that the Court, not being able to say that a dissolution must be decreed at the hearing, would not appoint a receiver, which would operate as an injunction. Baxter v. West, 169

— Certain persons joined together for the purpose of forming a joint-stock company, and with that view purchased property, and incurred debts and expenses. The project became abortive, and upon a bill filed for an account, on the footing of a partnership, it was held, that this was not a partnership, and the bill was dismissed. Hamilton v. Smith, 404

— A partner in a periodical who withdraws from the publication, and determines the partnership, so that the right to use the name must be sold and the affairs wound up, will not be restrained from advertising a work of a similar description under a new name, or the discontinuance of the former work, so far as his connexion with it was concerned. Bradbury v. Dickens, 667

— A surgeon sold a share of his business, and took the purchaser into partnership. The articles specified that the partnership was for such term as they should mutually agree, and that in case of death, absence or incapacity of either of the partners the survivor should have the right of purchasing his share at two years' value, or, in case of dispute, at a price to be named by valuers; but in case he should decline to purchase such share, then that it might be sold to any person willing to purchase. The purchaser died fifteen months after the date of the articles; and on his death the surviving partner refused either to purchase his deceased partner's share, or to admit any other person to be a partner with him. It was held, the surviving partner could not repudiate the articles; and that his refusal to purchase the deceased partner's share, or to admit a new partner in his place, left the surviving partner liable to reimburse the value of deceased partner's share, and also, in the meantime, to account for accrued profits. Featherstonhaugh v. Turner, 812

— Where land is purchased by partners out of the partnership assets, and used for the purposes of the business, it is to be considered as personalty, both as between the partners themselves and as between the heir and personal representatives of a deceased partner. Holroyd v. Holroyd, 902

PLEADING—To bill against executor for payment of a legacy defendant pleaded that testator was at the time of making his will and of his death domiciled in France, and all the bequests of personal estate affected to be made by the said will were by the laws of that empire null and void. Plea not double, as it did not state two bars to the suit, but two averments leading up to one bar. Although probate of a will is conclusive so far as relates to the appointment of executors, it is not conclusive as to the validity of the particular dispositions therein contained; and the above plea therefore was held not to be bad on that ground. Campbell v. Beaufoy, 645

— The Court has no jurisdiction to declare an equitable right on behalf of the legal owner of property, without something on which the Court can act. Bristow v. Whitmore, 801

POOR—Semble—The real and personal property vested in the guardians of a union for the general benefit of the parishes in the union are liable to the debts of judgment creditors. But money raised by rates for the relief of the poor is impressed with a definite trust, and as it would be a breach of trust to apply such money in the discharge of outstanding debts, a creditor who has obtained judgment in respect of a debt incurred prior to the year for which the rate was raised will be restrained from levying execution against the money so raised. Whether a judgment creditor of the existing year can levy execution against such money—quære. Attorney General v. Wilkinson, 392

POWER OF APPOINTMENT—A father, on his son's marriage, conveyed a certain farm to use of himself and his wife successively for life, with remainder to the children of the son. A power was reserved to the father by deed or will to charge all or part of the hereditaments thereby settled, with any sum or sums not exceeding 500*l.*, for portions of his younger children, and to create a term for securing the same. The father, by his will, devised the said farm to his son in fee, charged with payment of legacies of 200*l.*, 200*l.* and 100*l.* to testator's three daughters respectively. The will contained no reference to the settlement, and no limitation of any term, nor did the father otherwise exercise the power. It was held, the will operated as an execution of the power of appointment of which the father was donee under the settlement. Davies v. Davies, 102

— Where a person having a power of appointment over a fund in favour of her children, made an appointment under such circumstances as led the Court to believe that the appointor intended to derive some benefit to herself, but it was not proved that she actually derived any benefit, excepting that the fund appointed was applied partly in payment of debts of the appointee for which the appointor was a surety, the Court of Appeal (reversing a decision of the Master of the Rolls) set aside the appointment. Where there is proof that an appointor at one time intended a benefit to herself, the onus of proof that at the time of the appointment she had abandoned that intention lies upon those who support the appointment. Humphrey v. Over, 406

— Testatrix having, under her marriage settlement, a power of appointment over a trust fund in favour of her children, by her will appointed the trust fund, and also bequeathed her residuary personal estate, upon trust, after the marriage of her daughter C, to assign and transfer the same equally between her two sons and C; and by a codicil, after reciting the marriage of C, she directed that the income of any sums, &c. to which C. might become entitled under her will should be enjoyed by her, for her separate use, during her life, and at her death the principal should become the property of her children. C. was held to be entitled to her share of the trust fund, for her separate use during the life of her husband, with remainder to herself absolutely, and that no case of election arose; and a declaration having been made to this effect, the Court declined to alter it on the ground that the absolute interest, being in remainder, was inalienable during coverture. Wooldridge v. Wooldridge, 689

— Testator had three sons. After referring to a power in his marriage settlement, he said of the settled fund "the sum of 2,000*l.* was settled at her marriage upon my daughter Mary"; and then he added, "the remainder I wish to be equally divided among my sons." One of the sons died in testator's lifetime. This was held a good appointment; and that it was made to them as a class. Fitzroy v. the Duke of Richmond, 750

— Tenants for life of a fund settled on their marriage had a power to appoint the same among the children of the marriage. Upon the marriage of a daughter, one of the children of the marriage, under age, a deed was executed by the tenants for life, by which the reversion in 2,000*l.*, part of the fund, was assigned by the tenants for life to trustees to pay the income to the intended husband for life, with remainder to the wife for life, with remainder to the children of the marriage. This was held to be a valid appointment to the daughter, and that the settlement was a good declaration of trust by the intended husband of the fortune of his wife, though an infant. Fitzroy v. the Duke of Richmond, 752

— By marriage settlement personal property was settled in trust for the husband for life, remainder to the wife for life, remainder upon trust after decease of the wife for such children of the marriage and their issue who should be then living, as the husband should appoint; in default of such appointment to such children and their issue living at the death of the husband as the wife should appoint. There were five children of the marriage all living at the husband's death, and the wife survived her husband. The husband appointed four-fifths to four of these children, omitting any appointment of the remaining fifth. The fifth child died before the wife, leaving three children, one only of whom was born at the husband's death. The wife then appointed the remaining fifth to the only child of the deceased son, who was living at the husband's death, omitting the two children subsequently born, who were plaintiffs in this suit. It was held, overruling Simpson v. Paul, that the partial execution of the primary power by the husband did not preclude the wife from exercising the secondary power in appointing the unappointed fifth; that both the appointments were valid, and that plaintiffs could take no share in the fund. Mapleton v. Mapleton, 785

— A married woman, having a power of appointment in favour of any one or more of her children, appointed the whole fund to one child

absolutely; and there was evidence to shew that an arrangement had been entered into, that such child should hand over one half of the fund to her father absolutely, and should give him a life interest in the other half. No notice of such arrangement was, however, given to the appointee during the life of the mother. The execution of the appointment was held void, as being in fraud of the power. In re Marsden's Trust, 906

PRACTICE—Plaintiff obtained an order for a subpoena to hear judgment, and set down the cause for hearing after the time for closing the evidence in chief had expired, but before the time allowed for cross-examining affidavit witnesses. Defendant moved to set aside the order for a subpoena, and to strike the cause out of the Registrar's list, on the ground of irregularity. Plaintiff's proceedings regular, and the cause was allowed to be set down for hearing before the period for closing the cross-examination of witnesses. Dowson v. Solomon, 884

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—A solicitor acting for an embryo banking company agreed with R. for purchase of a large building and adjoining premises suitable for the company; R, through the solicitor, induced the company to purchase the building at a large increased price, which was divided between R. and the solicitor. The company took possession and adapted the building to the purposes of a bank, and obtained a trade reputation. They subsequently discovered the circumstances under which the sale of the building had been made to them, and upon a bill by the company stating that they could not relinquish the building and that the adjoining premises would greatly facilitate their business, it was held, that the purchase by the solicitor was made as agent and for the benefit of the company; that the company was entitled to the profits made by the solicitor and that the solicitor was a trustee for the company of the premises adjoining the building. *The Bank of London v. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY—Right of surety to have the shares of the receiver, a party to the cause, applied in discharge of payments made by him. Brandon v. Brandon, 147

— An innocent party to a fraud committed by another will not be allowed to derive any benefit from that fraud, unless there has been a consideration moving from himself. Therefore, where a surety innocently joined with his principal in persuading the creditor to accept a transfer of a pretended mortgage, which turned out to have no existence, and to release the surety from his liability, such a release was held to be inoperative. The friends of a surety advanced money to satisfy his private debts, stipulating, however, as a condition of such advance, that he should be released from his liability as surety. The surety having been released under the above circumstances, the creditor was held not entitled to set aside the release without repaying to the friends the money advanced by them. Schofield v. Templar, 452.

PRIORITY—A. mortgaged to B. to secure present and future advances, and afterwards executed a similar mortgage of the same property to C. B. & C. had mutually notice of each other's deeds. B. having made advances after the date of C.'s mortgage, it was held, affirming the decision of the Master of the Rolls, that C. was, in respect of his advances, entitled to priority over B, on account of such subsequent advances made by him. Gordon v. Graham overruled. Roll v. Hopkinson, 41

— A solicitor borrowed money from plaintiff, and deposited with him title-deeds of a leasehold house by way of security, at the same time agreeing by writing to execute an assignment of the premises when called on to do so. The solicitor, who had acted for himself in the first transaction, subsequently assigned the same property to another person, his articulated clerk, but the assignee neglected to obtain the title-deeds, although he made several applications for them to the mortgagor. Plaintiff claimed priority in respect of his equitable security. It was held, the assignee could not be considered to have had constructive notice, through the mortgagor, as his solicitor, of plaintiff's security, and that the omission on the part of the assignee to obtain the deeds did not prevent him from having the benefit of his assignment. Espin v. Pemberton, 308

— Where an assignee of a lease upon occasion of the assignment, made bond fide inquiries for the deeds, and a reasonable excuse was given for their not being produced, he was held (on appeal, affirming the decision below—see the preceding case) to be entitled to the benefit of the assignment, free from a previous equitable charge which had been made by the assignor by deposit of the deeds. Where a mortgagor is a solicitor and prepares the mortgage-deed, no other solicitor being employed in the transaction, the mortgagor will not be considered as the solicitor for the mortgagee, so as to affect the mortgagee with notice of facts within the mortgagor's knowledge, unless there be some consent on the part of the mortgagee to constitute the relation. Hewitt v. Loosemore observed upon. Espin v. Pemberton, 311

PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATION—The rule as to privileged communications between an English solicitor and his client, applies equally to a Scotch solicitor resident in England, not being admitted in England, and his client in Scotland. Lawrence v. Campbell, 780

— A solicitor who obtained possession of a lease from a client, which was claimed by a third party, cannot refuse to answer a bill filed against him upon an allegation that the information respecting the matters inquired into was obtained either in the character of solicitor or as a creditor of his client, neither will his claim to be a purchaser for value without notice in respect of a lien claimed upon the lease for a debt incurred by his client prevent his being required to answer the bill. Thomas v. Rawlings, 829

PROBATE—Discovery. See Will.

PROBATE DUTY—Where testator died domiciled in Scotland, and entitled to property in Scotland, and also to a fund standing in this court, and his executor, after the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 56, obtained a grant of confirmation of testator's will in Scotland, which he afterwards got sealed under the statute in England, this Court held it had no jurisdiction to question the sale at which the probate duty upon the fund in court had been assessed by the Scotch Commissary Court. In re the Trustees Relief Act, and the Trusts of the Will of Booth, 800

PRODUCTION OF DOCUMENTS—Testatrix devised an estate to trustees for fifteen years, and directed them to deliver up possession to such person as within that time should, to the satisfaction of her trustees, make out a right to the estate as heir-at-law to her uncle, who died owner of the estate; but in default of any such right being made out, testatrix devised the estate to L. W. There were two claimants to the estate; but the surviving trustee, after laying various cases before counsel and taking their opinions, was satisfied with neither. After the expiration of the fifteen years, L. W. filed his bill against the trustee and the two claimants to obtain possession of the estate; and upon motion by one defendant, a claimant, it was held the trustee was not bound to produce the cases laid before counsel, or their opinions, or any of the documents affecting the title to the estate. Wynne v. Humberston, 281

pany, he will, if the directors and the company are before the Court, be compelled to produce them, notwithstanding, by their answers, the directors say that the papers are in the hands of a third party, and the solicitor says that he has the documents, but that in his hands they are privileged. Gaskell v. Chambers, 388

— A. and B. had dealings together. B. afterwards became bankrupt, and A. filed a bill against B's assignees to establish the dealings. The defendants admitted the possession of copies of the examination of A. before the Commissioners, but refused to produce them, on the ground of privilege, as being evidence given in support of the defence. The Court (overruling a decision of the Master of the Rolls) discharged an order for their production, considering that they ought not to be produced until the hearing of the cause. Gandee v. Stansfeld, 436

— Legatee under a will filed a bill against the trustee who had raised money to pay off legacies, and against the mortgagee, who had lent the money, charging that the trustee had effected a certain mortgage; that he had borrowed the money for his own purposes, and not to pay the legacies; and that the mortgagee knew of the alleged breach of trust. The mortgagee admitted the mortgage-deed, "and for greater certainty as to the contents thereof craved leave to refer to it when produced to the Court," but denied the other allegations. The plaintiff obtained an order in chambers for production of the mortgage-deed. It was held, upon an adjourned summons, that plaintiff, who did not allege that the deed contained anything which would support his case, was not entitled to the production, except upon redeeming the mortgage. Howard v. Robinson, 670

— Defendant by his answer stating that he was a purchaser for value without notice, is not bound to produce the title-deeds of an estate to a mortgagee whose security preceded the purchase, though the bill charged that the deeds were fraudulently retained by the mortgagor. If defendant, in his answer, sets out partially the conveyance made to his vendor, he must produce the deed to verify the statement. Hunt v. Elmes, 680

— A corporation were sole defendants to a suit, no officer of the company being party for the purpose of discovery. On motion by plaintiff that defendants might file an affidavit, as directed by section 18. of 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, as to documents in their possession, it was ordered that the company should, before a day named, file an affidavit, made by one or more of its officers, as to such documents, unless they should in the mean time satisfy the Court that they could not procure such officer or officers to make the affidavit. *Ranger v. the Great Western Rail. RECEIVER—In the case of a receiver who was managing a business under the direction of the Court, a special order was made that, instead of the further fee payable under the Order of the 30th of January 1857, in respect of his gross receipts, the fee should be payable in respect of the net profits; and a sum previously paid in respect of gross receipts was directed to be allowed in the payment of subsequent fees. Buckmaster v. Buckmaster, 564

— A corporation, by act of parliament, was authorized to raise money by debentures upon the tolls, rents and stallages of the borough markets. The interest upon these debentures having been allowed to fall into arrear, the Court granted a receiver of the tolls, but held it had no jurisdiction to interfere with the corporation in the letting or management of the stalls, &c. in the market-place. De Winton v. the Mayor, &c. of Brecon, 598

REGISTRATION OF DEEDS—A memorandum charging a leasehold estate in the county of Middlesex with the payment of a sum of money, retains its priority over a subsequent mortgage duly registered under the 7 Ann. c. 20; and in a suit by the equitable mortgagee, he was held entitled to a foreclosure. Wright v. Stanfield, 183

REMOTENESS—In a gift by will to the present and future children of J. L, who should be living at the decease of the testator's wife, a direction that the shares of daughters should be settled upon themselves for life, with remainders to their children, is not void for remoteness as regards the share of a daughter born in the testator's lifetime, the gift not being to a class, but a separate gift in favour of each child. *Wilson v. RENT. See Apportionment.

RENT-CHARGE—The owner in fee of a small freehold estate granted twenty-two separate rent-charges to several persons and their heirs, each of which was made subject to the others; the whole fell into arrear, and the power of distress and entry could not be enforced. Upon bill by one of the grantees, on behalf of himself and the other grantees, a decree was made to raise the arrears by a sale of the estate. White v. James, 179

REVENUE. See Succession Duty.

REVIVOR AND SUPPLEMENT—The sole plaintiff in a suit to restrain waste, having died after decree, and having devised all his real estate to his son, the Court, upon the ex parte application of the devisee, made the usual supplemental order under the 52nd section of statute 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86. Jackson v. Ward, 515

SALE—A tradesman expecting the execution of a writ of fieri facias issued by the Court of Chancery for payment of costs in a suit, effected a sale of the whole of his furniture and stock-in-trade. The only document passing upon the occasion was a receipt for the money paid upon the purchase. A few days after the purchaser had taken possession the writ was issued, and the sheriff subsequently filed a bill of interpleader, upon which the question arose whether the sale was fraudulent and void. It was held, that it is not a ground for vitiating a sale, that it was made with a view to defeat an expectant execution; and under the particular circumstances of the case, there being no ground for saying that the purchase was not bond fide, the sale could not be set aside; but, there being facts of a highly suspicious character attending the transfer of the property, the purchaser was ordered to pay his own costs. The receipt given for the purchase-money not a "bill of sale" under the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 36, and therefore did not require registration. Hale v. the Metropolitan Saloon Omnibus Co., 777

SECURITY FOR COSTS—A plaintiff described himself of a particular place, and stated that his wife and family resided at this address; that he was a commission agent, and travelled about the country, but had been at his residence within the last few months. Upon an affidavit that he could not be found at his address, and that his place of abode could not be discovered, he was ordered to give security for costs. Oldale v. Whitehead, 333

— The Court will not require from a limited company security to be given for costs at the instance of a defendant who alleges that plaintiffs are insolvent, since the solvency or insolvency of plaintiffs can only be ascertained on the accounts being taken. Caillaud's Patent Tanning Co. v. Caillaud, 357

SERVICE OF BILL—Where a company amalgamate with another, and cease to have either officers or any place of business, the Court, upon a bill being filed, ordered the service to be made upon the late deputy-chairman and secretary, and directed that it should be good service upon the company. Gaskell v. Chambers, 385

— An order to serve a defendant out of the jurisdiction with a copy of the bill is wholly in the discretion of the Court, but it will look into the bill to see that the case made by the plaintiff is not such as prima facie will not obtain relief at the hearing of the cause, notwithstanding that the 33rd Order of May 1845 does not require evidence of the merits or truth of the case. Maclean v. Dawson, 742

SETTLED ESTATES ACT—Real estate was given by will to trustees, upon trust, to pay an annuity; and after the death of the annuitant, upon trust for all her children who should attain twenty-one. Some of the children attained twenty-one, and the others were infants. Part of the property was contracted to be purchased, and a petition was presented by the infant children for an order authorizing the sale, under the Act to facilitate Leases and Sales of Settled Estates (19 & 20 Vict. c. 120); but one of the Vice Chancellors refused to make the order, and his decision was affirmed. In re Burdin's Will, 840

A. and failure of issue of the marriage, to transfer the same unto, amongst and between J. F, R. F, W. F. and E. F. equally; provided that if either of them, the said J. F, R. F, W. F. and E. F, should depart this life without having acquired a vested interest, leaving issue, the share of such person so dying should go to such issue; but in case either of them should die without having lawful issue, then the share of him, her or them so dying should belong to the survivors or survivor of them. There was no issue of the marriage. J. F. and R. F. died in the lifetime of J. A. and S. A, leaving issue. W. F. survived J. F, and died in the lifetime of R. F. without issue. E. F. having survived both J. A. and S. A, she was held entitled by survivorship to W. F.'s share in the fund. In re Acott's Settlement, 383

SEWERS—The powers of local boards, under the Public Health Act, 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, for the construction of sewers, are confined to their own district; and the Local Government Act, 21 & 22 Vict. c. 98, extends the exercise of those powers beyond the district only where it may be necessary for the purpose of outfall or distribution of sewage, and not for the purpose of making new sewers. *Hayward v. SHIP AND SHIPPING—A. being equitably entitled to a ship entered into a charter-party with C, and afterwards mortgaged the ship to B, B, the mortgagee, having notice of the charter-party. The ship proceeded on its voyage, but shortly afterwards was obliged to put into port for repairs, which were paid for by B, and B. took possession of the ship. C. filed a bill against A. and B, praying specific performance of the charter-party, and for an injunction to restrain the use of the vessel for any other purpose than in performance of the contract entered into with C. One of the Vice Chancellors dismissed the bill; and, on appeal, this decision was affirmed, the Lord Chancellor considering that specific performance of the charter-party could not be decreed, the highest right against B. being to prevent him from actively interfering to stop the performance of the contract, while the contract remained in force, but that, under the circumstances of the case, the contract was virtually at an end, upon B.'s taking possession of the ship. *De Mattos v. — N, a timber-dealer in Sweden, had transactions with D, a factor in London, who sold timber on his account on a del credere commission. D. had sold for him three cargoes of timber. N, on the 29th of September 1853, wrote to D. a letter, in which he expressed a hope to be able in a few days to send the shipping documents of all the cargoes. Two only of those cargoes arrived. On the 6th of October 1853, N. wrote to D. inclosing invoices of timber shipped on board three vessels, and made out an account in which N. appeared to be a creditor for 1,312*l.*, and he drew a bill to that amount on D. On the same day N. wrote to H.

& Co., stating the value of the cargoes, and asking for three acceptances to the amount of 1,300*l*. He inclosed his letter to D, and the bill and the shipping documents, with directions to H. & Co. to deliver these last to D, on condition that D. accepted the bill for 1,312*l*., acknowledged the correctness of the account current, and admitted that the cargoes agreed for had been forwarded. These conditions were communicated by H. & Co. to D, who called the whole affair a regular swindle. D, after some hesitation, accepted the bill, but he obtained possession of the shipping documents by a statement that he wanted them to compare with the invoices, and would return them if from any cause he did not accept the bill. On this H. & Co. accepted N.'s three bills for 1,300*l*. D. did accept the bill for 1,312*l*., but refused to return the shipping documents, and utterly disregarded the other conditions on which they were to be delivered to him. It was held, that though he might have a prior equitable claim to these shipping documents, he had not properly insisted on it, and that he had thereby misled H. & Co., who had a legal right to recover them from him. Hoare v. Dresser, 611

— As between the owners of a vessel and the assignees of the freight, the wages of the captain and seamen and the expenses are proper deductions to be made from the gross freight. SOLICITOR. See Attorney and Solicitor. Trust and Trustee.

SOLICITOR AND CLIENT—After decree in an administration suit some of the plaintiffs filed a supplemental bill against their co-plaintiffs and defendants, alleging generally that it was inconvenient that they and their co-plaintiffs should continue to be represented by the same solicitor, and praying that the suit might be carried on between the parties to the supplemental bill in the same manner as it was carried on between the parties to the original suit. Demurrer to the bill, for want of equity, allowed. Peareth v. Peareth, 118

— A sale of real estate by a client to his solicitor at an undervalue, the client being in embarrassed circumstances, and not having independent professional advice in the transaction, cannot be allowed to stand, although upwards of twenty years have elapsed. A solicitor, who purchases from his client, must take care that the transaction is perfectly fair, and also that evidence of

that fairness is preserved, the onus of proof being upon him; and he cannot be heard to complain that the means of proving his fairness is lost by lapse of time. A right to sue is a devisable interest. Gresley v. Mousley, 620

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—By an agreement for a separation under seal B. W, in consideration of the agreements therein contained on the part of his wife J. W, covenanted with a trustee to pay for her separate use an annuity, in addition to the income to which she was entitled under her marriage settlement, and also to permit his daughter H. W. to reside with her; and J. W, who was entitled under her marriage settlement to an annuity of 400*l*. to her separate use, without power of anticipation, covenanted with the same trustee, that so long as B. W. should perform his part of the agreement, she would maintain, &c. H. W, and would not allow B. W. to be sued for her debts. Upon demurrer to a bill filed by J. W. for specific performance of the agreement, and for the appointment of a new trustee, it was held, that such a bill could not be sustained, first, because there was no consideration for the agreement on the part of B. W; secondly, because the stipulation as to the custody of the daughter was illegal; and, thirdly, because there was no trust property of which a new trustee could be appointed; and that to appoint a new trustee would be in effect to order fresh covenants to be entered into with a new covenantor. A covenant by a married woman having property settled to her separate use, without power of anticipation, is not a sufficient consideration to support an agreement otherwise voluntary. Walrond v. Walrond, 97

— A purchaser of leasehold property is bound to inform himself of the contents of the lease, and cannot avoid specific performance on the ground that it contains an unusual covenant, which was not mentioned in the particulars or at the sale. Grosvenor v. Green, 173

— An offer by letter to sell or buy a business cannot be carried into effect unless from the whole letter taken together an inference can be drawn from which the material terms of the contract can be ascertained. In the absence of that, it amounts but to an offer to treat, as nothing can be supplied by conjecture. What may be considered as fair inferences in such cases. Cooper v. Hood, 212

— When a defendant resists specific performance of a contract on the ground that he would thereby incur a forfeiture, the Court will look at the circumstances which gave rise to the danger of forfeiture, and if it arise out of the defendant's own acts subsequent to the contract, it will decree specific performance, and leave the defendant open to the consequences of his acts. Helling v. Lumley, 249

— A purchaser raised certain valid objections to his vendor's title, which the vendor refused to satisfy. The vendor gave notice, that if the purchaser refused to complete within five days he should re-sell and charge the purchaser with the expenses. The purchaser thereupon gave the vendor notice that he should bring an action for the deposit, if the requisitions were not complied with within a week. The action was commenced, and the vendor some time subsequently agreed to satisfy the requisitions at the purchaser's expense. Upon the purchaser's refusal, a bill was filed by the vendor for specific performance. The Court held, that the notice by the vendor of an intention to re-sell was equivalent to a declaration that he would not seek specific performance of the contract, and that the purchaser's action to rescind was effectual, and the bill was dismissed, with costs. Power of the Court to order the return of the deposit where the vendor's bill is dismissed, he having given an undertaking. Royou v. Paul, 555

— A company contracted to purchase the interest of leaseholders in a piece of land for a given sum, and for the conveyance in fee of a piece of the land which they were to take under the compulsory powers of their act of parliament. The agreement contained a clause that the company were to be consulted on any buildings to be erected in the line of street, and that differences should be settled by two parties named, or their umpire. The company held the contract suspended, and after their compulsory powers expired they refused to complete the contract. Upon a bill for specific performance, it was held the agreement respecting the buildings was vague, and that the Court could not decree a specific performance of the contract. Also, that as the agreement was uncertain, no compensation could be awarded; but as there was a concluded agreement, the Court dismissed the bill, without costs. Tillett v. the Charing Cross Bridge Co., 863

STATUTE—The Brecon Market Act empowered the corporation to purchase lands for enlarging the borough market, &c., and it directed them, within seven years after the act, to sell so much of the lands as were not required, the proceeds to be applied for the purposes of the act. They were also empowered to borrow money on debentures, and one holder was to have no priority over another. Power was also given to borrow money on mortgage, or by sale of the corporate property. The corporation was directed to apply all money received under the act, and the rents of the estates, and the tolls, &c. of the market, after paying various charges, in payment of the money borrowed. The act also contained a clause restraining the corporation, without the consent of the Lords of the Treasury, from taking, appropriating, using, selling, demising, mortgaging or alienating for the purposes of the act any messuages which they could not have taken, &c. before the act passed. Upon a bill by a debenture holder, it was held that a mortgage of lands made to a debenture holder, as a further security for money advanced on debentures, could not be supported; that such mortgage gave no priority or preference to the mortgagee; and that the lands comprised in the mortgage (being part of those purchased under the act) must be sold, and the money applied in discharge of the debts as directed by the act. De Winton v. the Mayor, &c. of Brecon, 600

— When retrospective. See Fines and Recoveries Act.

STAYING PROCEEDINGS—If two creditors' suits are instituted for the administration of the estate of a deceased debtor, and one is stayed by order of Court, provision will not be imperatively made for payment of the costs of the suit stayed in the suit to be prosecuted, but they will be left to depend upon the result of the assets after debts are satisfied. If two suits are instituted for one purpose, and one is stayed, no order will be made which will give the plaintiff in the suit stayed a priority for his costs, especially if the application is made in the one suit only. Canham v. Neale, 69

— The Master of the Rolls having decided that parties to a suit in a local court of limited jurisdiction could not apply to stay proceedings in a court of general jurisdiction, when part of the property in question was situate out of the limits of the local court (see Wynne v. Hughes, 283), on appeal, the Lords Justices ordered all the proceedings in this suit to be stayed, the plaintiffs here to have the conduct of the suit in the court of limited jurisdiction, they appearing in that court for that purpose. Wynne v. Hughes, 485

SUCCESSION DUTY—One of the Vice Chancellors held that the 2nd section of the Succession Duty Act, 1853, did not apply to the case of donees of powers; and that the 4th section of the same act did not operate by way of exception out of that section, but laid down the general rule to commence from a given time, for donee and predecessor in every case. Therefore, where a settlor, having by a settlement executed prior to the time fixed for the coming of the act into operation, reserved to herself a general power of appointment, executed that power by will, and died after the act came into operation, his Honour held, that the case was governed by the 4th and 12th sections of the act, and the property was not liable to succession duty. But, upon appeal, it was held, reversing that decision, that the property was subject to the payment of the duty, and that the case was within the 2nd section of the act; that the 4th section had no application, nor did the 12th section have any bearing on the question. In re Lovelace's Settlement, 489

TRUST AND TRUSTEE—The Court of the County Palatine of Lancaster has not jurisdiction to appoint a new trustee in place of a trustee of unsound mind not so found by inquisition. Such jurisdiction is given by the legislature (by the Trustee Acts) to the Lord Chancellor, or other persons intrusted with the care of lunatics, and not to the Court of Chancery. In re Ormerod, 55

— Upon a separation between husband and wife, a deed was executed, in which a trustee covenanted that, in the event of the husband allowing the wife to live separate and have the custody of their children, the trustee would indemnify the husband against the debts, &c. of the wife. Upon the decease of the trustee it was held, as the deed contained no power to appoint new trustees, the Court, under the Trustees' Relief Acts, had jurisdiction to appoint new trustees of the property. In re Matthews, 295

— If trustees, defendants to a bill filed against them for the execution of the trusts of a will, appear separately and sever in their defence, one set of costs alone will be allowed, and in the absence of evidence shewing misconduct, the Court will not order the costs to be paid to one trustee only. Course v. Humphrey, 327

— Mrs. E. Linzee, by her will, gave stock to her three daughters for life, with remainder to their children respectively. W. A. H. was one of the trustees. He ultimately became possessed of the whole fund, and sold out part and applied the same to his own purposes. G. E. V., by his will, gave 8,000*l.* consols to Mrs. Thorndike for her life, with remainder to her children. W. A. H. was one of the trustees. He ultimately became possessed of this fund, and sold it out and applied the proceeds to his own use. Mrs. Thorndike filed a bill against him (Thorndike v. Hunt), and an order was made that he should transfer into the court the amount sold out, and he accordingly transferred into court 3,253*l.* consols (which in fact was part of the trust estate of Mrs. Linzee). The dividends were paid for many years to Mrs. Thorndike. W. A. H. became insolvent, and the parties beneficially interested under the will of Mrs. Linzee filed a bill (Browne v. Butter) and soon afterwards presented a petition in both suits, praying that the 3,253*l.* which originally belonged to the trust estate of Mrs. Linzee, but which had been transferred to the name of the Accountant General in the suit of Thorndike v. Hunt, might be transferred to the suit of Browne v. Butter, and that the dividends which had been paid to Mrs. Thorndike might be repaid; and the Master of the Rolls ordered accordingly, on the ground that the 3,253*l.* was part of Mrs. Linzee's trust estate. The plaintiff in the first suit, Mrs. Thorndike, appealed to the Lords Justices, who held, reversing that decision, that the legal estate in the fund had by transfer become vested in the Accountant General for the purposes of the suit of Thorndike v. Hunt; that Mrs. Thorndike was a purchaser for valuable consideration without notice of the fraud, and was entitled to hold the fund against the parties interested under Mrs. Linzee's will. Strictly, a bill ought to have been filed, though the merits were so plain that their Lordships felt themselves enabled to decide upon petition. W. A. H., who was a solicitor of the Court, was ordered to shew cause why he should not be struck off the roll, and was struck off. Thorndike v. Hunt, and Browne v. Butter, 417

— Testator devised a public-house to A. and B., as trustees, upon trust, as soon as convenient after his death, to sell the same, invest the proceeds, and pay the income to C. for life, and divide the capital, after the death of C., as therein mentioned. Testator died in 1834. In 1836 the property was advertised for sale, and soon after, an offer was made of 900*l.* for it. The trustees having been advised that the property was worth 1,000*l.* did not accept of this offer. Shortly afterwards the property became depreciated in value from the scheme of a railway. A. died in 1842. C., the tenant for life, died in 1842. B. died in 1856. The property was unsold. In a suit instituted in 1856 for administration of testator's estate, it was held, that the property must be sold, and the estates of A. and B. held liable for the difference between the purchase-money and the rents from 1842, and 900*l.* and interest at 4*l.* per cent. from 1842. Fry v. Fry, 591

— A trustee having paid money into court under the Trustees' Relief Acts without making inquiries for the parties entitled to the fund, it was held, he must pay the costs which the cestuis que trust, who were officers in the Austrian service, had been put to in obtaining the money out of court. In re Knight's Trusts, 625

— In order to raise a trust by precatory words in a will there must be a certain subject-matter and a certain object; but it is not necessary that the object should be so defined that it can be distinctly ascertained: if there is a definite object intended, that is a sufficient creation of a trust to exclude the legatee from taking beneficially. Thus, where testatrix bequeathed to her husband absolutely a specific sum of 13,000*l.*, and requested that, after reserving to his own absolute use and benefit 2,000*l.*, he would make such disposition of the remainder as he might deem most desirable, to carry out her wishes, often expressed to him by word, and it appeared that she had never expressed any wishes on the subject, it was held, that there was a definite object intended; and though that object could not be ascertained, there was a sufficient creation of a trust to exclude the husband from taking the beneficial interest in the remainder of the fund, although the trust itself failed. Bernard v. Minshull, 649

— Where trustees of a legacy, given for the benefit of a lady for life, with limitations over, one of such trustees being also the residuary legatee under the will, refused to comply with request of tenant for life, that they would pay the legacy into court under the provisions of the Trustees' Relief Act, 1847, although she offered to pay the costs of the proceedings for that purpose, and she consequently instituted a suit and obtained an order for payment of the fund into court, the costs of the suit were directed to be paid out of the residue. *Handley v. VENDOR AND PURCHASER—Effect of an agreement by purchasers not to bid against each other at a sale of land by auction. In re Carew's Estate Act, 218

— Upon sale by auction, the property sold was described as leasehold ground-rent of 50*l.* per annum, amply secured on houses producing rental of 250*l.* let on a lease for the whole term at 82*l.*, held under two leases direct from the original lessor for an unexpired term of twenty-six years, at ground-rents amounting to 32*l.* The purchaser objected to complete, because the ground-rent was not amply secured, and the nature of it was not sufficiently set out. But it was held, that as the facts stated in the particulars were sufficiently explicit to lead to inquiry, and as, by the conditions, inspection of the documents was offered previous to the sale, the purchaser could not plead ignorance of what he might have made himself acquainted with, and the purchase must be enforced. Smith v. Watts, 220

— A contract for sale, by defendant to the plaintiff, of an advowson was entered into, subject to conditions of sale, one of which provided that if any objections and requisitions should be made which the vendors were unable or unwilling to comply with, the vendors might, notwithstanding any treaty or discussion in reference thereto, or any attempt to remove or comply with the same, annul the contract, without payment of costs. After the purchaser had accepted the title, disclosed in an abstract delivered to him by the vendors, and his solicitor had sent to their solicitor a draft conveyance for the vendor's approval and execution, the purchaser's solicitor, upon a search at the office of Queen Anne's Bounty, discovered that the rectory was subject to a mortgage or charge payable to Queen Anne's Bounty, of which upwards of 600*l.* then remained undischarged. The vendors having refused to comply with the requisition that compensation should be made in respect of the deterioration of the value of the advowson by reason of the charge on the benefice, and insisting upon their right to rescind the contract according to the terms of the condition of sale, the purchaser filed his bill for specific performance of the contract with compensation. One of the Vice Chancellors made a decree for specific performance, but without compensation, and ordered plaintiff to pay the costs of the suit; and, on appeal, the Lords Justices affirmed the decision in all respects, and the appeal was dismissed, with costs. Edwards-Wood v. Marjoribanks, 298

— A vendor put up for sale "the absolute reversion to the sum of 2,000*l.* consols," with conditions that any objections to title should be made within ten days after delivery of the abstract, and that the vendor, in case he should be either unable or unwilling to meet any objection that should be raised, might rescind the contract upon return of the deposit without interest or costs. The vendor filed a bill for specific performance, and the case came on upon motion for a decree. It was held, that notwithstanding the expiration of the time allowed for making objections to title, the purchaser was entitled to raise objections in respect to matters not disclosed upon the face of the abstract, which he had subsequently discovered, and which would render the title bad or doubtful. Also, that the vendor could not rescind the contract under the condition without first dismissing his bill, with costs. The Court refused the motion for a decree, with costs. Warde v. Dixon, 315

— A young man of the age of twenty-two, being the owner of a reversionary interest in a freehold estate, contingent on his surviving his father and mother, whose respective ages were fifty-four and forty-seven, sold the same by private contract. There was a doubt whether the reversion was in fee or in tail, but no steps were taken to ascertain its market value. Upon the death of the surviving tenant for life, after a lapse of thirty-eight years, the vendor claimed payment of a charge upon the estate, unknown at the time of the purchase, and he instituted a suit to rescind the contract, on the ground of fraud and inadequacy of price, or otherwise to foreclose the equity of redemption. It was held, a purchaser must, under such circumstances, satisfy the Court, by evidence taken at the time of purchase, that the purchase was bond fide and for full value; but that in the absence of such evidence the purchase must be set aside. Salter v. Bradshaw and Bradshaw v. Salter, 426

— A suit was instituted by a vendor for specific performance of a contract to purchase an estate which, by deed, dated in 1841, was limited to use of the vendor for life without impeachment of waste; and after determination of that estate by any means in his lifetime, to use of a trustee and his heirs during the life of the vendor, in trust nevertheless for the vendor and his assigns; and after determination of the estate so limited to the trustee and his heirs, to the only use and behoof of the vendor, his heirs and assigns for ever. One of the Vice Chancellors held, upon objection taken by defendant, that he was entitled to a conveyance of any interest which might have become vested by forfeiture or otherwise in the dower trustee, but no costs of suit were given to either party up to the hearing. The defendant appealed, on account of the decree not giving him costs, and of his having to pay interest from a certain date on his purchase-money. The appeal was dismissed, with costs. Semble—that the rule as to there being no appeal on the subject of costs alone is practically not now in force. Collard v. Roe, 560

— T. being the holder of certain shares in a company, upon which 20*l.* each had been paid up, and being also entitled to other shares in the same company, upon which 2*l.* each had been paid, instructed his broker to sell the 2*l.* shares. The broker sold the 20*l.* shares, and brought to T. for execution by him deeds of transfer in which blanks were left for the name of the transferee, for the number of shares sold, and for the distinctive numbers of the shares. The deeds bore stamps high enough to carry the 20*l.* shares, and were executed in blank by T. The deeds were delivered in this condition, together with the share certificates for the 20*l.* shares, which had been fraudulently obtained by the broker, to bond fide purchasers, who filled up the blanks. T. filed his bill to set aside the deeds, and it was held (see Taylor v. the Great Indian Peninsular Rail. Co., 285) that they were void, and that T. was entitled to the shares expressed to be thereby transferred, and to have his name restored to the register. This decision was affirmed on appeal. The practice of the Stock Exchange for a broker to deliver deeds of transfer in blank cannot prevail against the rule of law. Taylor v. the Great Indian Peninsular Rail. Co., 709

— The goodwill of a business comprises all the advantages that may be derived from the purchasers holding themselves out to the public as the persons interested in that business which has been identified with the name of a particular firm. Therefore, though it is well settled that the sale of a goodwill does not imply a contract on the part of the vendor not to set up again in a similar business, he is not at liberty to hold out to the public that he is continuing the same business by using the name of the old firm, even though his own name may be the only one that appeared in that firm. Churton v. Douglas, 841

— If a party executes a deed as principal he at once takes the property and makes himself liable for the purchase-money, and he will not be heard to say that no contract existed with the vendor, or that his execution was obtained upon the representation of a third party that the purchase-money was paid, and that he took the property in the character of trustee only. Wilson v. Keating, 895

VOLUNTARY BOND—A father having given a voluntary bond to trustees, conditioned for the payment after his death of a sum of money to them for the benefit of his two sons, afterwards, upon the marriages of his sons, assented to such bond being settled upon trust for the benefit of these sons and their respective wives and children. The marriages having taken place upon the faith of the provision thus assented to, in a suit for the administration of the father's estate it was held, that the trustees of the marriage settlements were entitled to rank as specialty creditors for value. The cases of George v. Milbanke and The East India Company v. Clavell observed upon. Payne v. Mortimer, 716

VOLUNTARY SETTLEMENT—A. and his wife, joint tenants in fee, in 1818 mortgaged their estate to B, the proviso for redemption being, that on payment of the mortgage-money B. should re-convey to A. and his wife, their heirs or assigns, or unto such other person or persons, and for such intents and purposes, and in such manner and form as A. and his wife, or the survivor of them, or the heirs or assigns of such survivor, should appoint. In pursuance of a covenant in the mortgage-deed, a fine was levied by A. and his wife. In 1823 the mortgage-money was repaid, and in 1827 by a deed reciting these circumstances B, by the direction of A. and wife, conveyed, and A. and wife appointed to a trustee the property to be held to the use of the wife for life, then of A. for life, and afterwards of S. (a daughter) and her children, &c. After the death of the wife, A. in 1854 conveyed the estate to his son for a valuable consideration. The son after A.'s death instituted a suit to set aside the settlement of 1827 as voluntary and void against himself, a purchaser for value. One of the Vice Chancellors made a decree in plaintiff's favour; but, upon appeal, it was held, that a power was created by the proviso in the deed of 1818, which enabled A. and his wife effectually to convey their interest, as they did by the settlement of 1827, without levying a fine; and that the wife's parting with her interest for the purpose of the settlement was sufficient to prevent the settlement being voluntary on A.'s part, and accordingly the plaintiff's bill was dismissed, with costs. Atkinson v. Smith, 2

— An attorney in insolvent circumstances, having assigned the goodwill of his business in consideration of a sum of money paid down and an annuity secured by bond to be paid to his wife for life, with remainder to himself for life, the settlement of the annuity was held void as against creditors. Neule v. Day, 45

— By post-nuptial settlement wife's reversionary property was conveyed to trustees, to pay the interest to the husband during their joint lives, and after death of either of them the principal to be in trust for the survivor absolutely. Upon joint application of husband and wife, the Court, upon the property coming into possession, treated it as unaffected by the settlement. Hogarth v. Phillips, 195

— To render a deed void as against creditors, it is not sufficient that it is merely voluntary, but it must be proved that the party making it intended to delay, hinder or defraud his creditors. On the question of a voluntary deed being void under the Statute of Elizabeth, all the surrounding circumstances must be looked at, and each particular case must depend upon those circumstances. Thompson v. Webster, 700

— P. B, in 1840, became bankrupt, and did not obtain his certificate, and in 1849 had a grant of leasehold property made to him by the Crown. The same year he settled that property on his sons and his daughters (then unmarried), and their children, but declared no trusts in favour of their husbands. The daughters afterwards married, and one of them had children. C. C. was a simple contract creditor of P. B, on a debt subsequent both to the bankruptcy and the settlement, and he filed a bill on behalf of himself and all other unsatisfied creditors of P. B, against the assignees, the trustees of the voluntary settlement, the sons of P. B, and the two daughters and their husbands, and the infant children of one of them, to set aside the settlement. One of the Vice Chancellors made a decree in plaintiff's favour, but considered that the husbands had no present interest, and that the wives and children were mere volunteers. On appeal, held, that plaintiff had no right to sue, he having no judgment, and not being in process of obtaining any; and their Lordships dismissed the bill, with costs, both of the appeal and of the original hearing. Collins v. Burton, 943

WARD OF COURT—A ward of Court married a fortnight after attaining twenty-one. Upon a joint petition of her husband and herself, asking for payment of a fund in court, part of her fortune, to her husband, the Court refused to accede to the prayer of the petition, though the wife attended and offered to consent; but a reference was directed to the chief clerk to approve of a settlement. Biddles v. Jackson, 40

— A female ward of Court married a fortnight after attaining twenty-one. Upon a joint petition of herself and her husband, asking for payment of a fund in court, part of her fortune, to her husband, the Court refused to examine the lady, who offered to attend for that purpose, and it also refused to accede to the prayer of the petition, but made an order directing the dividends of the fund to be paid to the husband during the joint lives of himself and his wife, without prejudice to any question. The order of the Court was made precisely on the same footing as if the lady had been examined in court, and had expressed in the strongest manner her desire that not any part of the fund should be settled. Biddles v. Jackson, 290

WILL—Construction of, as to vesting of legacy payable out of the proceeds of land. In re Hart's Trust, 7

— T. W, by his will, made in 1805, gave the residue of his real estate and all his personal estate to a trustee in trust for conversion and for accumulation, for the benefit of "such child or children" as his nephews and niece, Walter, Thomas and Dorothy, should leave at the time of their respective deceases, in equal third parts; and in case either of his said nephews and niece should die without leaving any children or a child, then such third share should be paid to the children or child of the other or others leaving children or a child, in equal proportions. And in case all his said nephews and niece should die without "leaving any issue," then he directed that the whole should go to the children of P. G, in equal shares. Walter, Thomas and Dorothy all died without leaving any child, but Dorothy left grandchildren. The Master of the Rolls decided that the word "children" should be interpreted so as to include grandchildren and remoter issue, and that the property was divisible among the eight grandchildren of Dorothy per capita, so that the gift over did not take effect, nor was there an intestacy. It was held, reversing that decision, that the words "child or children" must be read in their strictly proper sense, and did not include grandchildren or remoter issue; that "any issue" could not be read "any such issue," so that the gift over to the children of P. G. did not take effect, but that there was an intestacy. Pride v. Fooks, 81

— Testator gave leasehold premises to M. R. for life, and at his death to A. R. and her children; but if they should die without issue, in that case the property was to be divided between four persons, nominatim. A. R. had no children either at the death of testator or of the tenant for life. A. R. took only an estate for life, with remainder to her children. The rule in Wild's case has no application to personalty. Audsley v. Horn, 293

— The old rule that the Court would not admit a bill of discovery in aid of the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Court is not applicable to the case of a bill for discovery in aid of proceedings in the Probate Court, that Court not having the same power of compelling discovery as the Ecclesiastical Court had. An heir-at-law having been cited to see proceedings commenced in the Probate Court for the purpose of proving the testator's will in solemn form, filed several pleas denying the validity of the will, and filed a bill of discovery in aid of his pleas, and moved for an injunction to stay proceedings until answer. Interrogatories not having been filed, the motion was refused, with costs, but leave was given to move on a future day, after the interrogatories should have been filed. Fuller v. Ingram, 432

— Testator directed that, when the youngest of his two daughters had attained twenty-one, his real and personal estate and effects should be divided into three equal parts: one part to be for his wife, and one of the remaining two for each daughter; at his wife's decease her share to be equally divided between his two daughters; and, provided either of his two daughters should die before a division of the property should have been made, and having no surviving issue, then the part of the deceased to be given to her surviving sister. By a codicil, testator provided that "should both his children die in their minority, and leave no issue, then in such case, and in such case only," the property should go to his widow for life, and then over. One daughter attained twenty-one, and died without having been married, and afterwards the other daughter died under age and without having been married. It was held, the gift by the codicil to the widow for life, and then over, had failed. Maddison v. Chapman, 450

— Testator possessed of leasehold estates created a term for thirty years, which he vested in trustees to pay debts and to accumulate rents until the legacies were paid, and then to permit his son Benjamin to take the rents "until the son of my son Benjamin (if he shall have a son) shall attain twenty-one," when this son of Benjamin was to take the rents for life, "and after his decease, to the heirs male of such son, and the heirs male of their bodies." There were exactly similar provisions (in default of Benjamin having children) as to the next son, Lewis, and on failure of Lewis and his sons, then to the son of testator's daughter Abigail. Benjamin and Lewis entered successively into possession of the rents, and died without issue. Abigail had a son who attained twenty-one. It was held, the devise over was not void for remoteness, but that the rule as to freeholds applied in this case to leaseholds, and as in freeholds Abigail's son would have taken an estate tail, so here he took an absolute interest. Also, as the only legacy in the will was to be paid to a person in being at the time of testator's death on her attaining twenty-one, the direction to accumulate was not void. Williams v. Lewis, 505

— Testator, by his will, directed his trustees to accumulate the income of his residuary personal estate, "until the principal and accumulations should amount to the sum of 3,000*l.*, or thereabouts," and then to pay the income of the fund to A, B, C, D, E, F. and G. during their lives and the life of the survivor; and after the death of the survivor to pay the principal sum unto and equally among the issue of the said A, B, C, D, E, F. and G, who should be then living. At the end of twenty-one years from the death of testator (the period allowed by the Thellusson Act) the residue and the amount of the accumulations of the income thereof, fell far short of the sum of 3,000*l.* It was held, per Stuart, V.C., that the whole fund thus produced belonged to those who were next-of-kin of testator at the time of his death: but, upon appeal, it was held that the gift was not void for remoteness; but that the income of the fund, between the termination of twenty-one years from the testator's death and the time when the fund became divisible, belonged to the next-of-kin; Lord Justice Knight Bruce, however, dissenting from each construction of the will. Oddie v. Brown, 542

— Testator, by his will, gave all his real and personal estate to be enjoyed by his widow for life, and after her death to be sold, and the proceeds to be divided among his ten children equally. Testator directed that one of his sons should have a right of pre-emption for 450*l.* of a particular parcel of garden land, part of the real estate. After testator's death, and before the widow died, the parcel of garden land was purchased by a railway company under their compulsory powers; the compensation-money paid therefor, when freed from incumbrance, being represented at the widow's death by the sum of 882*l.* 18*s.* 2*d.* standing in court. It was held, that testator's son to whom the right of pre-emption was given was entitled to the compensation-money, subject to the deduc-tion of the price fixed by testator. In re James Cant's Estate. In re the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act; and In re the Eastern Union and Harwich Rail. Co., 641

— Under the 22nd section of the Wills Act, a general bequest by a married woman will include property over which she has a power of appointment. A bequest of "all and singular my other property and estate" will include not only everything not before mentioned in the will, but everything the previous disposition of which fails, unless it appears from the will that the property comprised in the previous disposition was intended to be excepted for all purposes from the residuary bequest, and not merely for the purpose of giving it to the particular legatee. Bernard v. Minshull, 649

— Testator bequeathed his residuary estate upon trust as to one moiety for his daughter M. for life, and in default of issue of M. upon trust as to one half part thereof as M. should appoint, and in default of appointment over, and as to the half part of such moiety, upon the same trusts as were thereafter declared concerning the other moiety of his residuary estate; and he proceeded to declare precisely similar trusts of the other moiety, substituting the name of his daughter E. for that of M. Both M. and E. exercised their powers of appointment, and died without issue. It was held, that each appointment effectually disposed of one moiety of testator's residuary estate. Atkinson v. Jones, 753

— Parol evidence will not be admitted to shew that a bequest in a former will had been inadvertently allowed to remain in a second will. Testator, in the lifetime of his niece E, made a will containing bequests in her favour. She afterwards died, leaving a grand-daughter, E. J, who was a great-great-niece of testator. With a knowledge of these facts, testator made a second will, which contained bequests to E, identical with those contained in his former will. It was held, that testator's great-great-niece was within the description, and that she was entitled to the legacies. Stringer v. Gardiner, 758

— Testator gave a legacy to each of his brothers and sisters (naming them), or to their "legal representatives," to be paid to them two years after his death, and legacies to his nephews, the whole amounting together to 6,100*l.* He then gave the residue of his property to his widow absolutely, except 4,100*l.*, which she was only to take for life, and after her death it was to be divided among his relations before mentioned, "in proportion to the legacies left above, which will just make their legacy double the first bequest." One of testator's sisters and two of his nephews died after the date of the will, but in his lifetime; and after his death the widow died. It was held, on appeal, there was not sufficient evidence before the Court to justify it in departing from the words of the will respecting the apparent miscalculation of the amount excepted out of the residue; and with regard to the postponed legacies, that notwithstanding the words "or to their legal representatives," the shares of the pre-deceased legatees in the amounts postponed to the widow's life interest lapsed, and that as the 4,100*l.* was not given as part of the residue, but as an exception out of the residue, those shares which lapsed fell in to the residue, and did not go to testator's next-of-kin. Thompson v. Whitelock, 793

— Testator, who died in 1822, by his will, gave to his brother J. B. a legacy of 100*l.*, to be paid "as soon as conveniently may be after my decease." He then gave an annuity of 50*l.* to H. H, to be payable out of his real estate, until one of testator's grandchildren should attain twenty-one, and on the happening of that event he directed his real estate to be exonerated from the annuity of 50*l.* and his real and personal estate to be sold, and the annuity paid out of the income of the produce. He declared that after the grandchild attained twenty-one the annuity should be a charge only on his personal estate. In 1839 the grandchild came of age and the real estate was sold, and the whole income paid to H. H. in part of her annuity until 1856, when she died. In 1858 J. B, the legatee, filed a bill for payment out of the trust fund, alleging that the personalty was not sufficient, but no personal representative of testator was made a party. The Master of the Rolls dismissed the bill on the grounds that the legacy was not charged on real estate, and that it was barred by the Statute of Limitations (3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 27). But on appeal it was held, that the personal estate was the primary fund; which there was no evidence was insufficient; that there was no personal representative of testator before the Court, and that by lapse of time the bill came too late. The appeal was dismissed, and leave to amend refused. Bright v. Larcher, 837

— If an estate is given to A. simply during the life of B, and A. dies before B, any person getting possession of the land after the death of A. will be entitled to hold it as the general occupant; but if an estate is limited to A. and his heirs during the life of B. a general occupant is not permitted, but the heir will take as special occupant, and not by descent. Semble—If an estate is given to A. and his executors and administrators during the life of B, and A. dies first, the executor would be capable of taking the estate as special occupant. In the case of an incorporeal hereditament limited simpliciter to A. pur autre vie, an executor or administrator may be a special occupant, but there can be no general occupant. If A, having an estate to himself, his heirs and assigns, during the life of B, conveys the legal interest to trustees, their executors, administrators and assigns, and the trustees die in the lifetime of the cestui que vie, the executors of the trustees will be special occupants, and A. will have no interest in the legal estate. If a tenant pur autre vie parts with the beneficial interest contingently, and the contingency does not happen, then there will be a resulting trust in favour of A. of the interest which he has not effectually parted with. Northen v. Carnegie, 930

— Testator (who at the time of making his will had three sons living), after devising estates to trustees, and directing accumulations, &c., appointed a time at which the estates were to be divided into three portions, and one was to be conveyed to the “eldest male lineal descendant” then living of testator’s eldest son. At the appointed time two persons were living who filled the character of “male lineal descendant.” One was a youth who was eldest in point of primogeniture: the other, his uncle, who was eldest in point of age. Under the words of the will, the former was held entitled to have the estate conveyed to him. Thellusson v. Rendlesham, 948

WINDING-UP ACTS—A person may be a contributory in respect of his application for shares, although he signs no written agreement to take shares, and does not, therefore, fall within the description of a “subscriber” mentioned in the 3rd section of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110. Ex parte Cookney, in re the Electric Telegraph Company of Ireland, 12

— If the directors of a banking company which is in difficulties, make a flourishing report to the shareholders and public of the financial condition of the company, and it induces a person to purchase shares in open market, or of third parties, and it turns out after he is registered in the books of the company that the report was altogether untrue and without foundation, and the company stops payment, still the purchaser is a shareholder and liable as a contributory. In re Liverpool Borough Bank, ex parte Duranty, 37

— Creditor of joint-stock company (limited) commenced an action against one of the shareholders. Petition for winding up was then presented, and notice given to the creditor, who, however, continued proceedings in the action until the advertisement appeared for a creditor’s representative. Creditor entitled to his costs of action up to the period of advertisement. In re the Welsh Potosi Mining Co., ex parte Tobin, 44

— A. B. was tenant for life of certain shares in a banking company, under a will of which his uncle was executor. At request of A. B., his uncle, a director of the company, transferred these shares into his name for a nominal consideration, in order to qualify him to be a director. A. B. became a director, and the company failed, and was ordered to be wound up. A. B. objected to his name being placed on the list of contributories, on the ground that, prior to his taking the shares, the directors had published fraudulent reports of the affairs of the company, and his uncle, being a director, must have known that they were fraudulent; and also that, being only tenant for life of the shares, it was a breach of trust on the part of his uncle to transfer the shares into his name, and that the directors must have been aware of the fact; and, therefore, that the transaction was a nullity. A. B. properly placed on list of contributories. In re Northumberland and Durham District Banking Co., ex parte Bigge, 50

— Where a company has been registered under the Joint-Stock Companies Acts of 1848 and 1849 as an unlimited company, and subsequently registered under the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 47. as a limited company, the Court of Chancery has power to make an order for the winding up of the whole transactions of the company. Ex parte the Plumstead, Woolwich and Charlton Water Co., 163

— A chartered banking company were empowered to extend their capital by the issue of new shares. A fraudulent report of the state of the affairs of the bank was made by the directors to a general meeting of the company, and by them adopted. The accounts had been audited by auditors appointed by the shareholders. In pursuance of the desire to have new shares taken, the directors issued a circular, which also contained false and fraudulent representations. N., upon the faith of the report and the circular, and also upon the representation of one of the directors, took shares, and received a dividend upon them. He afterwards employed his broker to dispose of the shares. According to the constitution of the company, the assent of the directors to a transfer of shares was necessary, the evidence of which assent was to be an indorsement on the deed of transfer. The broker employed by the bank purchased these shares, giving the name of E. as the purchaser. The transfer to E. was executed in the form which had been furnished at the bank, with E.’s name inserted as purchaser. E. was not aware of this transfer, but he had given authority to the principal manager to use his name in transfers, and he had accepted some transfers in which his name had been so used. The purchase-money for N.’s shares was paid by the bank. The next dividend was treated as part of the assets of the bank, and the shares were subsequently found in the principal manager’s possession, and given up by him to the solicitor of the bank as part of their property. The bank having stopped payment, N.’s name was sought to be placed on the list of contributories, and it was held that N. was not exempted from liability by reason of the false representation in the report and the circular, as the directors were not agents of the company for the purpose of making fraudulent representations, or beyond the scope of their authority as limited by the charter; but that the assent of the directors to the transfer of the shares by N. had been sufficiently shewn, and therefore his name must be removed from the list of contributories. In re the Royal British Bank, ex parte Nichol, 257

— S. took shares in a joint-stock company, and signed the deed, upon the representation made by one of the officers of the company that such deed contained a clause limiting the liability of the shareholders to the amount of their shares. This clause had been fraudulently inserted in the deed after complete registration, and was not contained in the registered deed. S. attended meetings of the company and received dividends for three years, when the company was ordered to be wound up. S. was held liable as a contributory. In re the Athenæum Life Assur. So.; Sheffield's case, 325

— The P. of W. Company effected a cross-insurance with the A. Society on the life of J, and the latter society was ordered to be wound up. The life dropped, and the P. of W. Company having paid the amount assured claimed to prove the amount as a debt against the A. Society, and moved that the official manager might be directed to make a call upon the contributories for payment of the same. The policy of the A. Society contained a proviso that the capital and other property of the company remaining at the time of any demand unapplied and inapplicable to any prior claim or demand should alone be liable to answer and make good the claims and demands against the company by virtue of the policy, and that no director or shareholder should be in anywise individually or personally liable or subject to any claim or demand beyond the amount unpaid of his shares in the capital stock of the company. It was held, the liability of the shareholders was expressly limited by the contract in the policy, to which the P. of W. company were parties, to the amount unpaid on their shares, and that no call could be made for satisfying a claim on the policy on a shareholder who had already paid up the full nominal value of his shares, or upon any other shareholder to an amount exceeding the sum due from him upon the shares held by him. Ex parte the Prince of Wales Life and Educational Assur. Co., in re the Athenicum Assur. So., 335

— Directors of a company, with the sanction of a general meeting of shareholders, issued preference shares at 6l. per cent. interest, which they had no power to do under their deed of settlement. Some of these shares were taken by a director, who sold a part to W, representing them to be preference shares. W. signed the deed of settlement. It was held, there was no fraud or misrepresentation on the part of the company which would exempt W. from the liability incurred as a shareholder, and that W.'s name must be placed on the list of contributories. In re the National Patent Steam Fuel Co., ex parte Worth, 589

— A holder of 100 shares in a company, transferable by delivery, knowing that the company was in difficulties and likely to be wound up, handed his shares to a workman in his employ for 2s. 6d. the lot. Five days afterwards a resolution was passed to obtain an order to wind up the company. It was held, that the transfer

could not be supported to the prejudice of other shareholders, and that the vendor, and not the purchaser, must be placed on the list of contributories. In re the Mexican and South American Co., ex parte Lund, 628

— B. applied for shares in a company, and having had 100 shares allotted to him, sold them without having signed the deed of settlement, or attended any meeting of the company. The directors, with the sanction of the shareholders, at a general meeting, declared all the shares to be forfeited where the shareholders had not signed the deed, but no power was given them under the deed to take this course. It was held, that B. was not discharged from his liability in respect of such shares, and his name was placed on the list of contributories; and, on appeal, this was affirmed, the directors having no power to declare a forfeiture. Ex parte Barton, in re the National Steam Fuel Co., 637

— W. was induced, on the representation of the secretary of a joint-stock company that there were to be two medical referees, and that he might be appointed one, to take 200 shares, whereupon he was appointed to the office. Soon afterwards W. discovered that there were four instead of two medical referees, on which he resigned his office, and demanded back the money he had paid for the shares. By the deed of settlement it was provided that if any shareholder did not pay his calls the secretary might send notice requiring payment within twenty-one days, and if the calls were not paid the directors might declare the shares forfeited. W. (under the foregoing circumstances) refused to pay his calls, and the secretary sent him the required notice, and added that if the calls were not paid within twenty-one days his shares would be forfeited. W. made default, and took no further notice of the matter, and the directors within the twenty-one days declared a forfeiture, but allowed W.'s name to remain on the share register for more than two years, when the company was wound up. One of the Vice Chancellors decided that there had been no such misrepresentation by the company as absolved W. from liability as a shareholder, and that upon the construction of the deed of settlement the forfeiture of the shares had not been completed, and that W.'s name must be placed upon the list of contributories. On appeal, it was held (affirming his Honour's decision) that there was no such misrepresentation or breach of faith as would exonerate W; but (reversing the same decision) that there had been an absolute forfeiture submitted to by W, whose name must therefore be removed from the list. Their Lordships also held, that whether the directors declared the forfeiture before or after the twenty-one days was a matter of form and not of substance. Ex parte Wollaston, in re the Home Counties Assurance Co., 721

— A company was established for working mines in a foreign country, without a deed of settlement, but according to the prospectus, and by the custom of the company, the shares passed by mere delivery of the certificates, and the affairs of the company were wholly managed by the board of directors. After several years the company was ordered to be wound up, by an order dated the 24th of November 1857. Messrs. G. and S. purchased shares a few days before the date of the winding-up order, and the scrip certificates of some of them were thereupon delivered to them, and the remaining scrip certificates after the date of the order. Messrs. De P. being the holders of shares, and being aware of the failing state of the company, and desiring to get rid of the responsibility, sold the scrip certificates absolutely and unconditionally, for a nominal price, to one of their clerks a few days before the order for winding up was made. The names of Messrs. G. and S. and of Messrs. De P. were placed upon the list of contributories, and it was held, that Messrs. G. and S. were liable in respect of all their shares, whether the certificates were delivered before or after the date of the order for winding up, but that Messrs. De P. were not, for that the sale by them was valid; wherefore the former would remain upon, but the latter would be removed from, the list of contributories. The holders of shares, bought in open market, although they may have been fraudulently issued by the directors, cannot on that ground claim relief against the other shareholders, whatever may be their rights and remedies against the directors. Every person purchasing shares in such a company as that described above, takes them subject to the liabilities of the company at the time of the purchase. A number of partners trading as a company, on the terms that their shares shall pass by delivery, does not necessarily shew that they are assuming to exercise the powers of a corporation, or render the company illegal. If a company not otherwise illegal was rendered so by the 4th section of the statute 19 & 20 Vict. c. 47, the acts done and debts incurred by it in the interval of time between the passing of that act and the passing of the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 14. (repealing the 4th section of the former act) are valid and binding on the company, and are not the mere acts and debts of individual shareholders. Ex parte Grisewood, in re the Mexican and South American Co., and Ex parte De Pass, 769

— The trustees of a freehold land society instituted a suit against defendant, and pending the proceedings the society became insolvent, and a winding-up order having been obtained, the official manager was substituted as plaintiff by an order of Court; but he was refused leave, by the Court making the winding-up order, to prosecute the suit. Upon a motion by the official manager to the Court, which had substituted him as plaintiff, asking that the suit might be stayed on terms, or that some order might be made for its future prosecution, it was held, that insolvency was no ground for staying a suit or preventing its being dismissed, and that the official manager must pay the costs of the motion personally. Caldwell v. Frost, 810

— An official manager appointed under an order made to wind up a company was by an order of course substituted as plaintiff in a suit instituted by the trustees of the company. He applied to the Court asking either that the suit might be stayed or that direction might be given for its prosecution. The application was refused, and he was ordered to pay the costs personally. Upon motion by defendant, which was served on the original plaintiffs and on the official manager, it was held that the bill must be dismissed, with costs. Also, that the application made by the official manager was not an adoption of the suit, and that he was not personally liable to pay the costs, but that they must be paid by the original plaintiffs. Caldwell v. Ernest, 811

— A shareholder in a joint-stock company presented a petition (against the approval of the majority of the shareholders) for winding up the company, alleging the loss of three-fourths of the capital (under section 67. of 19 & 20 Vict. c. 47); but the Court, being satisfied of the bad faith of the petitioner, and not being satisfied of the loss of capital as alleged, dismissed the petition. Under section 72. the order to be made upon a petition to wind up is entirely in the discretion of the Court. Ex parte Hawkins, in re the Metropolitan Saloon Omnibus Co., 830

— Upon winding up a company, carried on upon the cost-book principle, it appeared, by their deed, that shares in the company would pass by delivery of certificates; but no shareholder was entitled to a dividend unless his name was entered in the share register-book. A shareholder, who had transferred his shares, but whose transferee had not been registered, was held to be liable as a contributory of the company. In re Wrysgan Slate Quarrying Co., ex parte Humby, 875

— Under a supplemental charter a banking company, being empowered to issue new shares, a fraudulent report of the company's affairs was made by the directors, and adopted at a general meeting of the shareholders. In June 1856 M., a customer of the bank, took twelve of these new shares, executed the deed, and received the share certificates. In the next return to the Stamp Office his name was not inserted as a shareholder, and in the monthly balance-sheet the sum paid by him for the shares was treated as a debt from the bank. In his pass-book he was credited with interest at 4l. per cent. upon the sum he had paid on account of the shares. M. also attended two meetings of shareholders. In September 1856 the bank stopped payment, all the new shares not having been issued, and the affairs of the company were afterwards ordered to be wound up. M. a contributory in respect of the twelve shares, and not entitled to claim as a creditor in respect of deposit paid for his shares. In re the Royal British Bank. ex parte Mixer, 879

— A shareholder in a company, carried on upon the cost-book principle, relinquished his shares upon paying his pro rata portion of the liabilities of the company. All the formalities required for the relinquishment of such shares were regularly carried out and entered in the books of the company, and the correspondence was conducted with the purser, who fixed the amount to be paid by the shareholder without the sanction of the managing committee. The purser, being the authorized officer of the company to conduct such transactions, the shareholder was exempted from liability in respect of any excess of power on the part of the purser; and upon the winding up of the company it was ordered that such shareholder should not be placed upon the list of contributories. In re the Wrysgan Slate Quarrying Co., ex parte Birch, 894

— W, the partner of a firm, applied for shares in a joint-stock company, on condition that the firm should be employed to supply chains and other things manufactured by them, which the company would require in their business. The company was ordered to be wound up in bankruptcy, under the provisions of 19 & 20 Vict. c. 47, and one of the Commissioners placed the name of W. on the list of contributories; but, upon appeal, the order was reversed. Ex parte Wood, in re the Sunken Vessels Recovery Co., 899

WITNESS—In the case of a scrip company established previous to the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, transfer of the scrip certificates to new purchasers does not create new members or vary the company, or bring the holders within the provisions of the statute or render parties dealing in the scrip certificates of the company liable to penalties; therefore, a stockbroker, who had as a matter of business bought and sold shares in the company, is liable to answer questions respecting his dealings. In re the Mexican and South American Company, ex parte Aston, 631

BANKRUPTCY.

ADJUDICATION—Traders petitioned, under section 20. of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 119, for adjudication against themselves, and satisfied the Commissioner that their available assets exceeded in value the sum of 150*l.* They were accordingly adjudicated bankrupt; but it appearing at the certificate meeting that the assignees had not at that time actually realized that sum in cash out of the estate, the Commissioner postponed the grant of the certificate, adjourning the meeting for six months, with liberty for the bankrupts to apply when 150*l.* should be realized. Upon appeal, it was held, that if it should appear, as alleged, that the assets were sufficient to satisfy the requisitions of the statute, but that the realization was only postponed for the benefit of the creditors, the bankrupts were entitled to an immediate certificate of the first class. Ex parte Slater, in re Slater, 7

— A person, before leaving this country, gave a general authority (but it was not proved whether verbal or written) to his uncle to act for him in the arrangement and settlement of his affairs. Soon after his departure he was adjudicated bankrupt, and the uncle instructed a solicitor to dispute the adjudication. One of the Commissioners refused to hear the solicitor, on the ground that, under the 104th section of the above statute (12 & 13 Vict. c. 106), express agency was necessary. On appeal, the Lords Justices reversed the decision, and ordered “that the uncle should be allowed to appear before the Commissioner to dispute the adjudication by such solicitor as he should think fit.” “Such person,” mentioned in the section, does not apply only to the bankrupt himself. Ex parte Frampton, in re Frampton, 21

AFFIDAVIT—of admission of debt. See Trader-Debtor Summons.

ARRANGEMENT—A proposal for a composition was filed by a petitioning debtor under the arrangement clauses of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, and in this proposal was inserted, at the suggestion of the Court, a clause providing that the debtor's estate should be vested in the official assignee until payment of the composition. The debtor continued in possession of the estate, and at the time appointed paid the composition. It was held, the per-centage required by the 54th section to be paid to the chief registrar's fund was, under these circumstances, payable by the debtor. Ex parte Vero, in re Vero, 1

— A creditor on a bill of exchange accepted by traders issued a writ for recovery of the amount on the 21st of October. On the 28th of October the debtor served him with notice that a petition for private arrangement had been filed on the 26th. The creditor then discontinued his action, but on the 30th he caused notice to be served requiring immediate payment and proceeded on a trader-debtor summons for the same amount. The traders admitted the debt, but as they failed to pay at the expiration of the time limited, they were adjudicated bankrupt. One of the Commissioners confirmed the adjudication; but, upon appeal, his decision was reversed. Costs, under the particular circumstances, were not given against the petitioning creditor. Ex parte Arnold, in re Arnold, 11

CERTIFICATE—A trader who had made an equitable mortgage of ships to his brother was pressed by his bankers to give them security for his overdrawn account with them. The bankers produced an agreement, already drawn, to mortgage the ships, which he executed without informing them of the equitable charge. In less than six weeks he was adjudicated bankrupt. One of the Commissioners held, that he had been guilty of “obtaining the forbearance of a debt by fraud or false pretence,” within the meaning of the above-mentioned clause, and suspended his certificate for three years without protection, and then to be of the third class. On appeal, the Lords Justices ordered the certificate to be of the second class; but as there had been a departure from truth on the bankrupt's part, the decision was otherwise confirmed. Ex parte Holderness, in re Holderness, 20

— A timber measurer in a dockyard carried on the business of an eating-house keeper, which was managed by his wife. The latter business not thriving, he petitioned for an adjudication, which he obtained. He then sold the business, and handed the proceeds to the official assignee. One of the Commissioners granted him a second-class certificate, with the condition that he paid a certain part of his salary while he continued timber measurer until he had paid 7s. 6d. in the pound on the debts proved. On appeal, the Lords Justices granted an immediate unconditional certificate of the third class. It is against public policy that the salary of a public servant should be reduced by the application of any part for the payment of debts. Ex parte Harnden, in re Harnden, 18

JURISDICTION—Authority of registrar to make order after death of Commissioner. Ex parte Corles, in re Palmer, 15

PRACTICE—One of the Commissioners having refused to order office copies of proceedings in an adjudication which had been annulled to be furnished, in aid of a defence to an action in a foreign court, the Lords Justices, without deciding whether the Commissioner was wrong or right in his refusal, ordered the office copies to be furnished on the usual terms. Ex parte Sybrandt, in re Nevins, 14

PROOF OF DEBT—Two traders, partners, assigned the partnership property to trustees for the benefit of their creditors, after full payment to whom, the trustees were to hold the residue, upon trust to divide the same between the partners according to the deed of partnership. The partners had previously given their joint and several promissory note to their bankers for 1,500*l.* The bankers, by their public officer, executed the assignment for 2,755*l.*, which included the 1,500*l.* One of the partners afterwards became bankrupt. A suit was instituted in the Court of Chancery to carry into effect the trusts of the deed of assignment, and a decree for that purpose was pronounced. The bankers were admitted, under the bankruptcy, to prove against the separate estate of the bankrupt for the 1,500*l.* due on the promissory note; and the same was affirmed, on appeal. The technical rule against double proof does not apply where, as here, the partnership estate is not being administered in bankruptcy. Ex parte Thornton, in re Jobson, 4

PUBLIC POLICY. See Certificate.

TRADER-DEBTOR SUMMONS—A creditor, after assigning his debt, filed an affidavit of such debt (under 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. s. 18), and caused the alleged debtor to be served with a demand of immediate payment, and summoned him before the Court of Bankruptcy to state whether or not he admitted the demand of the creditor. The registrar (before whom the summons was heard) declined to enter into the question whether the debt had been assigned, and requiring the alleged debtor to state whether he admitted the debt or any part thereof, the debtor filed an admission as to part of the debt and a deposition that he had a good answer to the residue of the creditor's demand. Upon appeal, it was held, the creditor was not justified in making an affidavit of debt after assignment without the concurrence of the assignor, and that the alleged debtor was entitled to have his admission and deposition taken off the file. Sem-ble—that a proceeding by summons of a trader-debtor, if taken by the assignor and assignee of a debt jointly, would not be objectionable. In re Taylor, 9

— See Arrangement.

WINDING-UP ACT—A. B, the assignee of a debt from a joint-stock company to an amount under 50*l.*, upon which judgment had been obtained and execution issued, petitioned in his own name, and as attorney of the original creditor, for a winding-up order under the Joint-Stock Companies Acts, 1856, 1857. The Commissioner dismissed the petition as the debt was under 50*l.*, and the petition was not presented by the legal creditor; but, upon appeal, this was reversed, the Lord Chancellor considering that there having been execution, the amount of the debt was unimportant, and that the petition was regular, it being presented in the name of the original creditor. Re the London and Birmingham Flint Glass and Alkali Co., 17
